W.W. Montague & Co. the well known stoves, and agate ware dealers, -110 to 114 Battery St. make a fine showing, with the celebrated Van, Eureka, and Magic ranges as specialties, and all manner of kitchen utensils, artistically arranged.

In the central floor P. Rieger & Co. 511 Front St. have a handsomely arranged exhibit of flavoring extracts, and preserves, and under the band gallery,

the sweet cider stand

Sweetser & Delong, is a great attraction to the lovers of that beverage, because the cider is given away in delightful samples to prove it a pure article and a harmless but agreeable tiffle.

The display of Holbrook, Merrill & Stetson - 1113 California St. and 1719 Davis - is one of the handsomest stove exhibits - agate ware being a specialty, together with the famous Medallion range of which they tell me over 2,000 have already been sold on this coast. I give special prominence to these stoves, and culinary exhibits, because they are really worthy of it.

The sketch to your right, is of the exhibit of ~~Wain~~ Main & Winchester, harness manufacturers - 214 & 216 - Battery St. - It is close to one of the entrances to the Art Gallery, and is so picturesque, and pretty, that every season it attracts universal attention, and admiration. It is a picture in itself.

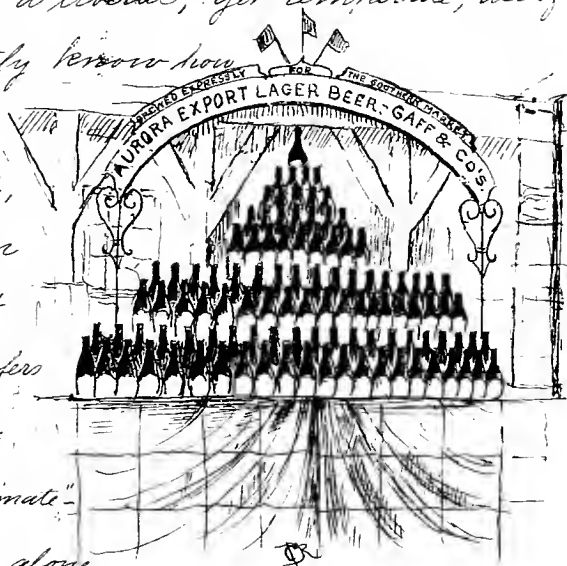

On the right hand side of the Northern corridor, just above the machinery department S & G Gump of 581 & 583 Market St. make a very tasty display and arrangement of handsome Mirrors, Picture, and Portrait frames. Rosewood, and walnut moulding, and everything that goes to beautify and adorn the dining room, and make the boudoir handsome.

The "Aurora Beer" exhibit, a sketch of which is given below, is something very much admired, by certain individuals with jolly bellies - not with good capons lined as in Bill Shakespeare's day - but brought to a jolly, and rotund degree of perfection, by a liberal, yet temperate, use of pure barley brew. I don't exactly know how many of our honest burghers.

have had an itching of the throat, and a keen sense of thirst, when passing these beer exhibits; but I do know, that the beverage suffers outside of the Pavilion. The Aurora Beer is "warranted to keep in any climate" - that is if you let the handle of the glass alone.

One of the handsome exhibits on the main floor, near the centre fountain, are the elegant cases of silver ware, from the Manufacturing establishment of Koehler & Ritter 26 Post St.

This firm makes a specialty of clocks, and bronzes, and also of diamond, cameo, pearl, and quartz jewelry, which they make to order from original, and unique designs.

The sketch to the right is of the exhibit of R. D. Hummel & Co. 221 Front St. agents for the celebrated "Magnolia Cans", and canned Salmon.

This same exhibit was made at the Centennial, and is very neatly arranged in an elaborate case. The Magnolia Cans, have a national reputation, and the canned Salmon, as a table article, is even more thoroughly appreciated in the East, than here where the rich fleshed fish, is a native of the waters.

The "Vienna Bent Wood Furniture" exhibit in one of the corridors, has attracted considerable attention from house-keepers. Chairs, and tables, that will neither strain, nor break, are a great desideratum - that is when they are handsome, as well as strong. This exhibit is made by Ackerman Brothers - 123 Kearny & 209 Sutter Sts. The firm deal in a multitude of house furnishing articles besides, and their store, and warerooms, are a source of great delight to the ladies, who so thoroughly appreciate, you know, the new inventions, and improvements, in the domestic line. Near the head of the Stairway, to the right of the entrance, Carlson & Currier, Agents for Belden Bros. & Co. silks, have a case filled with skeins, and spools of silk, of the richest shades of coloring. It is an exhibit, the beauty of which, can by no means be conveyed by a sketch. It must be seen to be appreciated, and being appreciated, by being seen, a detailed description, becomes absolutely useless.

And now by this time, I sincerely hope, that you have had enough of the Mechanics Fair. I have covered the entire ground for you as faithfully, as circumstances would permit, and if the effort has been a failure, I throw the entire responsibility, on the two artists, who instigated this thing. They have made all the mischief, obliging me to supplement it, with this most meagre, and miserable text - but I make no apology. Accepting any you may have to offer, I remain, Yours for the season. S.—

FOUNDRY, EDINBURGH, SCOTLAND.

WAREHOUSES, LONDON, ENGLAND

BRANCHES—TORONTO, CANADA; MELBOURNE, AUSTRALIA; SYDNEY, N. SOUTH WALES.

---

MILLER & RICHARD,

TYPE FOUNDERS,

Sole Makers of the Extra-Hard Metal Scotch Type.

Agents for the celebrated Campbell, Cottrell & Babcock, Potter, and Peerless Presses.

NO. 509 COMMERCIAL STREET, AND NO. 205 LEIDESDORFF STREET, SAN FRANCISCO.
SEND FOR PRICE LISTS AND CATALOGUES.

---

THE ARGONAUT,

A Political, Satirical, and Society Journal, published every Saturday, at 522 California St., by the Argonaut Publishing Co.

---

FRANK M. PIXLEY, }
FRED. M. SOMERS, } ..... EDITORS.

---

The "Argonaut" is essentially a Californian publication, bright, breezy of the Pacific, and the medium of the good things of current literature. Sent, post paid, to any address on receipt of $4.00, the yearly subscription price.

The "Sketch Book of the Mechanics' Fair for 1878" will be forwarded by mail, post paid, for 25 cents per copy. For sale by all newsdealers throughout the Pacific States and Territories.

THE ARGONAUT PUBLISHING COMPANY,

A. P. STANTON, BUSINESS MANAGER.

522 CALIFORNIA STREET.

---

BRITTON, & REY

PRACTICAL LITHOGRAPHERS, DESIGNERS, AND ENGRAVERS,

Steam Lithographic Printing in all its branches.

CORNER OF COMMERCIAL AND LEIDESDORFF STREETS, SAN FRANCISCO.

---

SLAVEN'S YOSEMITE COLOGNE!

F. S. CHADBOURNE & CO.
IMPORTERS & MANUFACTURERS OF FINE FURNITURE AND UPHOLSTERY
735 Market St. San Francisco.

The Argonaut.

VOL. III. NO. 9.

SAN FRANCISCO, SEPTEMBER 7, 1878.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

THE "AGGRESSIONS" OF RUSSIA.

The Impending Asiatic Conflict.

A cursory glance at the pages of European history over the eventful period embraced in the past three centuries will immediately attract the attention of the reader to the great changes and wonderful extension of the commercial and diplomatic transactions of the civilized nations. To mention and describe them fully would require volumes. Suffice it to say here, that the discovery, colonization, and conquest of America; the doubling of the Cape of Good Hope; the formation of the East India Company, which has led to the incorporation of India in the English Empire; the Turkish and Tartar invasions of Europe, and the subsequent wars which have forced the Asiatic hordes back whence they came; the immense expanse of Russian territory in Asia; the settlement of Australia; the opening of the Chinese and Japanese sea-ports to commerce; the extensive explorations in Africa by Europeans, to be followed by colonization; the construction of the Suez Canal; the proposed building of the railroads through the Euphrates Valley and across Central Asia—all these, and numerous other startling historical facts, make it plain to the dullest mind that this is, eminently the age of activity and liberal views. Unknown countries opened to civilization; barbarous nations put under control; immense deserts made fertile and habitable. These marvelous accomplishments of European energy and enterprise are sufficient to mark this as a most glorious century in the history of man.

There never has been a nation that has been more slandered and unjustly suspected than the Russian. To mention the epithets that have been applied to it would almost exhaust the vocabulary of satire and spite. We shall see presently that Russia, far from meriting such malignant opinions, has claims to the good and sensible judgment of mankind. The civilized world owes her a debt of gratitude which it can not afford to pay with insult and jealousy. We have been told that the European nations fear her, and that they should have interfered to save Turkey from her grasp. What ground is there for such a statement? There is nothing in the course pursued by Russia which should create the slightest suspicion. During the entire period of the recent struggle, the only noticeable symptoms of discontent appeared among the Turkish bond-holders, and those extreme English Turcophilists who would plunge their country into war for the maintenance of that dead-letter, the treaty of Paris. Beyond this, no protest against Russia was uttered. In Congress assembled, the European nations have in the main solemnly confirmed the accomplished results, and Turkey has been parted to the satisfaction of all except the Turk.

No one who is at all acquainted with the policy of Russia, as illustrated by her very shrewd diplomacy, will for a moment imagine that she expected that the treaty of San Stefano would be sustained by the Berlin Congress in its entirety. In that document Russia asks for a great deal more than she really expected to receive. She acted like many tradesmen, who put their merchandise at a value greatly in excess of the regular price, supposing that the purchaser will cheapen the wares. So we need not think that any humiliation has been heaped on Russia by the modification of the San Stefano treaty and the adoption of the Berlin compromise. Russia is sufficiently indemnified as the matter stands. The Berlin treaty can not be regarded in any other light than as giving to Russia all that she could have reasonably hoped for. Whatever may be thought of that agreement, the alternative of war has been temporarily avoided. It does not establish a permanent settlement. The guarantee given by England in the Anglo-Turkish treaty for the protection of the Sultan's Asiatic dominions, is like all other guarantees given by one nation to another, not only dangerous, but frequently useless. If England expects to act faithfully up to the spirit of the compact entered into, she will be involved in enormous risks. These arrangements will all have to be reconsidered and altered before a very great lapse of time.

Many persons who do not perceive coming danger until it is at hand, have sought to make light of Count Schouvaloff's earnest appeal to the Berlin Congress to protest against the employment of Asiatic troops in European warfare, and to draft measures so as to prevent the introduction of improved arms of war among the countless hosts of Asia. England may sneer and laugh at the warning cry of danger, but the other European nations which do not command Asiatic armies have given heed, and will take decisive measures to avert the calamity so vividly portrayed by the Russian plenipotentiary. It was not Russia that was "appalled at the potency of England and her dusky allies," but France, Germany, and Austria were alarmed at the appearance of an element that has more than once attempted to overthrow and destroy European civilization; and may, if not put under control, eventually succeed in doing so. The strong impression created by Schouvaloff on the diplomatic assemblage was very significant. The great English Premier remarked that the subject was foreign to the matter before the Congress. But Prince Bismarck and M. Waddington agreed that the question was of such momentous and overwhelming importance as to demand that another congress be called for the express purpose of discussing and acting upon it. I repeat that England did not frighten Russia by her Indian regiments and battalions at Malta, but she has aroused the fears of Europe. Many writers on the subject maintain that England should receive the support of the continental Powers, as she is the only nation that is able to checkmate Russia and prevent her domination. What an idle, ridiculous bugbear! We are to believe that the absurd fears on account of Russian supremacy will cause the great nations, Germany, France, Austria, and Italy, to fall on their knees and worship the sun of England; or, in other words, they wish us to understand that the nations of Europe will, for fear of the rising greatness of Russia, lie quietly down and submit to the yoke imposed by Britannia. The old story of jumping from the frying-pan into the fire. Such an idea could originate only in a mind that is unacquainted with, or misapplies the mighty truths of history, repeated time and time again. Did the nations of the world ally with the great Alexander and Caesar, or did they resist them? When Europe was threatened with French domination under Louis XIV. and the Napoleons, did they submit, or did they fight? When Spain was in the ascendancy under Charles V., were the European nations friends or foes? Did Europe worship the rising star of Prussia under Frederick, or did its nations combine against him? Are we not aware that the greater the power wielded by England is, the greater also will become the fear and envy of the continental nations, and the stronger will the alliance grow, that will curb any ambitious tendency on her part to become the dominating power of the world? The nations, instead of forming an alliance to aid England on to universal dominion, will more naturally array themselves against any such scheme on the part of the mistress of the seas. Nous verrons.

The outcry against the supposed plan of Russian aggrandizement is raised against a purely imaginary danger. Because Russia, like any other nation, has done some evil deeds in past times, she is to be made the object of a system of suspicion and slander, of which no other nation would be the object. We shall leave this groundless complaint to the judgment of those who can base their opinion on existing facts. No matter how often it is asserted that lust of conquest and ambition have been the causes of the growth of Russian Empire, the fact can not be successfully disputed that it has conquered and acquired territory principally in self-defense. The Turks, Tartars, and other Asiatic tribes, have committed her to strife, in which she had no option but to conquer or be destroyed. Russia has been forced to either annex and govern new territory, or relinquish what she already had.

It is the destiny of all conquering nations to be exposed to the necessity of advancing in their course. They are driven onward by invincible necessity. With them exertion is existence. Their fall begins with the first pause in their advance. Let us disabuse ourselves of all prejudice and speak fairly in the matter. Have not the Russians as much right to extend their dominions in Central Asia, as the English in the Indian peninsula? Were the Bosphorus and the Dardanelles to fall into the hands of Russia, would she not be as much justified in retaining possession of them as England has to hold on to Gibraltar? England and Russia are only following out their "manifest destiny," as every master nation has done and will continue to do to the end of time.

After a careful and impartial examination, one must be convinced that it is unnecessary to assume the theory of a settled scheme of conquest in order to account for the relations between the various countries of Asia. The relations, although continually disturbed, are the inevitable results of many concurring circumstances and accidents. Russian history reveals to us the fact that the chief motives of expansion have been colonization, defense against nomadic tribes, desire to reach the sea-coast to promote the commercial interests of the nation. We shall readily discover that the process has been greatly facilitated by the peculiar geographical position of the country and the autocratic form of government. Besides these reasons, the Russians, like other nations, are not entirely free from the foolish lust of territory. But this feeling is rapidly dying out. All the more thoughtful and influential Russians have already learned that extent of area does not constitute national greatness, and that it is often a burden. The idea of forwarding the commercial interests of the nation must be confessed to be a more serious motive that will continually increase in force. Russia aspires to be a great industrial and commercial nation; she believes that she will succeed in this by means of her immense natural resources and the enterprise of her people.

For a long time it has been the object of Russia to become a great naval power, and she has constantly endeavored to reach the sea-coast. To some extent she has succeeded; but neither the Polar Ocean nor the Baltic satisfy the necessary conditions. Hence it is that she has turned her eyes south to the Mediterranean and the Persian Gulf, and southeast to the Pacific. After gaining the shores of the Black Sea with great difficulty, she finds her design only partially realized; for the only outlet from the Black Sea to the Mediterranean lies through the Bosphorus and Dardanelles, which the Turks can open or close at will. Russia can not be at ease while the key of so large a portion of her empire is in the possession of the Turk. Is it, then, any matter for surprise that Russian policy should be so directed as to obtain possession of the straits, or at least to have them placed under European control?

Let us now turn our attention again to Central Asia. It is a truth confirmed every day that predatory tribes can be kept orderly when they know that they may be attacked on their own territory, and that there is no sanctuary to which marauders and criminals can flee. Therefore Russia and England must advance their Asiatic frontiers, until they reach a country whose government will keep order within its boundaries and prevent its subjects from depredating. It is then certain that they will eventually meet. The approach of these two great powers to each other in Central Asia need not awaken any groundless fears of complications. There will be no more danger of an Anglo-Russian conflict than there is at present. The wars that have taken place between Germany and Russia have not been as numerous nor as dangerous as those between France and Austria, although in the former case the frontiers are merely artificial, and in the latter a broad intervening territory separates the combatants. The old theory, that the great nations can be made to keep the peace by interposing small, independent states between them, has long since been exploded. Have Roumania and Servia ever prevented Russia from attacking Turkey? Nor will the new states of Bulgaria and Rumelia serve any more effectively as barriers.

Regarding the relations existing between Russia and China, the reader will readily understand them from what has already been written. Russia now possesses more territory near the Chinese frontier than she can possibly utilize for many years to come. She thus has no inducement to annex new land in this region, provided the Chinese behave themselves, and do not molest their European neighbor. But if China allows her subjects to commit depredations and perpetrate crimes, Russia will probably find conquest and annexation less expensive and troublesome than the maintenance of a strong military force along the frontier.

Central Asia has been to Russia financially a losing investment. Neither by its agricultural nor mineral wealth, nor by its commerce, nor by the revenue derived from it, has it repaid its cost. Nevertheless, it is impossible for Russia to withdraw from her position there. The consideration of her prestige would alone be sufficient to keep her there even at a still greater loss. Furthermore, we have previously seen that she will be compelled to continue her advance. How long this financial drain is to last, and how Russia is ever to be repaid, is very difficult to say. Railroads may bind the country more strongly to Russia by the ease of communication, and by affording increased facilities for the transportation of troops; but they can hardly develop a region which, as long as it is inhabited by the races now living there, does not seem to be susceptible of a much higher development. Experiments have been tried repeatedly with Russian and other European colonists, but no appreciable improvement was apparent. One final resort which is very promising of success remains yet for trial. Under the Chinese several provinces in Central Asia, which are now nearly worthless, were productive, prosperous, and thickly populated. Perhaps the patient and economical industry of the Chinese would greatly enhance the prosperity and productiveness of Turkistan, Bokhara, Khokand, etc. At all events, this experiment should be attempted. Let England, Russia, the other European nations, and last, but by no means least, America, take this matter in hand and give it their most careful consideration. Perhaps by this means the tide of Mongolian immigration that threatens to overwhelm us may be turned in the direction of the Asiatic provinces before mentioned. This may be the correct solution of the great Chinese problem. "The Chinese must go" to Central Asia.

The marvelous progress of Russia and England in Asia are as little regarded as if nothing were involved in such radical changes; as if Europe was not threatened by the tremendous power wielded by the English in the shape of Asiatic warriors on the one hand, or as if it could not be endangered by the wondrous growth of the already colossal Russian Empire on the other. The events we have narrated are so extraordinary that the most extravagant speculator holds his breath in contemplating the possible results. Changes which would have formerly convulsed the civilized world from end to end, are now considered as matters of course. The Russian and English expeditions to Central Asia are some of the most memorable events of history. For the first time the armies of civilized Europe have pushed forward into the heart of Asia, and carried their victorious standards into the strongholds of Mohammedanism—the cradle of the Mogul Empire. Neither the almost insurmountable obstacles of nature, nor the formidable resistance of fierce and barbarous races, could stay their advance. The European race has asserted its superiority over the Asiatic. Such incredible and unprecedented events can not fail to awaken every thoughtful mind. They speak volumes as to the mighty step in progress taken by the human race in the past five centuries. They indicate the vast power of modern civilization which has reversed the heretofore order of nature, and caused the tide of conquest which rolled from Asia and almost destroyed Europe to turn back on itself and be overwhelmed by the still stronger tide of European civilization. Asiatic despotism and fanaticism have seen their doom sealed. In their stead will be substituted enlightened governments that will serve as aids, rather than as drawbacks, to the intellectual advancement of the age.

ISAAC FREED

At the instance of the Mayor our citizens have a ten Postmaster-General Key a reception, on Monday next, at the Palace Hotel.

HANDSOME JACK.

The Mystery of the Little 'Un and the Big 'Un

All was commotion this evening in Sandy Flat; the excitement was greatest, though, in the Nugget, the general rendezvous of the miners. In fact, the conversation became so interesting that some of the most reliable and regular players pushed their chairs back near to the stove, and, assuming a comfortable position, determined to discuss the subject thoroughly and have it settled at once. There was a silence of a few moments after a while, each face wearing a thoughtful expression, as though each man was at his very wits' ends what next to say, when a solemn voice from behind the bar was heard, in hopeless tones, to say: "Well, boys, it beats me."

This remark produced a noticeable confusion among the miners, for it was Sam Noyes who spoke, whose remarks carried immense weight; for, besides being the most important man in town, in virtue of the functions devolving upon him as bar-tender, he was the acknowledged philosopher of the Flat, and for him to be "beaten" left scarcely a single ray of hope for any one else. Although they had been discussing the subject for two hours, still they were loth to forsake it, even after Sam Noyes had consigned its solution to utter hopelessness.

The silence was next broken by Jim Marshall, whose face was barely discernible behind the dense cloud of smoke that floated before him, and which spoke "volumes" in proof of the profound thought in which he had been absorbed.

"Boys," said he, "they're a mighty fine lookin' pair, anyhow, 'specially the little 'un."

This remark had been made no less than a dozen times by Jim since the arrival of the two ladies by the evening stage, and every time he reiterated it he added more stress to "specially the little 'un."

"The big 'un isn't to be sneezed at, neither," added Bill Turner.

Bill Turner's name fitted him exactly, for he was ready at all times to "go into" every new thing heard of or that happened to come his way. First in starting off to any new diggings that were heard of, and first to return with a big disgust; first to get into a row, and first to beat a disgraceful retreat. So to-night he was, as ever, ready to take part in the discussion; and, in fact, he took a most lively interest in it, for he had cast more than a friendly eye on the "little 'un" as she alighted from the stage, and, true to his fickle nature, he was immediately a captive to her charms; for indeed she was very pretty, as in fact was the larger one. The cause of his remark in reference to this latter was that made by Jim Marshall. Bill had a wholesome dread of James; and well he might, for their natures were as unlike as the stately pine and the scrubby chaparral, which difference had often been proved to Bill's shame; so when he heard Jim Marshall express such a decided preference for the smaller of the two ladies, he, true to his name and nature, immediately transferred his affections to the larger one; still he felt a little nettled, and ventured a depreciatory remark:

"But, boys, you know she looks a little—well—" catching the eye of Jim.

"Well, now, how does she look? Out with it," said Jim.

"That's what I was agoin' to say—she's a mighty fine lookin' gal," added Bill.

But Jim knew that that was not what he had intended to say; still he remained silent, and as the night was pretty far spent and adjournment in order, the convention disbanded.

There was a little scene that night, however, not witnessed by many of the miners, which took place outside of the Nugget. The actors were two, namely: Jim Marshall and Bill Turner.

"Now, Bill, I want you to tell me what you was goin' to say about that little 'un," said Jim.

"I wasn't goin' to say anything, I swear I wasn't," gasped Bill, for by the fierce visage of the man before him he knew that he was wholly in earnest.

"Now, see here, Bill, if ever you say a word agin them unpertected gals—"

Bill did not wait to hear the rest, but "You can jest chaw me up, if I do," he put in.

With an approving nod, Jim walked away toward his cabin, and Bill toward his.

Away down among the chaparral there glimmered a faint light that sent its timid rays out through the little window, which were soon lost in the surrounding darkness of the wooded mountains. If we take a look into the cabin through the window, what do we see? Two ladies, evidently sisters, but not the least alike in appearance. One tall and stately, rather dark, with long dark hair, that hangs carelessly down her back as she sits gazing affectionately at the sweet face before her—that of the one who had been christened by the miners the "little 'un." She, the smaller one, is fair, sweet-faced and child-like; her face as smooth and soft as the velvety wing of a butterfly; and now, over the sweet, deep blue eyes the lids unconsciously fall, and her nodding head slowly drops and is caught by the hand of her sister, who lays it gently on her breast; and there, like an innocent babe, she lies sleeping, with the arms of her sister encircling her, while two dark eyes look down with a love akin to pity upon the face of the unconscious girl. But why did they come here? The question might well puzzle the brain of the most thoughtful miner. Here, in this isolated cabin, far up in the Sierras, miles away from any of their kind—why did they come here, and what do they intend to do? These questions were again passed upon the next night at the Nugget, with the same result as the night before, although Bill Turner had called at the cabin that day. "Jest to see if they wanted anything, bein' strangers." His exclamations were loud in praise of the new-comers, but his curiosity was as great as before, his call not having elicited anything whatever that would give a clue to their mysterious presence in this rough mining camp.

The next evening Jim Marshall had disappeared from the Nugget, and reappeared to but very few in his best clothes, scaling the rocks around the edge of the camp, trying to avoid the gaze of his companions; for well he knew that if he was seen making his way toward the little cabin down in the chaparral his peace of mind would suffer utter ruin. So, unobserved as he thought, he reached the door of the cabin, in answer to his knock, the door was opened by the "little 'un," who invited him in and spoke in the kindest and, as he thought, sweetest manner he had ever heard; and she offered her sister's excuses for not being present, she pleading illness. During the conversation which followed he plied questions (being originally a Yankee, of course he couldn't help it, but in no way did he make himself offensive; but, adroit as were his questions, he elicited little more information than Bill Turner had. He was ashamed to let the fair creature before him know that he had not yet learned her name—the fact being that no one in camp had—so he cautiously ventured:

"Hem, mum, how do you spell your name?"

A slight twinkle was visible around her eyes as she slowly spelled "S-m-i-t-h."

"Thankee, mum, thankee," he said, very much confused; "rather—a—peculiar—name;" and his tanned face grew almost blue with what would have been a blush had it been of a fairer hue. Jim was sorry he had put that question, for, as he expressed it several weeks after in the Nugget, he "had held his own" till then. What added more to his confusion was just the slightest ripple of laughter from the adjoining room where the ill lady was. He soon, however, pleaded the lateness of the hour, and, after a kind invitation to "call again," departed toward his own cabin, where he divested himself of his present clothes and put on more comfortable ones, appearing in his accustomed place in the Nugget, looking as innocent as a lamb, only an hour late. That night every miner in town knew what the name of the two young ladies was, which information Jim Marshall had the honor and indiscretion to impart.

"But how did you find it out?" asked one.

"Oh, I got it from the stage driver this evening," he replied, and resumed his pipe.

"Why, I asked him last evening, and he said he didn't know nothin' about 'em," was the bombshell that Bill Turner dropped on Jim Marshall's head.

There was a short silence; then Jim added, slowly:

"Well, mebbe he forgot." But it would not do. There were a few winks passed around, and then Sam Noyes put in, significantly:

"Say, Jim, where was you goin' to-night with your store clothes on when I see you crossin' the little cañon?"

Jim arose and made quick time for the door, to escape the roar which he knew was approaching, but which caught him before he reached the door; but, through his closed teeth, as he shook his fist at poor Bill, he was heard to hoarsely whisper, "Damn you!"

For a week after this disastrous night Jim Marshall was not seen at the Nugget, and did not care to talk with any one whom he met; but one thing was noticed, that he no longer made his visits to the cabin down in the chaparral a secret; and those visits grew more frequent, as did also those of Bill Turner. Jim soon returned to the Nugget, and, after suffering a little for the sport of "the boys," settled back into his original condition of comfort.

So the weeks passed on into months; still the same impenetrable mystery hung around the occupants of the isolated little cabin. At the end of three months it was pretty well settled that Jim Marshall and the "little 'un" were engaged, and Bill Turner frankly admitted that he and the larger one were.

One evening Jim called at the cabin, and, as it was no unusual occurrence, found that Bill Turner had preceded him; and, as was always the case whenever Jim called, the adored of William pleaded illness, excused herself, and disappeared. This seemed singular to Jim as well as to Bill, but still it was never spoken of; and on such occasions the latter would don his hat and also disappear; but this evening he saw fit to remain, and, as his chief topics of conversation were narrations of wild and romantic adventures, he started in with some of the most startling and blood-curdling, of which he generally was the hero. Jim took no interest in these recitals of imaginary adventures, and only wished he could have administered his boot to this loquacious gentleman and retained the good graces of the fair one before him. So he smothered his wrath, and forced himself to listen to Bill's stories until he heard him mention the name of a person who had been suspected of the murder of the sheriff in the adjoining county; this man's name was Jack Redman, but better known as "Handsome Jack." Bill said he knew that Jack was was guilty because he saw the murder. Both of the men were a little confused when they looked at the girl in front of them. Her face was deathly pale.

"Did you say you saw him kill the sheriff?" said Miss Smith, timidly.

"Yes, 'um; saw him shoot him," replied Bill.

"Say, Bill," put in Jim, "what kind of a lookin' man was Handsome Jack?"

"Well," he answered, "he was about six feet, had a heavy beard, and was a pretty fine lookin' feller."

"Did he have his thumb and forefinger on his left hand cut off?" asked Jim.

"Yes, yes; come to think of it, he did," he replied.

Jim thirsted for blood; so, seeing his chance, he bore down upon his enemy.

"Beggin' your pardon, mum," said he, "this feller has been lyn' all this evening. Now, you see, I know Handsome Jack—"

"Do you?" broke in Miss Smith, quickly.

"Yes, 'um—do you?"

"O, no, no," she replied, "but—I've heard of him."

"Yes, 'um, I know him," he went on, "and he was one of the best lookin' fellers I ever see."

"Yes," said she.

"Yes, 'um; he's about five foot six." Then turning to Bill. "And he ain't got his thumb and forefinger cut off."

After a pause, he continued:

"Yes, 'um, and I'll jest tell you all about it. He was 'spected of killin' the sheriff; they caught him, and he had his trial; everything looked purty blue for him; the jury went out, and when they came back the next morning—they was kept locked up all night—they brought a verdict of 'Not guilty.'"

The fair face before the speaker grew still whiter as he spoke those words which have made so many hearts leap for joy, and then she arose and looked him in the face, and with trembling lips she asked:

"And he was saved?"

"That's morn' I can tell," said he; "cause when we was let out in the morning the bird had flew."

"When who were let out?" she said, quickly.

"Why, the jury. I was foreman of the jury that acquitted him," he replied.

"Thank God," she said; and the fair head fell back, and she would have fallen had not the strong arms of Jim Marshall caught her.

At the same time there was a sound from the adjoining room, like a sigh of relief; then the inanimate form which Jim held in his arms began to revive; and soon the lids rose from the blue eyes, a smile flitted across the sweet face, and Jim, much agitated, and forgetting the presence of any one else, kissed the white brow of the lovely girl. She soon revived sufficiently to sit, and Jim, after putting some water to her lips, excused himself, and, followed by Bill at a distance, moved away from the cabin. Strange were the thoughts that passed through the minds of the two men that night and the next day. They felt that the mystery of these two persons was daily increasing, growing deeper and more insoluble. How do they live? Why do they live here? Where did they come from? And many other questions, equally mystifying, arrayed themselves defiantly before their minds.

The next evening, at the Nugget, the incidents of the previous evening were fully detailed, for, sure enough, Bill Turner had told the whole thing, including the kiss, and it was with much trepidation and misgiving that Jim Marshall ventured to face the frequenters of this rendezvous; but when he entered, the excitement in the immediate vicinity of Bill Turner was so great that he slipped into his place almost unnoticed.

In a few moments, Sam Noyes came running out of the back room, into which he had just stepped, and cried:

"Where's Jim Marshall?"

Seeing him at the same instant, he beckoned him into the room which he had just left, and the men waited breathlessly for his return; and, in fact, some of the more curious followed him, and then they saw a sight that made the blood of at least one of their number boil.

But what was it? Through the window of the cabin down in the chaparral they saw the sweet little Miss Smith, with her head lying affectionately upon the breast of a man, his arms encircling her waist, while he imprinted kisses upon her upturned lips. It was too much for Jim; he rushed out through the saloon, and down toward the cabin, with pistol in hand.

"Foller him, boys, foller him," cried Sam Noyes, fearful lest the infuriated man should commit a rash deed.

The saloon poured forth its occupants, Bill Turner heading the crowd, and who reached the cabin at almost the same instant that Jim did, and in a moment the cabin was full of breathless, panting men. Standing at one end was a fine-looking young man, supporting the trembling form of the frightened girl. In his hand he held a pistol, ready to shoot the first man who made a move. No one seemed to know the stranger. His eyes were fixed on Jim Marshall, who in return glared at the intruder like a panther, and was the first to speak.

"Handsome Jack!" said he.

"Jim Marshall!" was the reply.

"Who is she?" gasped Jim, pointing.

"My wife!" came in a firm, manly voice.

The next morning there were two deserted claims over in the cañon; the cabins that the day previous had covered the heads of Jim Marshall and Bill Turner were now untenanted, and at night, when Sam Noyes looked out of his back-window toward the little cabin down in the chaparral, all was darkness.

L. H. CUMMINS.

Pony Glasses of French Brandy.

Le style des vrais amants est limpide. C'est une eau pure qui laisse voir le fond du cœur entre deux rives ornées des riens de la vie, émaillées de ces fleurs de l'âme nées chaque jour et dont le charme est enivrant, mais pour deux êtres seulement. Aussi, dès qu'une lettre d'amour peut faire plaisir à un tiers qui la lit, est-elle à coup sûr sortie de la tête et non du cœur.—Balzac.

Tous nos goûts sont des réminiscences.—Lamartine.

L'homme doit se mettre au-dessus des préjugés, et la femme s'y soumettre.—Mme. Necker.

L'oubli est la fleur qui croît le mieux sur les tombeaux.—G. Sand.

La vie ne semble souvent qu'un long naufrage dont les débris sont l'amitié, la gloire et l'amour. Les rives du temps qui s'est écoulé pendant que nous avons vécu en sont couvertes.—Mme. de Staël.

Dans la jeunesse, nous vivons pour aimer; dans un âge plus avancé, nous aimons pour vivre.—Saint-Evremond.

De toutes les ruines du monde, la ruine de l'homme est assurément la plus triste à contempler.—Th. Gautier.

"En amour, les vieux fous sont plus fous que les jeunes.—La Rochefoucauld.

M. de Richelieu envoyant une invitation à souper à Mme. de la Popelinière, Voltaire, qui était présent y ajouta ce quatrain:

Un dindon tout à l'ail, un seigneur tout à l'amour,
A souper vous sont destinés;
On doit quand Richelieu paraît dans une chambre
Bien défendre son cœur et bien boucher son nez.

Les femmes aiment la ténacité. Quand on les étonne on les intéresse, et quand on les intéresse on est bien près de leur plaire.—Ch. Nodier.

Tous les hommes sont fous, il faut pour n'en point voir S'enfermer dans sa chambre et briser son miroir.
—Marquis de Sade.

La coquetterie est le premier pas de la galanterie.

L'hypocrisie est une trahison permanente.

La calomnie est un assassinat moral.

Il n'y a rien de moins innocent que les jeux innocents.

La vie est une fleur, l'amour en est le miel.—J. Hugo.

Le sage ne se repent pas, il se corrige. Le peuple ne se corrige pas, il se repent. Les femmes se jettent dans la pénitence sans se corriger, et même sans se repentir. La pénitence est le dernier plaisir des femmes.—Lemontey.

LOVE AND LOVING.

With Testimony of the Poets Thereon.

"Somebody's courting somebody
Somewhere or other to-night;
Somebody's whispering to somebody,
Somebody's listening to somebody,
Under the clear moonlight."

Ah, yes! Somebody's courting somebody—somebody, always the same indefinite somebody—and, as well might be said, everybody. Everybody loves somebody, and a good many somebodies pretend to love everybody—though they don't. Queer thing is love, as we can all attest. Adam knew, Eve knew, and so have known their sons and daughters after them. Man may master everything but his own passion. With it he was endowed by nature; until nature deprives him of it he remains its slave. Prudes may draw in the corners of their mouths, may prate of virtue in love, or denounce its absence; but look well to them, fathom their motives, and you will find that either nature has slighted them, or their love has been allowed to die within them. A clear case of "sour grapes" can be proven against them. Despite their pratings, nature will govern; love, coming whence and why for no one knowing, will still sway the world, and defy comprehension. Nothing more than its duties and minor emotions can be experienced (not solved) by man. Shakspeare found that to love

"—is to be all made of sighs and tears,
It is to be all made of faith and service;
It is to be all made of fantasy;
All made of passion, and all made of wishes:
All adoration, duty, and observance;
All humbleness, all patience and impatience;
All purity, all trial, all obedience."

Thus, to love in accordance with an ethical view, one must be an epitome of heavenly virtues, a condition that, lamentable though it may seem, as yet very few may boast of. Nor is it at all likely that any very strenuous efforts will be made to acquire it. One writer says that "love gives wits to the fool and manners to the clown," but an intelligent observer would opine that love makes fools and clowns of the wise and mannerly. Colton's definition is the most pertinent. He says it is an alliance of friendship and lust. "If the former predominate, it is a passion exalted and refined"—and he might have added, but it doesn't predominate. Dryden believes in loving. He says:

"Ah, how sweet it is to love!
Ah, how gay is young desire!
And what pleasing pains we prove
When we first approach love's fire!
Pains of love are sweeter far
Than all other pleasures are."

Spenser, too, admitted the all-absorbing pleasures of love. Life to him was nothing if bereft of love.

"Ah! shouldst thou live but once love's sweets to prove, Thou wilt not love to live unless thou live to love."

All writers concur in that youthful ardor is conducive of the most passionate love, and concede that it is the shortest lived. The old song "Love me Little, Love me Long," first published in 1569, commences:

"Love me little, love me long!
Is the burden of my song;
Love that is too hot and strong
Burneth soon to waste.
Still I would not have thee cold—
Nor too backward nor too bold;
Love that lasteth till 'tis old
Fadeth not in haste."

Sir Philip Sidney, who charmed alike the maids and matrons of his native land by his clever verses and his magnetic love-making, who inspired them with love more by apparently mesmeric contact than by passionately professed vows, believed in "The Silence of Love":

"Dumb swans, not chattering pies, do lovers prove;
They love indeed who quake to say their love."

In Sidney's days, and especially to a man possessing his accredited attractions, this may have proven the most successful way of making and proving love; in this age of spoiled tastes and unmistakable "gush," however, it would prove an unpopular innovation. To be an acknowledged successful lover nowadays necessitates the possession, in addition to wealth and good looks, of an ability to flatter and gush, and a cast-iron conscience (with which, fortunately, we are all endowed) that such ability may be used unreservedly. Occasionally genuine "love matches" may be formed, and the sentiments of either party may find expression in the words of Hartley Coleridge:

"She is not fair to outward view,
As many maidens be;
Her loveliness I never knew
Until she smiled on me;
O then, I saw her eye was bright—
A well of love, a spring of light."

Moore leaves one bit of consolation for those who, in the first pangs of spasmodic love, are so fond to imagine it everlasting. He pitied them, perhaps, as they afterward pity themselves, and says that it at least was sincerely intended:

"Love hath echoes truer far
And far more sweet,
Than e'er beneath the moonlight's star,
Of horn, or lute, or soft guitar
The songs repeat.
'Tis when the sigh—in youth sincere
And only then—
The sigh that's breathed for one to hear,
Is by that one, that only dear,
Breathed back again."

This is probably the line alluded to by the cynical paragraphist, who said: "Love is like the measles—we can have it but only once." The same unsympathetic person acknowledged that love has its sweets, and straightway spoiled his confession by saying: "Falling in love is like falling in molasses—very sweet, but very dauby." These things, however, do not prove more than momentarily discouraging, as was evidenced by the rash promise of a sanguine and somewhat sanguinary youth, who, for love, said:

"I'll grasp the loud thunder,
With lightning I'll play,
The earth rend asunder,
And kick it away."

"The rainbow I'll straddle,
And ride to the moon;
In the ocean I'll paddle
In the bowl of a spoon."

"The rain shall fall upward,
The smoke tumble down—
I'll dye the grass purple,
And paint the sky brown."

Queerly enough, this modern would-be wonder-worker withheld his name. Where is he? Almost anything would seem capable of being done "for love's sweet sake." The mythical story of "Pygmalion and the Statue" evinces a belief in such accomplishments, at least. Pygmalion was a sculptor of Cyprus. He chiseled the image of a woman so fair and beautiful that he fell in love with it as if it had been a living creature. So violent became his passion for it that he prayed to Venus that it should be endowed with life and love. Venus heeded his prayer, transformed the model into a beautiful woman, and Pygmalion wedded her:

"She reached her hand to him, and with kind eyes
Gazed into his, but he the fingers caught,
And drew her to him, and amidst ecstasies
Passing all words, eye, well nigh passing thought,
Felt that sweet breath that he so long had sought;
Felt the warm life within her heaving breast,
As in his arms his living love he pressed."

Coventry Patmore, who penned so many bright stanzas of love and loving, whose verses betray the recollections of one deep in experience (else how account for his accuracy in them?), writes thus:

"I grew assured before I asked
That she'd be mine without reserve,
And in her unclaimed graces harked
At leisure, till the time should serve.
Twice rose, twice died, my trembling word.
Her dress that touched me where I stood,
The warmth of her confided arm,
Her bosom's gentle neighborhood,
Her pleasure in her power to charm;
Her look, her love, her form her touch!
The least seemed most by blissful turn—
Blissful but that it pleased too much,
And taught the wayward soul to yearn.
It was as if a harp with wires
Was traversed by the breath I drew;
And, O sweet meeting of desires!
She, answering, owned that she loved too."

All of us, did we have the power of expression, could truthfully write in the same strain. Life and love, and oft-repeated "sweet meetings of desires," would seem almost the chief end of man. He at least devotes a liberal part of the former to the qualification of the latter two principles. Of course, there is a bitter cynic who would decry love and all its devotees. He sings in his cracked voice:

"Love is the gold who outward hew doth pass,
Whose first beginnings goodly promises doth make
Of pleasures fair, and fresh as summer's grass,
Which neither sun, nor parch, nor wind can shake;
But when the mould should in the fire be tried,
The gold is gone, the dross doth still abide."

Rosalind found the wanton Love a bitter sweet; yet while she would chide she would conciliate him. She was little different from present-day Rosalinds, or other womanly treasures. She muses:

"Love, in my bosom like a bee,
Doth suck my sweet;
Now with his wings he plays with me,
Now with his feet.
Within mine eyes he makes his nest,
His bed amidst my tender breast,
My kisses are his daily feast,
And yet he robs me of my rest.
Ah! wanton! wanton!"

Rosalind was deserving of some punishment, if not for herself, for her fickle sex. Even as far back as the time of Meleager, the Greek poet, cause was abundant to thus speak of women; and of one in particular he wrote:

"In holy night we made the vow;
And the same lamp which long before
Had seen our earthly passion grow,
Was witness to the faith we swore.
Did I not swear to love her ever?
And have I ever dared to rove?
Did she not own a rival never?
Should shake her faith, or steal her love?
Yet now she says these words were air;
These vows were written all in water;
And by the lamp that saw her swear,
Has yielded to the first who sought her."

—Merivale's Translation.

Sir Robert Ayton, too, came in for his share of experience regarding woman's inconstancy. But his ideas were more practical than his Grecian predecessor; and, instead of putting himself into a fever about it, or seeking solace in self-destruction according to the enlightened ideas of modern minds, he viewed it rather philosophically:

"I loved thee once, I'll love no more;
Thine be the grief as is the blame;
Thou art not what thou wast before,
What reason I should be the same?
He that can love unloved again,
Hath better store of love than brain;
God send me love my debts to pay,
While unthrifts fast their love away."

This unpleasant sort of treatment usually comes from women who pass the early parts of their lives in "society." They acquire by contact the same blasé manners of their initiated companions—the same follies, vanity, and desire of conquest; and, when they ripen into lovely womanhood—the time when true love and lovers should most strongly appeal to their sympathies—they find their inborn sympathies stifled. There are some women so cold and passionless it would seem as if they had been sent into this world "custom made;" so devoid of sense or sentiment that to call them women is like perpetrating a huge joke upon an unsuspecting community. We all admire "rose-buds" of women—those just merging into the fullness of life, passing from maidenhood to womanhood. How much we find in them, how sincerely we can love them, when they are like—

"The morning pearls
Dropt in the lily's spotless bosom,
Less chastely cold
Ere the meridian sun
Hath kissed them into heat."

And how different they are, how great a contrast they form, how much of our love we manage to waste upon them, when they pass that stage of chastity, grow old with the world, and no longer reap their beauties from nature but from art. We may say of them, then, as was once said of Madame de Sevigne, and yet with no intent to slight:

"You charm when you talk, walk, or move,
Still more on this day than another.
When blinded—you're taken for Love;
When the bandage is off—for his mother."

As a fitting termination for an article of love, Byron's definitions of the characteristics of man's and woman's love, taken from "Don Juan," is adjudged worthy of quotation:

"Man's love is of man's life a thing apart;
'Tis woman's whole existence. Man may range
The court, camp, church, the vessel, or the mart,
Sword, gown, gain, glory; offer in exchange
Pride, fame, ambition, to fill up his heart,
And few there are whom these cannot estrange:
Men have all these resources, we but one—
To love again, and be again undone."

So far have been presented the varied observations of the most prominent commentators on love and lovers. So far have been followed love's chief features, its foibles, its pleasures, its sorrows. In the story that can here be traced can be found a history of love from the time its emotions first showed themselves by Divine intention, preconceived idea, ultimate force into the nature, the heart, and breast of man and woman; into their every thought and action; handed by them to their successors in the land of life and love, and followed by them in the same path of action, with all the same characteristics, with diligence, even to the present day. Love and passion will be for always—so long, at least, as there be man and woman. And when they cease to be, it will be a certain evidence that this world will have seen its best days—entirely "played out." WHISTLECRAFT.

Beauty Adorned.

Lingerie is being trimmed with colored embroideries.

The imported bonnets and wraps are ornamented beautifully with garnet beads.

A heavy cord of satin is now used to finish the edge of dresses with flowing trains.

Among novelties for trimmings are plaid foulards. Plaids will be worn early this winter.

One of the new dress materials shown is called Palmyra broché, with small flowers in brocade.

The velvet pockets mounted in silver, which are so fashionable for ladies' wear, cost as high as $125.

New buckles for belts are silver, engraved in quaint designs. Others are of pearl, and very handsome ones are of jet.

The inevitable boutonniere is no longer worn at the belt or throat by Paris ladies, but just below the shoulder on the sleeve.

Ladies now embroider their wide silk belts in the brightest colors. These belts are an ornament to black and dark silk dresses.

New frills on the dresses are pinked on both edges. This is a pretty fashion that economical ladies will be glad to use again.

An odd-looking necklace, worn by a St. Louis lady at a watering-place, is composed of silver quarter-dollars, washed with gold, with raised monograms riveted in.

The ladies of Vienna dress very richly, wearing soft silks and exquisite laces at dinner parties. Jewels, too, are never lacking, and are always worn with good taste. The young ladies from fifteen to twenty have the most perfect forms imaginable. The waists are round and slender, the shoulders slope with Venus-like accuracy, but the bust is the crowning beauty. It is the form and development of a woman with the face of a young girl. Usually they wear white and fleecy folds of soft tulle adorning every corsage. The arms are always bare from the elbow, and sometimes entirely so from the shoulders. At present all the ladies wear black shoes, like those known by the name of Oxford ties.

It is the custom among the Greeks to deck out their dead, especially young married women and girls, in the gala attire of festive occasions. The Stefanos, or crown, in shape resembling more a bishop's mitre than a bridal wreath, and made up of the brightest flowers of the parterres, intermingled with gold thread, is carefully put away after the wedding ceremony, only once to be worn again, at the lying in state of its owner, and at her funeral. As the lid of the coffin is carried in the procession, and only nailed down when the coffin is about to be lowered into the grave, nothing is lost of the elaborate get-up of the funeral toilet; and if the departed spirit could see and still feel the weaknesses of the flesh, its vanity would be not a little gratified at the excitement caused by its funeral procession, as evinced by the curious, eager faces thrust out of windows and doors as it winds its way slowly along the streets. Young ladies go to their graves in ball-room costume, kid gloves, and white satin shoes complete; so important are these details of the toilets considered, that cases have been known where the gloves and shoes were bought before the sick persons had breathed their last.

Bill of Fare for Six Persons.—Sunday, September 8, 1898.

Cauliflower Soup.
Cantaloup.
Boiled Turbot, Sauce Poquette.
Beefsteak Sauté, with Mushrooms.
Broiled Tomatoes. Lima Beans.
Roast Lamb, with Currant Jelly. Sweet Potatoes.
Olive Salad.

Sprawberries and Cream. Lady Cake.
Fruit-bowl of Apples, Apricots, Pears, Peaches, Plums, Grapes, Figs, and Gages.
To MAKE CAULIFLOWER SOUP.—Cut in small pieces two small sized cauliflowers. Put in a stewpan two ounces of butter, and set it on a moderate fire. When hot put the cauliflower in, stir until quite brown, then add a sprig of thyme and of parsley, a bay-leaf, one onion with a clove stuck in it, salt, white pepper, and three pints of soup stock. Simmer until the whole is well cooked. Throw away the onion, cloves, thyme, and bay-leaf, and mash well the cauliflower, strain, put on the fire with the broth. Give one boil, pour on cream, and serve.

To MAKE SAUCE POULETTE.—Set a small saucepan on the fire with a piece of butter the size of an egg in it. When melted, sprinkle in it a tablespoonful of flour, stirring the while; pour gently in it a glass of warm water and a glass of white wine; salt, pepper, a sprig of parsley, one of thyme, a chopped shallot, a little nutmeg, four small white onions, or a few green onions (the latter cut fine and fried in butter before using). Simmer until well cooked, add the yolk of one or two eggs, and the juice of a lemon strain and use.

Senator Sharon, it is said, has concluded to go to Washington and take an active part in engineering the ship of state. It is further intimated that he will live in a style befitting his wealth and social and political position. His daughter Flora, who is developing into a bright, witty, and altogether charming and graceful lady, is engaged in selecting a wardrobe that will help her to shine in Washington circles.

I was the other day with honest Will Funnell, the West-Saxon, who was reckoning up how much liquor had passed through him in the last twenty years of his life; which, according to his computation, amounted to twenty-three hog-heads of October, four tun of port, half a kilderkin of small beer, nineteen barrels of cider, and three glasses of champagne; besides which he had assisted at four hundred bowls of punch, not to mention sips, draughts, and wets without number. I question not but every reader's memory will suggest to him several ambitious young men who are as vain in this particular as Will Funnell, and can boast of as glorious exploits.

Thus an unknown but not unwise writer in the Spectator: It is not my intention to write a lecture on temperance; that can safely be left to such eloquent moralists as John B. Gough and Augustus Caesar Williams. Wine-drinking is a part of the etiquette of dinner-giving and average social gatherings. If we discontinued the use of everything liable to abuse, gastronomy, and other social pleasures, and perhaps all eating and drinking, would soon be numbered among the lost arts, and our entertainments would be lenten indeed. True temperance possibly lies somewhere between Will Funnell or Squire Chevy, let us say, and Father Mathew. The pendulum of sympathy oscillates between the host, when giving a party, who keeps one eye on the wine-cellar, and the free-and-easy young gentleman who is endeavoring to bribe the butler to give him an extra bottle of champagne. All this indirectly relates to the matter in hand. At a recent fashionable ball and party singular things passed under the eye of this nom de plume. Punches of all kinds had been concocted by the order of generous hospitality—of brandy, of whiskey, and of champagne—ready for the arrival of guests. These were liberally patronized from the first, and a few disciples of Bacchus, from a fanciful bibulous preference, lingered about the receptacles until dawn silvered the east, as time had already silvered their whiskers. Later, wine was freely served. Rumor fixed the quantity furnished during the evening at a sliding estimate between 2,500 and 3,000 bottles. The indulgence was coordinate with the supply. Young men came again and again, perhaps in some manner as Rogers says they went to see Geneva's picture, that they might throw it up when far away. An army officer, it is said, concealed four or five effervescent bottles under his ample waistcoat. The secret instinct developed itself in young men. Furtive whiskey and surreptitious champagne, asked by juvenile aristocrats of willing lackeys, and drunk in corners by masculine trios and quartets, were the rule of the festive hour. Wending their way homeward the forms of some of them looked unsymmetrical, padded with fragrant cigars and awkward fitting packages of cigarettes. The significance of all this can, of course, lie nowhere else but "in the application on't." Says the author already quoted: "The person you converse with after the third bottle is not the same man who at first sat down with you." Therefore, "he who jests upon a man that is drunk injures the absent."

The method of responding to invitations seems not to be perfectly understood in San Francisco society. At a large party, given so long ago that it lingers a mere speck on the horizon of memory, there was a long list of invitations, three-fourths of which very properly brought acceptances or regrets. Many of them were couched in curious form, and many more were curiously irregular in orthography. A gentleman and wife bluntly replied to those who had done them the honor of soliciting their company: "Mr. and Mrs. B. do not find it convenient to accept the invitation of Mr. and Mrs. C. for Monday evening." How absurdly discourteous to use here the word "convenient." One response bore in staring letters the imprint of the Timbuctoo Gold and Silver Mining Company, and under it the following epistle:

Mr. and Mrs. Goldquartz, of the Timbuctoo Gold and Silver Mining Company, present their compliments, and would be glad to accept your kind invitation for Monday evening, but we will be out of town.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN GOLDQUARTZ,

Superintendent of the Timbuctoo Gold and Silver Mining Co.

Among the responses was one, not inelegant in form, from a young army officer regarded by mamma as an eligible party, who "accepts with pleasure," etc. Another from a lady well known in San Francisco society read: "Mrs. N. accepts with pleasure your kind invitation," etc. Of course the young officer was posted in the weightier matters of the law. He knew more of triangles, lines of circumvallation, and the technical deploying of a skirmish line than of the elements of his native tongue. As for the lady, she doubtless thought, like the highbred dames of England a century ago, that correct spelling was quite beneath a woman of fashion. These are specimens—genuine specimens, let me say—of the acceptances and regrets alluded to. Some had grosser solecisms of language and more extravagant errors of form. Some were written on half sheets of paper, some upon letter-heads, some one or two on bill-heads, and in chirography as varied and chaotic as the individuality of this coast. Now, nothing could be easier than the writing of a reply to an invitation to a party. Use plain, elegant paper, and let the form be simple and straightforward. Let your yea be yea, and your nay, nay. For instance, either of the following forms will do:

Miss G. accepts with pleasure Miss M.'s polite invitation for Monday evening.

Mr. and Mrs. S. regret that a prior engagement (or illness, etc.) will prevent their accepting Mr. and Mrs. Omega's kind invitation for Thursday evening.

Senator John P. Jones and his accomplished lady have been freely and generously entertained since their arrival in San Francisco. Invitations have literally poured in upon them. They have been entertained at dinner by Mr. and Mrs. Head, Colonel and Mrs. Fry, and at lunch by Mrs. Samuel Wilson. Mrs. Jones has been spending the week at Napa, but returned yesterday, having been invited to pass Sunday at Mr. Castle's residence at Menlo Park. Next Saturday they will visit Mr. and Mrs. Flood at their country house at Fairview. Senator Jones and his wife were guests of Senator Sharon, at Belmont, from Saturday until Monday last. The entertainment was with the usual lavish hospitality of the wealthy host. Among those present were Mr. Barron of Mexico, Mr. Bell, Mr. Neely Thompson and daughter of New York, Dr. and Mrs. Bucknall, Mr. Brittan, Mr. Alden, and a few others, principally the magnates of the neighborhood.

Milton S. Latham leaves for Europe in a few days, to rejoin his wife, who is at present in Paris. It is understood that he will remain some time abroad. He regards himself as almost entirely recovered.

Mrs. Charles Crocker, her two sons, and her daughter are at present sojourning in Paris.

Mrs. John Skae, the new Queen of the Bonanza, is in Paris having a costly wardrobe prepared for her coming coronation.

Mrs. General McDowell had a "kettledrum" on Saturday, August 31st, to which the invitations were general. She has also recently given a lunch to Mrs. General Kantz.

There has been a general desire expressed for the revival of the hops which were such a pleasant feature of social life at the hotel winter before last. It is possible that the effort at resuscitation may fail for want of matronly superintendence.

Mr. Charles Crocker gave a dinner to Judge Black week before last, at which only gentlemen were present. Among the guests were Leland Stanford, General Colton, Mr. Huntington, and other gentlemen of distinction.

An amateur entertainment will shortly be given for the benefit of the yellow fever sufferers under the tasteful supervision of Mrs. Gwin. Among those who will take part will be Miss Carrie Gwin, Miss Maynard, and Miss Heth. There will be an amateur concert for the same good cause. Among the vocalists will be Mrs. Low, Miss Carrie Colton, Miss Bessie Simpson and Mrs. J. W. Brown.

Mrs. Butterworth and her two daughters, Mrs. Pringle and Mrs. Louis Haggin, have gone to Carlsbad on account of the illness of Mrs. Haggin.

Mrs. Jessie Moore and her daughter, Miss Newlands, are for the present at Belmont.

It is expected that Mrs. Mark Hopkins will return from New York the first of November, by which time her new residence on Nob Hill will be ready for occupancy.

Mr. Huntington, his wife and daughter, and a handsome widow, Mrs. Worham, who is their guest, are residing at the Palace Hotel.

Mr. James White, of England, and wife and daughter, have just returned from China, and are at the Palace Hotel. Mr. White will investigate the stock market, look after his bonanza securities, slightly fallen from grace during his Oriental wanderings, and then return to England to pick up the dropped thread of his social intercourse.

There is scarcely a ripple on the surface of Oakland society. In the absence of elderly dinner-giving and formal receiving the young ladies of our "sister city" have instituted a series of informal receptions. The most recent was that given last week by Miss Hattie Green. The next will be given by the daughter of General Houghton at his new residence at the corner of Thirteenth and Jackson Streets, on Tuesday evening, September 17th. Miss Bella Roe went East last Thursday, with the intention of not returning for the present. Miss Hussey left yesterday by overland route for a visit to friends in Cleveland. Mr. and Mrs. John B. Harmon also left for the East yesterday. Mr. Harmon to attend the Odd Fellows' convention at Baltimore.

Miss Minnie Watson, a young lady well known in Oakland social circles, was married last Monday to Alonzo M. Grim, of San Francisco. The ceremony was performed in Stockton while the bride was visiting at the residence of her uncle, Dr. Shurtleff, Superintendent of the Insane Asylum, and was, if rumor be right, a surprise to the bride's parents. Mr. Grim was formerly a member of the class of '79 in the University of California.

Flibbertigibbetings.

EDITORS ARGONAUT.—You ask, what's on the tapis? Any weddings, any parties, or any anything? Yes, mes-sieurs, there are quite a number of marriages to take place soon, and that's something new to be sure; so, clothed in our purple and fine linen, we will hire a cab with a horse that has many fine points about him, and go around on Nob Hill, Harrison street, and South Park calling, and cull the news from our dear five hundred friends. I understand (softly let me whisper it, that the "black" captain of the Flying Dutchman—I mean the Isadnie—is coming back to the City by the Sea to claim the hand of a tawny-haired and blue-eyed blonde in marriage. Her jolly fat father swears by all that's good and lovely that is, by his daughter, of course, that the porcupine-haired Russian shall not have his comely daughter. We will see whether the American sire is out-generated by the fierce little captain. Everybody knows that the brunette sisters were married last week—quietly, elegantly and sensibly. They both looked handsomer than ever before in their lives. White satin is becoming to brunettes; remember that, girls. Mr. and Mrs. Lonsberry will go East to spend their honeymoon. The other bride and groom will remain at home. They suit each other to a T. She is a rich brunette, of the Andalusian type, while he is as blonde as Prince Paul. He, being a lawyer, will make a fee; she, being a woman, will—make a fuss. The next marriage on the programme will be another double wedding—the two little sisters of South Park, who laugh so joyously, and entertain so many fine-looking foreigners. The youngest one, they say, will espouse "Bill"—Bill of the fierce mous-sache and languishing eyes. According to the rumor of the day, Monsieur William has made some ducats in stocks, and can better afford to get married than he could some months ago. We wish him joy of his "cole" little wife. Every one knows who Miss J. C. is going to marry, as the engagement has been talked of in society for the last six months. Who says that the handsome Doctor Key-knee is going to be led into the matrimonial halter? Madame Rumor. But, then, Madame Rumor is like a worn out old story, not re-lie-able. I, for one, do not believe the report, and will not until I know that the gordian knot is tied. His innamorata is handsome, with her dusky eyes and blue-veined complexion, but she is too much of a "brune" to suit him. Two dark people never agree, they both want the supremacy. He is making a sad mistake, and this is the only way that I dare tell him of it. He ought to marry a blonde. The modern Don Juan, J. C. A., will also again enter the matrimonial bondage this week. The bride is a charming young lady well-known in society. It is to be hoped that there will not be a mirror in close proximity to the "handsome Spaniard," while the ceremony is being performed, else his gaze might wander from his bride and the priest. Perhaps he will see himself reflected in her eyes. Alameda is still the fashionable resort of those who would "wash and be clean." Last Saturday a goodly number of the frisky Friscans were over there frolicking in the waves. There were at least five hundred bathing at once. No? I tell you it is true, and figures won't lie—except the figure of a woman. Mr. C. F. Stetefeldt, the inventor and eminent mining engineer, will leave in a few days for Utah. He is in a state of mental depression at the thought of leaving his petite wife. The Kentucky "Aristocracy" are still at the Coffee House. They are marshaling their forces for a winter campaign in Washington. They will leave for the East in a few weeks. Mrs. Gwin gives private theatricals at her residence. It will not be as exclusive, as purely blue-blonded, as absolutely crème de la crème, as though there had been no money in it. I wish there were "millions in it." Millions of money, and that they would buy a cold, frost-laden, chilling storm—a frozen blast from the icy, gracious North—to sweep down and destroy the fever that is now desolating our unhappy Southland. I feel how trifling, how almost wicked it is to write of love and weddings, society and gossip, plays and pleasures, with this yellow fever fiend gathering with his guant, skeleton hand the loved ones of our Southern homes. Mrs. George Hearst and son have gone to Europe. Mr. and Mrs. W. S. Keyes and Mr. and Mrs. George Oulton have just returned home. The Hon. John F. Swift and wife are now in the Swiss Alps enjoying a milk-and-water cure, long walks, and a cheese diet. Mrs. Charles Crocker and Miss Crocker are at Baden-Baden. No gambling there now; this fashionable vice is concentrated at Monaco, the oldest dynasty and the smallest principality in Europe. The bonanza's richest prince, J. W. Mackay, having enjoyed his summer abroad, shortly returns to San Francisco, leaving Mrs. Mackay with the Roseners at Trouville, a fashionable watering place in France. Mrs. Mackay will spend the winter in Paris at her hotel, Rue Tilsit, fronting the Arc de Triomphe. Two new palaces are to be erected on Nob Hill. Messrs. Flood and Fair are to crown the summit of this aristocratic place with residences that shall excel in architectural elegance even the residences that now cluster upon this nobbist of earth's small warts. We commend to Mr. Mackay the ambitious endeavor to outvie these palaces with some splendid dream of architectural effort that shall dwarf all the other and lesser mansions; and then we shall hope that Wm. M. Lent and Johnny Skae shall make Stanford, Hopkins, Colton, Haggin, Crocker, Graves, Flood, Fair, and Mackay all feel how poor, and mean, and unpretentious are their feeble efforts at palace-building. Thus was Venice built till clusters of palaces were reflected in the blue waters of the Adriatic. FLIBBERTIGIBBET.

A most fearful epidemic is desolating our southern cities. The condition is most appalling. The yellow fiend has turned the beautiful city of Memphis into a charnal house, and all over the Southland death is reaping a dreadful harvest. Noble men and brave, generous, Christian women are acting as volunteer soldiers, offering their lives in the heroic effort to fight this most frightful enemy. Poverty, disease, death are abroad in our native land. Men, women, and children are dying by the hundreds. Benevolent institutions everywhere are straining themselves, and putting forth their best efforts to aid our southern people. In the city of San Francisco Mrs. J. K. McLean, Mrs. A. L. Stone, Mrs. E. P. Baker, Mrs. W. E. Ijams, Mrs. S. E. Henshaw, Mrs. W. C. Pond, Mrs. S. B. Blakeslee, Mrs. K. M. Fox, Mrs. T. K. Noble, Mrs. R. S. Smith and Mrs. R. E. Cole, as officers of the Women's Board of Foreign Missions of the Congregational Churches of California, report they have sent $1,130 to Western Turkey, $700 to Western Mexico, $630 to Japan, and voted $5,000 to build a schoolhouse for Miss Rappelze, at Broosa, near Constantinople.

Congressman Frye tried in a recent speech to express in words the length, breadth, and depth of the greenback delusion. He said: "You go over to Augusta, Maine, and pick out the craziest man in that insane asylum, and you take that crazy man and wait for the darkest night that ever was, and you put that man in the worst sleep that ever could be, and you get an angel to bring him the wildest dream that ever came to the craziest man in the most troubled sleep on the darkest night of this earth, and it would not begin to compare with this insane delusion." This is the most lucid and reasonable argument in answer to the demand for national currency that we have as yet heard from any of the paid advocates of the national banks.

The demand for copies of the ARGONAUT containing the letters of Kwang Chang Ling has been so great that we have been unable to supply it. We have therefore determined to issue them in pamphlet form, and they will be on sale at our business office early.

"YELLOW COVERS."

A Sermonette by a Laywoman.

Milton wrote: "He who is born to promote the public good should read the law of God above his years and make it his whole delight." This was no doubt the poet's lofty view of the minister, the legislator, and the writer. The mission of the unacknowledged legislators of the world should be kept holy. With solemn steps and slow, they should walk abroad and be the pure exemplars of their doctrine. The crozier, the wand of office, and the pen should rest in unsullied hands. It is of the first importance to the moral dignity and the physical well-being of a State, that every man that bears a crozier or wields a pen should labor to ripen his judgment and keep his conscience sweet and tender. Since Milton wrote pens have fallen into many hands that were unworthy to hold them. Gifted men have basely misused their genius. A price has been paid to the poet for his lute; the orator has been in the open market place; the priest has stained his cloth. Still these unworthy servants have been few compared with the noble army of righteous thinkers and brave actors on the state scene, who have sped the world along "the ringing grooves of change." The hired scribe who wrought any pattern has well nigh disappeared with the Vicar of Bray. The shameless songster and the nefarious author of indecent fiction no longer hold place in the body social. They are hidden away in foul corners; they speed their work in the shade, for society will none of them. But this is not enough: it is a scandal and disgrace that they are in our midst, albeit they are treated as social lepers. Of late, these writers of scandalous fiction have, there is too much cause to fear, been on the increase, since their corrupting wave has found its way into open places, and their "yellow covers" are unhesitatingly laid on the counters of book-vendors, who consider themselves reputable traders. These books may be seen also in the hands of people who are slaves to public opinion; they are advertised and are to be had at railway stations, uniform with the cheap editions of Dickens, Thackeray, Disraeli, Bulwer, and other standard authors of repute. A taste for them is growing; they are teaching the young idea. It is the thing to have read them, and the popularity of these "yellow covers" has moreover brought a certain amount of unscrupulous talent to bear upon their production, so that, escaping from the filthy coarseness of the purlieus of New York, they reach places that should shrink from anything externally more contagious. Many of these books published abroad are to be seen in the windows of most prominent stationers in our large cities, and people have no idea that they are either better or worse than the novels, which, having attained a certain favor, are reprinted in a cheap form. They are not without a degree of cleverness, not to be called indecent, but simply infamous, all having the same object and the same aim, which is to give pictures of the life and manners of persons of whom one would wish the rising generation, at all events, should be ignorant. Void of genuine wit, but abounding with conversational banter—not quite repartee—which is the settled speech (in light literature) of intelligent people who belong to good society, the humor which generally redeems the class of writings of which we speak gives to them an insidious palliation, vitiating to all taste. Especially to be condemned are female authors who class themselves with those who take a fierce delight in writing flavorful stories, aping masculine vulgarity, and giving immortal tone to their ugly creations. In women it becomes nauseous indecency, and they do not represent the manners and habits of any class of men known to the world. Passing in an atmosphere reeking with the worst forms of corruption, we can not imagine persons of refinement reading such books with pleasure, any more than taking delight in seeing and making part of them. Yet these "yellow covers" are popular! There are people who relish reading of sins which they have yet a little too much conscience to commit, and tolerate daring language from an author, because it is contrary to all instincts of right that woman should be familiar with those particular forms of impropriety. In looking over many of the French novels of the modern school, from the Dame aux Camellias to M. About's study of all that is rotten in the society of his country in the person of "Madelon," it is difficult to write of these works with patience; they are brimmed with poison—presenting to the rising generation a gallery of portraits, not of famous men and women who have done noble works in their day, but of the dregs of society, the heroes of vice and crime, here painted and flaunting in a brougham, and there sweeping (to quote Béranger) the stairs as concierges of the house in which the sometime Madame de M. once occupied the gilded entresol. These are the familiar presences of the young generation of all countries. They are in the couturière's garret, and in the boudoir of the coquette on the first floor; they are subjects of conversation in every grade of society, and we see the woful result that already stands clear in the near distance. If the strong feel degraded by a cursory perusal of these works, what must be the condition of those to whom they are daily mental food? Should books like these be permitted to enter the houses of the virtuous and respectable, to fall into the hands of matrons or maidens? We are warned that the "yellow covers" already appear in places deemed respectable; we see that they are crowding from the press—a conclusive proof that they find a ready sale. How then is this stream of pollution to be stemmed?—these books, not within the meaning of any statute—infamous, subtle, with their deadly poison in them. Representative men are apathetic, the press remains passive, beads of families continue indifferent while every opportunity requisite for their suppression is afforded by legislation, denunciation, and prohibition. MRS. C. STEEFELDT.

"Olla Podrida" got things very much mixed last week by using the firm name of a leading house of Pine Street brokers, "Eppstein & Co.," for the bankrupt concern of "Einstein & Co.," boot and shoe manufacturers. It was a lapsus penne, which sent a great many people to the Pine Street firm, anxious to inquire if their stocks and accounts were safe; but the substantial character of the house of Eppstein & Co. made our blunder a harmless one.

Better to go to bed supperless than to rise in debt.

FROM MY SKY-PARLOR.

Something Very Like a Wall.

I am the sole inhabitant of a sky-parlor at No. 138 Grub Street. Our street is as near Nob Hill as it can squeeze. We are quite aristocratic on Grub Street, and if there are any impecunious writers living in our street we have no acquaintance with them. Any "gent," as Thackeray would call him, passing through our street at about eight o'clock in the evening, would be "blessed" by the sound of so many nice pianos, and the pure uncultivated soprano voices of our young ladies. I often wonder how it is, as I sit in my sky-parlor, with so much music all around me, above me, beneath me, and each side of me (Ariel could not furnish it in so many places at once)—across the way at Nos. 137 and 139, and on both sides, at Nos. 136 and 140, and in our drawing-room at 138—I say I wonder that it does not give me inspiration. Why, with such influences, can't I write a poem—

"through which my passion runs
Like honeysuckle through a bridge of June?"

From No. 137 float the sweet notes of "Baby Mine," from No. 139 is borne on the evening air, "Hear me, Norma;" No. 136 is patriotic, and gives me, "Marching through Georgia." There is a young gent, an officer of the Invisible Greens, visits there. From No. 140, the "Anvil Chorus," with goblet accompaniment, by another young gent who has a high position in the hosiery department in one of our "palatial" dry goods stores on Kearny Street. And yet I can not write as one inspired, even with all these surroundings. I open my window and "look out on the night." Perhaps gazing at the beautiful stars will, to use a trite expression, "fetch me." But, no; I have tried that for three nights in vain. The envious smoke of factories and the fogs hide the poetry of heaven from me.

Can any one tell a young man what to do for himself who wants to write and can't write? I had an inspiration about two weeks ago. I determined to write an article "On the Prevailing Styles" for the Gazette of Fashion, and strolled down the streets of our beautiful city to gather my materials. It was Saturday afternoon, the mystic hour of matinees, and when so many of our young gents are released from the bondage of offices. The ladies did not know there was "a chiel among them takin' notes." At the corner of Montgomery and Bush Streets I furtively put down for future elaboration, "the ladies are wearing black silk trimmed with black velvet." Opposite a well-known store I rested my note-book against the post-office box, and, after a careful scrutiny of the various costumes, I hurriedly entered the fact, "the ladies are wearing black silk trimmed with black velvet." On Market Street I saw the fair dames pass in review before me, and after scanning with eagle eye all their toilets, in another fit of enthusiasm I wrote: "The ladies are wearing black silk trimmed with black velvet." Eagerly I rushed with my note-book to my sky parlor. Washing my hands "with invisible soap in imperceptible water," I joyfully congratulated myself: "Now for a stunning article for the Gazette of Fashion." I opened my note-book and read my notes. I was dismayed. Can a man, even if he is gifted with genius, which I flatter myself I am, write a brilliant article when he has nothing but this one fact: "The ladies are wearing black silk trimmed with black velvet." Well, I can only say that it is a fact. I have tried to persuade some of the young ladies on Grub Street to array themselves in bottle green, in claret color, in morn-on-the-lake, ashes-of-roses, anything but black silk and black velvet, but I "Might as well go stand upon the beach

And bid the main flood bate its usual height."

Oh, that there might be some change, something to relieve the black silkiness and black velvetiness! M.

A thorough and truthful knowledge of the most curious history of the Pinney-Carr-Burr-Sargent-Gorham-Culver-Page-Crawford-La Grange-Corey-Rogers-Spaulling-Flora complication will probably be never arrived at. Some future romancist, like Wilkie Collins or Charles Reade, delving among the rubbish of the Mercantile Library, will fall upon this strange story, and from it develop the plot of an exciting tale. A careful perusal of the Carr letter, and an analysis of the entire testimony justify, doubtless, the exoneration of Wm. B. Carr from the imputation of any improper use of the moneys drawn by Pinney from the banks. It would be equally generous to admit also that Senator Sargent's hands are clean of the stain of improper money transactions, if any were ever imputed to him. But that Mr. E. W. Burr should bear the burden of being charged with a conspiracy that involves forgery, perjury, subornation of perjury, and compounding felony, we are not disposed to credit. His long and honorable life among us does not justify such a conclusion. The bank president who has handled a hundred millions of the people's money and lost not a dollar of it, who has betrayed no trust, who has held office without the suspicion of neglecting any duty, whose private and official life have been equally honorable, ought not to be hastily condemned. When the history of the case is remembered, and the character of the testimony is considered, it is at least only just for society to withhold its opinion till the truth of such serious charges are fully examined. Mr. Burr seems to have loaned the money of his bank upon questionable security. This is the more surprising when his great caution and financial ability are taken into account. But he promptly met his loss, paid it, struck it from his bank assets. This fact and the solvency of his bank, so recently certified by the Commissioners, must all be considered. It looks to us very much as if there had been a striking of hands all around, and that the two bank presidents had been made the scape-goats to bear away into the wilderness of forgetfulness a load of political sins for which they at least are in no wise responsible.

Madame Zeiss-Dennis gives a concert at the Metropolitan Temple, on Monday evening, in aid of the yellow fever sufferers. It is a charity pure and simple: no rent, no paid orchestra, no paid singers. Every dollar will go to the aid of the sick and destitute. It will be dispensed by the brave men and women who are fighting this epidemic.

PARISIAN BONBONS.

"Fickle and fine and French."

M. Prudhomme leads his son to contemplate the statue of Joan of Arc.

Son—Who was that woman, pa?

M. Prudhomme—Mark her statue well, my son. She was one of our greatest men.

Proud mother (to the new governess): "And here is a pencil, Miss Green, and a note book in which I wish you to write down all the clever or remarkable things the dear children may say during your walk."

The lady was leaning on the arm of an elegant and wealthy young man and leading her little daughter by the hand, when suddenly the child cried:

"Oh, ma, ma, look there! See that gentleman that's passing. Don't you know him?"

"N-no, my child."

"Why, mamma? he was pa last year."

Professor—What methods does man employ to express his thoughts?

Scholar—(after mature deliberation)—He usually employs speech.

P.—Right, but when he cannot employ speech what does he do then, eh?

S.—He—

P.—See here! Suppose you were a hundred miles away from some one you wanted to say something to, what then?

S.—I would—I would—

P.—Suppose you had to announce to your father that you had been plucked—had failed in your examination—had been fired out of the academic hall, what would you do, then, eh? How would you announce it?

S.—Oh, I'd write him a letter.

P.—Go and write him one, then. Next!

Baron Taylor, now past eighty, was recently waited upon by one of his friends, a man of about half his age, who happened to have rendered him some service. The old man began sounding his friend's praises in a truly dithyrambic tone.

"Thank you, Baron, thank you," said the friend, with a grateful blush; "you are very kind, but then, you know, it would be better to say such things after my death, you know—carve 'em on my tombstone."

"I'll see it done, my boy; I'll see to it myself," said the hale old man, with conviction.

The Colonel—it was in the Guards—was unaccountably late in returning, and the orderly, who had been with him for twenty-two years, got ravenously hungry, and, knowing that his kind master would not object, slipped away for a snack, writing a note to explain the cause of his absence and pinning it to his huge bearskin shako, which he left on a chair, being thus satisfied that it would meet the eye of any one entering the room. He was right. The colonel's wife entered the room, saw that her husband was absent and like-wife missed the orderly. The orderly's shako met her eye; then she saw the note. She opened it, and no longer had any reason to wonder that her husband was not there and that the only thing left of the orderly was his shako. There it was in the soldier's plainest and most painful handwriting: "I am eaten."

One lady read in the paper how a smitten youth had expended $120,000 on one of the most distinguished queens of the demi-monde.

"A hundred and twenty thousand dollars," says one of her auditors; "you wouldn't catch him spending $120,000 on a decent woman. Oh, those men!"

A critic met at the salon the other day a young painter, a youth of some ability but of more vanity.

"My young friend," said he, paternally, "do you wish to become a great painter?"

"No," replied the artist, who didn't want any advice.

"Oh, you don't want to," said the critic, gently, "then keep on as you're going."

The final communication of Kwang Chang Ling will be carefully perused by those who would subject the Chinese question to an unprejudiced consideration. If it be true that the population of China does not exceed one hundred and twenty millions of people, that within its empire there are vast areas of productive and unoccupied land, and that the rates of wages are increasing in China, so that the inducements to emigration are lessening, we may somewhat abate our fears of being inundated by the "barbarian hordes." We place the highest confidence in figures of this very careful statistician and able writer. His estimate of Chinese numbers, and his statement of the present condition of the Chinese Empire, are calculated to put a very different phase upon this important question. China, with 400,000,000 of people working for two cents per day, subsisting upon a meagre diet, threatened with famine, would with our cheap steam communications and quick transit be considered a most dangerous neighbor to our sparsely settled Pacific States, and would present a national question of grave importance. We have given the series of communications of Kwang Chang Ling because they are the best presentation of the Chinese side of the Chinese question that we have seen—because they are argumentative, historical, and bristling with facts, presented in a style and language that the American writer might well afford to imitate. We have presumed upon the generosity and intelligence of our readers that they would desire to hear an argument from the Chinese standpoint, if conducted in fairness, although they might altogether dissent from the conclusions of the writer.

After returning to London from Berlin, Lord Beaconsfield's first act was to send to a bookseller for the last dozen French novels. He remarked to Lord S. disbur after the fatigues of recreation nothing was so restful as to get back to work again.

TOLD IN LETTERS.

Domestic Fact and Fashionable Fancy.

MY DEAR EM:—I had not been to Plum's for some time, and so I thought I would refresh my self with a sight of pleasant household furnishings the other day, and accordingly dropped in. Luckily for me it turned out, for the loveliest carpets and rugs, just come from Scotland, were strewn all over the floor. There were several patterns of those quaint Japanese styles that the Glasgow factories so excel in. One, for instance, in grays, browns and yellows, is a mixture of squares, circles, and parallelograms that is quite bewildering, a sort of a fugue in woolen, a thing without any end, hardly any visible beginning, but charming withal. The circles, that are scalloped on the edges like a dinner plate, and sprayed all over with the disjointed fragments of reeds, rushes, and sedges, intermixed with small blossoms of peach color and blue, and here and there a huge flower of amaranth that bursts into unexpected luxuriance at all sorts of odd and unlooked-for places, are set in the midst of the sharp cornered squares, from which, obliquely, start out bands of gray on either side, filled with more straggling vegetation of browns and grays. Have you ever seen the Scotch grass pattern? It is one of the most admired of all the many novelties of the new season, and deservedly so, for it is grace itself. I like that on the turquoise blue ground better even than that on a black, although the latter is exceedingly rich. Turquoise, you know, is to be the favorite background for all styles of patterns this season. A beauty is one with a mixed design of China asters and leaves in dark and light blues, mottled with yellow. The border is particularly noticeable. It consists of a band one-half blue, the other half of rich golden bronze, edged by an inch wide stripe of deep indigo. Over the lower edge, half flowers are seen peeping up like stars just rising above the horizon. The same pattern comes in browns and yellows. The "Marguerite" design, scattered daisies of white and gold on a velvety black ground, is one of the richest in the flower styles. I should like to describe a velvet there is there, in the light shades, but it is beyond me; only the bordering, a floral scroll in natural colors, is one of the handsomest things you ever saw. The Scotch rugs at Plum's are a real reform in patterns. Personally, I object to walking over sleeping dogs and long-suffering tabbies, or being confronted every time I sit down for a quiet "think" by a screeching parrot doing circus business in a gilded ring; I fancy flowers at my fireside far better, or even geometrical problems, if need be. These suit me exactly. Another comfort is the Shaker rocker, the genuine ones, made only at Mt. Lebanon. A number of them, large and small, and in different colors, were being undone while I was there. They are light, easy and unbreakable. I know a great many ladies will be glad to find them here, for these are the first that have been brought and Plum is the only importer of them. The Shaker rugs, and the cutest little footstools to match, are among the lots. I never go there without traveling up stairs and down with the laudable purpose in view of seeing everything there is to be seen. This time, I found some of the last pieces of Mrs. McDonough's furniture for her house at Menlo Park just being finished up; among them a massive bookcase in old English style that would grace any establishment. It is divided into three compartments above, the middle being the wider and higher, and below are three doors to correspond, which inclose more shelves. Something odd which I never knew before is the manner in which horse hair for mattresses is kept. It comes in long coils, looks exactly like clothes lines, and is picked apart by hand. I saw the difference between the genuine and the imitation hair, the latter made up of pigs' bristles, and now know why the mattresses made there are so superior to those in many other stores. If you want a handsome fan for Christmas, I'll put John up to getting one at Anderson & Randolph's, for they have some of the handsomest and the newest I have seen. What shall it be? Feathers? There is the ostrich tip, with stems of mottled shell; and, newer and costlier still, the clear shell, untouched by spot or shading, clear as amber, with cloudlike tops of downy marabouts in gray and white, or the odd white feathers of the Japanese pheasant curiously curled at the points. Or you may have the daintiest and creamiest of satins, with those exquisite figures by Rudeaux, famed for his wonderfully lifelike skin tints, or some of Marie Bonheur's or Comte Nils' characteristic work. By and by, you may choose of Gavarni's, Hamon's, or Diaz' masterpieces, for there is coming from Paris and Vienna a collection that will carry you, in fancy at least, right into the midst of fan-land. The French carving in precious woods and metals is said to be superior now to even the Chinese in softness, and equally intricate and original in design. A French manufacturer has lately patented a silk in which different tints, blue and white, pink and gold, are wonderfully blended, one seeming to actually melt into the other. On this are to be painted figures and flowers—"Faust," "Undine," "Macbeth," "Hiawatha," are the favorites among serious subjects; "Tom Thumb," "Cinderella" (this latter done in gray and white only on a black ground), and "A Goose Tender," for comic designs. Nothing prettier for mourning has been made than the design called "Winter," which is said to be a combination of mist, whirling snow, icicles, and other cool fancies. Those sets of Neapolitan shell—there is one of a naked baby lying in the lip of a fluted shell, as tenderly pink as the heart of a wild rose, take my fancy amazingly. Dear old Mother Goose is not being forgotten in these days of high art. She comes out resplendent in the richest of materials. Here is a bowl and platter, with an accompanying spoon, designed for baby suppers of bread and milk. It has authentic portraits of Jack and Jill on its silver outside, together with an explanatory line from the poem, all engraved in the style so much in vogue, and each piece is lined with gold. Birds, the most perfect or the imitations of nature yet devised, are entering largely into all these ornamental articles of late. Particularly original in design are the gray and black cranes and quails that are harnessed to large-wheeled carts of silver that contain a single glass toilet bottle each. This is the prettiest conceit of the kind I have seen yet. This is surely the age of the grotesque. Pour faire rire seems to be the motto of the day. Consequential looking toads and frogs are playfully playing on musical instruments are certainly not made to serious and philosophic writing when acting as paper weights; and card receivers of precious metals, upheld on the shoulders of stalwart negroes, their shining black faces full of lazy good nature, lizards "going for" unconscious flies on the most natural of green leaves, crabs, lobsters, serpents, in all sorts of positions and ludicrous situations, do not suggest any but amusing thoughts. There is a new design in this same establishment—a round-topped jewel casket of oak, a little longer than it is broad, bound with bands of silver, and ornamented with gold cubes in place of nails. When closed, it is impossible to detect the fastening, for back and front are exactly alike. Oxidized silver, in combination with gold, is one of the most expensive and beautiful styles. The casket is square, the silver, on which are florid arabesques, is the centre portion of sides and top, and is surrounded by richly-carved gilding in repoussé work, the corners being finished by carved columns of the same. A chest mounted on a trestle-work, and borne between two stalwart and scantily dressed Africans, is another conceit. I see that Liebes, on Montgomery Street, has received some of the newest styles in silk fur-lined sacques from Paris. I shall tell you about them next time I write. The Eastern embroglio, as the newspapers call the grab game that is going on in Europe now, has had one pleasant result, at all events. It has made the gorgeous Oriental hues and quaint patterns as cosmopolitan as the most republican of us could wish. There are at least fifty distinct varieties of silk and woolen goods of that character already in our markets, besides the gauze-like fabrics, camel's hair, and pineapple materials, the latter coming into use again after a hiatus of some fifteen years or so. Some of the all-silk brocades are so rich in color and expensive in make as to be used mainly for vests, cuffs, and pockets only, particularly for the long Louis Quinze vests now so much worn. The richest of these goods is a mixed pattern that is no pattern at all, but just a mass of fine dots of brilliant colors, from among which the gold thread shines out dazzlingly. Among the novelties are several especially noticeable, as the "Palmyra" broché, a fine woolen goods with a close ribbing and small satin flowers brocaded all over its surface; the "Chuddah" cloths, that have a slender stripe like herring-bone stitch in a blending of all colors—genuine camel's hair these; the "Burrpoo" cloths, with patterns, mainly of small flowers, either pressed into the fabric or raised out of it in a series of fine knots, one color and shade being preserved; and the different varieties of India cashmere, that this year comes in somewhat less shaggy designs than heretofore, and in some new shades as well, the notability among the last being the Russian gray, which is really a violet with an ash shade over it. But the real novelty of the season is the "Velours de Pekin," a modification of the "bourettes," so long favorites. They are really a new triumph of the loom, light and soft to wear, yet massively rich in color and design. Some have just a zigzag line of color, like a raised cord; some are in squares, triangles, stripes, and the like, and in a single shade; and there are yet others, somewhat similar to the silk brocades, that are only pin-points and specs of color, with all the sparkle of the turquoise, the ruby, and the amethyst, and the glint of gold running throughout. There are many that will make up beautifully for street wear, coming in the darker shades—browns, plums, blues, and blacks—that have a twilled surface broken by lengthwise stripes of raised and knotted threads, almost like fine astrakhan cloth. Mrs. Riordan, on Market Street, has some very handsome hats and bonnets this week. The "Portland" is something quite new and very odd. It is melon-shaped, and has a narrow brim. Trimmed with a rich scarf of amaranth red, with ornaments of mingled jet and gilt, it is extremely stylish. A cream white straw with a broad, almost flat brim, shows well under pale blue and cream feathers and a twisted leaf of gauze of the same shade. The face trimming is a band of twisted gauze and silk, and a butterfly just alighted on a spray studded with pearls; ivory white silk lines the brim. Hats seem to maintain their ascendancy. The close turban with slightly turned up sides, but compact, is one of the favorites. There are at least one hundred and twenty-five different varieties this fall, and many are really pretty. The combinations in color are equally varied, bright and dead-leaf tints being much used as foils for each other. There is a new bow, called the "grebe"—why, I do not know, but, any way, it is made to simulate a sheaf of wheat by binding down the corner ends of the loops and spreading out the upper ones. These loops are made of silk rather than ribbon, as silk maintains its stiffness best. An exceedingly stylish hat is the "Bourbonnaise," an exact copy of those worn by the fashionables of Louis XV.'s reign. The brim droops low in front, and there is a curtain at the back, through which is run a black velvet ribbon, to be tied in a very large bow and rest on the hair at the back. When the hat is of Leghorn, as it most frequently is, the trimming most worn is a strip of the finest possible white linen, with a triple plaiting of Alençon lace, tied a little to one side in a large bow. There are pretty newnesses in hats coming up now every week, and there will be many more before the season is fairly opened. The Habit-Franklin dress, Mrs. Coleman tells me, will achieve a great success here this fall. I fancy it will exactly suit your figure, so I will try to give you an idea of it. It is a trained robe, with a waistcoat and coat-waist, which has down the sides long coat-tails that may be trimmed or plain, as one likes. The train projects slightly below the waist and under the fulness so produced hang two square ends, or flaps. Two pockets finish the back breadths; the waist is cut away to show the rest, and the sleeves are severely plain to match. White and black are the combination most used, but the vest may be of a third. Foulards are being much used for the five o'clock teas so fashionable, and for other demi-toilet occasions. The new cashmere flannels, at Keane's, are being extensively used for morning négligé pajamas for summer wear. They are as pretty as the "Jurah," or twilled silk goods used for the same purpose. Spiral jabots of lace and narrow plissés of silk are the train wings; watered and satin ribbons mingled for bows. Lawton is earning the good will of all housekeepers in adding a very full stock of house furnishing goods to his other wares. It contains pretty much everything in that particular line. I shall attend Miss Mary Prince's interesting lectures on the "Fine Arts" that she is giving at her residence, No. 218 Eddy Street. I am exceedingly pleased with the preliminary one; she is so well up in her subjects, and, moreover, speaks of them con amore.

Yours as ever,

LILIAS DUBOIS.

EXTRACTS FROM MY DIARY,*--VI.

By an Early Californian.

* By mistake these articles were marked concluded last week.

The little town seems quite deserted. Most of its inhabitants have either removed to the mines, or are on the wing to and from stores or posts near "the diggings." A few merchants remain, receiving cargoes from below, and selling and distributing them with their launches to different points above. Notwithstanding the income from ports along the Pacific Coast, from the Sandwich Islands, and from home, the place looks bare. Many prophesy its decline and the uprising of a great commercial city somewhere above us, either at Benicia, or the embarcadero of Sutter's fort, or at other points equidistant from all the mines. Larkin has been shaking his wise head and lamenting over the departing glories of San Francisco; and Dr. Semple is all smiles, and, in his enthusiasm over the promised success of her rival (Benicia), almost dislocates the fingers of every hand he shakes. I told you of having met him soon after my arrival, dressed in gamuza; he was then, or had been shortly before, the editor of the Californian. On Commodore Biddle's arrival Semple was presented to him, and extended his great palm in welcome; the little Commodore put his fingers into the trap, not expecting to be lifted on to his toes and shaken to his very centre by the hearty old giant. Up and down went the arm, while a long tirade was poured out like water upon the head of the impatient listener. When the Doctor was delivered of his address the Commodore, swearing not loud but deep, made for his boat, resolving to give a wide berth thereafter to the Doctor and all his Bear-flag companions; and, as he met Major this, and Captain that, on shore, who had been attached to the Stockton brigade, ordered them, as Lieutenant or Midshipman so and so, "to repair on board and report for duty." Semple put down the pen to take up the oar, and, starting a ferry at the Straits of Carquinez, has earned many an honest penny transporting passengers from the Martinez ranch (El Pinole) to Sausalito. His charge being fifty cents per man, and one dollar for man and beast, his receipts are said to amount to ten dollars per day. He was the inventor of Francesca, and of the sale of its lots as advertised, and when Yerba Buena became San Francisco, he changed its name to Benicia, "to prevent San Francisco receiving any advantage which might come to it from the confounding of names." Don Timoteo Murphy, Alcalde of San Rafael, has also become aware of the prospective importance of his little town. He, too, for some time past has advertised "Lots for sale." Where the inhabitants are to come from it is difficult to imagine, unless he discovers placers in the neighborhood or is planning country seats for the nabobs of the future. Some time since, Dr. Phillips, surgeon of the —, called upon me, saying that he was ordered home and would leave very soon. In the course of conversation as to the country and its future, he asked if I did not want to buy a hundred-vara lot he had taken out. I answered that I was surprised to hear that he wished to sell, and advised him to keep it, as it might be valuable at some future time. But, as he seemed determined to get rid of it, I begged him to offer it to no one else, but to go on board and sleep over it, and come to me next morning if his mind was unchanged. The next day he brought me a deed, and I paid him $100 for hundred-vara lot No. 113 (the present corner of Townsend and Third Streets). As no survey has been made, and no stakes are driven in that part of the town, I don't know exactly the position of the lot, but will find out in due time.

The water lots are receiving more consideration and will become valuable in time. At the late sale some of them brought $400. The lots are one-third as large as a fifty-vara lot. The most desirable property lies between Sacramento Street and North Beach. Leidesdorff's cottage, its adobe walls and the lot on which it was situated having been purchased from Bob Ridley, is the last house on Montgomery Street towards the Mission—no, not the last, for an old watchmaker named Russ, who came out in Stevenson's regiment (bringing his family with him) took out a fifty-vara lot some distance beyond him on the other side of the sand-hill, which hides it from the rest of the town. On it he has placed an old ship's caboose, to which he made additions sufficient to accommodate his wife and children, who have moved in from the Presidio. I think I have heard he has more than one lot, having taken out others in the name of his boys, but I am not certain of this. In January the Angelique, consigned to us, arrived from New York with a part of its precious cargo. A very important part was left behind at Valparaiso. Believing that a useful ingredient would be wanting in the society of San Francisco a lady of New York conceived the idea of leading to the just-conquered country a certain number of her sex, who were to assist in its refinement. Whether matrimony was thought of in this connection is known only to the benevolent few who accompanied the lady on her pilgrimage. As they were not young and gold was not dreamed of then, their devotion to a cause or principle seems worthy of all praise. The leader has given such evidence of strong-mindedness as has put us to no little trouble, and will, we fear, put the owners to no little expense. The Captain's story is, that at Valparaiso, where the vessel stopped for provisions, the ladies went on shore. He told them of his plan for sailing, and how important it was to him and the owners that no delay should occur, and notified them that, after the signal was made (the firing of a gun, I believe), they must all repair on board. As Mrs. Farnham left the ship she said: "You must wait for me, at any rate, and not sail until I am on board." The captain answered that he had given due warning, and after the signal was made and reasonable delay occurred, he should weigh anchor and sail, no matter who was left behind. And so he did. Mrs. Farnham was missing, and, unfortunately, her child, with nurse, was brought to San Francisco without the mother. She, of course, received much sympathy in Valparaiso, was sent on in another vessel just ready to sail, and arrived here in time to bring suit against the captain. He succeeded in getting away with the ship, but I think the owners will have to pay the damages awarded by court and jury.

JAMES C. WARD.

Coöperative dollar stores are wanted, where people can get trusted for things they do not need.

THE DECAY OF THE CHINESE EMPIRE.

Another Letter from Kwang Chang Ling.

TO THE ARGONAUT:—Do not be alarmed. It is not proposed to bore you with any further argument concerning the Chinese question in California. Should it ever assume the form of discussion I shall be happy, if permitted, to take part in it; but such is not yet the fact; and I am too well aware of the inveteracy and rancor of race prejudice to expect to convince my opponents so long as they refuse to join issue with me, and are satisfied merely to reiterate that demand for the expulsion of the Chinese which it has been my endeavor to show was both unjust and unwise.

There are, however, some topics connected with China which, although they relate remotely to the Chinese question, must possess a higher interest for you in other respects; and this interest must remain, whether the Chinese question is settled by our expulsion or not. They relate to the general question of civilization; to the world's civilization; to Asiatic, to European civilization; and which is more to you—to these civilizations considered apart. One of these topics is the population of the Chinese empire; and, with your honorable permission, I will lay before you certain facts and inferences in this connection which I have reason to believe will possess some interest to you, quite separate from the question concerning the Chinese in California.

There are few events in history more remarkable than the settlement of the recent war in Turkey. A power commanding nearly 60,000,000 of subjects overruns, in the course of a few months, the territory of another power, commanding less than 25,000,000, and is upon the point of entirely destroying the latter, when a third power, summoning to its aid a force of Indian allies, puts a stop to the conquest, and, with little change, restores the enraged belligerents to their previous positions and relations. The novel means employed to bring about this extraordinary and unlooked-for result did not fail to elicit the indignation of the baffled conqueror. Count Schouvaloff significantly warned Europe that arms of precision in the hands of Asiatics convey a menace to all European civilization. But these are not all of the means employed. The other were the brains of a British Premier, who is himself of Asiatic blood, and deeply imbued with the characteristics of Asiatic civilization—strong passions, a powerful imagination, and disregard for the conservation of national religions.

Lord Beaconsfield belongs to a race who, up to within a very recent period, were bated and despised in Europe as much as the Chinese are to-day in America. They could not own land; they could not even drive a horse; they enjoyed no civil privileges; their residences were confined to noisome ghettos; they were restricted to the most disreputable and repulsive vocations; they were compelled to wear peculiar dresses, and forbidden even to assume surnames. There is not a country in Europe which has not repeatedly plundered, massacred, and driven them forth. There are but two to-day—England and France—where they do not have to struggle against civil disabilities; and it is only a few years since these were removed in England. Precisely the same charges that are to-day made against the Chinese were but quite recently urged against the Jews. They were an alien race, unfit to mix with Christians, whose civilization was menaced by their presence. They were filthy and leprous; they poisoned wells; they ate Christian babies; they were incorrigible cheats, and void of conscience; they lived upon refuse, and underbid the labor of honest men. They were hated by man and accursed of God.

That the entire power of the British Empire, embracing, as it does, some two hundred and fifty millions of inhabitants and greater wealth and resources than all the world besides, should have been recently intrusted, without hesitation, to the disposition of one of this race, would appear to contain a still more serious menace to the conservation of European civilization than the event noticed by Count Schouvaloff. But every thinking man knows that it does not. Why? Simply because the Jews are a decaying people. There are not half as many Jews in all the world to-day as there were two thousand years ago in Palestine alone. Has persecution killed them? Not at all. Under persecution they have invariably thriven and increased. What, then, has diminished their numbers, and must soon extinguish them altogether? Absorption. Merely absorption. The great sponge of European civilization, which first opened its pores during the French Revolution, has absorbed and nearly extinguished them. Lord Beaconsfield is himself an example of the process. He is a member of the Church of England. And myriads of similarly absorbed Jews surround you upon all sides. They not only abjure their distinguishing religion and customs; they change their names; and in the course of two or three generations there is nothing left of their original characteristics, but a trace of their highly-organized blood and ancient refinement.

So, too, have the Chinese been a decaying race for more than a century past. My government does not admit this; my confrères vehemently deny it; but many years spent in the Western world during my youth, and some familiarity with Chinese affairs, combined with a knowledge of Western histories and books of travel, enable me, as I believe, to perceive what my government would conceal and my companions are loth to admit. It belongs to history, to science, and to civilization, to reveal the truth in this matter. The truth can do no harm to any one; certainly not to my countrymen. Under the policy of concealment in this respect they have suffered all that men can endure. Let the truth now be tried. It is the inheritance of all mankind; it is the bequest of Heaven.

According to the various official enumerations which I have been able to find mentioned in European authors, the population of China proper at various periods of history was as follows:

POPULATION OF CHINA PROPER AT VARIOUS PERIODS, AS ASCERTAINED BY OFFICIAL ENUMERATION (CENSUS).

Christian Year.	Emperor.	Number of Families.	Total Population.	European Authority.
B. C. 1000 to 248.	Chow dynasty	13,704,920	65,000,000	Martin's Hist. Ch., I, 217.
B. C. 202 to 1st cent.	Han dynasty	83,000,000	83,000,000	Martin, I, 217.
A. D. 100.	Han dynasty	12,233,062	59,594,978	Malte-Brun, II, 94.
A. D. 740.	T'ang	48,143,800	48,143,800	Malte-Brun, II, 94.
A. D. 997.	Chin-tung	9,995,729	50,000,000	Martin, I, 215.
A. D. 1393.	Hungwu	16,612,869	60,545,812	Malte-Brun.
A. D. 1491.	Hiao-tung	9,134,449	53,281,158	Malte-Brun.
A. D. 1506.	Ching-te	10,000,000	50,000,000	Martin, I, 219.
A. D. 1578.	Wan-te	10,621,436	60,692,856	Malte-Brun.
A. D. 1662.	Kang-he	21,068,600	105,000,000	Martin, I, 29.
A. D. 1668.	Kang-he	25,386,209	125,000,000	Martin, I, 29.
A. D. 1710.	Kang-he	23,312,300	115,000,000	Martin, I, 29.
A. D. 1711.	Kang-he	26,605,716	140,000,000	Martin, I, 29.
A. D. 1743.	Keen-lung	198,213,713	115,000,000	Allerstein, in Malte-Brun.
A. D. 1760.	Keen-lung	196,837,977	115,000,000	Allerstein, in Appleton.
A. D. 1761.	Keen-lung	198,214,624	115,000,000	Allerstein, in Appleton.
A. D. 1830.	Taouk-wang	142,652,000	142,652,000	Macgregor Com. St., V, 7.
A. D. 1834.	Taouk-wang	125,000,000	Estimated as in text.
A. D. 1876.	Tsai-tien	100,000,000	From previous numbers.

From this table it will be seen that the population of China reached its greatest numbers more than a century ago, and that at the present time it amounts to little more than one half as many as it did then. As these results will probably be questioned, I will now proceed as briefly as possible to substantiate them.

It will be observed that I have adduced no enumerations which have not been mentioned in European authors. This course has been observed because of the non-acquaintance of Europeans with our native authors and language. The enumerations previous to the reign of Kang-he (1662-1722) are not important in this connection. They, however, serve to show that our population has retrogressed more than once before, and to some extent indicate the limits within which the numbers may be found at various periods. Kang-he was one of the greatest princes who ever sat upon the throne of China. He was an indefatigable student, a thorough mathematician, and by far the best scholar in the empire. He visited the provinces in person, caused them to be surveyed by Europeans, and ordered the geographical positions of all important places to be ascertained. The enumerations made during his reign were subjected to the inspection of Europeans—Messrs. Gerbillon, Bouvet, and others. Kang-he reigned sixty years, during which time the population increased from 105,000,000 to about 150,000,000. "His whole life was an arduous struggle to benefit his subjects." (Martin, I, 233.)

Very different was the character of Keen-lung (1736-1796). This prince also reigned sixty years; but they were sixty years of foreign and domestic wars, turbulence, imperial rapacity, social decadence, and political retrogression. Between 1763 and 1769 nearly 1,000,000 of men were lost in the war with Burma. Civil wars occurred in nearly all parts of the empire; the crops failed repeatedly, and vast numbers died from famine. From nearly 200,000,000—at which number the population stood when Keen-lung was called to the throne—it fell to little more than 150,000,000 at the time of his death in 1796. Yet but one year previous to this event he permitted Chu-ta-jin of the imperial foreign office to communicate to the British Ambassador, Lord Macartney, a statement to the effect that the population of the empire amounted to 333,000,000 souls! It is out of this false statement that have sprung all the erroneous statements which appear in your books of reference concerning the population of China.

Some of these works pretend to quote from a census of 1812; others from a census of 1842; the truth being that no such censuses were ever taken, and that all these pretended enumerations are conjectures based upon the falsehood conveyed to Lord Macartney in 1795, and the equally false assumption that the population has gone on increasing ever since. There is no country in the world where better opportunities exist for taking a census than in China. Every district has its officer; every street its constable; every ten houses its tything-man; and every family is required to have a board always hanging up in the house ready for the inspection of the regular officer, on which board the name of every man, woman, or child in the house must be inscribed. Yet no actual census of China has been published since that of 1761. Decaying countries are never known to publish censuses; it is the act only of growing ones.

However, the best evidence of the population of China is afforded by the extent of its cultivated lands. The productive capacity of their lands, and the usual quantity of food necessary to support human life, being known, the numbers of those who dwell upon them can be deduced within a very reasonable degree of certainty. From these data it will be found that the population at the date of the last cadastre, viz.: about the year 1834, did not exceed 125,000,000.

China proper consists of eighteen states, or provinces, containing a total area of 1,297,999 square miles, or 830,719,350 acres. Of this area, it has been stated that the extraordinary proportion of three-fourths, or 640,579,381 acres, are cultivated (2). The mountainous and desert character of a very large portion of the empire is a sufficient refutation of the statement; but be this as it may, the cultivated portion has never been held by any author to exceed 141,119,347 acres (3). This figure, however, appears to relate to the last century, the latest figure of the area actually cultivated being 103,607,338½ acres (4). This result is obtained from our official cadastral works, is given by provinces, contains internal proofs of correctness in the character of its details, and is supported by the collateral evidence afforded by the land tax.

The principal, though not the only, grain of China is rice. This grain forms the staff of life chiefly in the southern and eastern provinces; whilst in the northern and western, barley, wheat, buckwheat, maize, and millet constitute the dietary of the people. Meat is scarce, but fish affords an important article of food, and is said to supply a tenth of all consumed.

In the fertile districts of the southern provinces two crops of rice are raised every year from the same land, and, in some very exceptional spots, as many as three crops have been obtained. Two annual crops in the south and one in the north is, however, the rule. Sometimes the secondary crop is not rice, but vegetables and even cotton. But there is little gained by this system, and it has been derided by modern agriculturalists. It exhausts the land too rapidly and renders the succeeding crops feeble. This system, and the fact that the land has been used from time immemorial for the same kind of crop, has reduced the harvest returns of the Chinese Empire to a condition that can not surprise the cultivator of overcropped lands in your Eastern and Middle States, but may seem small to those of fresh and exuberant California. Even with two crops a year from the same land in a considerable portion of China, an acre of land in that country will on an average of good years produce only 14.04 bushels of paddy or 9.36 bushels of clean rice (5). Were the entire cultivated area of China sown in rice, and every crop a fair average one, the entire annual harvest of the Empire would amount to but 1,070,880,000 bushels. As a considerable area is planted in tea and other crops, the grain harvest does not probably exceed 900,000,000 bushels.

This estimate is supported by others. De Guignes stated the grain tribute for the year 1777 at 28,000,000 taels on the first crop, and 22,000,000 on the second. Together these sums are equal to $81,250,000. Regarding the tribute as one-tenth of the whole crop, and reckoning the value of the rice as low as 12 cents per pound, this would make the crop equal to 1,083,000,000 bushels.

Wells Williams gives the grain tax for a recent year at 95,700,000 bushels. Regarding this as a tithe of the whole, we have for the entire crop 957,000,000 bushels. In round figures let us say it amounts to 1,000,000,000 bushels. It remains to ascertain how many people this will support.

The average consumption of rice in China by men employed in agricultural labor is three shing per day, or 15.77 bushels per year; in the cities it is one shing, or 5.26 bushels per year, fish and other comestibles eking out the remainder of the fare. As the principal portion of the population is agricultural it is fully within the mark to estimate the average annual consumption of grain throughout the empire at ten bushels per head, supplemented by some fish and vegetables and a very little meat. With a crop of 1,000,000,000 bushels, this bespeaks a population of not over 100,000,000. Making due allowance for possible errors of calculation and for the numbers of people supported from the profits of foreign commerce in tea, silk, metals and manufactures of various kinds, it appears liberal to estimate the population of China at the period to which Gutzlaff's cadastral figures belong—namely, some forty odd years ago—at 125,000,000. At the present time they can hardly amount to 120,000,000, and may not exceed 100,000,000.

But while from these evidences China appears to have declined in population during the past hundred years or more, there are not wanting evidences that she is upon the point of becoming, if indeed she has not already become, a growing nation again. During the last fifteen or twenty years there has been a notable rise of wages in China; the condition of the poor has materially improved and the incentives to emigration are being fast overcome by the superior advantages of remaining at home. This change is attributable to the influence of a liberal imperial policy, foreign intercourse, the introduction of more rapid and certain means of transport and communication, of certain Western arts, and of improved methods and implements of husbandry—the latter forming the merest beginnings of a new era, but nevertheless counting for something.

China is by no means dead, but only sleeps. So far is she from threatening to let loose upon the Western world a pauper population of four hundred and odd millions of people, she does not possess over a hundred millions of people. To these have lately been afforded such powerful means of future prosperity, that, instead of being obliged to permit her sons to wander upon distant and inhospitable shores in search of a scanty living, she may be able at no distant time to offer homes, within her own domains, to foreigners.

KWANG CHANG LING.

(a) Wells Williams' Middle Kingdom, I, 218. Macgregor, V, 12, 13, says that one-third of the land is cultivated; but this, though nearer the mark, is mere conjecture.

(b) Martin's History of China. Table prefacing Vol. I.

(c) Gutzlaff's China.

(d) Chinese Repository, XIII, 26. In Java the average product of rice is 575 pounds, or 11½ bushels to the acre. Ibid., III, 234.

A boy over eight years old was observed to sit down on the curbstone on Washington Street and lean heavily against a hitching-post. He looked pale, even through the dirt on his face, and several pedestrians halted to make inquiries. One of them observed an old stub of a cigar in the boy's fingers, and he queried: "Bub, is this your first cigar?" "No-o; it's m-m-y second," gasped the boy, and after a long pause, attended by increased paleness, "b-but I don't see any change in the symptoms!"

ELLAIR.

I.

Slowly we went one moonlit eve
Through the wide garden sweet and pale;
We saw the fragrant locust weave
Its net of shadows pure and frail;
The graceful eucalyptus spires
Caught each fair star's melodious fires,
And, trembling in the wind's control,
Each outlined tree revealed its soul.

We talked of books, and birds, and flowers;
At last the dewy night grew chill;
We spoke of absent friends of ours,
Then for a moment we grew still,
To watch the twinkling town and bay,
And the glad lights in long array.
Oh, underneath the moon, how fair
Was thy pure face, serene Ellair!

We had been children side by side
Through many softly flowing years;
What wonder if, that eventide,
We found a little space for tears?
So at the last no word was said,
But quiet hands were clasped instead,
And then a softly closing door
Shut in my world forevermore.

II.

For me the great world loomed before,
With unsealed height and hidden deep;
I could not wait on any shore,
With spurs to win and truth to keep.
I hardly thought the way was long,
I only knew my youth was strong,
I only saw a sunrise vast,
And heard a trumpet's eager blast.

Years passed. I never saw thy face
Except at midnight, in the sky.
In ranks of men I won my place—
To some a foe beyond reply,
To some a friend of royal grace,
To all at times a mystery;
And every song of wave and air,
Took shape with thoughts of thee, Ellair.

I could not think you changed or grew;
Each woman for your sake was pure;
In dreams the childish ways I knew,
In dreams I saw the carved door,
Or heard the music of the hills,
In those memorial hills,
And watched the heavy-laden bee
Search the white-tufted buckeye tree.

III.

At last, when many years were dead,
I thought to find the cottage gate,
Where roses wandered overhead,
And snow-white lilies, with their freight
Of endless fragrance, leaned to greet
My wayward but remembering feet;
There might I see thy face, and there
Should touch thy hands, serene Ellair.

Oh, it was but an empty space,
A weary, hopeless, bitter land.
I could not see you face to face,
I could not touch your gentle hand;
For your white soul had longed to hear
Divinest songs, till earth grew clear,
And, smiling, in a happy place,
You saw the angels face to face
In their celestial sphere.

I found where memory's marble lay,
And hid my mute lips in the grass;
I felt a wave of weeping pass,
As if the world were full of tears, alas!
But tears could not be mine that day.
At last the loving starlight crept
About me as a babe's soft hands,
And, in the falling dew, I wept
With the sad earth, and lonely lands,
And drifting cloud. "O lost Ellair!
If I can find you anywhere,
Or bond, or free, or quick, or dead,
The troubles of the world to bear
Were blossoms on my bended head."

So I went out, where currents cross,
To mingle with the tides of men,
And weave my lonely hours again.
I found a world of toil and pain,
Whose need I measured by my loss,
And better loved my dreaming pen;
But no more brimmed the fragrant wine
Of mirth in any song of mine.

And all day long I hear in dreams
A rustled dress across the sill;
Your name is writ in sunset gleams,
And waves of dusk when winds are still.
I never sink to rest, Ellair,
But that a nameless presence thrills,
A gently glimmer somehow fills
The outlined shadow of my chair.
And we shall meet, shall meet somewhere,
When this poor soul has grown so strong
That it can climb the spaces long
To thy pure realm of peace, Ellair.

NILES, August 25, 1878.

CHARLES H. SHINN.

"The Childer."

It is "nasty hot"; it is dusty; the city smells naughtily. Diphtheria is at it again. Why not take the little ones off this pestilent peninsula and give them a run in the gulches? The field, are brown, but over in Contra Costa, Alameda, and Marin, and down the road in San Mateo, are cool, green corners—reentering angles of the hills—where the sun is stronger, and ferns, and mosses, and with some late flowers, hold capacities of pleasure for the tiny men and wee women of our streets and schools. Was it for nothing, do you suppose—just for so much a line—that Bret Harte wrote this:

"And so one day she planned a picnic on Buckeye Hill, and took the children with her; away from the dusty road, the straggling shanties, the yellow ditches, the clamor of restless engines, the cheap finery of shop windows, the deeper glitter of paint and colored glass, and the thin veneering which barbarism takes upon itself in such localities. What infinite relief was theirs! The last heap of ragged rock and clay passed, the last unsightly chasm crossed, where the waiting woods opened their long files to receive them! How the children—perhaps because they had not yet grown quite away from the breast of the hounteous mother—threw themselves face downward on her bosom with uncouth caresses, filling the air with laughter."

What if you did take them last spring and Willie got poisoned with poison-oak? Take them again and give him a chance to get even.

When a base ball player comes home for the season, as if he had been talking the sign language.

* Number of men between fifteen and sixty years of age.

† Given by Martin as the whole population, but evidently meaning families.

‡ Am. Cyc., Old Ed., 1377.

§ From one hundred to one hundred and twenty millions.

NOTICE.

The Argonaut is published every Saturday, at No. 522 California Street, by the Argonaut Publishing Company.
 Rates of Subscription: $4 per year; six months, $2.25; three months, $1.50—payable in advance. Postage prepaid. City subscribers served for 35 cents per week. Single copies, 10 cents.
 Address all communications to "The Argonaut, 522 California Street, San Francisco."
 Branch Office: Cassell's Bookstore, 740 Market Street.
 News Dealers and Agents in the interior supplied by the San Francisco News Company, No. 113 Washington Street, to whom all orders should be addressed.
 A. P. STANTON, Business Manager.

THE ARGONAUT.

FRANK M. PIXLEY, }
 FRED. M. SOMERS, } . . . . . Editors.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 7, 1878.

Just published. "The Argonaut Sketch Book" of the Mechanics' Fair. Thirty-six pages. 500 illustrations. Character sketches and caricatures. 25 cents per copy. Be sure and see it.

One of the embarrassments of a republican form of government is the fact that the best and broadest minds, the most honest and earnest intellects, are driven out from the possibilities of political success. The underlying vice of democracy is that policy and not principle must rule. In all other forms of government, autocratic, monarchical, or aristocratic, there is an opportunity afforded for proud, well born, gifted men to serve the nation, to become diplomats or statesmen. To rise by earnest, long, and patient toil to the higher employments of the state is the prize for which scholars and gentlemen will labor. The honors of office are inducements to the highest and loftiest exertions. The result is, that in England, France, Germany, Italy, Russia, and indeed in all the governments of Europe, we find the noblest born, the most gifted, the wealthy crowding around the throne, the parliament, the council, impelled by a higher motive than mere spoils of office. The road to these honors may be long and wearisome, the way may be impeded by those who, by the accident of birth, jostle to the front, but the proud, gifted, ambitious man may overcome all this if he is not compelled, as in a republican government, to play courtier to the mob. In the United States of America the best men do not serve the state. Politics, elsewhere honored as an honorable pursuit, is here a disgraceful industry. From public life the sensitive, honest man shrinks as from pollution. The road to office is here a slimy and tortuous path. It is intrigue, and not merit, that wins the race, and when an honor is attained by an honest man, he becomes the target of almost universal abuse. The result is that young men who start out with an ambitious desire to win for themselves an honorable name in the public service turn around, disgusted and beaten back by the base rivals who, in the arts of the demagogue, can outbid them for popular favor. The result is apparent to-day, both in our national and State politics. It is a noticeable fact that the best men are not found in the public service. The man who succeeds to any office is either some obscure man of mediocre talent and blameless life, against whom nothing can be said, or the bold, resolute, unprincipled adventurer who, with tireless energy and accommodating morals, will pander to the prejudices of the mob, and through intrigue beat his way to position, or the man of accident struck by the lightning of popular favor. The tendency of this thing in America is a downward one. In the earlier days of our republic the Senate, the Congress, and the Presidential and gubernatorial offices were filled by our best and greatest representative men. Later we saw the falling off, and one by one in all the higher offices adventurers and political charlatans drove from their pedestals the abler men, till now, where in the councils of the nation, or in the higher positions, do we find men that adorn them? Let us ask, in all respect to our present Chief Executive, could he, with his blameless life and feeble intellect, have achieved in England the position of Premier? Let us glance at the Senate of the United States and compare it with the Parliament of England or the Chamber of Deputies in France. Let us compare it with half a century ago in statesmanship, intellect, eloquence, and personal pride of character, and ask whither we drift. Let us contemplate the later Cabinets, and draw the same comparison. If we turn to Congress, whom do we see? The able-minded men of the nation? The great thinkers, writers, orators? On the contrary, we note a vulgar mob of common minds, composed in about equal parts of political adventurers and obscure accidents. In California it is strikingly apparent that no really great minded, proud, and honorable man can aspire to a leading position with any hope of success. Even the meaner offices of emoluments, where the profits of place are the controlling inducements for obtaining them, it is obvious that a respectable man and gentleman has very little hope of success; while from the under-current of ward politics comes some ignorant, base-born, dishonest adventurer, who has intrigued and plotted to control the party machinery. Fit men in office are now the exceptions to the rule.

Who is to be the next President of the United States? There was a time in the history of our republic when, upon the recurrence of a presidential election, some Saul stood up conspicuously above the common herd—taller in intellect, in honesty of purpose, in public service, and in promise of usefulness, by a head and shoulders than any other man. There are no giants in these days, and warring partisans are now contending to secure a presidential candidate who shall possess the elements of success at a popular election. The considerations are confined to the question of availability for election, not fitness for office. Tilden, with his barrel of money; Tammany, with its dirty intrigues; Ben Butler, with his possibilities of enlisting the workingmen; General Grant, with his prestige of military success. The word that expresses qualification, honorable purpose, statesmanship, will never be uttered till the conventions have nominated their most available candidate; then the zeal of partisanship, the press, the orator, the office-holder, and the office-seeker will clothe the chosen aspirant with all the virtues that ought to adorn the highest station. If Tilden be renominated the "slogan" of the battle will be "fraud," "fraud," "fraud;" the old wounds of the South will be torn open, the old intrigues in South Carolina, Florida, and Louisiana reënnacted. If Ben Butler shall, in defiance of every principle that makes the endurance of republican institutions possible, receive a presidential nomination, we shall hear from the sand-lots and the purlieus of society appeals to such passions and prejudices as will make his election a menace to the life of our republic. If General Grant shall be renominated, it will not be in recognition of his military service to the Government, not in recognition of the fact that he possesses in any preëminent degree the qualities that adorn the republican Chief Magistrate, but because officials can renominate and wealth reflect him. In his campaign the appeal will be to the people to take the first step in the direction of a strong government—strength meaning bayonets in the hands of a paid army—the first step in the way which when republics enter upon they can never stop or turn back.

The people have not made up their minds whether they will consent to the renomination and election of General Grant or not, and they do not want their minds made up for them. The matter is under consideration, and while there are many reasons that render it undesirable that he should receive a third term, there are certain possibilities that may occur to reconcile the better men of the nation with his candidacy. If the office-holding class think it can press his nomination through the party machine, and either in advance of, or in opposition to, popular opinion, thrust General Grant upon the nation as its candidate, they may make a serious mistake, and one that in event of success at the National Convention would provoke revolt and end in defeat. There is very little party loyalty now remaining. The great mass of intelligent and thinking Republicans feel grateful to General Grant. In memory of his distinguished military services they are generously disposed to overlook some of the graver mistakes of his civil administration, the most serious of which was the genius he displayed in selecting for his confidants and party friends the most unconscionable rogues and adventurers of the country, and adhering to them with an obstinacy that to better men would have been regarded as fidelity. And yet there may arise certain political exigencies that may reconcile the nation to accept General Grant's candidacy as the lesser danger. We see embarrassing complications arising, the extent and importance of which no man can foretell. The reflecting minds of the nation are awaiting the development of political events. They are determined that there shall be no opinions manufactured of artificial party enthusiasm, and no action predicated upon apprehended dangers that may not exist and menaces that may never be carried into execution. If General Grant maintains his present attitude of silent expectancy; if his friends of the ring and his partisans in place shall not too plainly unmask their designs; and the democracy shall strike hands with sand-lot, communism, and Molly Maguire; if the counsels of Tammany or the plottings of Tilden shall gain ascendancy in the Democratic ranks; if the Republican extremists shall again raise the banner of the bloody flag, and rally upon some blatant demagogue for its candidate—it may happen that the great rank and file of sober-minded, intelligent, moral, and property-owning Americans may unite upon General Grant as their candidate. In such an event they will expect to call him, and not have him thrust upon them; they will expect to be the judges of the necessity that will ask him to serve them a third time. The less exertion made by his party friends, the greater the probabilities that he may be regarded as a necessity.

We have been revolving in our minds the question whether insurance companies are such an unquestioned advantage to our community as we are all in the habit of conceding. Now, we are not expressing an opinion, we are only asking questions. There are some eighty-four agencies in San Francisco, with active officers and solicitors, with a perfect army of employes, with expensive business places; and the question naturally suggests itself that it must take a mint of money to support this business. The next idea that comes to us is, that the companies must receive a great deal more in premiums than they pay in losses. Then it is suggested, that out of the eighty-four companies seventy-nine are foreign, and that the excess of premiums over losses is a constant drain upon us, and that the money-flow from the insurance business from San Francisco to the East and London must be very large; that foreign capital is not brought here, as in other occupations, but only foreign credit, to deplete and exhaust us by carrying on a pursuit which if not profitable would be abandoned. We ask ourselves this question (and it covers the whole ground), Would not San Francisco be richer to-day if it had never a foreign insurance company doing business here? Home companies keep the money here and in circulation. The number of millions that have been sent to Hartford, New York, and London must be great. If, therefore, the business of insuring property had been confined to local companies and our own capital or our own credit, San Francisco as a community would be doubtless richer by very many millions. As yet there has been no loss by fire which home capital could not have met, and we have an idea that some of the capital as figured upon sign boards is delusive. If we understand this business we are unable to tax the capital of foreign companies to support our fire department or maintain our municipal government. Hence, it has occurred to us to ask the question whether there are not certain principles involved and certain considerations that it would be well for our constitution-menders to consider in reference to this insurance problem. Life insurance is a horse of another color. There are people who think it an unmitigated swindle; but we are only asking questions.

If there is a Providence that deals with man, and has a care over His creatures, it demands a blind confidence to reconcile God's justice with His guardianship of the Southern people. It would almost seem as though they had drunk to the dregs the bitter cup of affliction. First, slavery, with all its attendant ills; then a war to enfranchise slaves, with its long harvest of horrors; then a reconstruction policy that precipitated upon the community the rule of bayonets in support of a government of carpet-baggers and negroes. And now, after a loss of property, the death of sons, brothers, and husbands on the battle-field, and before the wounds of civil war had healed, comes this dreadful scourge of the yellow fever, desolating the community and carrying fear and death to every home. We of San Francisco, with our cool sea breezes that come in their daily visits fresh from five thousand miles of ocean breadth, can not appreciate the agony of a people that must wait till November for the frost that shall destroy the spores of this deadly and mysterious epidemic; an agony that can devise no relief, finds no remedy, that must patiently wait while loved ones die. Brave men and women, in the care of their sick and burial of their dead, can only exhibit the heroism of despair, and we of the North can only send them food, and medicine, and money. We doubt not that generous hearts will bountifully respond to this wail that comes up from the fever-stricken South. It is the North's opportunity to do now that which shall undo all that party strife, sectional jealousy, political hatred, a bloody war, and a mistaken policy of reconstruction has done to alienate the hearts and embitter the feelings of a divided people. We are more than sure that the North, and all of it, all its parties, religious denominations, its charitable, social, and commercial institutions, will enter upon a generous rivalry to sustain the Southern people in this the hour of their affliction.

The Rev. Mr. Beecher, in giving the causes that have produced the present hard times, has omitted the one which seems to us to have most largely contributed to the present condition of things. The invention and use of labor-saving machinery in all the branches of industry has caused an over-production of all products, has thrown laborers out of employment, filled our warehouses with fabrics beyond the demand of present consumption, and thus caused stagnation in trade; has closed manufactories, and enabled a few laborers to accomplish by the aid of machinery results which formerly gave a wider field of employment. This is an evil which only time can remedy by giving opportunity for adjustment of the relations of labor and capital on new bases.

The unexpected death of the Hon. Henry H. Haight is at once a shock and a loss to California. His was a useful and honorable life in this State. He adorned all the positions he filled; alike loved and respected in the private, professional, and public stations. He was a conscientious, intelligent, honest gentleman, and we are sorry he is dead.

Mr. Clement's concluding article in reply to Kwang Chang Ling will appear in our next issue.

AFTERMATH.

"My brother 'Lyss" is called upon to mourn the untimely insanity of "that fellow Orville," who has been consigned to an early asylum where interviewers cease from troubling and the garrulous are at rest. In the overthrow of this powerful intellect we discern a public misfortune that is not "altogether displeasing." Should "my brother 'Lyss" be elected for a third term it is better that Orville should be a lunatic than a rascal, for it is better that he should be supported by some one State in a style to which he has not been accustomed, than by the whole country in a style to which he has been. It is to be feared, however, that his incarceration as a maniac is merely a bit of "political chicanery"—that he is no more demented than he always has been, only a good deal more de trop. The management of the third term scheme requires delicacy, tact, and moderation; there must be seasons of significant silence, and Orville will talk, and talk all the time. It may have been thought best to have his thunder ignored as the explosions of a self-cocking lunatic of the bull-dog pattern.

Mining stocks continue to "boom," and there is every prospect of harvesting a new crop of millionaires. This delights us, and throws a rosy glow of real sunlight over everything. The horse market is reviving, and as soon as the summer winds are over, our Golden Gate Park and ocean drive will be filled with fast pairs and fours-in-hand, with drags and tandems. This rise comes just in time for fall bonnets and gewgaws of French fashion. If there is anything we delight in it is the millionaire; and if there is one kind of millionaire that pleases us better than another, it is a new one. Old wine, old families, old books, old pictures, old china, old silver sets of solid bullion, old family mansions, with their old traditions, are well; but new millionaires are something superlatively charming, with their new clothes, new airs, new carriages, new houses. They make the money fly, and make everybody happy.

Sierra Nevada is going to $1,000 per share. It is the most promising bonanza that has ever been struck on the Comstock. It is the best defined ledge of mineral ore that the world has ever seen. It is a better buy at $100 a share than it was at $8. Everybody that has any sense should pawn his jewelry, sell his homestead, and buy Sierra Nevada. One hundred millions of dollars will be declared in dividends. And if not, and it peters out, and you get burst, you can do without jewelry; and if you lose your homestead you can board at the Palace Hotel. Buy Sierra Nevada is the advice of Senator Jones.

Buy Mexican. They have found it in Sierra Nevada, rich. There is a bonanza in Ophir beyond any doubt—covered up, but waiting to be unearthed. Mexican lies between the two discoveries. It is sure to advance; it will go to a hundred dollars within thirty days. Barton and Mark McDonald advise everybody to buy Mexican.

Buy Union Consolidated; it lies next to Sierra Nevada. The bonanza is on the disputed three hundred feet, and is pitching toward Union Consolidated ground. It will go to five hundred dollars. The chances are that the Union Consolidated will get the bulk of the best ore in the lower levels. The Nevada Bank advises everybody to buy Union Consolidated.

The ARGONAUT, after a careful examination of all the mining news—after a personal interview with all the mining experts, and confidential conversations with all of the stock millionaires and the leading brokers of both boards—advises all its readers, without distinction of color, race, or previous condition of servitude, to buy stocks. Go it blind. The excitement is just begun, and it will make but little difference what stock is purchased, as all will advance. Then sell out just before the decline begins, for when the market makes its final break it will go down by the run. There is no surer way of making money than by purchasing stocks upon a rising market, if you sell before the reaction sets in.

We are called upon to mourn the loss of an old and highly esteemed friend. He was the comrade of our boyhood days, the companion of our riper years. He was a man of many virtues and his unexpected loss we deeply deplore. He was taken suddenly rich about thirty days ago, and has been out of his head ever since. Upon calling upon him a few days since we found that our friend was dead—to us. He will be buried in his riches in his elegant mansion on Nob Hill—as soon as he erects it—attended by a large concourse of new friends. His family has our deepest sympathy. He leaves a wife—at home—to mourn his loss.

We know of no one who has searched longer or more diligently for a gold mine than William M. Lent. He has found it in Bodie, and at once he steps to the front in our line of millionaires, a man of solid, real wealth. We know of no one who better deserves the luck and no one who will make a better use of it. He will distribute it, and wherever in Nevada, Arizona, or California there are promising outcroppings of gold or silver-bearing ore, there Lent will sink a shaft, run a drift, erect a mill, and if there is a mine he will develop it. He has been a miner in a broader and better sense than those stock gamblers in San Francisco who only drift for ore in other men's pockets.

The Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, in a letter to a Boston lecture bureau, says: "I have never had the slightest idea of visiting America. If ever I should do so, I could not preach or lecture for money. Excellent as your services doubtless are to those who need them, they could not possibly be needed by me. I should regard it as an utter prostitution of any gifts I possess, if I were, as a servant of God, to use them to make money for myself in the way in which lecturers very properly do." The point of these remarks is in the application of them.

We presume that it is untrue that the police authorities of this city are to be arrested for violating the pure air ordinance, under which they take fifty Chinamen out of a room twenty feet square and thrust them into a cell fifteen feet square, for the good of their health. There are so many of the authorities that if arrested they could not be confined even in the public squares and parks, the dog pound and the cemeteries, or anywhere under the dome of heaven, without a violation of the pure air ordinance.

Mr. Beecher says we have no parasites here. This is a mistake; we have not only those that he enumerates but some others that he does not. Eminent among the latter is the priestly peripatetic who charges fifteen hundred dollars for a lecture in aid of a charitable fund.

A negro minstrel, named Harrigan, who appears to have visited this Coast recently, has been interviewed by a New York reporter, and has given a rather longish opinion of San Francisco. It is generally favorable, but that is not what we complain of. It is published in extenso in one of the leading New York journals; but we can stand that. What we cannot forgive is that a negro minstrel should have the metallic audacity to entertain an opinion.

An impenitent contemporary complains that the religious press, which last year overwhelmed the country with prize dictionaries, and the year before with heart-rending chromos, is now overlaying this continent with watches. There is in our mind's eye a touching picture of a serious young man who has for three years "got up the largest club of subscribers" to the New Jerusalem Janboree, standing by the kitchen stove with a prize watch in his hand, to see how long it will take to boil a prize dictionary for his dinner, over the flaming colors of a prize chromo. Alas! the chromo is a copy of one of Bradford's icebergs, the dictionary gets more indigestible every minute, the watch falls to pieces in his hand, and one more immortal soul joins the innumerable caravan of hardy blasphemers. And away in a far city sits the proprietor of the Janboree, crosses one fat leg over the other, caresses a fat purse with a fat hand, and knows that he has a dead sure thing on salvation if money will buy it.

America is naturally credited with all wonderful inventions, but we really must disclaim the electric pill which a European journal avers that we have contrived. This useful bolus is described as containing a minute apparatus for the production of electric light. The patient swallows it and it straightway lights up his interior; he becomes transparent, and the doctor scrutinizes the mechanism of his in'ards, not, as heretofore, through a glass darkly, but face to face, as it were. We are disposed to accord the honor of this invention to the despised but ingenious race that thought out the Chinese lantern.

Kearney is "pooling his issues." Ignorance, blasphemy, profanity, vulgarity, and a cheeky sort of flatulent vituperation are all that have issued from him since the beginning of his career, and a very filthy pool they make.

A physician writes in refutation of the charge that tippling in women is caused by the wine prescribed by the family medico: "Every doctor in large practice finds that one of the greatest evils with which he has to contend is the alcoholic tendency in women—a tendency which more often springs from insufficiency of wholesome occupation than from the occasional prescription." Drink, pretty creatures, drink; but don't drink because you have nothing else to do. Ah! mesdames, might you not find a "sufficiency of wholesome occupation" in pulling your own corks?

On some of the railway lines in England—there are but few which have only a single track—they have what is called the "staff system." It is, in principle, this: The road is divided into sections, and each section can have but one train on it at a time. The guard or conductor carries a staff, or baton, which, on arriving at the terminal station of the section, he surrenders to the station-master, receiving from him another staff, which is his authority to enter upon the next section. The staff he has surrendered is retained by the station-master until the guard of a train coming from the other direction requires it. As no guard is permitted to start upon any section without the staff belonging to that section, and there is but one belonging to it, it will be seen that this arrangement is a protection against collisions as nearly perfect as human ingenuity can devise. We do not know if the same or any similar system is in use in this country, where nearly all the roads have but a single track for trains going both ways at once.

The English system of interlocking signals is a good one, too. These signals, placed near every switch, are semaphores about as tall as telegraph poles. The arm is projected horizontally to indicate that the track is closed, and falls to a vertical position to show that it is open—or vice versa, we forget which. At any rate, it is so connected with the points that these can not be moved without the signal showing how they stand, nor can the signal be moved by any other means.

Most Americans would be surprised at the development of railway traffic in England. At one junction near London—Clapham, if we rightly remember—more than nine hundred trains pass daily, most of them in the hours of daylight. This is lively work, and makes apparent the importance of such mechanical aids to do his thinking for him as man can invent and control. But in proportion to the number, complexity and efficiency of these devices is the frightful destruction of life and property when they do fail to work. Of course no machinery, however ingenious and "automatic," can dispense with the human eye and the human hand in the control of its supreme function; nor can these be so educated by habit as to get on without the human judgment. But the human judgment is fallible, the human hand sometimes disobedient, and the human eye will occasionally go to sleep at its post of duty. The effect, in a ten-acre field of interlacing side-tracks with a half-dozen trains spinning sinuously through them from all the points of the compass, is ghastly.

His name was Watch; he was a large, ugly, one-eyed brindle dog. He would fight with other dogs, kill sheep, bite in a sneaking way, without a bark; all the boys stoned him, all the neighbors gave him a bad name; he was shot at, poisoned, threatened; yet he died a natural and peaceful death, upon his own dung-hill, and his remains were gathered to the shade of a sweet apple tree. Moral: A threatened dog lives the longest.

"In answer to prayer, the finger of Providence always moves from six to ten per cent." Mr. Beecher thus illustrates the beauty of his own preaching, that "confession is good for the soul."

It seems scarcely ingenuous on the part of the Masonic lodges to deny that the Order is responsible for the losses to depositors in the Masonic Savings Bank. Of course we understand that the Order can not engage in banking; but when a part of the Temple is rented for bank purposes; when all its officers, from President to Janitor, are leading Masons, and the bank allowed to appeal to public confidence as the "Masonic Bank of Savings," we can but think the Brotherhood morally responsible to depositors for the safe-keeping of the funds. The same idea suggests itself in connection with the "Odd Fellows' Bank," in the Odd Fellows' building, where the Odd Fellows kept their lodge accounts, and the officers of which were Odd Fellows, and whose leading advertisement was in the Odd Fellows' journal.

"Good morning, Impycu," said his friend, as that gentleman emerged from a tailor's shop. "Bless my soul," was the reply, "how did you know me in this disguise?" "What disguise?" "Why, for the last six months I've been wearing another man's clothes. I am now in my own: I have just paid my tailor." "See here, Impycu; it strikes me you have donned a disguise just when you had ceased to need one."

That otherwise interesting weekly, the London Truth, has recently fallen into the bad habit of boasting of the number of libel suits against it. This test of merit in a journal was, we believe, discovered by the Chronicle of this city, which, however, now seems unwilling to be judged by it, for it has passed a splendid opportunity to provoke another suit. Indeed, in the Carr-Sargent matter, it has improvidently made an abject apology.

Here is a problem in mental arithmetic: If President Hayes is unpopular, and if the procession that escorted him in Chicago was five miles long, how many times five miles long would a procession escorting him have to be if he were popular? Here is an easier one: If President Hayes drove into Chicago in a barouche drawn by four horses, at the head of a procession five miles long, with Attorney-General Devens at his side, what would we have thought if he had merely ridden into Jerusalem on an ass? One more: What Attorney-General would have been the ass?

The inconvenient scarcity of five-cent pieces is now explained. Instead of banking the contents of their contribution boxes, as heretofore, the churches have taken to hoarding them for the purpose of withdrawing the small coins from circulation in the hope of getting larger ones. Thus far the plan has not been altogether successful; the men who formerly gave five cents now give nothing.

OLLA-PODRIDA.

We hear bad news from San Diego. The climate of this part of our State is represented to be very delightful. The port is, next to that of San Francisco, the best upon the Pacific Coast. There has been some prospect that Tom Scott might connect his railroad with the harbor of San Diego; in which event the route to China would be shortened some seven hundred miles, and the entire oriental trade would be diverted from its present line. San Francisco would find itself abandoned of the rich prospective commerce of the Orient, and be left as the entrepôt of a local coast trade. These considerations have caused considerable anxiety in our business and financial circles, and contributed doubtless to the decline in the values of our real property. Now, there comes to us seemingly reliable information, which, if true, will cast a blight over the prospects of San Diego, arrest its material progress and forever prevent it from realizing its anticipations of becoming a great commercial metropolis and the seat of the trade of India. It is charged, and even admitted by the leading journals of that city, that a Mr. — has succeeded in growing the banana, and that there is imminent danger that it may become so acclimated that the banana fruit shall become a leading production of the county of San Diego. If the fear is realized, this portion of the State is ruined and will be given over to hopeless poverty: its people will become idle and worthless. It is well known that no people flourish where the banana grows. This fruit is capable of sustaining life with so little labor that it has become a recognized fact that where it is grown civilization must decay. Unless the authorities take this matter promptly in hand, uproot the plant, and impose severe penalties upon those who grow it, we shall have reproduced within our own borders a Central American civilization—Bob Ingersoll's idea of a community, wearing broad-brimmed sombreros, through the holes of which uncombed hair protrudes; riding bareback on Sunday to a bull fight; women barefoot, in cotton gowns, whose sole industry is to raise children, comb their hair, and eat watermelons.

There is a great deal in climate. If it were not for our climate we should have no hoodlums. We have no firesides in San Francisco. Some one has said there can be no fire-side circle around a hole in the floor, meaning the aperture over a heating furnace in the cellar. There can be no fire-side circle around an ornamental grate that for more than half the year has no fire in it, and for the remainder of the season is only piled with a handful of smouldering coal; there is no fire-side circle around a poor man's stove, the fuel for which the children must gather in the streets. Our boys are not, like those of New England and the North, driven to their homes at night for a large part of the year to find protection from cold. Blankets and roaring fires are not in demand here as there. After a boy is ten years of age he has very little necessity of a home at all; and it is not surprising that the children of the vicious find it more agreeable to lead the life of street Arabs than to hang around the desolate and uncomfortable home, where poverty, dissipation, and perhaps cruelty reign. Children of ten years and upward, attracted by the mildness of the climate, charmed by the society of street associates, delighting in the adventurous incidents and attractions of absolute freedom gather together in little societies and plan for themselves a life of independence. Every boy is more or less a "Tom Sawyer;" at some time there comes to him the desire of being a pirate or a Robin Hood, and he takes to the wharves, the hay piles, the empty houses, the sand-dunes. He gathers around him kindred spirits; they live upon fruit in its season; the refuse of restaurants and hotels furnishes them food; they sell papers, run errands, pilfer, and pick up here and there a dime; the dime novel excites their imaginations, and prompts them to imitation by romantic stories of vagabondage and crime. Boys and girls thus neglected by parents, driven out from unattractive homes, unnoticed by society, and abandoned to idleness, come naturally to be criminals and hoodlums. Thus we are producing a class of vagrants and criminals peculiar to ourselves. Vicious boys from the interior, breaking away from parental restraint, come to San Francisco to swell the crowd. From this class of boys we are educating a class of criminals and tramps; the more daring and adventurous develop into thieves and burglars; the more timid grow up to become vagrants and idlers. Our city is as yet too young to realize the extent of danger to which it is exposed, but this is an evil that is yearly growing and assuming most serious proportions. The parent who has a home of plenty, where every comfort is provided, where there is a mother with her love, and a father with his discipline, realizes oftentimes how difficult it is to restrain the waywardness of his boy; how serious a responsibility it is to direct him safely through the temptations that beset boys in a city like this, and how frequent it is that the children of the best homes break loose from every moral influence and drift away to the bad. Is it then strange, that from these homes of poverty and pinching want, where one or two rooms are all that are furnished for kitchen and dormitory, from these homes where the parents are drunk, where crime is a familiar presence, and where a moral sentiment is never heard, that a bright, keen-witted boy should go out in disgust with a resolution never to return? He can find no employment because the "order" of artisans, in its cowardly selfishness, has conspired against his becoming an apprentice to some useful trade. He can find no innocent amusement; the theatre is closed to him because he has no money for admission; the saloon, the brothel, the gambling hell are the only places open and attractive. The Mechanics' Fair demands half a dollar for him to listen to its music and watch the play of its fountains. His clothes are ragged; the dress of the girl is torn and dirty; they are quick to note the glance of scornful contempt thrown sidelong at them; they are proud; they have a sense of being injured and they resent the wrong they can neither right nor philosophize upon. They resent the wrong society puts upon them by warring against it, by confederating and banding together, boys and girls. Society stamps them as hoodlums, gathers up its skirts and scolds.

The remedy for hoodlumism is not the church, for its sermon never reaches down to it. The grave old Deacon

Buckram, or the stiff and prudish Miss Black Bombazine, never gets within talking distance of a hoodlum girl or boy, and if they did the hoodlum would get the best of any theological discussion they might enter upon. Prayers may move the finger of Providence to point from six to ten per cent.; the prayer that invokes the Divine consent for a clergyman to accept a "call" at a higher salary is often answered; but we have never witnessed any intervention of Providence in behalf of our boys and girls gone astray. The remedy for hoodlumism is not the criminal code; the county jail, the industrial school, the Magdalen asylum, are in no sense reformatory, and over their portals might be written the words that Dante found inscribed over the gates of hell. We have a suggestion to make, not in the way of remedy, but prevention. Our suggestion is, however, premature and will not be heeded for at least ten years. It will take that time for this evil to develop its full proportions, before society will very seriously undertake to consider it. The crop must ripen and begin to drop its seed; and when we finally have a perfectly developed criminal class, and when its burdens shall be more keenly felt by our tax-paying and property class—when our wild boys shall have become full grown criminals—then we will look around us for a remedy. Our suggestion is in the nature of a prevention and not a cure, and it rests in this idea: Boys will be boys, and girls will be girls. They must have amusements and recreations. If innocent amusements and harmless recreations are not provided for them, they will improvise criminal and hurtful pleasures for themselves. Wealthy people may make their homes attractive, and thus rescue their children from the dangers of the Arab life. For the children of the poor we would, at the public expense, furnish a pleasant, instructive resort, where they might enjoy themselves in innocent recreations, and where instruction should be mingled with pleasure: where there should be plenty of fun and of a kind that would improve and not demoralize. We would take Union Square, and, at an expense of say one million of dollars, would build a glass and iron palace. It should be an ornament to the city of San Francisco. It should be divided into compartments; it should cover the entire square and be of proportionate height, with stairways and galleries leading to all its parts; it should have in it fountains, birds, music, flowers, and an aquarium; it should have at least an elephant or two and several cages of monkeys; it should have a splendid promenade, where in the evening a band should play; it should have a dancing floor, with appropriate music, where young people might dance; it should have a reading-room for free books, a lecture-room for free lectures, a Punch and Judy, and a marionette show; a theatre for amateur theatricals, a gymnasium, and a ball court; halls, which literary societies and social clubs might use free of cost. There might be rented, at a moderate price, a restaurant where a lunch should be provided; a nut, candy, and fruit store; a saloon for ice cream, soda water, and temperance drinks; a court for baby wagons, where children with their nurses might romp; a garden with caves, and beautiful flowers; and a fountain with miniature lakes, with speckled trout, and swan, and toy boats. This palace should be placed under the charge of a commission of gentlemen who should, without salary, act as guardians of the property and mentors of the of the institution. The price of admission should be cleanliness and good conduct. It should be open Sundays and every day till say ten o'clock at night. It would be free from wind, free from dust, and free from sectarian influence; a place where children, young boys and girls, young people, old people, poor people, everybody, might go and stay, might go and come as they pleased, and where the leading idea should be to provide innocent amusement and healthful recreation without cost. Such an institution as this would do more good to the rising generation, and rescue more boys and girls from lives of idleness, profligacy, and crime, than all the reformatory institutions now among us. It would rival the Sunday-school in the good it would accomplish; it might supplement the free common schools in the good they are presumed to do.

In order to meet the expense of this pleasure palace, all the higher teachers from our common schools might be dispensed with, the cosmopolitan schools might be abolished, and the system brought back to the point from which it started, viz.: the education of the children of the poor in the rudimentary elements of an English education. In this way saving of $750,000 a year could be effected. There might be some economical and decent system suggested for working the street department, some intelligent and honest man placed at the head of it, and an additional million be saved for the tax-payers. The salaries of all our officials might be reduced one-half, and another half million of money captured. Commander Glass' pleasure yacht might be laid up, and thus a few more thousands might be turned into the maintenance of a pleasure palace. Then some of our rich men might be induced to die and leave a fund to endow some special sport for this popular pleasure university; say a professorship for the dancing hall or gymnasium, a band of music, or a band of monkeys for the perpetual delectation of our boys and girls. It would in time, we hope, become popular for people to die that they might have the privilege of leaving something to this kindergarten of fun. If such a place as this, free and open to all, attractive music, fountains, birds, flowers, innocent recreations, pleasurable amusements, and instructive teachings, would not withdraw our boys and girls from the vicious association of the streets, we do not know what would. There are, we think, very few boys who would not rather be gentlemen than loafers, honest boys than hoodlums; very few girls who, with a kind word and encouragement, would not infinitely prefer a life of virtuous industry to one of shame. There are, in our opinion, very few irreclaimables among the young. We never saw a gang of boys stoning a Chinaman to whom we could not appeal with effect. Only a few days since we tested our powers over half a dozen of these little wretches whom we found going for a heathen Chinese, endeavoring to solve the great political and labor problem with stones. We accosted them as "young gentlemen," and in a conciliatory way discoursed with them the Chinese question. We were amazed at the intelligence and information they displayed; we were not a little surprised at the ingenuity with which they argued in defense of the right of pelting the heathen, and we were quite satisfied at the result of our lecture, which was not given till we had patiently listened to them, after which they politely listened to us.

Let it not be thought that this plan of ours is suggested as a panacea for all ills, nor as a solution of the problem, "What shall we do with our boys?" There are other questions that should accompany a proper consideration of this question, one of which is involved in the idea of technic schools, where boys and girls may be taught trades and be educated to useful employments. Another is the reform of our school system, to the end that we may escape the evils of mis-education and over-education. Another is some plan where the home influence may be purified and uplifted to a higher plane. Nor do we suggest this plan of ours as one at variance with the teachings of church or Sunday-school; nor do we underrate the exertions of Christian people in their endeavor in their own way to exert a moral influence over the lives of our youth.

OUR LIBRARY OF OLD FAVORITES.

XLIX.—Memories.

It was in the depths of the cool green wood,
The sunbeams filtered over her hair;
On some happy thought she seemed to brood,
And I kissed her unaware.
The sun had gone from the purple skies,
And each bird had flown to its downy nest.
Still I bathed my soul in her eyes:
"Dearest and best,
Darling, till all that can die of me dies,
On my heart rest."
He lifted his eyes from the lettered page,
And half forgot the gray in his hair.
"How well I remember the hour!" he cried;
"Where is she—where?"
Watchers gathered about a bed
Whence a woman sunk to her last long rest;
This she whispered: "I mind what he said
In the cool green wood with the sun in the west:
Dearest, till all that can die of me dies,
On my heart rest."
Men forget sooner than women," she said,
"Does he remember how we met there?
O for a kiss from him ere I lie dead!
Where is he—where?"
So she parted from life with a sigh.
Know we naught of death's mysteries yet?
Did his soul thrill as her soul passed by?
Men are prone to forget.
But his cheek was wet with a sudden tear
As he turned to his old law book again.
O Love, so full of joy and fear,
Despite thy trouble, despite thy pain,
Who would not summon thee back again?
"As we sow we must reap," he said, with a sigh;
"Perhaps our parting was all for the best,
But until all that can die of me dies
In my heart she must rest!"
The rain beat fast on the window-pane,
The pine trees shivered and sighed in the blast,
A ghostly whisper fell on his ear—
She had spoken and passed!

MARY KYLE-DALLAS.

L.—A Retrospect.

In the year since Jesus died for men
Eighteen hundred years and ten,
We were a gallant company;
Riding o'er land and sailing o'er sea,
Oh, but we went merrily!
We forded the river and clomb the high hill;
Never our steeds for a day stood still;
Whether we lay in the cave or the shed,
Our sleep fell soft on the hardest bed;
Whether we couched in our rough capote
On the rougher plank of our gliding boat,
Or stretched on the beach, or our saddles spread
As a pillow beneath the resting head,
Fresh we woke upon the morrow.
All our thoughts and words had scope,
We had health, and we had hope,
Toil and travel, but no sorrow.
We were of all tongues and creeds;
Some were those who counted beads,
Some of mosque, and some of church,
And some (or I mis-say) of neither;
Yet through the wide world might ye search,
Nor find a mother crew nor blither.
But some are dead and some are gone,
And some are scattered and alone,
And some are rebels on the hills
That look along Epirus' valleys,
Where Freedom still at moments rallies
And pays in blood Oppression's ills;
And some are in a far countree,
And some all restlessly at home;
But never more, oh, never, we Shall meet to revel and to roam.
But those hardy days flew cheerily,
And when they now fade drearily,
My thoughts, like swallows, skim the main,
And bear the spirit back again
Over the earth and through the air,
A wild bird and a wanderer.
LI.—The Water-lily.
O star on the breast of the river!
O marvel of bloom and grace!
Did you fall straight down from heaven
Out of the sweetest place?
You are white as the thoughts of an angel,
Your heart is steeped in the sun;
Did you grow in the golden city,
My pure and radiant one?
Nay, nay, I fell not out of heaven,
None gave me my saintly white;
It slowly grew from the blackness
Down in the dreary night.
From the ooze of the silent river
I won my glory and grace.
White souls fall not, O my poet!
They rise to the sweetest place. M. F. BUTTS.

Bogardus, when not glass-ball shooting, can make way with forty-nine fish-balls out of a possible fifty.

THE WISDOM OF OUR ANCESTORS.

Curiosities of Ancient Errors and Customs.

Knowledge consists in the acquisition not merely of new facts, the recollection of old ones, and the recoloring of faded impressions, but it may also consist in forgetting or discarding a great many things accepted and cherished as truths. We must forget sometimes in order to learn, or rather learn by forgetting. It is amusing to observe, and encouraging to those who feel disheartened at their own ignorance, to note how some of the greatest intellects of antiquity—the accepted teachers of mankind—have themselves been mistaken on very commonplace subjects, and propagated their errors among their admiring followers.

Every school boy nowadays knows that snow and ice, for example, are water in a congealed form; and yet Pliny, and Gregory the Great—many centuries after Pliny—believed that ice and snow were converted into crystals. Plutarch believed that goat's blood could melt diamonds; but that the blood should be warm and the goat fed on wine and saffras, and then it would not only melt diamonds, but break hammers and anvils, and was, in fact, an infallible cure for calculus in the bladder.

Wonderful and various was the efficacy ascribed to the mandrake. It would poison him who pulled it; it shrieked when pulled, and would only grow at the foot of a scaffold. A plant called ferum equinum would draw the nails out of the horse-shoe that pressed it. Bay leaves warded off lightning; so did the fig tree and the skin of a seal. A cup-of-ivy-leaf, filled with wine and water, separated these liquids, retaining the wine and letting the water ooze through the pores of the leaf. A snake could not live in the shade of an ash, and an elephant had no joints. Aristotle asserted that solopodes (animals not split in the hoof) had no gall, neither, according to others, had the dove or pigeon—this, because of the meekness ascribed in Scripture to those birds. According to Seneca—the tutor of Nero—the she-bear licked her offspring into shape. It was said by the ancients that, if a wolf saw a traveler before the traveler saw the wolf, the traveler was struck dumb or hoarse. This notion gave rise to the expression among the Romans, Lupus in fabula (the wolf in the fable), and was applied on occasions when a sudden pause occurred in a conversation. Sudden surprise and the natural alarm at encountering such a furious animal may have given rise to the fiction.

Another idea was that deer, crows, hawks, and eagles lived to fabulous ages. A deer, it was believed, lived a hundred years; crows five hundred, and hawks seven hundred years. The periods of gestation in the one case, and of incubation in the other, ought to have corrected this notion, for length of life in all animals is proportionate to their respective periods of gestation. Thus, the deer is in gestation eight months, and the elephant fifteen; and as those longest in gestation are slowest in maturing, it is probable that the life of a deer would extend to thirty years, and that of an elephant to sixty or seventy. But birds of any kind can not, according to this theory, be long lived, since the period of incubation is short and they arrive at maturity early. Yet it is a popular belief even in the present day that eagles live a hundred years. Who has not heard of the poetic fiction of the phoenix first introduced by Homer? There was but one phoenix in the world, and it lived a thousand years. At the end of that time it was consumed by fire, from the ashes of which, and procreated by its own energy, it arose renewed after the lapse of another thousand years. It is possible that Homer meant to typify by allegory the life of a nation which can not be annihilated by whatever disaster, and must revive in some form or another. Mention is made in Scripture of the phoenix, but Greek scholars think it is the bark of the palm tree—steleus jointikos, and not jointix—which is alluded to as renewing itself.

A salamander was so cold as to extinguish fire when placed in it, and the female vipers bit off the head of the male, in revenge of which the young in parturition ate their way through their mother's side. The Romans for this reason, when drowning a parricide to execution of the law, inclosed a viper in the sack with the criminal. In the construction of this fable, it was forgotten that the young vipers, when apprehending danger, take refuge in their mothers' mouths.

Change of sexes in the hare was also an accepted theory. The hare might be a male one part of the year, and a female another. Lamprey eels were believed to have nine eyes in each side of the head. A camelion lived on air until it was discovered that flies afforded the necessary food. The ostrich, and still later, the emu, digested iron; but though these birds are known to swallow iron nails as ducks and turkeys swallow stones, to promote digestion, it is scarcely likely that iron would dissolve in the stomach. The horn of a unicorn, made into a drinking-cup, was an antidote to poison and a preservative against apoplexy. But as there are several kinds of unicorns, such as the rhinoceros and Indian ox, besides several sorts of fishes and insects, and the horn of no particular unicorn is stated, the recipe loses its value. That all animals have their counterpart in the sea is a fiction not yet exploded; but though there might be some points of resemblance sufficient to suggest a name, still the dog-fish is no more like a dog than the latter is like his namesake in the heavens.

That the swan sings sweetly immediately before its death is a very pretty poetic fiction not yet exploded. It is founded on the well-known mythological fable of Orpheus having been changed into a swan. But that a peacock should be ashamed of his feet, and that a stork couldn't live in any other but a republican country are fables, for which one fails to see the slightest foundation. The lion, after centuries of patient endurance under the imputation of being afraid of a cock, had at last vindicated his courage by springing from the King of Bavaria's managerie into a neighboring poultry yard and eating up the denizens thereof—cocks and hens together.

Rings are worn on the left hand and on the third finger, because the heart is in the left side, and a nerve from the heart descends to third finger. But when rings first began to be worn they were put on any finger of either hand. The Romans wore their rings on the forefinger of the right hand, and sometimes on one finger and sometimes on another. This was when iron rings were worn. But when they began to wear gold and precious rings they shifted them to the left. The most plausible reason for shifting the ring to the left seems to be that the left hand is less used than the right, and the ring on that hand is less liable to injury. The right is the place of honor from time immemorial. Nature and custom give preference to the right for many reasons, but chiefly because of its superior strength—its strength, because of the alleged crassitude or thickness of the blood and its vigorous circulation; its vigorous circulation, because of the superior activity of the members of the right side.

That a drowned man floats on the ninth day, because at that time the gall breaks, was another popular error, and is largely prevalent in the present day. The fat and not the gall is the agency in this case. When the fat begins to ferment, putrefaction sets in, and the body becomes swollen and inflated, and therefore lighter. The fattest people float soonest. Fat animals, whose galls have been taken out entirely for experiment, and thrown into water have been known to float sooner than those containing the gall. Eels, which have little or no fat, seldom or never float.

The custom of saluting or invoking the protection of the Deity on a person sneezing is of very ancient date, practiced in all countries, and in ancient and modern times. The custom is said to derive its origin from a pestilence, prevalent in Italy about the time of Gregory the Great, when the force used in sneezing proved fatal to those affected, and the protection of God was invoked in the perilous juncture by saying, "God bless you," or, "God bless us." But long before Christianity the custom had obtained and been religiously observed. The Emperor Thierius, though a sullen, morose man, invariably observed the custom of invoking Jupiter whenever he sneezed, and expected others to invoke Deity for him as well. Still further back, among the Greeks in the time of Cyrus, when that potentate was preparing for his retreat, one of the soldiers sneezed, and the High Priest, who was consulting omens at the time, invoked the assistance of Jupiter Soter. When a certain Emperor of Africa sneezed the acclamations and salutations of his subjects rang from one end of the city to the other. Sneezing was regarded as a good or bad sign: when good, it was hailed with thanksgiving; when bad, the evil that was supposed to follow was deprecated by invoking the interposition of Jove. In apoplexy, cataplexy, etc., it was regarded as a good sign; in pleurisy and sore throat, a bad one. If one of the ancients sneezed while dressing in the morning, he went to bed again. Aristotle has a problem why sneezing from noon till midnight was a good sign, but sneezing from night to noon, the reverse. Sneezing to the right was a good omen, but sneezing to the left a bad one. Plutarch relates that when Themistocles sacrificed in his galley on the eve of a battle, Xerxes and one of his assistants sneezed to the right, and the soothsayer presaged victory to the Greeks, and an overthrow to the Persians.

In the three great climacterics—forty-nine, sixty-three, and eighty-one—sixty-three was held to be the most dangerous. If death is escaped at this climacteric, the person was likely to live to eighty-one.

The term "bosom friend" is derived from the position occupied by the ancients at the symposia or supper tables, when guests, reclining on couches, sat in circular form, so that the head of one would be nearly opposite the bosom of another; hence, bosom friend. This must have been the position occupied by our Saviour when John reclined on his bosom at the Last Supper.

Owls and ravens were birds of bad omen. When Alexander entered Babylon ravens appeared; and an owl was seen by Crassus on the eve of his ruin. The falling of salt was a bad omen. Salt, the emblem of purity and incorruptibility, and the symbol of friendship, was the first service presented to a guest; if it fell, it presaged friendship of brief duration. The ancients at convivial meetings wore chaplets of roses, and therefore spoke sub rosa. Nothing that transpired at such meetings was revealed, as a rule of hospitality. The Germans described a rose in the ceiling over the table a sign that all that should pass should be kept a secret. The rose was the flower of Venus, consecrated by Cupid to Harpocrates, the god of Silence.

JOHN MANNING.

American Luxuries in England.

Six years ago ice was such a rarity in London, says a correspondent, that extra charges were made at the hotels if a glass of ice-water was called for, and in most cases the guest had to wait until some could be sent for. An Englishman at that time considered ice-water unhealthy, and looked with amazement at Americans who persisted in calling for it. It was then not kept at the taverns, and it was seldom required. Now the waiters go around at the hotels with bowls of cracked ice and supply all the guests, without extra charge. That it is a recent innovation is evident from the fact that all the drinking-houses in the city of any character have cards extending across their windows, with the word "Ice" emblazoned in large black letters about fifteen inches long. It is evidently paraded as an attraction to customers. "American whisky" is also a new card in their store windows. While dining in a restaurant, the other day, a young Englishman came in there and called for "a go" of American whisky. They brought him about a half-tumblerful, which he swallowed down raw. His red nose and watery eyes gave evidence that he was not a stranger to this kind of drink. Turning to the bill of fare, we found the following rates: "A go" of brandy, one shilling; "a half-go" of brandy, sixpence; "a go" of whisky, sixpence; "a half-go" of whisky, three pence; "a go" of gin, four pence; and "a half-go" two pence. Gin is the favorite drink of the toppers, but whisky is commencing to rival it.

The Pall Mall Gazette says that the marked superiority of women over men is on few points more remarkable than in their superior powers of smelling and tasting. A woman will detect the faintest odor of tobacco when a man, even though a non-smoker, often fails to discover any symptom of it. As with smell so with taste. Women are marvelously acute and fastidious in the matter of sauces and all flavoring ingredients. This faculty has been recognized in a most pleasing manner by the composition of the jury who are to decide in Paris on the merits of the mustards of various nations. The mustard congress is to consist of twelve gentlemen and an equal number of ladies. This arrangement, it is stated, is owing to a suggestion that the palates of men are vitiated by smoking; whereas, women, who do not, as a rule, indulge in that pernicious habit, are likely to be better qualified to form a correct opinion on the merits of condiments.

"Have you got your lesson to-day?" asked a Brooklyn Sunday-school teacher of a little maiden, whose head was bandaged in red flannel. "No, ma'am," said the child. "Well, then, have you got your catechism?" "No, ma'am," again answered the child. "Well, have you got your hymn?" The child drew out, "No, ma'am." "Well, then, I'd like to know what you have got?" impatiently continued the teacher. "Please, ma'am, I've got the mumps."

INTAGLIOS.

Two and Two.

A brown head and a golden head
Above the violets keep in sight;
Dark eyes and blue (with tears to shed)
Look laughing toward me in the light.
A red bird flashes from the tree;
"The world is glad, is glad!" sings he.

A golden head and a head of brown,
Below the violets, miss the sun;
Dark eyes and blue—their lids shut down—
With fears (and theirs were brief) have done.
A dove hides in another tree;
"The world is sad, is sad!" grieves she.
Through song and moon, I hardly know,
Between the red bird and the dove,
If most I'd wish that two below
The violets were with two above,
Or two above the violets lay
With two below them deep to-day.

Suicide.

Invisible as the wind along the sky,
She ever wanders about the earth immense,
A lonely spirit of strange malevolence,
With noiseless feet and vigilant furtive eye,
She loathes and shuns each halcyon haunt where lie
Love, peace, and all sweet happiness born from thence,
Yet greedily seeks for woes and discontents,
For agony's hottest tear, its deepest sigh!
But when some dreary sufferer darkly fails
To find in life's chill heaven one starry trace,
One vital hope no ruinous harm assails,
Toward him she steals with sure triumphant pace,
And slowly to his desperate look unveils
The maddening splendors of her lurid face!

EDGAR FAWCETT.

Endeavor.

A moaning cry, as the world rolls by Through gloom and darkness and glory of sky,
Kings in my ears forever,
And I know not what it profits a man
To plow and sow, to study and plan,
And reap the harvest never.
"Abide in truth, abide,"
"Spake a low voice at my side,
"Abide thou and endeavor."

And even though, after care and toil,
I should see my hopes from a kindly soil,
Though late yet blossoming ever,
Perchance the prize were not worth the pain,
Perchance the fretting and wasting of brain,
Woes its true gladness never.
"Abide in truth, abide,"
"The tender voice replied,
"Abide thou and endeavor."
"Strive, endeavor; it profits more
To fight and fall than on Time's dull shore
To sit an idle ever;
For to him who bares his arm to the strife,
Firm at his post in the battle of life,
The victory faileth never.
"Therefore in faith abide,"
The earnest voice still cried,
"Abide thou and endeavor."

The Swan.

From cloud with purple sprinkled rim
A swan, in calm delight,
Sank down upon the river's brim,
And sang in June, one night.
Of Northland's beauty was his song—
How glad their skies, their air;
How day forgets the whole night long
To go to rest out there.
How shadows there both rich and deep
"Neath birch and elder fall;
What gold-beams o'er each inlet sweeps,
How cool the billows all!
How fair it is, how passing fair,
To own there one true friend!
How faithfulness is home-bred there,
And thither years to wend.
When thus from wave to wave his note,
His simple praise-song rang;
Swift fawned he on his fond mate's throat,
And thus, methought, he sang:
"What more? Though of thy life's short dream
No tale the ages bring,
Yet hast thou loved on Northland's stream,
And sang thy songs there in spring!"
FROM THE SWEDISH OF RINEBERG.

A Vision.

From the tropic air of the city
I'm turning, my darling, to you;
Where your feet tread the fragrant lilies,
White and shining with morning dew.
I catch a breath of their perfume,
Of the busy, life-giving air;
I catch a glimpse of your face, love,
In its framing golden-touched hair.
I hear again the sweet tones, love,
Of the words that have answered my own,
And I walk with you through the meadows,
And list to the wind's low tone;
With you, 'mid the ferns and mosses,
When the shadows are lying asleep;
With you where the waterlilies rush
Through the wild glens dark and deep.
Ah! sweetest of all the sweet visions
That are borne on the morning air,
The glimpses I catch of your face, love,
Framed in gleamings of golden-touched hair.
LILIAN WHITING.

Night and Morning.

I stood alone in the porch last night,
And watched the moon rise over the lea,
Till the shadows waved in the silver light,
And the night wind sighed to me.
And down in the garden-paths I knew
That last year's leaves were lingering yet;
Leaves that had taken the sun and the dew
Of days I would fain forget.
I found no peace in the summer night;
"Old joys," I said, "like the leaves lie low,
And I can not rest in this tranquil light;"
So I wept, and turned to go.
I stood again in the porch at morn,
While the boughs shook down their sparkling spray,
And the sun rose over the springing corn,
And the fields of scented hay.
A wain went by with its fragrant load;
The waggoner whistled loud and clear,
But I heard a step on the quiet road,
And I knew that my love was near.
Blow, morning wind, o'er the sun-lit slope,
And carry the dead leaves out of sight!
For my heart beats high with its new-found hope;
Ah! why did I doubt, last night?

"You have a nice soft thing of it here, Charley," said the gushing heiress, as she fondly patted her simple young husband on the spot where his center-parted hair is.

NEW

BOOKS

A Primer of American Literature. By Chas. F. Richardson. 12mo.....$0 50
Child and Woman. From the German of Clementine Helm. 12mo.....1 50
The Political Economy of Great Britain, the United States, and France, in the Use of Money. 8vo... 3 50
Monetary and Industrial Palaces. A Dialogue. 8vo 1 50
Sensible Etiquette of the Best Society. By Mrs. H. O. Ward. 12mo.....2 00
Life of Madame de la Rochefoucauld. 16mo.....1 25
Artists' Biographies. New volume, Guido Reni. 18mo. 50
A Heart Twice Won, or Second Love. By Mrs. Elizabeth Van Loan. 12mo.....1 50
The Primrose Path. By Mrs. Oliphant. 8vo, paper. 50
Blush Roses. A novel. By Clara Francis Morse. 8vo, paper.....50
Six to One. A Nantucket Idyl. 16mo, 75 cts; paper. 40

BANCROFT'S
721 MARKET ST. S.F.

FALK'S

MILWAUKEE BEER.

Beer drinkers will, on trial of this superior article, be convinced that it is excellent and unsurpassed by any other in the market. It has a beautiful amber color, full body and fine flavor, and is for sale at all the leading places of resort in the city and vicinity. We request a trial.

CUTTING & MURRAY,
Sole Agents, 206 Front Street, S. F.

CALIFORNIA

STATE FAIR

FOR 1878,

AT SACRAMENTO, CAL.,

COMMENCING

MONDAY.....SEPTEMBER 16,

AND CLOSING

SATURDAY.....SEPTEMBER 21.

$50,000 CASH

To be Distributed in Premiums.

THE EXHIBITION WILL BE DIVIDED into Seven Departments, and the SOCIETY'S GOLD MEDAL to be awarded to the most meritorious exhibition in each department.
Those desiring Premium Lists will please notify the Secretary.

The Largest Stock Show and Most Attractive Speed Display

Ever offered by any Agricultural Society in the United States.

ATTRACTIVE MILITARY TOURNAMENT

Public Sale of THOROUGHbred STOCK on Friday of the Fair.

The Central Pacific Railroad and Steamers will carry articles to and from the Fair, free of charge.

Wells, Fargo & Co's Express will deliver all packages free, not weighing over twenty pounds.

Applications for stalls at the Park and space at the Pavilion should be made to ROBERT BECK, Secretary, at once.

Membership.....$5 00
Single Admission.....50 cents

M. D. BORUCK, President.

ROBERT BECK, Secretary.

WAKELEE'S

AUREOLINE

Produces the beautiful

GOLDEN HAIR

SO MUCH ADMIRER. SUPERIOR to the imported article for reason of its freshness and the care used in its production. Price, large bottles, $2.00. Manufactured by H. P. WAKELEE & CO., Druggists, corner Montgomery and Eush Sts.

PUBLIC ADMINISTRATOR,

WILLIAM DOOLAN,

Office No. 12 Nevada Block.

T. J. PETTIT &amp; CO'S

LABEL, SHOW CARD, ENGRAVING AND PRINTING

ESTABLISHMENT,

528 CALIFORNIA STREET, SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

BACON & COMPANY
PRINTERS
CLAY ST. CORNER S. F.

SAN FRANCISCO, September 6, 1878.

MY DEAR MADGE:—I had thought if there was a family in English literature which did not seem to invite the attention of the dramatist it was that of "Dr. Primrose." I never expected to see the dear old vicar and his wayward girls before the footlights, and, having seen them, I must say that they did not appear peculiarly Goldsmithian. It was not, however, because the pretty household picture was not faithfully reproduced, but one so misses the Vicar's happy style of narration that everything seems transformed. Occasionally a bit of the original dialogue is introduced, and it is like the face of an old friend peering out from among a crowd of strangers. What a providential dispensation it was that Herne ceased to be a member of the company before they brought out Olivia! I never saw an actor who looked more at home in a powdered wig and knee-breeches than did Bradley. He is a very fair actor, too, if they do not surcharge him with comely, and played the "Vicar" very acceptably, if somewhat funereally. I was quite enchanted with the first act, and thought everything promised to go off admirably. The scene was really pretty. A comfortable-looking apartment, which, in the stage-like fashion, served the triple uses of parlor, library, and dining-room, was arranged with some cosy-looking, old-fashioned furniture. A ramification of woodwork inclosed the piano, and was supposed to represent the musical instrument most in favor with the Primrose girls. I can not tell you what it was, Madge, but it looked like a progenitor of the Metropolitan Temple organ. There was an old-time dresser filled with blue china, an antique looking book-case, and the inevitable checker-board table-cloth. Looking with prophetic eyes into the dim future I can see the stage manager at Baldwin's in his last hours lift his voice like the dying swan, and sing:

"Oh, wrap the cloth around me, boys,
To die were far more sweet,
With the good old red-checked table-cloth
To be my winding sheet."

There is nothing wrong about the cloth, Madge, but, like Mr. Crumple's "props," it is introduced so frequently as to invite remark. The powdered locks of the vicar and his wife, the bright dresses of the younger ones of the flock, and the homely comfort of everything, made a picture such as the eye delights to dwell on. It was with a pang that I realized that the California model savings bank was not a new institution, and that the poor old Vicar of Wakefield suffered his first misfortune from their eccentric custom of closing up when such a course is least expected. Aside from the savings bank bombshell there is not much in the first act, which is simply introductory. But the second act, oh! the second act introduces Mr. Lewis Morrison in his great specialty, the nielo-dramatic villain. I like to see him enter. I always feel as if a full brass band were playing, "See, the conquering hero comes," and he were keeping time to the inaudible music. I think he feels so, too. "Olivia" and "Thornhill" seem to have arrived a pretty fair understanding by the time the curtain rolls up on the second act, although "Mr. Thornhill" has not made the acquaintance of the audience previously. "Olivia" is a very trying part for Miss Rose Wood. It is difficult for the most superior actress to satisfy the ideal which readers build from a well known author. It is "Olivia's" story which is interesting rather than herself, for, after all, she is in the book but a vain, forward, ordinary girl, and as such would not be an acceptable stage heroine. Miss Wood plays one little scene very tenderly, although it gives her scarcely a word to speak. But I have frequently observed that she has a genius for posing herself in attitudes of supplication and despair. She received a call after this act, which can only have been for this graceful posing, for, really, when one looks back upon it, although one may enjoy the play, there is nothing to call any one out for. I had hoped that Miss Wood would give us some picturesque costuming to delight in, but she did not. She was wrong. There is as great a charm in the quaint costumes of an older time as in the elaborate setting of a stage; and we all know that a stage manager must be an artist to acquire a reputation, when they will copy the model of an apartment from continent to continent, as they did in Diplomacy for example, although it was but a modern comedy, enacted in a modern salon. Miss Wood, and every one else, conformed in a degree to the fashions of the period in which the play is laid. Mr. Bradley, Mrs. Farren, and Mr. Willie Seymour only conformed to them absolutely. These three might have been reprints of some of the etchings of that day. The latter looked as guileless as a baby in his long fair hair, and pitched into his by-play in the hay cart with genuine industry. He is very neat in small parts, and on this occasion was the most interesting member of the "Primrose" band, although Robinson got two distinct rounds of applause all to himself. "Olivia," of course, is excepted. I find myself getting back to "Olivia," and may as well say my say, although Jack thinks he has broken me of the habit of looking at people's feet. But he has not, and can not so long as I see every open glass in the house leveled straight at the floor when the actresses are obliged to wear short dresses. What a slender, arched, pretty Spanish foot "Olivia" has; but oh! Madge, why are not vivid pink hose and Oxford ties with vivid pink laces tabooed? Well, there, I will say no more. My attention was distracted by something much worse, I assure you. A young lady, whose name was killed in large letters, was intrusted with the part of "Sophia." I believe "Sophia" was that one of the "Vicar's" daughters whose "soft, modest, and alluring manner" vanquished by efforts successively repeated. I can not say that this young lady successively repeated any efforts. She was the most respectable specimen of inflexibility I ever saw. She had the stage to and then, and seemed to be telling herself something, but her remarks reached us only once or twice through the evening. Jack thinks she has a delicate, pretty face, and I rather liked the tones of her voice when I did hear them, but she needs to be galvanized. It was madness to imperil the success of a new piece by giving her such an important part; but I am inclined to think all the managers have spells of lunacy nowadays. Bishop made rather a rollicking villain, and joined in the wholesale repentance in the last act. How absurd this is! After making their villainy—more especially "Thornhill's"—so depraved and revolting that it is unpardonable, they do a little eleventh hour business in the last act, and are forgiven, even by "Burchell." O'Neill, as "Burchell," had nothing to do until the last, except to glide around mysteriously in a long black cloak. But they gave him one speech finally, and he made the most of it. I like to see O'Neill in earnest. There is considerable strength in his Celtic warmth. What a difference there is between the idyllic quiet of Olivia and the boisterous fun of Our Bachelors. It can hardly be called a play, for it is a mere farcical melange; but the people seemed to enjoy it as much as if it were constructed by every Boucicaultian rule of art governing such matters. When the two comedians emerged from opposite sides and met in the centre of the stage, "at once there rose so wild a yell" as only a crowded gallery can give. They are quite unchanged. In fact, one can hardly expect a complete metamorphosis in the course of one year, although they have both "done" Europe since their last visit, and, I think, must have run up some long tailors' bills. Robson's only attempt at make-up is a remarkably natural-looking wig, only half covered with "hay-er," as he expresses it in that remarkable way he has of bisecting a monosyllable. The remainder of it glistens like a sea of glass. In fact, he glistens from head to foot; actually beams and gleams with the suggestiveness of soap and scrubbing. Crane is an irascible old chap, with a very tufty pair of whiskers and turbulent opposition standing out in every lock on his head. The plot of the play is as transparent as crystal, but some of the situations are very amusing, and the people laugh as if the sayings of Artemus Ward, Mark Twain, and the Danbury man were all combined. First, one heard a subdued giggle in the dress circle, then a shriek of mirth from the gallery; this was broken in upon by the diapason of an orchestra guffaw. Anon, timid womankind expressed itself in a to-he-he; amused age, in a subdued cackle; then came a chorus, at regular intervals, over some fusillade of witty dialogue—ha-ha-ha—pause—ha-ha-ha—pause, and ha-ha-ha. Now and then there was the solo explosion; and what is funnier than one single person out of several hundred seeing something that no one else sees and laughing at it all by himself. How inexpressibly foolish he feels after he has laughed. How wonderfully every one turns to him. How doubly distilled is his misery if it happens to occur a second time. Now and then one hears the fresh, gurgling laugh of a child; but the complications of "Bangle" and "Jowler" are not exactly adapted to childish appreciation. I believe they are rehearsing Forbidden Fruit. That is a very attractive title, Madge. Whether it is the title or the play I can not say, but I have heard a great many say who would not go to see Our Bachelors that they were waiting for Forbidden Fruit. They are getting a company together at last at the California. Our Bachelors introduced three of the new people, and, I believe, we are yet only to hear from the comedian and leading man. I have scarcely formed an opinion of Miss De Forrest. At all events, if she is no better, I think she is no worse than we have had. She is somewhat hard in her style, and is perhaps, therefore, better as "Mrs. Eva Clinton," a rich widow, than she will be in more ingenuous parts. She has a fair stage presence, and inclines to the striking in toilets. She was excessively nervous in her first scene, for which no one can blame her, for it is a most ill-advised situation in which to introduce a heroine or a hero. Mr. Cotter sustained the latter role on this occasion, and appears rather well, aside from the remarkable regard he manifests for his hat. I could not exactly ascertain whether he were afraid of losing it, feared to catch cold, or thought it remarkably becoming. He clung to it like a drowning man to a straw; it might not be called a very handsome hat either. We were next introduced to Miss Eliza Long, the soubrette. Is it not strange that all the Longs are so short? She is the merest dot of a woman excepting her head, which is large enough for a leading man. She has some nice little ways, but is not at all vivacious, and is not, I should think, especially talented. If she is it was not visible on this occasion. As for beauty she has a magnificent pair of eyes. Is it not strange that one sees so few really beautiful women on the stage when the world does so abound with them? It is not often that one sees two like Maud Granger and Jeffreys-Lewis on the stage at one time. I looked around the auditorium on Monday night and saw so many pretty faces. There were at least twenty handsome women and three whom I considered peerlessly beautiful, who would challenge the attention in any assemblage, and this without the charm of light and colors, in those disfiguring California Theatre shadows, with no rouge and no blacking. A little powder perhaps, but what woman nowadays does not give her nose a little sly, innocent caress with the powder puff? I meet several girls on the street shabbily dressed, or bedecked with cheap finery which is as bad, who are quite as handsome as Adelaide Neilson, and yet how world-famous is her beauty because she is one of the few handsome women on the stage. Do the pretty girls never get stage struck, or is the disease confined to the plainer ones only. After all it is only expression we seek. It is this eternal false stage-smile that makes them all look alike, all the stupid ones I mean. What does it matter whether the nose be too long or too flat, whether the mouth be too broad or too thin, so that the face says something which comes from the inside, and oh, how many of them say nothing but "aint I sweet!" I can not accuse Alice Oates, who comes next week at Look's Bush Street Theatre, of this sort of insipidity. I shall be glad to see the frolicsome, frisky, jovial little woman back again. She will have a good season, for the people are beginning to languish for a little opera bouffe. We need it periodically, as ague patients require red pepper tea. She commences the season with the Chimes of Normandy, and I hope next week to tell you how they ring.

BETSY B.

A writer in a London journal thus describes the lodgings of our American prima donna, Albani, who has recently married the famous impressario, Mr. Gye: "One's first impression on entering the drawing-room is that he is in the saloon of a rich Florentine of the sixteenth century. The furniture is of ebony inlaid with ivory. Imposing buffets and babinets stand in the place of cabinets and chiffoniers. The curtains and mural hangings are in crimson brocade. Settees are ranged round the walls. In the palace of Fountainebleau there are some like them, in the Henri II. gallery. Mixed with them and scattered about are modern fauteuils inviting visitors to be seated. A smaller saloon, in blue and white, the Diva and her sister have made their music and sitting-room. You see at once it is the habitat of a lyrical star.

JUST PUBLISHED MECHANICS' FAIR SKETCH BOOK!

THE FIRST EDITION OF THE

ARGONAUT SKETCH BOOK

Of the Mechanics' Fair for 1878

IS NOW READY.

The Sketch Book this season consists of thirty-six pages, printed on heavy book paper, and bound in handsome tinted covers. There are something like five hundred illustrations in the work, executed by our best artists and representing every conceivable subject. There are letters descriptive of the general features of the Fair, of the Garden, of the Flirting Scenes on Saturday, and of the pretty exhibits.

There are character sketches and caricatures of yourself, and of hundreds of people you know and more that you have seen. Representatives of every section and quarter of the city have been outlined by the cunning hand of the artist. Out-of-town people have also suffered.

There is everything to interest, and some things that will make you laugh. So, don't fail to get a copy of the first edition. It will soon be exhausted. For sale at all news stands and by a thousand newsboys. Dealers throughout the State and Pacific Coast supplied by the San Francisco News Company. Copies mailed to any address from this office on receipt of the retail price, 25 cents.

Make it a point to get a copy of the Sketch Book.

THE ARGONAUT PUBLISHING CO.

522 California Street, San Francisco.

BOSTON DRESS REFORM.

California "Worth" Princess Suits, Skirts, and attachable Flounces: Cashmere and Merino Union Suits for ladies and children; ladies' and misses' shoulder-brace Corsets; Abdominal Corsets. No. 430 Sutter Street. A. W. BAKER, the only Dress Reform Agent in the city.

BATTLE OF THE BOOKS.

General H. D. Watson, of the Johnson's Cyclopaedia, reconnoitres in force, and captures the very light brigade that Appleton throws out as skirmishers. Knowlton must get his Ebenezer up, brandish his little hatchet, and come scalping back upon the war-path. Chaw-ink-sky, Warsaw's last champion who shrieked when Appleton's Cyclopaedia fell, must rally for another bluff. In this battle of the Cyclopaedias, the schoolmaster and the second-hand dealer in old cloth-covered novels seem to be getting the worst of the conflict. Watson's last broadside is thus entitled:

THE LOST CAUSE AND EBENEZER KNOWLTON.

Appleton's revised American Cyclopaedia is blighted and doomed. It deserves to be, for it has falsified the facts of history in the interest of a church which has for centuries stood in the way of human liberty and intellectual progress. Let intelligent American parents and patrons and friends of our Public Schools ask themselves the question, Why are the Catholic priests and the Jesuitical foes of our Public School system so strenuous in their efforts to force this lying Cyclopaedia into the schools of this State? Why do they so zealously recommend the faithful of their flocks to buy this costly and worthless production? No doubt their object is to preserve the minds of the school children of this State and the hearts of their parishioners free from the taint of sectarian prejudice! They have every confidence in a book made by Father O'Reilly, and most heartily sanctioned by Cardinal McCloskey. Why shouldn't they?

And now comes the redoubtable "Professor" Ebenezer Knowlton, after his perilous ascent of Mount Shasta, "alone and without a guide" (?), with his deep chest and brawny arms and his "words of learned length and thundering sound," to prop up the falling fortunes of James T. White and his blighted Cyclopaedia. The "Professor," however, "having jointly and severally in the aggregate examined over a thousand test topics," comes to the sage conclusion that "the American Cyclopaedia is unquestionably and very decidedly the better book." The learned "Professor" would do well to invest twenty-five cents in a composition primer and devote his next year to the mastery of its contents before he ventures to appear before the public in the role of a literary critic. I trust that those who know me will give me credit for possessing too much discernment and knowledge of men and things ever to leave to Ebenezer's determination the merits of Johnson's Cyclopaedia, or of any other book. For the benefit of those who do not know me, I will state that I never challenged White to leave the two Cyclopaedias to the judgment of Ebenezer Knowlton, or to the judgment of any Committee of which the renowned Ebenezer was a member.

The "Professor" accuses me of attempting to bribe him! Will the doughty "Professor" tell the public when, where, and how? I assert that I never tried, either directly or indirectly, to bribe Ebenezer Knowlton, and I defy him to prove that I ever did. It is hard for me to say this where many young ladies still live to whom the immaculate "Professor" once exclaimed, "My children, you see before you a man who, thanks to the training of his good mother and the kindness of his Heavenly Father, never told a lie." Oh! Ebenezer, lesser than Washington, yet better, how has the mighty fallen into the hands of Appleton's agent!

And now a word or two in reference to the card of the almost equally renowned Choynski, the far-famed antiquarian who sells second-hand books on Geary Street. Let me inform the gentle antiquarian that either he or his friend White can have all the Appleton's American Cyclopaedias which he or his friend will furnish bonds to pay for, at the following rates: Revised, in sheep, for $60; agents' price, $95. Condensed American, 4 vols., $19; agents' price, $38. On my return to the city last Saturday I found three cards, from the courteous Choynski in my post-office box, in one of which he threatened to publish my offer in last Sunday's Chronicle as mere buncombe. Now, to settle this question forever, I hereby challenge either Choynski or White to place $5,000 in the Bank of California of this city, and if I do not deliver at any place they may direct one hundred sets of Appleton's Revised 16 vol. American Cyclopaedia for $5,000 within ninety days, I agree to forfeit $100 for every set I fall short, and I will place $5,000 in bonds in the above mentioned bank as an evidence of my good faith in making this proposition. Among the one hundred sets which I am ready to furnish will be those that were kicked out of the Oakland schools by the unanimous vote of the Board of Education of that city, in order to make room for Johnson's Cyclopaedia. White has not accepted my challenge, which, I submit, was a fair one. Neither he nor D. Appleton & Co. dare accept it. I dare Choynski or White to put up money to take Appleton's Cyclopaedias at $60 a set. H. D. WATSON.

One of the most attractive and beautiful features of the Mechanics' Fair is the exhibit of musical boxes made by M. J. Paillard & Co., 120 Sutter Street. The display is a fine one, embracing some of the best instruments in the country. Visitors to the Pavilion should not fail to see and hear these exquisite boxes.

The Saturday evening train of the Santa Cruz Railroad (for Aptos and Santa Cruz) which has made connection at Pajaro with the Southern Pacific Railroad train leaving San Francisco at 3:30 P. M., has been withdrawn for the season. The Monterey and Salinas Valley Railroad has also withdrawn the Saturday evening train (for Monterey), which has connected at Salinas with the above-mentioned train of the Southern Pacific Railroad.

For silverware, go to Anderson & Randolph's, Clock Tower Building, corner Montgomery and Sutter Streets.

Mrs. Parker, of the Ladies' Depository, has opened a new store at 126 Post Street. She will be happy to see her former patrons. New Style Lace Patterns.

LADIES—NUMEROUS GOOD GIRLS APPLY DAILY for positions at my office. Your orders are filled by my lady clerk, a competent housekeeper, who knows how to select your help. Zeehandelaar & Co., 627 Sacramento Street, above Montgomery.

WEDDING AND OTHER PRESENTS OF SOLID STREILING SILVERWARE BRONZES, CLOCKS, AND FANCY GOODS

The largest stock of artistic novelties in the city, at much lower prices than similar goods have ever before been offered.

ANDERSON & RANDOLPH,

Clock Tower Building, corner Montgomery and Sutter Sts.

CHURCH NOTICE.

HOWARD STREET M. E. CHURCH, Howard Street, between Second and Third. The pastor, Rev. Thomas Guard, will preach at 11 A. M. and 7 1/2 P. M. Sunday-school at 2 P. M. Praise service at 6 1/2 P. M.

WANTED—Copies of the ARGONAUT of August 3d (No. 4, Vol. III.)

BALDWIN'S THEATRE.

THOMAS MAGUIRE.....MANAGER.
F. LYSTER.....ACTING MANAGER.
G. R. CHIPMAN.....TREASURER.

DECIDED HIT OF THE LONDON SUCCESS, OLIVIA.

ENGAGEMENT OF MISS JEAN BURNSIDE.

Every evening, including Sunday, will be acted the charming idyl of English life in the last century,

OLIVIA,

Being a dramatization of Oliver Goldsmith's admirable tale

THE VICAR OF WAKEFIELD,

Several adaptations of which are at present creating profound interest in London and New York.

Matinee Saturday, at 2 o'clock P. M.,

OLIVIA.

MR. J. C. WILLIAMSON and MISS MAGGIE MOORE will shortly appear at this Theatre.

BUSH STREET THEATRE.

CHARLES E. LOCKE.....PROPRIETOR.

Saturday and Sunday Evenings, Sept. 7th and 8th, positively last two nights of the

HAVERLY MINSTRELS.

Saturday Evening, Benefit of the QUARTET.
Sunday Evening, Benefit of J. H. HAVERLY and the entire Company.

Monday Evening, Sept. 9th, 1878, engagement of the peerless Queen of English light Opera,

ALICE OATES,

And her new Company, engaged in England expressly for this tour; and first production here of the very successful Comic Opera,

LES CLOCHES DE CORNEVILLE.

CALIFORNIA THEATRE.

BARTON & LAWLOR.....MANAGERS.
BARTON HILL.....ACTING MANAGER.

Monday Evening, September 9th, last week of
OUR BACHELORS.

SES PACKED TO THE ROOF.

"Nerrier men, within the limits of becoming mirth, I have not spent an hour's talk withal."

THE COMEDIANS,

STUART ROBSON & WM. H. CRANE.

In the funniest play of the century,

OUR BACHELORS.

JOWLER.....MR. ROBSON.
BANGLE.....MR. CRANE.

"I say we shall have no more marriages. Those that are married already, all but one, shall live. The rest shall keep as they are—Old Bachelors."

FOUR LAUGHING ACTS.

Robson scares Crane at 8 o'clock.

Crane bullies Robson at 9.

Robson thrashes Crane at 10.

Both demoralized at 10:30.

Every Evening and Saturday Matinee. The necessity for an immediate purchase of seats the management disclaim any intention to disguise.

Monday, September 10th, by special request, FORBIDDEN FRUIT, or "Charge it to Baster."

PALACE HOTEL RESTAURANT,
FIRST CLASS IN ALL RESPECTS.

QUIET AND DESIRABLE PLACE
for Ladies, Gentlemen, and Families. Entrance south side of Court. A. D. SHARON.

DECKER BROS

FAREWELL LECTURES

Of the gifted Orator,

REV. THOMAS GUARD

Will be delivered in

Howard Street M. E. Church,

Between Second and Third Streets.

TUESDAY EVENING.....September 10

Subject, "Martyr of Florence."

THURSDAY EVENING.....September 12

Subject, "Law of Inheritance."

Admission, 50 cents. Lectures commence at 8 o'clock.

METROPOLITAN TEMPLE.

MONDAY EVENING.....SEPTEMBER 9, 1878.

GRAND VOCAL &amp; INSTRUMENTAL ## CONCERT,

Given under the patronage of the Citizens' Relief Committee for the benefit of the

YELLOW FEVER SUFFERERS,

.....BY.....

MADAME ZEISS-DENNIS,

Assisted by the best local talent. Admission, $1; reserved seats, $1 50, secured at Sherman & Hyde's on Saturday and Monday. Tickets for sale at all the principal music and book stores.

CALIFORNIA THEATRE.

BARTON & LAWLOR.....MANAGERS.

BARTON HILL.....ACTING MANAGER.

It is respectfully announced that a grand Extra Matinee in aid of the

YELLOW FEVER SUFFERERS,

Will be given on

THURSDAY.....SEPTEMBER 12.

The following eminent artists and combinations have generously volunteered: Alice Oates and her Opera Company, the Haverly Minstrels, Mrs. Scott-Siddons, Messrs. Robson and Crane, and the Company and Management of the California Theatre.

Sale of seats will commence Monday, Sept. 9th, at nine o'clock.

BALDWIN'S THEATRE.

THE SOUTHERN PLAGUE.

The management has the honor to announce that a Grand Matinee will be given on WEDNESDAY, Sept. 11th, at two o'clock, for the benefit of the ## SUFFERERS BY YELLOW FEVER.

A bill of unexampled attraction will be presented.

THE PACIFIC LAND AND TRUST CO.

RENT HOUSES,

COLLECT RENTS, MANAGE ESTATES

HOUSES AND LOTS FOR SALE

in this city, Oakland, and Alameda. Lands and Ranches for sale in all parts of the country. Agents in the principal cities. Collections made throughout the coast.

NO. 534 CALIFORNIA STREET.

JOHN E. QUINN,

1400 Polk Street, corner Pine.

THE LARGEST AND BEST SElected stock of

FANCY GOODS, LADIES' AND GENTS' FURNISHING GOODS, DRESS TRIMMINGS, KID AND LISLE THREAD GLOVES,

And all the popular novelties in the Fancy Goods line, outside of Kearny Street.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

Phyllis. By the "Duchess." Cloth, $1 25; paper...$0 50
Molly Bawn. By the "Duchess." Cloth, $1 50; paper... 60
Blush Roses. By C. F. Morse. Paper..... 50
Safar-Hadgi. By Prince Lubomirski. Cloth, $1; paper..... 60
Impressions of America. By R. W. Dale. Paper..... 25
Sea Bathing. Its Use and Abuse. Paper, 25 cents; cloth..... 75
Back to the Old Home. By Mary Cecil Hay. Paper 20
Pottery Painting. By J. C. L. Sparks. Paper..... 20
My Boyhood. By H. C. Barkley. Cloth..... 1 50
Prairie Days. By M. E. Sleight. Cloth..... 1 50
Friendship. By "Ouida." Cloth..... 1 50

NEW STATIONERY

RECEIVED DAILY.

BILLINGS, HARBOURNE & CO.,

BOOKSELLERS AND STATIONERS,

NOS. 3 AND 5 MONTGOMERY STREET.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District, of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

MARY E. HENRY, plaintiff, vs. JAMES J. HENRY, defendant.—An action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to JAMES J. HENRY, defendant:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District, of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days; otherwise within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony existing between plaintiff and defendant (as will appear more fully by reference to the complaint on file herein, to which your attention is hereby directed), and for general relief and costs of suit.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this Third day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight.

[SEAL OF COURT.] THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.

By W. STEVENSON, Deputy Clerk.

T. J. CROWLEY, Attorney for Plaintiff,

No. 629 Kearny Street.

LOCUST GROVE,

SONOMA.

FAMILIES OR YOUNG LADIES

wishing to spend the month of September in this Valley (the grape season) can, on early application, be well accommodated at this well known place on reasonable terms.

MRS. A. B. LUBECK, Sonoma.

HOME IN THE COUNTRY.

NOOK FARM.

FAMILIES WISHING TO SPEND

the Summer in the country will find this a cheerful home, and beautiful scenery of such endless variety as tempt to healthful exercise and recreation. We furnish good accommodations and an excellent table. Good fishing and hunting on the premises. Four trains from San Francisco pass the station daily. Address

E. B. SMITH,

Rutherford, Napa County, Cal.

A CARD.

R. C. MOWBRAY, M. D., DENTIST,

224 STOCKTON STREET, would respectfully inform his friends and patrons that he has entirely recovered from his late illness, and will resume practice on MONDAY, August 19th.

In reply to numerous inquiries Dr. Mowbray would state that HIS PRACTICE IS ENTIRELY SEPARATE FROM THAT OF DR. YOUNGER.

FINE GOODS.

LOWEST PRICES.

H. A. CALLENDER.

650 MARKET ST.

Below Kearny.

JEWELER.

RUPTURE.

BUY NO TRUSS

Until you see what has been accomplished by DR. PIERCE'S late invention.

Call, or send for New Illustrated Book. Prices reduced.

MAGNETIC ELASTIC TRUSS

CO., 609 Sacramento Street, San Francisco.

THE BEST

KOHLER & CHASE

SAN FRANCISCO

& CO.

A cotemporary referring to a cotemporary, says:
"A word to the wise will hardly reach him."

The ex-Empress Eugénie, who has been of late in Vienna, proposes buying a large estate in Austria and making that country her residence. The waters of Ems lately cured her of a cough.

Sir George Bock, the distinguished Arctic navigator, is dead. He was not the inventor of Bock beer. And although water was his favorite, he has finally come to his—Infant class in pantographing, what did the gentleman come to?

Charles Reade has sent a manuscript play to Clara Morris for her consideration. He says if she doesn't accept it she is a mendacious ignoramus, an unmitigated lout, and a fractured idiot. Miss Morris is considerably embarrassed.

One of the end men of a newly organized minstrel troupe applied at one of our bookstores recently for a comic almanac fifty years old. He explained that the troupe wanted to study up a stock of jokes a little fresher than those used by the minstrels at present on the road.

The Niagara Falls Indians complain that their sales have fallen off seventy-five per cent. One of the noble red men remarked: "To the devil wid the Injun bizness, onyhow! Be jabbers I m thinkin' I'll have to go back till dhruvin a shtrake ear agen." Lo! the poor Indian!

Speaking of gambling, it is not out of place to note that at the recent sale of ex-Queen Isabella's diamonds, her celebrated dividend was broken up and the brilliant sold by weight for 166,615 francs to the widow of M. Blanc, who used to keep the gambling tables at Monaco and Homburg.

"Suppose you were out in a jungle somewhere," said Strobel to Billikins, while walking through the Zoo, "and should see a tiger come charging down upon you, with fur up and his mouth open, what would be your first thought?" "Well, I rather think," replied Mr. B., "that for about two seconds I'd conclude Marthy Ann's mother had just got back from her trip to camp-meet. It would be a comfort thought, when I found out I'd been mistaken about it."

"Throughout the hot and dusty day
The sprinkler sprinkles its way,
And sprinkles sprinkles up and down
The sprinkly precincts of the town.
In vain have sprinkled ladies swore
At crossings sprinkly sprinkled o'er;
In vain the sprightly sprinkling hoots:
Who sees the sprinkler sprinkle his boots;
That sprinkling sprinkler sprinkles on Until its sprinkling sprink is done,
Nor pauses for a curse or thank Unless its final sprink is sprank."

Worth, the Paris man-milliner, is not a Frenchman at all, but a Protestant Englishman with a Catholic and Parisian wife, and two sons just out of college. His home is at Suresnes, a suburb of the gay capital, immediately under the guns of its chief defense, Fort Mont Valerian, which the Germans failed to reduce in 1871. Here he plays the genial host in an elegant chateau, planted in the midst of extensive grounds, which are fenced in by high brick walls. One day and night each year house and grounds are thrown open to Worth's employes, the women appearing in dresses given them from his store, and each trimmed according to the great milliner's directions.

Just now we are told that experiments have been made at Krupp's manufactory of Breidel on certain big guns, producing big results in connection with such a big treaty as that of Berlin—Peace! Let us see what these peaceful pets, these artillery infants, can do. At 10,000 yards the ball from one of these charmers will perforate the thickest ironclad; at 2,000 yards two such shot will disable or sink the largest ship afloat. And every one of these shots cost some $150 in money and six minutes in time to do its deadly and destructive work. Thus, in twelve minutes and for $300, you can destroy an ironclad costing $1,600,000, provided the shooting is good. Include the other minor matters, such as the death of the crew, consisting of 600 or 700 men.

The train was just going out of the station, and Mr. De Barth thought that he would have some fun. Several rough-looking country lads stood on the depot platform, and D. B. squared himself for a jolly time. All the passengers watched him.

He shook his fist at the tallest of the party, and said: "Oh, you son of a gun! I'd like to have you in this car for about five minutes; I'd make your head look like a coal sieve. O-o-o-h, you son of a gun!"

Then he put on a fearful look, and made believe that he was mad; but he wasn't, for he had never seen the countryman before. All hands laughed.

The countryman didn't say a word, but he had that satisfied look which betokened extreme good nature, or a hope of getting square.

The train went merrily on its way, and soon the little incident was forgotten. D. B. had had his little joke, and quietly settled down for a little nap.

Suddenly the train slowed up. Then it stopped. Then it began to back.

Heavens! Was it going back to that station?

Yes; there was a car full of freight that had to go to New York, and the train must take it on. D. B. turned pale. Then he began to get up. Then he got up. There was no chance for flight. Ah, ha! The seat! Under it went D. B. When the train stopped, the countryman entered. Let us draw the curtain.

Mr. B. arrived home in a week, he wrote a long letter to the newspapers about the unkind treatment meted out by hospital nurses.

ARLINGTON HOTEL, SANTA BARBARA, CAL.

NO HOTEL ON THE PACIFIC

Coast can surpass the ARLINGTON in the airy cheerfulness and convenience of its arrangements. None can equal it in the natural and artistic beauty of its surroundings. The readers of the ARGONAUT will be pleased to know that the problem of combining solid comfort within doors, inexhaustible pleasure without, and calm contentment all the time, at a very economical rate of expenditure, has been solved at the ARLINGTON, and is respectfully submitted by GEO. T. BRONLEY, Manager.

BERKELEY GYMNASIUM

The Berkeley Gymnasium (a preparatory school to the University)—a first-class boarding-school establishment in the interests of higher education, and in opposition to the cramming system of the small colleges and military academies of the State. The next term will commence July 24th. Examination of candidates for admission July 22d and 23d. By request, instructions have been provided during the summer months for students preparing for the August examinations at the University. For catalogue or particulars, address

JOHN F. BURRIS, PRINCIPAL,
BERKELEY, CALIFORNIA.

NOTE.—We desire to call special attention to the organization of our Grammar Department, separate from the Academic, and solicit the patronage of parents and guardians of small boys.

GOLDEN GATE ACADEMY

AND CADET SCHOOL.

Next year will commence July 30, 1878.
For circulars, address

D. P. SACKETT, A. M., Principal,
Oakland, Cal.

J. C. MERRILL & CO.

SHIPPING

COMMISSION MERCHANTS,

Agents for the

SANDWICH ISLANDS AND OREGON PACKET LINES.

204 AND 206 CALIFORNIA ST. - - San Francisco.

REDINGTON'S FLAVORING EXTRACTS

ARE THE PERFECTLY PURE
and highly concentrated Extracts of

FRESH FRUITS

Prepared with great care. They are put up in superior style, in a bottle holding twice as much as ordinary brands of Extracts.

Comparing quality and contents, none other are nearly so cheap.

Wherever tested on THEIR MERITS, they have been adopted in preference to all others, and now are the

STANDARD FLAVORING EXTRACTS

Of the Pacific coast. Dealers will find them to give better satisfaction to the consumers than any other kind and are respectfully requested to give them a trial.

REDINGTON & CO.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

H. P. WAKELEE & CO.,

Wholesale and Retail

Druggists, Importers of Foreign and Domestic Drugs, Chemicals, and Perfumery.

No. 142 Montgomery Street, under the Occidental Hotel,
San Francisco.

PARTICULAR ATTENTION PAID

to compounding Physician's Prescriptions, the dispensing of which is entrusted only to the most competent hands, while every care is taken to ensure the purity of all preparations.

GEO. W. PRESCOTT. IRVING M. SCOTT. H. T. SCOTT.

UNION IRON WORKS

(Founded 1849.) Post Office Box 2128.

COR. FIRST AND MISSION STREETS,
SAN FRANCISCO

MANUFACTURERS OF

Compressed Engines,
Air Compressors,
Rock Drills,
Portable Hoisting Engines,
Marine Stationary and Portable Boilers
Baby Hoist, complete.

CONSTANTLY ON HAND AND FOR SALE,

Direct-acting Pumping and Hoisting Engines,
Upright and Stationary Engines,
Quartz Crushing and Amalgamating Machinery,
Blake's Rock Breakers,
Smelting Furnaces,
Quicksilver Pumps,
Chlorodizing Furnaces,
Cornish Pumps,
Steam Pumps.

All manufactured by us of the best materials, design, and workmanship, and furnished at lower rates than by Eastern manufacturers.

PRESCOTT, SCOTT & CO.

MUSIC BOXES

OF ALL DESCRIPTIONS AND OF

Standard Reputation, playing from one to over one hundred airs. The largest and best assortment in this city. MUSICAL BOXES WITH CHANGEABLE CYLINDERS always on hand. New and interesting styles constantly received. Call and examine our stock.

REPAIRING OF MUSICAL BOXES thoroughly done in all their particularities.

M. J. PAILLARD & CO.,

MANUFACTURERS AND IMPORTERS,

120 Sutter Street, San Francisco.

Branch of House, 680 Broadway, New York.

MILLER & RICHARD, SOLE MAKERS OF EXTRA-HARD METAL SCOTCH TYPE.

SPECIAL AGENTS FOR

THE CAMPBELL, HOE, AND PEERLESS PRESSES.

No. 529 COMMERCIAL STREET.

And 205 Leidesdorff Street, San Francisco.

O. F. WILLEY & CO.,

IMPORTERS AND MANUFACTURERS OF

FINE CARRIAGES AND WAGONS

No. 427 MONTGOMERY ST., SAN FRANCISCO.

Agents for the sale of Wagons manufactured by
BREWSTER & CO., New York;
W. D. ROGERS, Philadelphia,
C. S. CAFFEY, Camden, N. J.,
WOOD BROTHERS, New York,
H. KILLAM & CO., New Haven,
COOLING BROS., Wilmington

ALSO, AGENTS FOR

HARNESS MANUFACTURED BY WOOD GIBSON,
TOMPKINS & MANDEVILLE, AND
A. H. DUNSCOMBE.

Also, a fine assortment of Robes, Blankets, Nets, Whips, etc.

J. W. BRECKINRIDGE, DANIEL Z. YOST,
Member S. F. Stock and Ex. Board.

BRECKINRIDGE & YOST, STOCK BROKERS, S. E. corner Montgomery and California Sts.

J. M. WALKER, JENNINGS S. COX, ALEX. AUSTIN.

J. M. WALKER & CO.

STOCK BROKERS, N. W. CORNER
Montgomery and Pine Streets.

CHAS. N. FOX, M. B. KELLOGG.

FOX & KELLOGG,

ATTORNEYS AND COUNSELORS
AT LAW, San Francisco, Cal.

Office, No. 530 California Street, Rooms 1, 2, and 3.

W. E. HALE, R. FACHECO.

HALE & PACHECO,

STOCK AND COMMISSION BROkers, 317 Montgomery Street, Nevada Block.

S. B. WAKEFIELD, A. W. FOSTER,
Member S. F. Stock and Exchange Board.

S. B. WAKEFIELD & CO.

STOCK & EXCHANGE BROKERS,

314 Pine Street, San Francisco.

CALIFORNIA FARMERS' MUTUAL

Fire Insurance Company

[ESTABLISHED IN 1874.]

Paid up Capital .....$300,000
Assets exceed..... 326,000

PRINCIPAL OFFICE, 209 SANSOME ST.
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.,

THOS. FLINT, President. J. W. FOARD, Manager.

FRED. K. RULE .....Secretary.

I. G. GARDNER.....General Agent.

JOHN C. STAPLES.....Special Agent.

COMMERCIAL INSURANCE COMPANY OF CALA,

FIRE AND MARINE.

Principal office, 405 California Street, San Francisco.

JOHN H. WISE, President.
CHAS. A. LATON, Secretary.

THE STATE INVESTMENT

—AND— INSURANCE COMPANY, FIRE AND MARINE

CASH ASSETS.....$450,000

Principal Office, 218 and 220 Sansome Street, San Francisco

OFFICERS:
A. J. BRYANT, President,
RICHARD IVERS, Vice-President,
CHAS. H. CUSHING, Secretary,
H. H. WATSON, Marine Survevo

OFFICE OF THE BODIE MINING

Company, San Francisco, August 28, 1878.—At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above named company, held to-day, an extra dividend of five dollars per share was declared, payable on Saturday, August 31st. Office, Room 53, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery Street.
WM. M. LENT, Secretary.

HALE & NORCROSS SILVER MINing Company.—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia Mining District, Storey County, State of Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 13th day of August, 1878, an assessment (No. 50) of one ($1) dollar per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately, in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 58, Nevada Block, northwest corner Pine and Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California. Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the 15th day of September, 1878, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before will be sold on Wednesday, the ninth (9th) day of October, 1878, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with cost of advertising and expenses of sale.

By order of the Board of Directors.
JOEL F. LIGHTNER, Secretary,
Office—Room 58, Nevada Block, northwest corner Pine and Montgomery Streets, San Francisco, California.

NORTHERN BELLE MILL AND

Mining Company.—The fourth annual meeting of the stockholders of the above named corporation, for the election of Directors and the transaction of such other business as may come before it, will be held on MONDAY, September 9th, 1878 (second Monday in September), at the hour of one o'clock P. M. on that day, at the office of the Company, Room No. 29, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California. Transfer books will be closed on Monday, September 2, 1878, at three o'clock P. M.
WM. WILLIS, Secretary.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.—NOTICE

is hereby given by the undersigned, Administrator of the Estate of MICHAEL KELLEHER, deceased, to the creditors of, and all persons having claims against, the said decedent, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers, within four months after the first publication of this notice, to the said Administrator at his place of business, Room 12, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery Street, in the City and County of San Francisco. Dated August 8th, 1878.
WILLIAM DOOLAN,
Administrator of the Estate of Michael Kelleher, deceased.

ALASKA COMMERCIAL CO.

No. 310 SANSOME STREET,

WHOLESALE DEALER IN FURS.

MOODY'S Drug and Prescription STORE,

Northwest corner Polk and Pine Streets.

Prescriptions prepared with care from the purest of Drugs and Chemicals.

JOS. L. HOWELL,

Importer and Manufacturer of

STATIONERY, BLANK BOOKS, LEGAL, CUSTOM-

HOUSE, AND MISCELLANEOUS BLANKS,

624 Montgomery Street, Montgomery Block,
San Francisco, California.

COMMENCING SUNDAY, JULY 14, 1878.
Passenger trains will leave San Francisco, from Passenger Depot on Townsend Street, between Third and Fourth, as follows:

8.30 A. M. DAILY for San Jose, Gilroy, Hollister, Tres Pinos, Pajaro, Salinas, Soledad, and all Way Stations. At Pajaro, the Santa Cruz R. R. connects with this train for Aptos and Santa Cruz. At Salinas the M. & S. V. R. R. connects with this train for Monterey. STAGE connections made with this train. PARLOR CAR attached to this train.

10.40 A. M. DAILY for San Jose and Way Stations.

3.30 P. M. DAILY (Sundays excepted) for Gilroy, Pajaro, Hollister, Tres Pinos, and Way Stations. STAGE connection made with this train at SANTA CLARA for Pacific Congress Springs.

4.40 P. M. DAILY for San Jose and Way Stations.

6.30 P. M. DAILY for Menlo Park and Way Stations.

SUNDAYS AN EXTRA TRAIN will leave for San Jose and Way Stations at 9.30 A. M. Returning, will leave San Jose at 6.00 P. M.

EXCURSION TICKETS to San Jose and other points and return sold on Saturdays and Sunday mornings. Good for return until following Monday, inclusive.

Also, Excursion Tickets to Monterey—good from Saturday until following Monday, inclusive.

A. C. BASSETT, H. R. JUDAH, Superintendent. Asst. Pass. & Tkt. Agt.

SOUTHERN DIVISIONS.

Passengers for points on the Southern Divisions of the road will take the cars of the Central Pacific Railroad via OAKLAND, leaving SAN FRANCISCO via Ferry Landing, Market Street, at 4.00 P. M. daily, and making close connection at GOSHEN for Sumner, Mohave, LOS ANGELES, Wilmington, Anaheim, Colton, Colorado River, and YUMA.

NORTH PACIFIC COAST RAILROAD.

CHANGE OF TIME.

On and after Monday, August 3th, 1878, the two new, fast, and elegant steamers SAN RAFAEL and SALITO will run between San Francisco and San Rafael as follows:

WEEK DAYS.

Leave San Francisco. From San Quentin Ferry, Market Street.

8.15 A. M. for San Rafael.

9.40 A. M. " " & Junction

1.45 P. M. " " "

4.40 P. M. " " "

5.10 P. M. " " "

6.10 P. M. " for San Rafael.

(From Sausalito Ferry, Market Street).

5.30 P. M. for all points between Sausalito and San Rafael.

1.45 P. M. Through train for Duncan Mills and way stations. Stage connections made daily, except Monday, for all points on North Coast.

SUNDAYS.

(From San Quentin Ferry, Market Street).

10.00 A. M. for San Rafael.

12.30 P. M. " " "

3.15 P. M. " " "

5.45 P. M. " for San Rafael and Junction

(From Sausalito Ferry, Market Street).

8.00 A. M. Excursion train, connecting at Junction with train for San Rafael.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

Round Trip Tickets between San Francisco and San Rafael have been reduced as follows: Week days, 75 cents; Sundays, 50 cents.

W. R. PRICE, General Ticket Agent.

JNO. W. DOHERTY, General Manager.

SAN FRANCISCO AND NORTH PACIFIC R. R.

Commencing Monday, July 29th, 1878, and until further notice, Boats and Trains will leave San Francisco (Washington Street Wharf), as follows:

3.30 P. M. DAILY, Sundays excepted, Steamer "James M. Donahue" (Washington Street Wharf), connecting with Mail and Express Train at Donahue for Petaluma, Santa Rosa, Healdsburg, Cloverdale, and way stations. Making stage connection at Lakeville for Sonoma; at Geyserville for Skaggs Springs, at Cloverdale for Ukiah, Lakeport, Mendocino City, Highland Springs, Barlett Springs, Soda Bay, and the GEYSERS.

STAGE connections made at Fulton on the following morning for Korbels, Guerneville, and the Redwoods.

(Arrive at San Francisco 10.15 A. M.)

SUNDAY EXCURSIONS AT REDUCED RATES.

8.00 A. M., Sundays only, via Donahue, for Cloverdale and way stations. Fares for the round trip: Donahue, $1; Petaluma, $1.50; Santa Rosa, $2; Healdsburg, $3; Cloverdale, $4.

Connection made at Fulton for Laguna, Forestville, Korbels, Guerneville, the Russian River, and Big Trees. Fares for round trip: Fulton and Laguna, $2.50; Forestville, Korbels, and Guerneville, $3.

Arrive at San Francisco 6.55 P. M.

Freight received from 7 A. M. to 3.00 P. M. daily (except Sunday).

TICKET OFFICE, WASHINGTON STREET WHARF.

ARTHUR HUGHES, Gen. Manager. A. A. BEAN, Sup't. P. E. DOUGHERTY, Gen. Pass. and Tkt. Agent.

R. P. & H. N. CLEMENT, ATTORNEYS-AT-LAW,

Nos. 2, 3, AND 4 SHERMAN BUILDING,

Montgomery Street, N. E. corner of Clay, San Francisco (P. O. Box 727).

NEWTON BOOTH, C. T. WHEELER, Sacramento,

J. T. GLOVER, W. W. DODGE, San Francisco

W. W. DODGE & CO.,

WHOLESALE GROCERS,

Northwest corner Clay and Front Streets, San Francisco.

C. P. R. R.

COMMENCING WEDNESDAY,

July 10, 1878, and until further notice.

TRAINS AND BOATS

WILL LEAVE SAN FRANCISCO:

7.00 A. M., DAILY, VALLEJO

Steamer (from Market Street Landing), connecting with the trains for Napa (Stages for Sonoma), Calistoga (The Geysers), and Sacramento. Connecting at Davis (Sundays excepted) for Woodland, Williams, and Knights Landing.

(Arrive San Francisco 2.55 P. M.)

8.00 A. M., DAILY, ATLANTIC

Express Train (via Oakland Ferry) for Sacramento, Marysville, Redding (Portland, Or.) Colfax, Reno (Virginia City), Palisade (Eureka), Ogden and Omaha Connects at Galt with train arriving at 1.00 P. M.

(Arrive San Francisco 3.55 P. M.)

8.00 A. M., SUNDAYS ONLY

Special train via Oakland Ferry, arrives at Martinez 10.15 A. M. Returning, leaves Martinez 4.10 P. M., arrives San Francisco 6.00 P. M.

EXCURSION TICKETS AT REDUCED RATES.

9.30 A. M., SUNDAYS EXCEPTED,

Northern Railway Accommodation Train (via Oakland Ferry) to Martinez.

(Arrive San Francisco 3.35 P. M.)

3.00 P. M., DAILY, SAN JOSE

Passenger Train (via Oakland Ferry and Niles), stopping at all way stations. Arrive at San Jose at 5.30 P. M. (Arrive San Francisco at 9.35 A. M.)

3.30 P. M., DAILY, NORTHERN Railway Passenger Train (via Oakland Ferry) to San Pablo and Martinez.

(Arrive San Francisco 9.35 A. M.)

4.00 P. M., DAILY, EXPRESS

Train (via Oakland Ferry) for Lathrop, and Stockton, Merced, Visalia, Sumner, Mojave, Newhall (San Buenaventura and Santa Barbara), LOS ANGELES, "Santa Monica," Wilmington, Santa Ana (San Diego), Colton, and Yuma (Arizona Stages and Colorado River Steamers). Sleeping cars between Oakland, Los Angeles, and Yuma. Connects at Niles with train arriving at San Jose at 6.55 P. M. (Arrive San Francisco at 12.40 P. M.)

4.00 P. M., SUNDAYS EXCEPTED,

Vallejo Steamer (from Market Street Landing), connecting with trains for Calistoga (The Geysers), Woodland, Knights Landing, and Sacramento, and at Sacramento to with passenger train, leaving at 9.35 P. M., on Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays only, for Truckee, Reno, Carson, and Virginia. Sleeping cars between Vallejo and Carson. (Arrive San Francisco 11.20 A. M.)

4.00 P. M., SUNDAYS EXCEPTED,

Sacramento Steamer (from Washington Street Wharf) for Benicia and Landings on the Sacramento River; also, taking the Third Class Overland Passengers to connect with train leaving Sacramento at 9.00 A. M. daily.

(Arrive San Francisco 8.00 P. M.)

4.30 P. M., DAILY, THROUGH

Third Class and Accommodation Train, via Lathrop and Mojave, arriving at Los Angeles on second day at 11.55 A. M. (Arrive San Francisco 7.30 A. M.)

FERRIES AND LOCAL TRAINS.

FROM SAN FRANCISCO, DAILY.

To Oakland.

To Alameda.

To San Jose.

To Niles.

To Berkeley.

To Redwood City.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

To San Francisco.

FRENCH SAVINGS AND LOAN SOCIETY.

411 BUSH STREET, ABOVE KEARNEY, SAN FRANCISCO.

G. MAHE, Director.

S. P. C. R. R.—(NARROW GAUGE).

NEW ROUTE TO ALAMEDA, SAN JOSE AND SANTA CRUZ.

SUMMER ARRANGEMENT, 1878.

Commencing Saturday, June 1, 1878, and until further notice, trains and boats will leave San Francisco, at the new Ferry Landing, Market St.:

5.00 A. M., via Alameda Ferry, daily, for Alameda, West San Leandro, West San Lorenzo, Mount Eden, Alvarado, Hall's, Newark, Mowry's, Alviso, Agnew's, Santa Clara, San Jose, Lovelady's, Los Gatos, and Alima.

9.20 A. M., via Alameda Ferry, daily, for Alameda, Newark, Alviso, Santa Clara, San Jose, Los Gatos, Alima, and all way stations, connecting at Los Gatos with Colgrove's stages for Oil Wells, Patchen, Mountain Charley's, Martin's Ranch, Scott's Valley, and Santa Cruz; or via Wright's Summit, Hotel de Redwood, Comstock's Mill, Mason's Grove, Sequel, to SANTA CRUZ. Also, connecting at Los Gatos with Blabon's stages for Saratoga and CONGRESS SPRINGS. (Dinner at Los Gatos.)

4.20 P. M., via Alameda Ferry, daily, for Alameda, Newark, Santa Clara, San Jose, Alima, and all way stations.

On Saturdays only stages will connect with the 4.20 P. M. train at Los Gatos for Santa Cruz and Saratoga. Returning, leave Santa Cruz at 4 A. M. Monday (breakfast at Los Gatos), arriving in San Francisco at 10.15 A. M.

FERRIES AND LOCAL TRAINS

Will run as follows:

LEAVE SAN FRANCISCO DAILY.

A. M. 6.40 9.20 10.30 P. M. 4.20 6.30

LEAVE HIGH STREET (ALAMEDA) DAILY.

A. M. 7.30 9.25 10.30 P. M. 4.25 7.00

* Sundays only.

THOS. CARTER, GEO. H. WAGGONER, Superintendent. Gen. Pass. Agent.

PACIFIC COAST STEAMSHIP CO.

Steamers of this Company will sail from Broadway wharf for PORTLAND (Oregon), every five days, direct, and for LOS ANGELES, SANTA BARBARA, SANTA CRUZ, SAN DIEGO, SAN LUIS OBISPO, and other Northern and Southern Coast Ports, leaving San Francisco about every third day.

For day and hour of sailing, see the Company's advertisement in the San Francisco daily papers.

TICKET OFFICE, No. 214 MONTGOMERY ST., NEAR PINE.

GOODALL, PERKINS & CO., Agents, No. 10 Market Street, San Francisco.

PACIFIC MAIL STEAMSHIP CO.

First-class steamers with unequalled accommodations for passengers will leave San Francisco:

FOR YOKOHAMA AND HONGKONG, On the 1st of every month.

FOR SYDNEY AND AUCKLAND, via HONOLULU, September 2d, and every fourth week thereafter.

FOR NEW YORK, via PANAMA, CENTRAL AMERICAN, MEXICAN, and SOUTH AMERICAN PORTS, HAVANA, and all WEST INDIA PORTS, on the 5th and 19th of each month.

FOR HONOLULU, April 27th, and every four weeks thereafter.

FOR VICTORIA, B. C., PUGET SOUND PORTS, and PORTLAND, Oregon, on the 10th, 20th, and 30th of each month.

WILLIAMS, BLANCHARD & CO., Agents, Corner First and Brannan Streets.

OCCIDENTAL AND ORIENTAL STEAMSHIP COMPANY

FOR JAPAN AND CHINA,

Leave Wharf, Cor. First and Brannan Streets, at noon, for YOKOHAMA AND HONGKONG.

Connecting at Yokohama with steamers for Shanghai, GAELIC, OCEANIC, BELGIC.

Saturday, May 18. Tuesday, June 18 Thursday, Aug. 1

Saturday, Aug. 17. Tuesday, Sept. 17 Wednesday, Saturday, Nov. 16. Tuesday, Dec. 17

Cabin plans on exhibition and Passenger Tickets for sale at No. 2 Montgomery Street.

For freight apply at the Pacific Mail Steamship Company's Wharf.

T. H. GOODMAN, Gen'l Passenger Agent.

DAVID D. COLTON, President.

SAUCILITO FERRY.

SUMMER ARRANGEMENT.

On and after Thursday, June 20, 1878, a swift and commodious steamer will leave as follows:

San Francisco, foot of Market Street—8.45 A. M.; 11.00 A. M.; 3.30 P. M.; 5.30 P. M.—R. R.

Sausalito—7.55 A. M.—R. R.; 9.30 A. M.; 1 P. M.; 4.30 P. M.

SUNDAY TIME.

San Francisco—8.00 A. M.—R. R.; 10.00 A. M.; 12 M.; 2.00 P. M.; 4.30 P. M.; 6.30 P. M.

Sausalito—9.00 A. M.; 11.00 A. M.; 1.00 P. M.; 3.30 P. M.; 5.45 P. M.; 7.45 P. M.—R. R.

On MONDAY an extra trip from San Francisco at 7.00 A. M. On SATURDAY extra trip from Sausalito at 6.15 P. M. * This trip at 2 P. M. on Saturday.

LANDS FOR SALE

In lots to suit. Inquire at the office of the Company, No. 320 Sansome Street, or of M. DORE & CO., No. 410 Pine Street.

FRANCIS AVERY, Superintendent.

FRANK KENNEDY,

ATTORNEY AT LAW, 604 MERCHANT STREET, Room 16. Probate, divorce, bankruptcy, and all other cases attended to.

THE NEVADA BANK OF SAN FRANCISCO

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA.

Paid up Capital.....$10,000,000 Gold

Surplus (U. S. Bonds).....3,000,000 "

DIRECTORS:

LOUIS McLANE, President. J. C. FLOOD, Vice-President.

JOHN W. MACKAY, W. S. O'BRIEN, JAMES G. FAIR.

Cashier.....H. W. GLENNY.

Agent at Virginia, Nev.....GEO. A. KING.

Agents at New York, C. T. CHRISTENSEN.

(62 Wall Street.) GEO. L. BRANDER.

Issues Commercial and Travelers' Credits, available in any part of the world. Makes Transfers by Telegraph and Cable, and draws Exchange at customary usances. This Bank has special facilities for dealing in bullion.

EXCHANGE

On the principal Cities throughout the United States, Europe, Japan, China, and the East Indies, the Australian Colonies, and New Zealand, and on Honolulu, Hawaii.

NEW YORK BANKERS.....The Bank of New York, N. B. A.

Am. Exchange Nat. Bank.

LONDON BANKERS.....Messrs. Smith, Payne & Smiths.

The Union Bank of London.

THE ANGLO-CALIFORNIAN BANK (Limited.)

No. 422 CALIFORNIA STREET, SAN FRANCISCO.

London Office.....3 Angel Court.

New York Agents.....J. & W. Seligman & Co.

Authorized Capital Stock.....$6,000,000

Surplus Earnings.....150,000

Will receive Deposits, open Accounts, make Collections, buy and sell Exchange and Bullion, loan Money, and issue Letters of Credit available throughout the world.

FREDK F. LOW, IGN. STEINHART, } Managers.

P. N. LILIENTHAL, Cashier.

THE BANK OF CALIFORNIA,

SAN FRANCISCO

Capital.....$5,000,000

D. O. MILLS.....President.

WILLIAM ALVORD.....Vice-President.

THOMAS BROWN.....Cashier.

AGENTS—New York, Agency of the Bank of California; Boston, Tremont National Bank

CHICKERING

PIANO WAREROOMS,

31 POST ST., Mechanics' Institute Building.

ELEGANT PIANOS.

L. K. HAMMER,

Sole Agent for Pacific Coast.

Owners of Chickering Pianos are specially requested to leave orders for tuning at warerooms, 31 Post Street.

MUSIC

KNABE PIANOS,

IRVING PIANOS, ROGERS' UPRIGHT PIANOS,

Prince Organs, Waters' Organs, Sheet Music.

BANCROFT, KNIGHT & Co.,

733 MARKET STREET.

PIANOS

SCHOMACKER AND HENRY F. MILLER CELEBRATED PIANOS.

Pianos Tuned, Rented, and for Sale on the Installment Plan.

WOODWORTH, SCHELL & Co.

12 Post Street, San Francisco.

A WORLD'S TRIUMPH.

THE CURRENT OF

TRADE REVERSED.

TO EUROPE.

STEINWAY & SONS

ORDERS FROM EUROPE

have increased to an extent, necessitating the establishment of Warerooms in London, England, and connected with it is a Concert Hall, the whole combined making the most elegant Piano Warerooms in Europe, and stands there as a monument of American genius and industry.

It is impossible to mention in the limited space of an advertisement the innumerable triumphs of this enterprise. They stand foremost as victors in Piano building in America, and in that respect, no small compliment to their inventions is the undeniable endorsement of all their competitors, as shown in their imitative efforts. Certain principles of the Steinways are however so completely protected, that no imitation or substitute is attempted at all, and the shallow method of crying such inventions down are resorted to and relied upon.

The Steinways designed and perfected the Overstring and Iron Frame systems. The application of the Agraffe Arrangement to Square and Upright Pianos. The Patent Duplex Scale creating the most beautiful treble tones, (the Duplex Scale is of recent invention and only to be found in Pianos sold recently). The improved Double Dampers. The later ideas extending the Agraffe to every string in the Piano. The highest finish to all parts of the instrument, including first qualities of ivory, ebony, felt, cloth, etc. The wood work and varnish of each first-class character, that the employment of large capital and experience alone permits.

The name of Steinway has become a "household word" in American homes, and the satisfactory record of 19 years trial on the Pacific Coast, in itself assures the purchaser that the investment is no speculation, but one of perfect security.

The oft-repeated story of rival makers claiming to have been Steinways' foreman, etc., should have no weight with purchasers. An American manufacturing business like the Steinways is divided into departments for the various classes of work, and a foreman of one department superintends that alone, and cannot be perfect in other details.

The Steinways (a numerous family) are the inventors and designers of the principles of their Pianos, and are alone responsible for the thorough execution of their own ideas.

In the Machinery Department at the late Centennial Exhibition Steinways were awarded a special medal for an invention for testing their iron frames under a pressure of 5,000 lbs. to the square centimetre. (This award was distinct from their medal for the best Pianos exhibited.) The iron frames in Steinway Pianos are the only ones so tested, and while other makers rely on castings from an ordinary foundry, the Steinways maintain their own foundry, and manufacture a frame of composite metal, which adds greatly to the resonant qualities of the instrument in general.

It frequently occurs that the attempt is made to raise the character of Pianos constructed on less costly principles to the rank that the Steinway maintains, by naming a price, the same or nearly so. This method is frequently exposed by the perfect willingness of the dealer to make astonishing discounts for cash or extremely low credits; systems not entertained in any first-class business. In selling a Steinway Piano, a guarantee of worth is given protecting the purchaser for 5 years, and catalogues issued by the Pacific Coast Agencies have a uniform rate of prices in gold, and where desired a liberal installment plan is offered to responsible buyers, with an additional charge of simple interest on deferred payments. Catalogues mailed on application to

M. GRAY, General Agent,
105 Kearny Street, S. F.

THE CAL. FURNITURE M'FG CO.

HAVE FIVE TIMES AS MUCH

FURNITURE

As any other house on this Coast, which has been purchased so low that we CAN and WILL sell at such prices that the poor can gratify their WISHES and the rich their TASTE. At the old stand,

NOS. 224 AND 226 BUSH STREET, S. F.

HERRMANN'S

FALL STYLES

ARE NOW OUT AT

336 KEARNY STREET, BETWEEN BUSH AND PINE,

.....AND.....

910 MARKET STREET, ABOVE STOCKTON.

A GREAT INSURANCE COMPANY.

THE NEW ENGLAND MUTUAL LIFE INS. CO OF BOSTON

Is one of the greatest trust institutions of the present age. It was organized over forty years ago, and under a conservative management it has grown, and strengthened, and is now at the head of honored and trusted companies for the insurance of life in the U. S. Its policies are issued under the non-forfeiture law of Massachusetts. It charges no more for its insurance than those companies that forfeit the policy in case of non-payment of premium when due. Its present assets are $14,893,427 78, and its surplus over all liabilities amount to $2,759,965 04. Wallace Everson, No. 328 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, is the general agent for California and the Pacific States and Territories, and is ever ready to give all information desired.

MRS. R. G. LEWIS,

DRESS MAKING PARLORS,

ROOMS 27 AND 28,

Thurloe Block, corner Sutter and Kearny Streets, San Francisco.

Elegant Walking Suits, Evening Toilets, Bridal Trousseau, and Mourning Costumes, manufactured at the shortest notice, after the latest Parisian modes. TAKE THE ELEVATOR.

MISS K. McCARRICK,

MILLINERY PARLORS

135 KEARNY STREET, NEAR SUTTER, UP STAIRS.

The finest assortment of French Millinery Goods in the city always on hand.

TERRACE

SWIMMING BATHS

FOOT OF WEBSTER STREET, ON CENTRAL AVENUE, ALAMEDA

BEACH, now open to the public, and pronounced by the "elite" of San Francisco and Oakland as the only place for a good bath on the Pacific Coast. Perfect security against monsters of the deep. High water at all times of day and night.

SPECIAL ACCOMMODATIONS FOR LADIES UNATTENDED.

Reached in thirty-five minutes from San Francisco by steamer NEWARK—depot on the premises; or C. P. R. R. to Market Station, or from Oakland by horse-cars at Broadway Station, running within two blocks of the Baths, 25 CENTS, including Private Room, Bathing Suit, Towels, Shower Baths, etc.

R. HALEY & C. A. EDSON, Proprietors.

PACIFIC BUSINESS COLLEGE,

320 Post St., San Francisco.

BUY YOUR

RARE ENGRAVINGS AND ETCHINGS.

W. K. VICKERY NOTIFIES HIS

customers and the public that he has removed to a larger and more convenient office at No. 23 Kearny Street (next door to Snow & May's), where he has a large collection of these beautiful and rare Works of Art. To those who can not visit his collection, he will be glad, on receipt of a postal card, to take a portfolio of Engravings for inspection at their residence any forenoon or evening. 23 Kearny Street. Hours, 1 to 5 P. M.

SHIRTS AT

DIAMONDS, WATCHES, JEWELRY AND SILVERWARE

AT GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

STERLING SILVER SPOONS & FORKS, .925 FINE, AT

$1.50 PER OUNCE.

Geo. C. Shreve & Co.,

110 MONTGOMERY STREET.

MARBLEIZED

IRON MANTELS

— AND —

ENAMELED GRATES.

The perfection which the manufacture of Marbleized Iron Mantels has attained brings them in direct competition with the best qualities of slate for all purposes, where mantels are used, and they are in a great measure taking the place of marble. The soft rich color in which these mantels are finished renders them a much more agreeable article of furniture to a room than the cold, repulsive-looking marble slab, and colors may be selected to harmonize with the furniture. In ELEGANCE OF DESIGN, QUALITY OF FINISH, AND DURABILITY OF POLISH, they are every way superior to slate or marble. In point of economy, also, they cost very much less, are stronger, and certainly far more durable than either.

The Largest Stock and Greatest Variety on the Pacific Coast. For sale by

W. W. MONTAGUE & CO.,

NOS. 110, 112, 114, 118, & 120 BATTERY ST.

SEWING MACHINE,

The only really light-running lock-stitch Sewing Machine in the market.

"DOMESTIC" PAPER FASHIONS

Elegant, stylish, and reliable.

J. W. EVANS, 20 Post Street, San Francisco.

MORRIS, SCHWAB & CO.

FINE-ART DEALERS.

FREE ART GALLERY.

A complete assortment of ARTISTS' MATERIAL, GOLD FRAMES, etc.

19 AND 21 POST STREET.

WAREHOUSES, N. W. CORNER KEARNY AND SUTTER STREETS.

SHERMAN, HYDE & CO.

SHEET MUSIC, MUSIC BOOKS, MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

MILITARY FURNISHERS

AND DEALERS IN

REGALIA

.....AND.....

LODGE SUPPLIES

FOR ALL SOCIETIES.

Silk and Bunting Flags, Banners.

A. J. PLATE & CO.,

510 SACRAMENTO STREET.

THOMAS BOYSON, M. D.

(University of Copenhagen, Denmark),

PHYSICIAN AND SURGEON. Office and Residence, 112 Kearny Street. Office hours, 11 A. M. to 1 P. M., 6 to 8 P. M. Sunday 11 to 1 only. Telephone in the office.

BEAMISH'S

The Argonaut.

VOL. III. NO. 10.

SAN FRANCISCO, SEPTEMBER 14, 1878.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

"THE CHINESE MUST GO!"--III.

A Reply to Kwang Chang Ling, the Chinese Literate.

"Who is Kwang Chang Ling? Is he a Chinaman?"

These are the doubting questions propounded by many who have read the able and scholarly presentation of the Chinese question from a Chinese standpoint by one claiming to be a Chinese Mandarin, who signs himself "Kwang Chang Ling." The authorship of the Palace Hotel letters is a matter into which I, in common with the community, have no valid right to inquire, unless it in some way affects the question at issue. If Kwang Chang Ling is a veritable Chinaman, it may be claimed with some force that these very articles, which so eloquently set forth the Chinese cause, are an evidence of the mental capacity of the Chinese people to surmount the difficulties and absorb the essences of modern civilization. If, on the other hand, it should be ascertained that "Kwang Chang Ling" is a mere pseudonym adopted by some glib-penned Bohemian writing for coin—"a Caucasian hiring"—or one of those very sincere but idiosyncratic gentlemen, who, observing the majority of the community, the "common herd," taking one side, immediately adopts the other upon "the rule of contraries;" or one of those strictly "business men" who view all questions in the light of "commerce," or, more properly speaking, through the colored goggles of their own self-interest, and who, in order that their profits may not be endangered, deem it expedient to employ "one of them literary fellows" to ransack history and gather statistics to justify themselves before men; then, and in either of these events, it may perhaps be well said that, as no Chinaman has yet appeared on this continent capable of assimilating sufficient modern thought to be able to present even in the humblest degree his own cause, they may be set down and judged as they have ever been, an isolated, mediocre, barren people, who have never as yet risen to a full appreciation of any question, much less exhibited the ability to discuss it. Notwithstanding the positive yet harmless assertion of the author, in his opening article, that he is "a warrior, a noble, a leader of the Chinese, and a representative by authority," I do not hesitate to say that I believe Kwang Chang Ling to be a pure myth. No such Chinaman ever did live or ever will live. "The power of statement, the aptness of expression, the myriad evidences of a mind schooled in the intricacies of modern civilization, all unite to convince us that no Chinese 'literate' could have written the papers signed 'Kwang Chang Ling.' And yet, even with these admirable features, it must be admitted that the Palace Hotel letters are singularly barren of logic and painfully lacking in any system of connected reasoning. While they are sufficiently fertile of thought and abundantly suggestive, yet they are strangely lacking in conclusiveness. While they abound in tersely expressed truisms, industriously accumulated statistics, and ingenious historical references, the truisms are unfitting, the statistics are irrelevant, and much of the history erroneous. Lord Bacon said: 'Histories make wise men; poetry, witty men; the mathematics, subtle men; natural and moral philosophy, deep and grave men; logic and rhetoric, men able to contend.' Kwang Chang Ling may be a historian, a mathematician, and a philosopher, but he has abundantly demonstrated that he is not a logician.

At the close of his first letter we are informed, with an air of genuine "celestial superiority," that "the trouble with the Chinese question is that it has been viewed from too low and narrow a standpoint." Now, let us right here determine, if we can, what is the highest and broadest view to be taken of the Chinese question? Is it true that our Casserlys, Booths, Sargents, Hagers, Pixleys, Davises, and Haymonds, have, with all their scholarship, their experience, and their study on this question, been so narrow and pig-headed as never to have been able to take a broad and statesmanlike view of the Chinese question?

The Chinese question may be viewed from three distinct standpoints: (1.) As a question of social science, (2.) as a question of political economy, and (3.) as a question of political policy. Let us briefly review the leading arguments under each of these heads:

(1.) As a question of Social Science.—The social scientist looks at the effect of Chinese immigration upon society. He observes that the Chinese have been coming and going among us as well as among other nations for twenty-five, fifty, and even a hundred years, and that they are as much strangers and aliens now as they were the first day of their arrival. He observes that they do not come like the European immigrants seeking homes, bringing their families, and adopting our institutions, but as aliens, strangers, laborers, intending to return to China as soon as possible; that they do not come to escape the feudal oppressions of China in order to seek a free government, where they can have liberty of thought and freedom of action, but solely to make money. Freedom of thought, he observes, is nothing to Chinamen, for they have no thoughts above their stolid and unvarying round of duties. He observes that they have absolutely no conception of our society, of our laws, of our government, or of our institutions; that society gains nothing by them; that they are a menace to our system of educated labor; that they bring with them muscle, but no brains; that they do not aspire; that they degrade labor by their stolid and servile habits and manner of living, instead of elevating and dignifying it by holding up their heads as men, citizens, and voters, having ideas, principles, and thoughts of their own; that by reason of their inferior civilization they have few wants, and can, therefore, underbid even the most economical American laborer who takes newspapers, buys pictures, sends his children to school, and enjoys the myriad luxuries incident to our superior civilization—for civilization is expensive, while barbarism is cheap; that the influence of Chinese immigration upon the laboring classes of our country is, therefore, demoralizing in the extreme. He studies their history to ascertain whether there is not some hope for the future only to find that they have always been an exclusive, conservative, unchangeable race who have ever refused to mix and amalgamate with other races. He finds that they are a decaying race, and that if they should change their policy and come among us to dwell permanently, the mixing of inferior and decaying races with superior races results in harm and deterioration to the superior. He learns that even their very language is in a state of "arrested development," and has from all time stood like a bulwark in the way of their attaining a higher state of civilization. He learns that the offspring of the cross-breeding of distinctive races results in weak and short-lived mongrels, and that the moral degradation involved in such mixtures is an evil to society and to government. From all these facts and circumstances, and myriad others, the social scientist concludes that Chinese immigration is an injury and a curse to any civilized people, and he, therefore, is not disposed to listen with any degree of patience to the cold-blooded arguments of the political economist who welcomes the Chinese immigrant as a cheap laborer.

(2.) As a question of Political Economy.—Political economy as generally taught is a cold, calculating, commercial science (if indeed it should be called a science). It looks at things as they are, not as they ought to be. It takes it for granted that whatever is right. It ignores the great Godlike principle of human sympathy. It deals simply with the law of adjustments. It sees the Chinese in California, but it does not ask nor care whether they come as immigrants, seeking homes, or whether they intend to return to China. It does not ask nor care what the influence of their coming is upon our civilization or upon our people. It does not ask nor care whether they are intelligent or whether they are ignorant; whether they are aliens, or whether they are citizens; whether they are assimilative, or non-assimilative; whether they are white, or whether they are black. It simply asks them one great, all-absorbing question, and that is: "Can you work, and if so, will you work cheap?" This is the sum total of the political economy view of the Chinese question. If it has any ideas outside, above, or beyond this, it answers and settles them all by one wise and stunning proposition: "If they are here it is because they ought to be. It is manifest destiny that they should be here. If it were not so they would not be here." It has some dim, shadowy idea that there are times in the world's history when commerce, or some other mysterious power, causes a shifting of some races and the displacement of others. That in obedience to some such law as this the Chinese are here, and in spite of all we can do and all we can say, they will stay here. Thus the average political economist is a pure, unadulterated fatalist. He thinks it would be interfering with some great natural law to stop Chinese immigration. He may not have a very intelligent reason for believing so, but he is none the less unyielding and dogmatic in his opinion. If there is any one principle the one-ideal political economist will fight for, it is the principle of "cheap labor." He regards that as a cardinal principle of his creed, never to be given up under any circumstances. He thinks that the country was made to be "developed;" that the only way it can be developed is to procure cheap labor; and that therefore Chinese cheap labor is a blessing. There are political economists, however, of eminence and respectability, who recognize the element of humanity even in political economy; who determine the prosperity of a nation not by the wealth of a few, but by the prosperity of the many; who recognize the fact that cheap labor means low diet, few comforts, and no luxuries for the laborer; who have observed that to deprive the laboring classes of the incidents of high civilization renders the whole community less prosperous; that the true prosperity of a nation consists in all classes of society enjoying the comforts and luxuries of civilization; who have observed that as we recede from the more highly civilized countries, to Hungary, Turkey, Southern Russia, and the steppes of Asia, toward the borders of barbarism, wages become lower and still lower, and the comfort and welfare of the laboring classes are totally neglected; that as we approach the more highly civilized and prosperous nations wages become higher; that low wages mean stagnation and decay, and high wages, growth and progress. Thus there are two schools of political economy—one favoring, the other opposing Chinese immigration.

(3.) As a question of Political Policy.—The Chinese question is of course a political question. It must be settled, if at all, by statesmanship. It comes to this country, unfortunately, in a three-fold aspect, namely: As a local, and at the same time as a national and an international question. It is unfortunate in another aspect, in this, that it arouses the sleeping fires of "State rights." Many of us who were strenuously opposed to States rights in the Southern contest begin to see that, as a matter of principle, the Southern States were not so far wrong after all—that no local State government ought to be yoked under a social burden it does not want to bear, and the enormity of which it cannot make the stolid millions of this great empire of States understand. Be this as it may, we are forced to meet the question. Whether as a local, a national, or an international one, it is a problem for our statesmen to solve, and statesmanship involves everything. The statesman ought to be noble, and good, and great. He ought to be a prophet, to know the future; a seer, to know the past; and an archangel, to know the present. Yea, he ought to be a very God in omniscience. Alas! how rare is statesmanship. It is not, however, for humanity to rise to the level of Deity. The graces and virtues are dealt out to us only as we are prepared to receive them. There were, a few years ago, some choice spirits in the vicinity of Boston who formulated a political creed something like the following: "This, the best government on earth, was established under the especial guidance of Divine Providence, as a fit place in which to usher in the millennium; a government to which the down-trodden and oppressed of every nation on earth may come, and be welcome to enjoy with us the rich blessings of liberty, fraternity, and equality; a government where the 'brotherhood of man' shall be fully recognized, and all prejudices of race be forgotten; a government in which all mankind shall meet on one common level, speak the English language, love one another, and constitute a high and noble example for the benefit of other nations." How beautiful in theory, how hideous in practice. It arose as many another error has arisen and thrived, in a good cause. It was the offspring of a noble but mistaken impulse of humanity. It was prompted by sympathy for the slave. We hated slavery because it was wrong. We said the slave ought to be free, and we made him free. The Republican school, in which many of us were educated, was a school of humanity, but we learned some lessons in it which we must now unlearn, and one of them is that there is a vast difference between the right of a slave to be free and the right of a Chinaman to come to America. The humanity which would free a slave from bondage does not extend so far as to declare that this nation is a great common sewer into which the vile offscourings of the nations of the earth is expected to flow. The humanity which declares that "all men are created free and equal" cannot apply to Asia and Africa, and to the islands of the sea, nor be interpreted as an invitation for the barbarians of the world to come and dwell among us. There is some limit to this doctrine of humanity. Enlightened minds long ago discovered that nations as well as individuals have the right to choose their abode and defend themselves from the encroachments of others; that nations as well as individuals have the moral right to invite to their homes and their firesides only such as they may desire to come; that nations as well as individuals have the moral right "to enjoy life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness" without molestation. A morality so high that it compels me to take into my household the vile criminal in order that I may do him good is a libel on the name of morality. The charity which would compel me to take the bread out of the mouth of my family to give it to a stranger is robbery. The mercy which would compel me to take the leper into my house to "cleanse him," and thus communicate the disease to my children, is brutal and inhuman. The political morality which would compel me to open wide our Golden Gate and welcome the hordes from China, Tartary, and Mongolia in order that we may civilize them and do them good, although by so doing we destroy our own cherished institutions, is hideous and revolting. No such morality as this was ever dictated to humanity. Virtues carried to excess are the worst of vices. There is a limit to humanity. There is a limit to kindness. There is a limit to hospitality and to all the graces and virtues. These limits have been recognized by the wisest statesmen and the most highly civilized and enlightened nations. Grotius, Vattel, Chief Justice Marshall, Thomas Jefferson, and Charles Sumner have all recognized the fact that "nations have the right to keep at a distance whatever is capable of causing their ruin." It was in recognition of this principle that our forefathers saw fit to limit the right of citizenship to foreigners until after a probationary period of residence among us. It was in recognition of this principle that John Quincy Adams opposed the annexation of Texas, and Charles Sumner the annexation of San Domingo. It was in recognition of this principle that the Hon. Eugene Casserly, foreseeing the evils of Chinese immigration, declined to attend the banquet given to Anson Burlingame in honor of the Burlingame treaty. With the far-seeing eye of a statesman he saw that we had prostituted and bartered the highest interests of our nation for "a mess of pottage." In accordance with this same principle we have the right—the moral right—to stop Chinese immigration if it is an injury to us. If it is claimed on behalf of the Chinese that every human being has the right to better his condition, and that it is our duty in a larger sense of humanity not to stand in the way, and that it is a part of the great economy of Nature that we should suffer some in order that the Chinese may be benefitted a great deal, we may reply that we do not have our right of opposition upon the right of self-preservation alone, but on behalf of humanity in its largest sense. We have adopted a republican government and democratic institutions, which it is to the interest of Christendom to preserve and perpetuate. Anything that threatens the safety of our government endangers the welfare of humanity. We may, therefore, oppose Chinese immigration, not upon our mere selfish right to exist (though in the eyes of all civilized nations that is sufficient), but upon the higher right of our government and our institutions to be perpetuated for the benefit of mankind.

I have thus attempted to classify the methods of viewing and treating the question of Chinese immigration: (1.) In its influence upon our social and political fabric; (2.) in its influence in an economic sense upon our prosperity as a nation, and (3.) as a political question. Leaving out of view the political question of our right to stop it, and regarding it simply as a question of benefit or injury in a social or economic sense, what is the highest and broadest view to be taken of this question? If the Chinaman is an evil to society and a benefit to commerce, which shall yield, society or commerce? If as a laborer the Chinaman is a benefit, and as a citizen he is an injury, which shall we dispense with, his society or his labor? If he is a benefit to the capitalist and an injury to the poor man, whom shall we favor, the rich man or the poor man? There can be no half-hearted answer to these questions. Humanity is above commerce; the citizen is more than the laborer; freedom and intelligence with poverty are better than the wealth and prosperity of the few with serfdom for the many. I have never been able to discuss the interests of humanity from a political economy standpoint.

Having thus fully set forth what I believe to be the highest and broadest methods of treating the Chinese question, I had hoped and intended to point out specifically how far short Kwang Chang Ling had fallen from the standard which he himself proclaimed at the outset, and also to call attention to some of his more glaring errors of logic. My columns are full and space forbids, and I must therefore close.

THE RIVAL COMMANDERS.

A Semi-Historical Scrap.

Late one sultry summer afternoon, in the year 1840, General Vallejo, then acting as Commandant at the Sonoma Presidio, was slowly pacing to and fro in the open corridor overlooking the court-yard of his residence.

The General, although just risen from his after-dinner siesta, was, nevertheless, in a very bad humor, as was plainly shown by the knitted appearance of his usually placid brow, and the short, fierce puffs and pulls which he gave at his cigarrito. The cause of his state of mind may be easily explained. His thoughts were dwelling upon a certain piece of intelligence which he had received early that morning, to the effect that Colonel Rotschef, the Russian Commandant at Fort Ross, had been making a survey of the mountainous country lying to the north and west of Sonoma. The report further stated that he was accompanied by his wife, the Princess Helena, and a number of armed followers.

The mere fact of the Russian having been in his neighborhood would not have affected the General in the least, were not the very thought of him a source of anger and bitterness to his mind; for Fort Ross was at that time considered by the Mexicans to be a mere squatter settlement, and its commander and garrison aliens and outlaws. General Vallejo, as the nearest Mexican officer of authority, had several times held negotiations with the Russians, looking to their departure, but had never succeeded in bringing them to any satisfactory conclusion; partly, it may be, because Rotschef, remembering how little they held, in common, regarding either race, political opinions, or religion, did not altogether trust his military neighbor. And now, added to these reawakened and unsatisfactory recollections, Vallejo had the bitterness of knowing that his rival had been leading explorations as if preparing for further encroachments; but, if such were the Russian's intentions, the General vowed they should never be executed while he should hold command at Sonoma; and having sealed this determination with a stamp of his foot and a mental something very much like profanity, the Commandant began to feel a trifle more at ease with himself.

He had stopped in his sentry-like walk, and was leaning idly over the balcony, gazing vacantly out upon the landscape beyond the town, when he was disturbed by the entrance of a stout, low-set, and rather sinister-looking dependent, who, approaching him, said, respectfully:

"An Indian has just ridden in, Señor Commandant, and wishes to see you."

"An Indian, Sanchez?"

"Si, señor. I think he comes from Prince Solano."

"Bring him here."

Sanchez bowed and retired, but soon returned, leading in a mild-looking Indian boy of fourteen or fifteen years. The General addressed him in Spanish, the boy replying in the same language, though somewhat brokenly.

"You come from Prince Solano?"

"Si, señor."

"Why did he send you?"

The youth seemed, in some degree, confused by this question, but soon recovering himself, began to speak rapidly and excitedly:

"He did not send me; I ran away. He would not have let me go. But I would come and tell you, señor—she is so good, so beautiful!"

"She! Whom do you mean?" demanded the General.

The Indian threw a quick glance around him, as if afraid of being overheard; then, drawing his two listeners a little out of the way of observation from the street, he resumed his tale in a voice scarcely above a whisper.

Both the General and Sanchez listened with growing interest, and when the boy ceased speaking, the former exclaimed:

"Solano—Rotschef! Sanchez, have ten of the men saddle their horses and prepare to accompany me immediately. The Prince's design must be frustrated at all hazards."

Sanchez hesitated and said, doubtfully:

"But, señor, your excellency, why should you annoy yourself? The Russian—"

Vallejo stamped his foot, and his eyes shot fire.

"Scoundrel!" he cried. "You dare suggest dishonor to me! Not another word: do what I tell you. Take the boy to the kitchen, then call the man and have my horse saddled. Be quick about it, for it will be a long ride. The arroyo de Santa Rosa you said, boy? Very well." And the General rushed into the interior of the dwelling.

Sanchez smiled sourly, and set about obeying his master's commands.

It was now late, and the sun was nearing the western horizon, behind which a few moments later he disappeared from view, his last rays glittering upon the polished weapons of the brilliant troop of horsemen just issuing from the town.

Day had passed, and upon the broad Santa Rosa plains deep darkness had settled down, unbroken at that early date by the brightly sparkling glimmer of those innumerable farm-house beacons which now lend cheerfulness and beauty to the soft night landscape; yet its entire extent, at least, was not wholly given over to obscurity, for a space of many acres, lying but a short distance from the present site of Santa Rosa, was thickly studded with numerous camp-fires. And the arrangement of these glowing beacons was as peculiar as the scene they illuminated. By far the greater number were so placed as to form a large, though somewhat irregular circle, in the centre of which were grouped the remainder.

The effect of all was to clearly illuminate the entire space, thereby making plain the fact that, so arranged, they represented the positions of besiegers and besieged.

Around each of the encircling fires a number of Indians—aggregating perhaps two hundred—were grouped, standing or reclining, whose fierce visages and barbaric arms and equipments seemed, in the varying glow of the firelight, at once picturesque and terrible, while the numbers of prancing and pawing horses picketed near added a new element of wild vigor to the scene.

Among the savages was one noticeable from the gaudy splendor of his attire as well as from the air of authority he wore, who, spending the moments constantly passing from point to point of the limits of his fiery circle, was from the universal deference paid him readily recognizable as the leader. He was, in fact, no other than Prince Francisco Solano, this being the name and title given by the Mexicans to the barbaric sovereign who, at that day, ruled over a vast extent of country lying north and east of San Francisco Bay, and was the acknowledged suzerain of all the petty chiefs who dwelt therein.

Always a friend to the early Mexican settlers, and, among his fellow aborigines, the avowed advocate of the white man's civilization, that the Prince should now be found in an attitude of open hostility toward one who, although not of his favorite Southern blood, was, nevertheless, a Caucasian, was certainly surprising. But the time-worn assertion, "No trouble but owes its origin to a woman"—an assertion, by the way, which, taken literally, is certainly an outrageous lie—was, in a modified sense, true in the present instance; for a woman, none other than the beautiful Princess Helena, wife of Colonel Rotschef, of Ross, was the cause of the present hostile demonstration on the part of Solano, and the object of his lawless passion.

Lying now, worn and weary from travel and anxiety, within her frail tent, guarded only by her husband and a score of followers, while on every side were the armed and savage hundreds of her wild lover, she seemed already almost utterly in his power, and, as the night wore on, she even wondered that the chief so long refrained from crushing relentlessly her few protectors, and making her prisoner. When, some hours previous, the Prince had suddenly surrounded her party, he had, wishing to avoid hostilities, and impelled by what was to him a spirit of perfect fairness, offered Colonel Rotschef very liberal terms for his wife—ponies and pelts without number, together with assurances of his future staunch friendship and support—offers which, to his great disgust, the Russian refused with angry scorn.

Enraged in his turn at this obstinacy, Solano had thereupon declared that if his terms were not accepted before the moon should rise that night he should possess himself by force of the lady's person, even though, in so doing, he should have to destroy her entire escort. Rotschef's answer had, of course, breathed nothing but defiance, and, having delivered it, he set about putting his small force in the best possible attitude to make as desperate and as lengthy a defense of his, indeed, almost indefensible position as the nearly hopeless circumstances would allow. All the preparation possible had soon been made, since which the Colonel and his men had been constantly on the alert, momentarily expecting attack, for none believed that the Indian would restrain himself till the time set, since he must already be convinced that only by force of arms would he be able to accomplish his purpose. In the minds of the besieged was the conviction that he waited only in the hope that a moment's relaxation of their part might give him an opportunity to overwhelm them unexpectedly, and therefore with less loss to himself. And they sternly determined that such hope should be vain.

But Solano had cogent reasons for respecting the period of truce he had himself set. While he could, without doubt, in his own opinion, annihilate the small number of whites with the warriors already at his command, he at the same time knew that the deed could more easily be performed with a still stronger force, and he felt confident that with the expiration of the time fixed would arrive large reinforcements, for whom he had dispatched messengers even before surrounding his prey; and he was still not altogether without hope that his augmented forces would so overawe the Russian that he might yet be induced to yield, and avoid a fatal and hopeless conflict. So, restraining his own and his followers' impatience, he waited.

Rotschef had retired into his tent to afford his wife for a few brief moments the consolation of his presence. Seated together, they were a striking pair. Rotschef, though a number of years the elder, was yet young, handsome, and soldierly-looking; while the Princess herself, in her marvelous northern beauty, well deserved the enthusiastic admiration then and subsequently accorded to her by all who beheld her loveliness; she seemed indeed a fair excuse for Prince Solano's lawlessness. Pale and worn, from weariness and anxiety, there was yet upon her face an expression of pride and loathing that betrayed how great an indignity the very thought of the Indian's demands was to her mind; and, in the brightness of her anger, she seemed one within whose veins wild might flow the blood of the Gagarins.

Yet when her husband—his look determined, but hopeless—entered, and, taking her hand, silently seated himself at her side, a softer light shone from her eyes, and letting her head sink upon his shoulder, she whispered: "My poor Ivan! is there then no hope?"

Rotschef shuddered, but answered with forced calmness: "I do not despair, Helena: the Indian may yet relinquish his purpose, or aid come from our settlement at Ross. They were to have heard from us to-night. No messenger arriving, they may become alarmed and march to meet us."

"Heaven grant they may come! But will it not be too late?"

"Not while I live, Helena. While life is mine you are safe. But should I fall—that is the thought that stings me! Not that I fear death; you know I do not; but you—who will save you from him then?"

"Ivan, Ivan, need you ask? I laugh at the wretch! Not he nor death can part us. No! we lived, we loved, so shall we die—together!"

Her eyes flashed with passionate pride and determination, her form dilated, and she seemed at that instant the goddess-like incarnation of high and stern resolve; but the next moment, in a sudden revulsion of feeling, she flung her arms around her husband's neck, hiding her face upon his breast, and sobbed, in tones of bitter self-reproach: "But oh, Ivan! that my folly should have caused it all! Had I but listened to your counsels, and remained at Ross, I might have spared you this. Ah, wretch that I am! forgive me!"

Rotschef pressed his wife to his heart, and kissed her fondly, murmuring: "Helena, my own dear love, grieve not, for it was God's will, and He may yet deliver us."

Sounds of a commotion without now attracted the Colonel's notice, and, again pressing his lips to her cold cheek, he hastily left the tent. By the light of the camp-fires he saw that the Indians were in a state of great excitement, many of them talking and gesticulating vehemently, while almost all were gazing intently to the southward. Solano and a few others even walked out a few paces in that direction, and then, standing stationary, seemed to await the arrival of some one. And the waiting was not long; there was a clattering, galloping rush, sounding nearer and nearer, and five minutes later a round hundred of fantastically armed and equipped horsemen, screaming "Solano! Solano!" burst into the circle of fire-light. They were led by a low-sized, but broad-shouldered Indian of middle age, at sight of whom the Prince's followers shouted "Marin! Marin!" in tones that fairly drowned the cries of "Solano."

The student of California's early Indian history does not need to be told that the new arrival was Marin, of I—, a sub-chief of Solano, dwelling upon the shores of San Francisco Bay.

The noisy welcome accorded to this chieftain was hardly stilled when, from the darkness to the northeast of the camp, came once more the clattering sound of galloping hoofs. Again the Indians waited, excited and eager; and their impatience was once more relieved by the arrival of nearly, if not quite, as numerous a troop as followed Marin. But now the welcoming cry was "Sonoma!"—that being the name of the wild-looking chieftain leading these last-coming allies. With a skin hardly darker than a Mexican's, and wearing a heavy, wiry, bristling, and most piratical beard, this individual probably had much more white than Indian blood coursing through the veins of his stalwart frame; yet, in savagery of aspect, if not of character, he cast his fellow-chieftains utterly in the shade.

The three approached and greeted each other, their followers in the meantime intermingling and cordially fraternizing. After which Solano, drawing his vassals aside, held what appeared to be an earnest conversation with them, lasting for some moments; at the conclusion of which there was much affirmative nodding—the trio evidently well understanding each other.

All this had been closely observed by Rotschef and his men, and also by the Princess Helena, who, at the commencement of the commotion, had followed her husband from the tent and now stood beside him, resisting all his entreaties to return. She, as well as her husband and escort, by this time fully understood the reason of Solano's previous forbearance, and what might now be expected. She saw that the number of their enemies was doubled; that escape, if not hopeless before, was now absolutely so, and the shadow that came over her face was the pall of a brave heart's despair.

Rotschef noticed it, and again begged her to reënter the tent, but she answered, in a whisper of entreaty: "No, Ivan; let me stay beside you. It will soon be over now, will it not?"

"The truce will end immediately," he answered. "The savage has evidently received the aid he waited for, and has no further reason for delay; at all events, the moon rises within a few moments now. Since you wish it, Helena, you shall remain with us until the last moment of peace; and that, I fear, will soon come. Ah, see! the Indians are even now preparing."

Rotschef here spoke a word of warning to his men, who were already so arranged behind the frail barriers of their camp as to defend it upon all sides. The soldiers—steady, fearless veterans of the Russian army and navy—nodded intelligently, with stern and grim smiles, which indicated a determination to sell life and victory as dearly as possible.

Solano, Marin, and Sonoma, mounted upon their steeds and armed with long lances, now rode slowly forward alone toward the Russians, as if desirous of holding a parley. Having allowed them to come within thirty feet of his defenses, Rotschef signaled them to halt, and, springing lightly over his frail barrier, waited for them to deliver their communication. It was, as he had expected, only a repetition of Solano's former terms, which offer, it is needless to say, met with as scornful a rejection as before.

Solano's eyes flamed with passion, and he gave vent to a number of savage and—what he intended should be—terrifying threats, all of which were received with calm contempt. Although the vassal-chieftains, Sonoma and Marin, had heretofore said nothing, leaving to their superior the office of spokesman, nevertheless it was not without great indignation that they observed the defiant bearing of the Russian officer; and to such a degree was their rage at length excited that, with a sudden and almost simultaneous movement, both brandished their lances and seemed about to transfix the daring Colonel. Uttering a thrilling cry, Helena flew over the low barrier and flung herself before her husband, while, at the same instant, Solano, shouting angrily to his chiefs, struck their weapons aside with his own. It was well that he did so; another instant—and the three would have fallen dead from their horses beneath the fire of half a score of muskets.

The chieftains, without uttering another word, turned suddenly and galloped back to their lines, while Rotschef and Helena reëntered their defenses.

A moment later, and the whole body of savages was sweeping down upon the Russians.

Half the space that separated them had been traversed, and Rotschef's lips were opened to order his men to fire, when the clarion voice of Solano was heard commanding his followers to halt; for, even amid the sullen roar of their horses' hoofs, his quick ear had been made aware of another commotion in his rear, and had caught the sound of his own name, shouted in piercing tones: "Solano! hold! for the love of the Virgin, stay!"

The words were in Spanish, and the Prince well knew the voice—the voice of one whom, if he did not fear, he at least thought it good policy to keep on good terms with. He, therefore, cared not to disregard the summons, but, halting his men, waited in sullen silence for a moment; at the end of which time the new-comers, some twelve in number, dashed through the Indians' lines, and, whirling their horses around directly in front of Solano, halted between him and the Russians. They were armed with sabres and carbines, and dressed in the picturesque garb of Mexican cavalry; while at their head was the lithe yet vigorous form, and bold, eagle-eyed face of General Vallejo.

Solano gazed upon him in silence, and the soldier, saluting him, spoke in a tone at once firm and full of frank friendliness: "Prince, I am come to save you from a crime. You know not what you do. The great ruler I and my countrymen have so esteemed must not dishonor himself by robbing the stranger of that which is nearest and dearest to his heart. You are a mighty chief, the friend of right and justice, not an outlaw and a robber!"

Solano made a gesture of angry impatience and broke forth, speaking almost perfect Spanish: "And are not these your enemies? Why are you not pleased that I may destroy them?"

"They are rivals of my people, yet still they are my friends, the brothers of my race. I will not see them wronged—they shall not be!"

"Señor," answered the Prince, with a slowly kindling eye, "you and yours have been the Indians' friends. I have ever loved your people; I would still remain their ally; but Solano's mind is set, and he will have his way; he is, as you say, a chief."

As the speaker uttered these words with a certain calm dignity of tone and manner, he waved the Mexican aside with his lance, and seemed about to renew the attack. But Vallejo, so far from taking the Indian's hint, only drew up his men the more compactly, and face the chieftain with unflinching eyes.

"So let it be," he answered, firmly. "Friends we have been till now, but here that friendship ends. Your warriors may crush the Russians, but first they must destroy my followers. You I will meet myself. Here, on this spot, Solano or Vallejo dies!" And with these words the soldier drew his sword.

A pause of breathless silence succeeded. All, whites and Indians, who surrounded the pair, gazed upon them with eyes of intense interest, perhaps in almost equal dread of what might follow. Solano's brow grew black as night, and his bare right arm upraised and poised his ponderous lance, the gleaming point turned fully towards Vallejo's breast. Then the chieftain hesitated. His calm opponent made no movement to parry or to fly; he might have slain him, sitting there, and yet he could not. Thoughts of all the firm and steady friendship he and his race had known at Vallejo's hands swept through his mind and shook his purpose. With a weary sigh he let his heavy lance's shaft sink to the ground, and, turning away from those eyes that met his own so fearlessly yet kindly, he leaned upon the weapon and meditated deeply.

A moment silently passed, while all, Russians, Mexicans, and Indians, gazed upon him in questioning wonder. Again his brow darkened; once more the lance was lifted, but now a new influence was brought to bear upon him.

One of Vallejo's troop—the only one unarmed—drawing the muffling scarf away from his dark face, rode near the chief and laid a trembling hand upon his arm. It was a boy, the messenger from whom the Mexican had learned Solano's wild intentions, in whom the chief now recognized his son. In silence, for one moment, they gazed upon each other, before the youth found utterance: "Let my father spare the friend of his people, and wreak his vengeance on his son, his son who has betrayed him. I brought the white man hither—I, whose mother dwells within Solano's tent, and who would not, could not, see the stranger there!" And as he spoke the boy's wild eyes were filled with burning fire.

The clouds of anger disappeared from the Prince's brow; a faint smile swept over his dark features, and for an instant he rested his hand caressingly upon the stripling's raven hair; then, riding slowly forward to Vallejo and clasping his hand, he said, gently: "Solano has been mad and blind, but he sees more clearly now. The stranger is your friend; then from this moment he is mine as well. Tell him so."

He had been speaking in Spanish, but now, turning once more to his followers and lifting his voice to a pitch of mighty power, he gave an order in a strange tongue; Sonoma and Marin appeared to echo it, and the next instant, with the rush and roar of an avalanche, the entire body of Indians had started southward, riding as if for life. One moment—and the firelight shone upon a confused and bewildering mass of rushing steeds and swarthy, wild-eyed horsemen, on many a feathery lance and dancing plume; the next—and the outer darkness had shut them in, and the faint moonlight showed only a dark, cloud-like shadow sweeping swiftly over the plains and growing even fainter.

Rotschef and the Princess met Vallejo, who had dismounted without the barriers of their encampment, and offered their hands in speechless emotion. Heartily grasping the former's, and kissing that of the latter with all his native grace of gallantry, the General said, with a frank smile: "So, Señor Colopel, henceforth we are to be friends, are we not?"

It is not necessary to record Rotschef's answer, since it is known that from that hour until the removal of the Russian settlement, they who had been rivals in authority were, in every sense of the word, friends. GEO. H. MEYER.

SONOMA, September 10, 1878.

"George, did you chop down the cherry tree?"

"What d'yer say?"

"Did you chop down that tree?"

"Ax me no questions and I'll tell you no lies."

"George, have you a hatchet?"

"So's a hen."

"Young man, commere to me."

"What do you want?"

"To play hide and seek."

So the old man went out to seek the hide. The scene which ensued in the wood-shed beggars description. It was touching in the extreme.

Barber—How long ago did you have your hair cut?"

Customer—About three months ago.

Barber—Awful bad cut. Who cut it?"

Customer—You did. (Silence of a few minutes.)

Barber (having somewhat recovered his nerve—I see that your chin has been cut by the last barber that shaved you.

Customer—Yes.

Barber—You ought to have built a head on him bigger'n a mule.

Customer—I did.

Barber continues to shave with great care.

At the depot: Foreigner—"Is that the Emperor of Germany at that desk in there?" Employé—"O, no!" Foreigner—"Perhaps, then, he is the president of the road?" Employé—"Not at all, not at all; he is an ordinary person employed on a salary, same as myself." Foreigner—"Indeed! I'm very much surprised. Only a subordinate! Why, I was completely humiliated all the time he was talking to me. I was about to commit suicide from a feeling of my own unworthiness. Only a subordinate! Well, next time I'll know a railroad man when I hear him."

NAMELESS.

Judge, I plead guilty. He speaks truth.

I am what he says, and what you see:

So old in a damned, unhalloved youth.

That your wrinkled years seem young to me.

Don't preach—don't lecture—I know it all—

The easy canting, the fluent words,

The solemn drivels of texts from Paul.

And a mangled phrase or two of the Lord's.

Moreover, you err if you suppose

That even a harlot, soaked in sin,

Slides down the darkness without some throes

Of the slain sanctity within.

Oh, sir, you wrong even our disgrace,

To think that we never wait and cry

Out from the depths, with lifted face

To an Awful Something up in the sky.

Do you think I never dream of home,

Of a weary man with whitening hair,

Of a missing voice in a vacant room,

And the sobs a-choke in a woman's prayer?

That nothing has ever prompted flight

Fast as my hungry feet could fly,

Fatherward, Motherward, that I might Fall on their necks, break heart, and die?

My God! my God! When the masked brows must Be clothed with a false, forged radiance, while

The bloom of the soul is burnt to dust,

And straight through your fabricated snile

Wan ghosts of murdered innocence fling

Perpetual javelins from their eyes,

And a babe's bird-like chirruping

Scares like thunder out from the skies.

When the clear instincts set to guard

The virgin altars from trampled stain,

Tricked of their holy watch and ward,

Moan and madden in heart and brain—

And a howling fury hunts and bounds

Wherever a clean thought bides away,

And a dreadful voice of dooming sounds

Through the haunted chambers night and day—

And a Something mocks you when you laugh,

A Something jeers you when you weep,

And hell-fire lurks in the wine you quaff,

And a fiend grins at you in your sleep,

And a coiling horror sucks you down

Far and farther in the abyss—

Judge, do you think your legal frown

Can augur punishment worse than this?—

Well, what a maudlin fool am I

To talk like this to a man like you.

Some day the toughest of us must die,

And we shall be sifted through and through—

Sifted and sorted. Judge, have you thought

That possibly, to the Searcher, then

Something that now is may be naught,

When the coward-shrieks steam up from men?

SAN FRANCISCO, September 2, 1878. RICHARD REALE.

An Archery Idyl.

Poising her bow in dainty hand,

Clad in a suit of Lincoln-green,

With head erect and steadfast tread,

She looked indeed an archer queen.

Fair Marian, bold Robin's bride,

Who followed the hart through forest glade,

Ne'er bent a bow with better grace

Than she, this winsome city maid.

Her tiny foot was planted firm

Upon the sod, her lithe white wrist

Drew back the string, the light shaft flew.

But, aimed too high, the target missed.

"I'll try and hit the gold," she said;

The arrow plumes her cheek caressed.

I murmured: "Were those plumes my lips,

Sweet woodland nymph, then were I blest."

I spoke too loud; she turned aside

In pretty wrath to one who knew

His heavy purse was all the claim

He brought this archer-maid to woo.

"I'm sure to hit the gold," she said.

Her bow she raised and shot with strength;

The arrow struck with force, but missed

The centre by a bodkin's length.

She leaned upon my rival's arm;

They wandered down the pleasant slope.

"I know he loves her, and his wealth,

His lands and houses, give him hope.

"Oh, that I were a border-knight.

With ten good bowmen in my band,

I'd bear her off, and you, rich fool,

Should feel the keen edge of my brand."

An hour or so, we met again.

Now for my fate. "Tell me," I said;

"If, since we shot at yonder mark,

Your shaft has hit the gold, sweet maid."

She blushed; her story then I knew

Ere she replied: "My archer bold,

For you, my own beloved one,

I gladly, dearest, missed the gold."

OAKLAND, September 7, 1878. DANIEL O'CONNELL.

Faith.

If they should come and say that you were dead,

I think that I should never speak again—

Should never from the dust lift up my head—

But smile at death and bless its welcome pain.

Expectant, happy, I should seek you straight,

As blessed saint-soul flies to heaven's gate.

If they said "false," I would no more believe

Than told the sun were blotted out this morn,

Or if an angel spake 'twere still the same:

I'd laugh the strong one back with mocking scorn.

"False!" Even though heaven's legions at my side

Should say it, it should be denied.

It is not woman's weakness, woman's faith,

That gives my soul this absolute, firm trust,

But perfectness must full fruition meet.

I love you so, I know, if God is just,

He will no more such love should fail or fade

Than perish all immortal He has made.

SAN FRANCISCO, Sept. 10, 1878.

ALL ABOUT WOMEN.

The tide of life—the married ones.

Woman's sphere—that she won't get a rich husband.

The girl who wears a diamond ring generally has an itchy nose.

The breath of scandal is beyond the control of cardamom seeds.

What a splendid Pole Modjeska would make to support the American flag!

The rejected lover who swears that his idol is cold-hearted, can get up a neat heartburn for himself by a liberal use of pie and milk.

The girl with "sparkling eyes" has the advantage of the girl with a "luminous mouth."

Deference is the most complete, the most indirect, and the most elegant of all compliments.

The last Irish bull is: "If I lived with such a disagreeable woman, she should always be alone."

It may be true that tall men like short women; but tall women never like men who are "short."

A little Cincinnati girl, when asked what God made her for, replied: "To wear a red fedder in my hat?"

When there is a chasm of misunderstanding between a mistress and her Irish help, she should Bridget.

Some ladies, when walking out, seem angry if they are gazed at, but are sadly disappointed if they are not.

Said he: "Matilda, you are my dearest duck." Said she: "You are trying to stuff me." She was too sage for him.

Young ladies who decline spring water for fear there may be tadpoles in it, freely eat arsenic to beautify their complexions.

"What," said a lady, "do you think of platonic love?" "Madam," said the gentleman, "it is like all other tonics—very exciting."

It is melancholy, says Ouida, in her latest novel, to see how large the proportion is of young ladies who marry solely to get rid of their mothers.

"How old are you?" asked a conductor of a little girl who was trying to ride on half fare. "I am nine at home, but in the cars I am only six and a half."

"Boots and gloves that fit, and a pretty handkerchief," answered the French woman when challenged to name three essentials of an elegant costume.

"Elder sister: 'Oh, you fancy yourself very wise, I dare say, my dear, but I could give you a wrinkle or two.' Younger sister: 'No doubt—and never miss them.'"

A Cleveland young man has a scrap-book containing the marriage notices of all the women that he has loved, and he sits out in the moonlight and reads it, and cries.

"Do not marry a widower," said the old lady; "a ready-made family is like a dish of cold potatoes." "Oh, I'll soon warm them over," replied the damsel, and she did.

A young lady sitting in a front door way used to be content to occupy a single step, but since the introduction of tinted hose and strapped slippers at least three are found necessary.

"Dearest," he murmured ecstatically, as he enfolded her in his arms for the first time, "let me sample the nectar of your lips." "Take a whole schooner of it," she faintly whispered, "it's all on tap."

It's the fashion nowadays when a girl gets married to send samples of the wedding dress for her friends to dream on, instead of a chunk of wedding cake. It isn't half as apt to attract the mice, and never greases the pillow-case.

A clergyman says: "I once married a handsome young couple, and, as I took the bride by the hand and gave her my warmest congratulations, she tossed her pretty head, and, pointing to the bridegroom, replied, 'I think he's the one to be congratulated.'"

There is a very young girl at Congress Hall, Saratoga, named Sweetapple. She is by birth a Canadian, but lives in California. The name must be derived from the Indians in Canada. Miss Sweetapple is a blonde, with large brown eyes. So says an exchange.

He thought he had married a spirituelle young creature, with æsthetic tastes. The first Sunday morning she ate three platefuls of baked beans and two sections of brown bread. He says it was the most enthusiastic æsthetic taste he ever met since he saw the lions in the circus fed.

It was a stranger in Nevada who ran away with a Nevada man's red-headed wife, and when the Nevada man caught up with him, he said: "Wimmin is skeerse out here, stranger, derned skeerse; but I'd rather have rest than fun. Gimme yer horse so's to legalize the thing, and take her along."

"What ails you, sister Theresa? Why are you thus wild with woe?" he asked, with deep anxiety.—Extract from novel.

She made no reply, but pointed silently to a bucketful of watermelon rinds under the table. The conundrum was answered.

Miss Kellogg is still in Paris, and is having a magnificent set of costumes made by Worth, the man milliner, which announcement is the accepted form of advertisement for a prima donna. If Clara can get Worth to furnish her with a voice to sing that "polonaise" in Mignon, on which she always slips up, it will be doing more than the dresses.

Scene at a fashionable evening party.—Mr. Brown—"Ah, Mr. Jones, allow me to introduce you to Miss Smith." Jones—"Delighted to meet so agreeable and charming a lady. Will you allow me to hug you for a half hour, Miss Smith?" Miss Smith—"Certainly, Mr. Jones, I am exquisite of such pastime." And the two embraced and waltzed.

STRICTLY CONFIDENTIAL.

NO. 1. SUTHER STREET, September 13, 1898.

Cervantes says, "Life resembles a bow, which if kept continually bent, must ultimately break." If one is allowed no respite from labor, one becomes mentally, morally and physically unable to conquer fate. In this high-pressure age of stock gambling, fashionable dissipation, and feverish business activity, what wonder that we seek amusement? And the fact is, the Friscans must have relaxation; there are no people in the world, not even the volatile French, to whom it is more of a necessity. Here every species of amusement may be found too, from a minstrel performance in a "dive" to the grand comic opera, with Mrs. Oates as the prima donna. A propos of the opera, on the opening night I noticed a number of engaged couples, and not a few who were flirtatiously inclined. Among the latter was the beautiful Miss —, daughter of the retired naval officer, with her big hat à la Devonshire, and her chestnut-colored hair, that always looks as if the sun were shining on it. She is a blonde, au naturel—this entre nous—don't tell, and her hair is perfectly innocent of aureoline, soda, or black tea. She handles her fan with the grace of a Spanish lady, and we be unto the man who thinks he is proof against the arrows of her eyes. She was attended as usual by the elderly gentleman with a gray moustache and anxious eyes, I presume, because he is never any more sure of her than an Irishman is sure of flea. Query, if she not engaged, why is he always at her side? Among a multitude of other elegant ladies present was the o-eyed Juno of Harrison Street, looking uncommonly well, in her new blue bonnet with the pink roses. I did not think to notice who her attendant was, but she was chaperoned as usual by her little sister. South Park was also represented as well as Nob Hill. There seems to be something in the atmosphere of the former place that engenders a disease which has almost become an epidemic in that region at last, the symptoms of which are loss of appetite, sleepless nights, and a desire to haunt the vicinity of numbers 16, 18, and 32. At any hour, before twelve o'clock at night, love-sick swains may be seen issuing from the Park. It is confidently reported by my friend Mrs. Grundy, who lives at the Palace Hotel, and who keeps herself thoroughly informed as to what is going on in the gay world, that the marriage of Miss M— will take place in the course of a few weeks; but who the lucky man is I have not been able to ascertain; it is said that it rests between "Shep" and a spoony naval officer who sings well and is generally admired by the ladies. Now, I am going to tell another piece of news. It was told me in the strictest confidence, of course; but, not being able to keep a secret—being a woman—I will tell it to you to keep for me. "The Only Jones" is going to be married! Just think of it! And the most astonishing part of the business is, that the young lady is a prominent belle in society. Take heart of grace, O ye wits and beaux! Since Mrs. F— has taken her accomplished daughter to Europe, how does poor J. H. C. feel? We presume he will console himself with the "widow" in lieu of the maid.

"When away from the arms that are dearest, Make love to the arms that are nearest."

Mr. and Mrs. Shillaber will give a reception at the Occidental Hotel next Monday evening to General and Mrs. Fremont. As I am one of the dear five hundred friends who are honored with an invitation, I will give a description of it in my next. I heard yesterday that Judge Harry T—n, the sometime widower of Van Ness Avenue, is going to take a new wife. The lady is a brunette, tall, lithe, and twenty-four. She has made fifty thousand dollars lately in stocks, which is no objection to the Judge, I take it. R—, why were you so attentive to Miss — on the excursion to Oakland the other day? Any thing serious? The "twins" were again together on the boat. One of them preferred to play the part of "Romeo" with "Juliet"; the other, for a certain reason, was enraptured with the "Flower of Kildare." I am rather of the opinion that "Romeo" is a gent; he is easily recognizable in his externals to be one. His tastes are Oriental—there is an Eastern gorgeousness in his raiment, a splendor of barbaric pearls and galvanic gold in his ornament; his neckties are always of unparalleled and variegated radiance, and, when circumstances favor, his fingers and his speckly shirt-front are adorned with the very finest and the purest of California brilliants. Over his manly bosom is commonly festooned the largest, heaviest and yellowest of watch-guards, in whose genuineness he requires the most unquestioned faith, as in a matter of personal honor. If all this does not constitute a "gent," then what does? Now that the fashionables are returning to the city, the Park once more presents a lively scene on Saturday afternoons. Almost any fine day now, Miss H—, of Mission street, may be seen galloping through the Park with all the fearless grace of a Di Vernon. She enjoys the reputation of being the most accomplished rider in California, at least he thinks so. Who? Lieutenant Whiskerandos, of the Twelfth Infantry. When asked by an officer who knew she affiliates with the army if she rode well, she replied: "I can ride anything from a mule to a zebra; like Lady Gay Spanker, I was born on horseback." A Fact. Your own,

FIFTEENTH ST.

MARK TWAIN AND THE GILDED AGE.

How Clemens and Warner Wrote Their Alleged Novel.

HARTFORD, August 31.—Mark Twain conceived the idea of The Gilded Age when he was suffering from a prolonged fit of blues. He proposed to write a story with a moral, and he told Charles Dudley Warner that he wanted the moral so plainly put that he who ran might read. It was high time for the American people to be awakened. The American people were awakened to the extent of $14,000, which Mark Twain and Dudley Warner pocketed in six months' time from the sale of the book. Here the equal division ended, however; for John T. Raymond says that he has paid Mark Twain $50,000 royalty on the play, while it is a secret that Dudley Warner sadly tries to keep that Mark Twain paid him $1,000 for his half interest in any dramatization. The discrepancy is said to have arisen because Warner regarded the book, when the last sheet was tossed on the floor still wet with ink, as the most successful piece of American humor, while Mark Twain gravely reminded Warner that any such view of it taken by the American people would ruin the influence for a better state of public morals which it was intended by him to exert. Warner stuck to his opinion, and Mark Twain to his. Twain was surprised and grieved to learn that the public so far agreed with Warner as to characterize it as an attempt at humor.

The two men shook hands over it under the best of Calvin in Mark Twain's den, and then Warner sailed for Europe to spend the money the book had brought him, while Mark Twain remained behind to negotiate with John T. Raymond.

An intimate friend of both, in an unguarded moment, revealed the secret of the way in which the book came to be written. This is said to have led to a temporary estrangement from Parson Joe Twichell, upon whose shoulders Mark Twain foisted the "Punch with care burden," and afterward told about it in the Atlantic Monthly. An estrangement from Parson Twichell was wide-reaching in its effects, for it resulted in Mark Twain's absenting himself from the family pew on Sundays, and strangers staying in Hartford over Sunday are somewhat in the habit of seeking Twichell's church and quietly asking the sexton to seat them as near Mark Twain's pew as possible.

The story the intimate friend tells is this: One evening in the summer of 1874 Dudley Warner and his wife dropped in upon Mark Twain, who had been gloomily smoking clay pipes in his den all the week. Even the cheery Joe Twichell had been unable to shake him from his melancholy.

"If you look from your den window to the northeast," the Parson would say, "you can see where General Hawley lives, and his success ought to encourage you."

"But that makes me think of politics, and they are a curse."

"Well, look over across the street, and you can see where Jewell lives. You know he began life with his shirt sleeves rolled up and his arms to the elbow in a tan vat."

"Now, don't! He reminds me of mails and letters, and they are an abomination."

"Well, there's Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe's house next door. She what a name she made after discouragements."

"But slavery is gone now."

"Well, there's Dudley Warner's Summer in a Garden over there. You can almost see the pusley from here."

"That settles it. I'll get Warner here to-night and bother him about pusley."

So Warner came around, and during the evening spoke of a recent American novel.

"It's atrocious what bosh is written for American novels now," Warner said. "I believe I could write a better novel myself."

"You! You write a novel!" said Mrs. Warner, and she laughed. "Why, you can't write anything except about pusley in your garden."

"Warner is quite right," Mark Twain drawled out. "I have for a long time felt that I could write a better story than any American novelist."

Then it was his wife's turn, and, when she controlled her merriment, she said: "You write a story! Why, all that you can do is to write about jumping frogs."

"Let's write a story, Warner, and show these women what we can do."

Mark Twain's blues had departed; and he pulled Warner up stairs to his den, lighted a clay pipe, and talked it over as rapidly as he can talk—about sixty words to the minute, about half the ordinary rate.

"Don't let's tell Twichell until it's done," Mark Twain suggested, "because we want to surprise him, you know."

The story was to be highly dramatic, strictly moral, and to have a point. Warner suggested that too many novels had points; and Mark Twain said that it wouldn't do to have a pointless novel, and he was disposed to reprove Warner, when the author of the Summer in a Garden suggested that people would take Mark's most serious attempt as designed to be funny.

"That's just it, Warner; I want to write something so serious that it can't be mistaken for fun."

It being decided that the story was to teach a lesson, the two authors found themselves brought up short in trying to decide what the lesson was to be, and they prepared to make a night of it, forgetting all about the wives below. Warner had a dim idea about the evils of speculation, while Mark Twain thought something on the errors of the religious teaching of the present day would do and he got warm about it.

At length Warner said that he once knew a man who would make a first-rate character for a novel; and then he told Mark Twain about Colonel Eschol Sellers, who had always been just on the point of making his millions.

"That's the thing," said Mark Twain, "name and all."

Warner protested against the name, because he was afraid that they might hear from Colonel Sellers, but Mark Twain was stubborn and said that the character and name were just the foundation for a novel showing the dangerous effect of the tendency to speculate. So they decided to build a novel on Colonel Eschol Sellers. Each was to write a certain amount every day, meet in Mark Twain's den at night and fit the ends together, lay out the work for the next day, and talk it over. Mark Twain was enthusiastic. He insisted that Colonel Sellers would be recognized as a sad type of the prevailing American evil, and the people would be benefited by the warning. Warner had some doubts about the people looking at Colonel Eschol Sellers as portrayed in The Gilded Age in just that way.

The manuscript was finished in just a month from the date on which it had been begun; and Mark Twain, who has horror of writing the headings of chapters, thought that it would be desirable to get Dr. J. Hammond Trumbull, the linguist, sometimes described as the only man who can read Eliot's Indian Bible in the original, to write the chapter headings in some forgotten language with unknown alphabets. This Dr. Trumbull gladly did, and it explains their queer headings which made more talk than Colonel Sellers did when the book appeared. Mark Twain has since said that he was glad one book had been published which contained something that even the critics had to admit they did not understand.

The Gilded Age sold rapidly at first, and Mark Twain assured Warner that the people were accepting Col. Sellers, as he had known all along they would, in all seriousness. But the sale suddenly stopped. Mark could not understand it until Parson Twichell told him that the trouble was that the book was too serious. The public would accept nothing from him that was not funny, and they had been deceived in this book. They bought it for fun, and found it a sad, solemn story, with a moral. Mark accepted the explanation, but Dudley Warner's friends say that the book stopped selling when the public found out how bad it was, and Warner privately admits it. However, the profits to the authors were $14,000, and would have been $20,000 more had not Warner's prediction, when Mark Twain proposed to use Col. Eschol Sellers' name, come true.

Dudley Warner sat in his editorial chair, in the Hartford Connecticut office, one day, so the intimate friend says, a few weeks after The Gilded Age had been published. The door opened, and a tall man with a broad-brimmed hat stood on the threshold. When Warner looked up and caught the tall man's eye he felt a growing sensation of weakness, and wished that Mark Twain was there. The card that the tall man handed him, as Warner knew without looking at it, bore the name of Col. Eschol Sellers. Only a few words passed between them, and after the interview was over Warner hastened to Mark Twain's house. Money or a suit was Col. Eschol Sellers' ultimatum.

There was a meeting of lawyers, and Col. Eschol Sellers left Hartford $2,000 richer, and with the promise that all subsequent editions should appear with the name changed to Colonel Beriah Sellers. This explains why in a few copies of The Gilded Age the name appears as Col. Eschol, and in all others as Col. Beriah. In this respect Mark Twain's prophecy, that Col. Eschol Sellers would be a serious reality was fulfilled.

John T. Raymond did not like Beriah, and substituted Mulberry when he dramatized the story.

Also, John has a story of his own to tell about the bargain with Mark for the right to dramatize the story. When he buys another play, John says that he must put the pound of flesh in the bond, and then he won't be ruined when pay time comes.

All this on authority of a correspondent of the N. Y. Sun.

A Monument to Spanish Patience.

The King of Spain has decided on having an immense basilica raised over the remains of Queen Mercedes. The sum of 1,000,000 reals will annually be deducted from the Civil List for its construction till the building is completed. The Duc de Montpensier and the Princess of the Asturias have promised to furnish yearly 200,000 reals in aid of the work. Lastly, the Duc de Montpensier has brought to Paris with him a letter from the King to Queen Isabella, asking her to join in the project by handing over for the purpose the diamonds and jewels deposited in the Cathedral of Atocha which belong to her, and represent a sum of 15,000,000 reals—more than 600,000 dollars. The Queen at once telegraphed as follows, in reply: "My son!—The Duc de Montpensier has just brought me your letter. I see that, like a Catholic King and gentleman, you seek consolation in God and think of Mercedes in doing good to the capital. You are going to place her beloved remains at the feet of the Virgin beneath a magnificent temple. Your mother, my child, not only permits the jewels of Atocha to be sold, but she blesses you and joins in your project—a project worthy of a King, a Christian, and a good husband. For this and everything, count always, Alfonso, on the immense love, the support and cooperation of your mother, who wishes it to be known that, although at a distance, she is and always will be the same for Madrid, for Spain, and for her King." Spain is probably the only country in the world where a Catholic King and gentleman could seek consolation in God and display his love for his dead Queen by placing her remains at the feet of the Virgin beneath a magnificent temple, reared at the expense of an impoverished and church-ridden people. Spain is to-day the Spain of the middle ages in all that pertains to superstitious and feudal tyranny. Spain is accursed of its church. The traveler, passing through this priest-ridden, ignorant, impoverished old Spain, sees the most abject misery, the most hopeless poverty; he sees villages, where half the people live in holes and caves, in huts and hovels—sees distress on every side; land tilled with crooked sticks for plows; rags, filth, destitution, and poverty. Yet, in every town, village, and city, a gorgeous cathedral rears its spire to the heavens—a cathedral rich in marbles, paintings, and gorgeous upholstery; in every village and town, sleek, fat, and oily priests, with broad-brimmed sombreros and robes of velvet. We attribute these grand edifices to an earlier age, but semper eadem seems to be truly the motto of the Roman Church, that allows a Catholic king in the name of religion to rob the poor—to build at the expense of millions of reals a monumental cathedral over the remains of a dead girl who was for five months the Queen of Spain.

The stock market is just a shade off, but our friends must not be discouraged. It will be sustained by varying fortunes until the grain crop is fully marketed. Time will be given to everybody to put their money in. Still, our advice to farmers is not to hold on to their wheat too long, but to realize as soon as possible and invest it all in mining stocks.

French playwrights invent naughtiness. Their more virtuous English and American brothers only steal it.

FABLES AND ANECDOTES.

By Little Johnny.

The Social Incapacity of a Tailless Dog.—How to Furnish a Bed Room without Expense if the Victim of the Plan is not Deaf.—Extraordinary rencontre between the Author's Uncle Edward and a Lion with the Toothache.—The Patient's Importunities suitably Rebuked.—Braided Snakes for Female Wear, the newest Sweet Thing in Personal Adornment.—The Dismal Misadventure of two Quack professionals.—The Lion-Haunted Spring.

One time there was a dog wich hadent got no tail cos it was cut of, but I think it is notty to cut em of, but oxes tails is mity nice soop, and the beever he has got a flat one, like a shingle. There was a uther dog wich had a long tail, slick like a wip lash, and them the fellers for me. And the dog wich had got a tail it said to the dog wich diddnt: "Wen yure master givs you a bone wot do you waggle?"

The other one said: "I waggle the bone, and that is a nuf, if it is a big one, plenty meat onto it."

Then the dog wich had the tail it said a other time: "Wen yure master kix you wot hav you got for to put by tween yure legs, to sho how keenly you feel yure pesition?"

And the bob tail feller it said: "I jest put a haf of a mile by tween my legs and hisn, wot more cude I want, xcept mebbly the uther haf of the mile?"

The dog wich had got a tail it thot a wile, and shuk its hed, much as to say: "This feller aint no tail, but he has got a hed onto him wich is no slowtch for argue;" but after a wile he begin to smile, the dog wich had got a tail did, and then he said: "Wot hav you got for the little boys to tie a tin pan onto?"

Then the otherm it sed: "Yu got the ad vantage of me there, thats a fack. This no tail of mine is jest as good as any for bizness, but it aint worth a cent for to be sociable with."

A feller in Oakland wich had took a unfurnish bed room in a lodgin hous he said one nite to his frend, the feller did: "Now I got my room, and I have bot a bed, and a booro, and a chair, but haint got any more money, wot am I agoin for to do for them little nix nax wich a man of taste likes for to see about him, sech as a woter pitcher, and cannle sticks, and a boot Jack, and a lukin glas, and a hair bresh, and the like?"

Then his frend he spoke up an sed: "Jest gimme that cat and them kittens and come a long of me, and we wil git all them things mity quick."

So they cot the ole cat and the little kittens and tookem to a other house, in to the back yard, and took sum close pins, and pind their tails to the close line, wich was offe notty, but drowndin cats in sacks is the kind of fun for me. Bime by the ole cat an the kits they begin to holler like a funeral pformance, and the frend he sed: "Now we wil git plenty boot Jacks, and woter jugs, and cannle sticks, and tumblers, ol we got to do is just hide here til mornin and carry them a way wen it gits lite a nough for to pickem up."

But in the mornin wen they was most froze, an the cats was ded, nothin had been throde out, and wile they was lookin up to the windo a feller in his shert sleefs he opend it for to look at the sun risin. Then one of em he looked up to the feller in the windo, and said: "Good mornin, condemn you!" but the man in the windo dident say nothin. So the otherm he hollered: "How do you like cat concerts, ole stick in the mud?" but the man he dident say nothin a other time. Then the feller wich was hous furnishin he got reel mad, and ne shuke his fist and yelled as loud as ever he cude: "He git even on you yet, you gum dasted stingy ole thief!"

Then the man in the windo he took notice, and went back in his room, but purty sune he come back, and leend out of the windo with a normous great ear trumpet in his ear, and said: "Wot der yer soy?"

A natif in Injy one time over tuke a other, and as thay was both a goin the same way they traveld together, and one said: "Wot is yure bizness?"

The other he sed: "Snake charmer. Wot is yourn?"

And the feller wich had spoke first he said: "Lion tamer?" Bime by there was a lion jumpt out in to the rode and bey both skinned up a pom tree, like 2 skawirrels, but wen hay had got bout half way thay see a big snake curled a round the top of the tree, with its hed downweds. Then the ion man he sed, the lion man did: "Lucky for me I have got you a long, you jest charm that serpint reel quick, so we can go high upper."

But the snake feller he sed: "Wots the use? You jest ame that quodderped, so we can go low downer, wich is more tords our oh riginal pint of destnation."

Then the tamer he was mad, and he sed: "If ever I travel with a other swindlin imposter may I be tore to peeces!" And the charmer he sed: "Wen I keep compny agin with a yin frod I hope to be swollered hull!"

Then the snake it et the charmer, and the lion it et the amer.

A other time Uncle Ned was wockin out, and a long slen snake flew at him and bit him on the hand and got a way. Then Uncle Ned he run as hard as he cude, for to git home nd di into the boosom of his family. Wile he was running, nd a prayin for his sins to be forgave, he seen a natif nigger settin by the rode, and the natif nigger had three jell each snaks twisted all around his arms and legs bitin him all yer, but he had got all their tails in one hand. Then Uncle Ned he sed: "Poor feller, I have been bit too, by one of dem same dedly cobries. As ther aint no hope for either of s now we will jest sell our lifes as dear as we can."

So he throde of his cote and picht in, and grabbed the nakes by the tails, too. Then the natif nigger he let go nd took his 2 hands to untangle the snakes, and said: "Thankee, sir; I gess we will be able to manidge em now. Here is to be a party tonight, and I have been tryin for or than a half an our for to braid these fellers into a neckless for my wile to wear around the stummeck of her belly, ut the wrascles squerm so I thot Ide have to let 'em go." Uncle Ned he sed: "Wot! aint these reptuals pizen?" and the natif nigger he said: "How do I kno? Do you sposse I ver et one?"

SAN RAFAEL, September 12, 1878.

AFTERMATH.

To many the death of Alexander Austin is a sensation—to us it is a loss. We have known him for almost thirty years, and in an intimate association during this long period he was to us the very embodiment of many virtues. He was eminently a manly man; he was a brave, courteous, generous gentleman, large-hearted, tender as a loving woman, true and honorable. We shall always remember him as he was in his prosperous, popular days, when all were friends, and none were enemies. We shall always treasure him in our memory as an honest man, overcome by casualties that are not crimes. We believe that two causes contributed to his death—the loss of a large trust fund in stock transactions and the untimely death of a wife he loved. The money loss would have been declared a crime, and Alexander Austin was of material that would rather brave death than the charge of dishonor. We believe that this money, himself, and all he had was sucked into the whirling vortex of this devilish maelstrom of stock gambling. He committed suicide, and if we are right in our estimate of his condition, we are glad of it. Some hateful bigots, who did not know him—and if they had, would not have appreciated him—will bury his memory in the cross-road of their hearts, where prejudice and superstition meet; and they would drive the stake through his body, but it would not touch his great palpitating, throbbing, bruised, and tender heart. Better his mode of departure than to have stood up the target which envious, malignant minds would have named crime, and not misfortune. He did bravely, and we will not insult his memory by giving him the apology of insanity. He wrapped the mantle of death around him, and stepped confidently out into the darkness of eternal night. He escaped his enemies, he paid his debts, he paid the penalty of his weakness and his mistakes, if any there were. Society can demand nothing more of him. He has joined his wife. His friends, and those who loved him living, cherish his memory, and not the less that he solved the problem of his life by cutting the thread that relieved him from all its complications.

It is represented that there is a vengeful war being waged against the ruling dynasty of the Comstock, and that new pretenders to the golden crown are putting forth their claims. We do not see it. We never remember any continued conflict between moneyed powers. Wealth bears no resentment, nurses no unkind memories, and perpetrates no revenges. Railroads, banks, steamship companies, stock-brokers never quarrel beyond the possibilities of a compromise, and the danger of adjustment and cooperation is always most imminent when the gongs beat loudest and the stink-pots fly fastest. We lay it down as an axiom in stocks, viz.: that self-interest dominates all other considerations; that everybody who deals does it to make money for himself; that there is not now, and never was, and never will be, a strictly conscientious man in the business; that anything like a syndicate to keep Sierra Nevada out from the control of Flood is a rope of sand; that Skae, Morrow, Head, Jones, Schloss, Miller, Williams, Glazier, or other Protestant, Greek, Jew, or Gentile, who may be in this combination to hold, will sell at any time that he gets his price. These are all very nice persons. Eels are very nice fish, but you cantie a double-bow knot of slippery water-snakes as easily as you can bind together a body of stock-brokers. Whenever the bonanza firm wants the control of Sierra Nevada it will just stretch out its tentacles, and the whole syndicate will squirm, and wriggle, and crawl to see which shall get first into the maw of the octopus.

General Grant is to-day the most promising candidate for the Presidential office of all that are proposed. If one was called upon to name a winner in the great Presidential sweepstakes for 1880, General Grant's would be the first name that would suggest itself. It will not be wise for those who do not wish his renomination—either politicians or newspaper men—to endeavor to whistle him down the wind. His relation to the country makes this mode of disposing of him impossible. His splendid military career, and his not altogether unsuccessful civil administration, are too firmly fixed in the minds of the nation to allow of this mode of disposing of his claims to reelection. The best way to defeat General Grant will be to find a better man. If the ARGONAUT could name the next President of the United States, it would be the Honorable E. B. Washburne, our late Minister to France. If the ARGONAUT could name the Democratic candidate for that high position, it would be Senator Bayard, of Delaware. To Mr. Washburne we would give the Hon. Roscoe Conkling, of New York, as Vice-President, and this position we would assign to the distinguished Senator from New York as a resting-place on his way to the Presidential office. We would not break down the two-terms tradition if we could avoid it. We prefer civilians over military men; a Republican over a Democrat; brains over availability; and any body with patriotic purpose, stern resolve, and a firm determination to maintain the law and the rights of person and property, as against the spirit of misrule that is abroad in the land.

It is not altogether improbable that the Democracy may carry the next Presidential election. There are some considerations that render such a result not undesirable. It is probable that the South will present itself as a unit in the Electoral College, supplemented by the vote of a considerable number of the Northern states. Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Indiana, Oregon, and California can not be relied upon to cast their vote against the right kind of Democrat, nominated in a proper manner. If, for once, the Democracy could rise to the level of patriotism, eschew Tammany, and give the cold shoulder to the foreign blatherskites and domestic demagogues, who are educated to the idea that politics is a synonym for intrigue, and that political power is only desirable to the party as an opportunity to plunder; could place in nomination a statesman and a gentleman like Senator Bayard, and go before the people upon the issues of national currency as opposed to national banks, economy and honesty as opposed to criminal profligacy of administration, union of all the interests of all the States in opposition to sectarian hate, and instead of partisanship and politics, offer the country statesmanship and intelligent administration—the Democratic party might be successful, and its success might not be a national calamity.

PARISIAN BONBONS.

"Fickle and fine and French."

The little Paul, aged eight, passes the day at his uncle's. At dessert they serve the tart to the cream.

"Ah, my uncle," says the child, "why didn't you tell me this morning that there was going to be pie for dinner?"

"Why?"

"So that I could have expected it all day," replies the infant, passing his tongue around his ears.

A man who had long been in populous cities pent, having occasion to visit the country, encountered a flock of those birds widely known in connection with tailors and apple sauce.

"Well," said the citizen, having noted the peculiarly stupid way in which they gabbled and stared at him, "I don't wonder that they called you geese!"

A commissaire de police, meeting a woman in tears, demanded of her the cause of her sorrow, and was informed that her husband had beaten her.

"See here," said the officer to the husband, "if you go on doing this sort of thing I'll have to run you in" (il me faudra vous courir de dans.)

"What for?" growled the husband. "Hitting her? I didn't hit her; I just struck her with my handkerchief, which was doubled up."

"Yes," said the wife, "but you don't say that it has a thumb on it."

"Hello, what are you doing now?"

"Editing a comic paper. Permanent thing. Got to be witty for the rest of my life. Ha-ha!"

"In other words, you've had sentence of death passed on you."

"So the D— girls have never had a brother?"

"Never. Just the seven sisters of them."

"Like the nine Muses. How awfully jolly."

A Brazilian count, a billionaire, was dining at the table d'hôte of a fashionable hotel. His cutlet was to his taste, and he ordered another.

"We only give one cutlet," said the manager, "and no bread with one fish-ball."

Without a word the count rose, went out, bought the hotel, returned, led the manager to the front door and kicked him down the steps, then reseating himself at the table, said: "Bring me another cutlet."

They brought it, swift as the eagle cleaves the air.

At the annual award of the prizes at the village school the worthy mayor calls up a blue-eyed and golden-haired young girl, with the air of a startled fawn, to receive the prizes for good behavior and French composition.

"Why, my child," he says, "what's the matter with your nose? It's scratched."

"Yes, sir," replies the bashful girl; "that red-headed, moon-eyed leper, Lizzie N., tried to smash my nose, but I bit her ear; you bet your carpet slippers on it. That is the sort of a hair-pin I am."

"Madam, I know all."

The miserable woman, not knowing how much he did know, concluded that it would be wise to grovel at his feet.

With the grace of King Henry, from whom, indeed, he borrowed the words, her husband said with dignity:

"Rise, madam: were any one to see us he would think that I was forgiving you for some offense."

And after a pause he continued:

"When, in point of fact, I don't forgive you at all!"

"Yes, sir," said the exasperated gentleman, "I will go and find him. I will upbraid him with his treachery, and then, looking him sternly in the eye, I will kick the seat of his pantaloons out through the crown of his hat."

Difficult, but not impossible, remembering how Montgomery's bleeding warrior lay prone on his breast and glared at the skies.

"Now, your Majesty," said the scientist, who had been commanded to conduct a series of experiments before royalty, "these two gases will have the honor of combining before your Majesty."

The Commander of the Faithful was about to uniform his hosts, and a gigantic contract for cloth was ahead.

A contractor presented himself to the Minister of War, prepared to make his tender.

"How much a yard?" said the Minister, softly rubbing his fingers and thumb together.

"By the beard of Allah!" said the contractor, who was short-sighted, "thirty liras delivered f. o. b., and may goats defile my grandmother's grave if I make more than five liras profit a yard."

"Come again to-morrow," said the Minister of War, rather curtly, as the second contractor presented himself.

"What do you charge a yard?"

"By the great Thirty-nine Imams, forty liras, which leaves me fifteen liras a yard profit."

"A-ah," said the official, brightening up, "God is great. Just wait a minute till I see this other slave. How much do you want for your cloth, eh?"

"Sovereign lord," replied the third contractor, falling upon his face while a wink shot over his left eye, "the slave of the footstool has some cloth all wool and warranted not to shrink, which I will lay upon the altar of my country for fifty liras a yard."

"And the profit thereupon?" said the official in a voice choked with emotion, "is —"

"Is twenty-five liras a yard."

"Omy soul, O my lamb," replied the Minister, "the contract is thine." And clapping his hands he bade the Nubian slave who appeared go bid his bekbekrs begin carting for his new palace.

A ROMANCE OF SPAIN.

Morning in Madrid. The day was warm and sultry; nature seemed wearied with her prolonged daily contest with the fiery shafts of the summer sun, and appeared to hang her head in submissive impotency. The branches of the trees drooped languidly, and the little breezes that occasionally passed drowsily over the city were mere ghosts, that not a soul could catch.

It was market day in Madrid. Troops of girls, with red and purple skirts, and black and yellow stockings, with fine dark eyes and olive cheeks, their long hair dangling to their waists in broad plaits, came with light, quick steps down the pathway leading to the great fountain of the Plaza del Oriente for water. Some balanced red water jars on their small, compact heads, while others, with languid, undulating grace, swung their long dark rounded arms, in the abandonment of dreamy idleness. Lazily reclining around the fountain, or lying on benches under the trees, might be seen young men, barefooted, and negligently but gayly dressed, their white shirts revealing their dusky throats, and their intense black eyes saucily glancing up now and then from under their broad-brimmed sombreros.

These gay, merry do-nothings cheerily hailed the pretty water-carriers as they came and went, with: "A Dios, mi alma," "Buena mañana, mi corazón!" To which the dark-eyed beauties would respond with musical laughter, displaying the prettiest rows of pearly teeth in the world, and filling their pitchers at the fountain, would lightly mount them to their head, and, nodding and gesticulating, disappear around the corner of the square.

On one side of the Plaza groups of rudely but gayly dressed women were moving hither and thither, making preparation for the morning sales: some with trays of fruit—pomegranates, luscious figs, and tempting grapes and guaves—and others at gay little wooden stalls, where all kinds of cooling drinks—"bebidas"—were sold. There were other stands, set off prettily with bunches of bright wild-flowers, on which were heaped vegetables, fresh and crisp from the earth, and white cakes of honey embellished with the delicate green lettuce leaf. There were other stands still more attractive, at which might be seen burnished trays with tiny silver cups, and bronzed Spanish girls preparing that delicately delicious chocolate so dear to the Castilian palate. Picturesque groups, though continually changing, were constantly gathered about these places.

Among the busy, chatting market folks might now and then be seen a priest, with his black robe and funny bell-crowned hat, and umbrella and prayer-book, hurrying to morning mass. Crowds of little girls, with white dresses and broad-brimmed hats, and little straw-plaited baskets, were loitering on their way to school. There were men with slouched hats, barefooted or wearing sandals; men on horseback; women on foot, and on donkeys heavily laden; and occasionally might be seen a graceful señorita, enshrouded, head and figure, in folds of black lace, of whose beauty one must alone guess by the tapering white fingers that clasped the veil at the breast. Old women, dark and shriveled, were hurrying to the chapel, counting their beads as they passed along. Gay fellows, with spangles and feathers, on fiery steeds, galloped with foolish speed down the narrow streets. Down among this motly throng flitted the water-carriers, making the air resound with their sharp and clear, and yet musical cries of "agua, agua, quien quiere, agua."

In the centre of the Plaza, near the beautiful fountain, are charmingly grouped parterres of flowers and plants of rare growth, bright, variegated-leaved grass gracefully waving among them.

On each side of this square, or Plaza, are fine walks with shade trees. The streets, though narrow, are smoothly paved, and adorned by splendid houses, the proportions of which are grand and massive. They are inhabited by nobles, and knights, and the rich gentlemen of Madrid. The streets present a fine artistic effect; the dark, grand houses rising up majestically on one side are rendered doubly imposing in appearance by the open space and waving trees and grasses of the Plaza opposite. These houses are marvels of beauty and strength. The windows are all made with latticed casements, protected on the outside by ornamental iron gratings. They are entered by arched gateways, within which swing massive doors, themselves containing smaller doors, all opening into courtyards, in which are more plants, fountains, and statuettes.

From the casement of one of these noble houses, half enshrouded in the meshes of the fine lace curtains, a young girl sat, sleepily and languidly fanning herself, and gazing at intervals through the lattice on the bright scene of the street below. She looked, in truth, like a fair prisoner behind the heavy gratings, and it was evident, by her look of ennui, that time hung heavily on her hands.

The room which contained this fair occupant was magnificent in all its appointments. On one side stood a table of Italian marble, which was spread with all manner of fine confections. By the side of it was a small silver spirit-lamp of unique workmanship, which cast a delicate blue flame over the pretty picture.

In an alcove, amidst a cloud of white and pink curtains, hung a hammock with cushions of pink silk, and a white shawl hanging carelessly over the side. The room was large and spacious, casements reaching to the floor and opening on balconies which resembled hanging gardens, so completely were they filled with flowering plants and vines. The occupant of this lovely room reclined in an abandonment of ease on a half couch with silken pillows. Her dress was of pure white, loose and flowing, and of softest and finest texture, revealing arms and neck of snowy whiteness.

From the voluminous folds of her dress a tiny foot in a little pink slipper protruded itself. Her hair, dark and luxuriant, confined around the forehead and clasped at the back of the neck with bands of pearls, fell in waving masses of beauty to her waist. From her girdle was suspended a rosary with a little golden cross attached.

Her perfect oval face, with pure, regular features, large, languishing eyes with heavy fringed lashes, and the ripe red lips and pearly teeth, made up the charming counterpart of the fair Doña Maria de Montana. The señorita was tired, being so dull, and longed for some event, some excitement.

Suddenly she saw a young man, very pale and of interesting appearance, leaning against a tree in the Plaza opposite, and evidently looking at the passers-by. He was dressed in black, wearing a long cloak and high Spanish hat with a long feather. Doña Maria thought it strange that in such weather any sane man should wear such a long, heavy cloak, and she sighed and fanned herself at the mere thought. Recovering her composure she looked again at the young man. He was pacing up and down the street in a nervous, agitated sort of manner, and stopping at the different stalls from time to time, closely inspecting the features of the different girls, sometimes even so much as touching them.

It seemed to Doña Maria that he must be having some coarse jest, or impudent proposal, for the young women always laughed and drew back, and the young man himself seemed dissatisfied, to judge by the expression of his face and the continual shaking of his head.

"Is it not lamentable," she said to her maid, "that so fine looking a young man should act in such a way?"

The maid nodded assent in a nonchalant way, and suggested he might be a little wrong in his head.

Doña Maria still continued to watch the young man. At last he stopped before another young girl, looked all over her face, and examined her features minutely, even so much as slightly raising her chin, as if to caress her, but she laughingly drew away from him.

He then purchased a small quantity of fruit from her, but at the same time they seemed to be making a bargain of another nature, judging by the motions of their heads and hands.

"Isn't it awful?" said Doña Maria, and Clarissa, the maid, laughed saucily and shrugged her pretty shoulders, and suggested to the mistress that the chocolate was quite hot and delicious and waiting her pleasure. But Doña Maria maintained her seat, her eyes fixed on the pantomime below.

When the young man had finished his bargain he slowly walked off as if in a deep and painful reverie, always followed by Doña Maria's eyes. Before he rounded the corner of the street he turned, nodded to the young girl, and held up his right hand with the fingers extended, and she nodding in turn smiled back to him.

"I wonder who he is?" cried Doña Maria.

"So do I," said Clarissa, "but he may come back again to-morrow."

"Oh, I do not care about what he does," said Doña Maria. "Come, Clarissa, I will take my chocolate, but oh, how warm it is!"

But Doña Maria could not wholly banish the fine, sad face of the singular man, who acted so strangely in the street; and his high hat and feather, dejected visage, and long cloak even figured in her dreams.

The next afternoon, after her usual siesta, Doña Maria took her seat again at the window behind the curtains, and looked toward the Plaza, secretly hoping that the young man would again make his appearance. The heat was subsiding, and the shadows cast by the high houses made a grateful shade in the hot streets. The Plaza was deserted—the streets were silent, the inhabitants having withdrawn to the cool retirement of their homes.

As the clock struck four the young man indeed made his appearance. Under his long, black cloak he seemed to carry some parcels, for the sides protruded rather ungracefully. On this occasion he did not honor any of the other women with his scrutinizing looks, but walked directly to the girl with whom he had spoken the day before, and when he reached her, directly in front of the residence of Doña Maria, he saluted her with a slight bow and a grave smile.

Doña Maria's heart beat violently; she bit her lips with her small pearl teeth, clasped her hands and slightly trembled. Jealous and angry, she felt she could have annihilated the pretty fruit seller.

"What is the matter?" exclaimed Clarissa, who had observed what passed in the mind of her mistress.

Doña Maria did not make any answer; but her eyes looked most intensely on the young couple below. The young man took his sword from its scabbard, and, with one well-directed stroke, he made it fast in the ground. He then took a piece of canvas from under his cloak, and, setting it against the sword, he thus made it perform the duty of an easel. He then knelt down before it, and put colors and brushes on the ground beside him. Doña Maria sighed deeply, with evident relief, and continued to gaze with renewed interest. She now understood that his object was to paint the pretty girl, and that he must be very poor indeed, as he did not even have an easel. Then she remarked his shabby attire, his pale, attenuated face, in which his eyes shone like two despairing souls; and, in her heart, she asked his forgiveness for all the evil she had thought of him the day before.

The painter commenced his work, and, the canvas being turned toward Doña Maria, she could see every stroke of the brush. There was painted already on the canvas the brown surplice and hood of a saint or Sister of Annunciation, but the head was wanting; and, from the position of the hood, Doña Maria thought that the head must be looking upward, in a posture of devotion, representing the ecstasy of adoration. The painter placed the young girl's head in several different positions, but seemed to have great difficulty to get it just as he wished. Indeed, the position he required was extremely difficult, as the head was to be thrown back and the eyes raised. At last he succeeded, and Doña Maria, from her perch above, trembled lest the fair neck should break. The young girl, who was in fact very beautiful, had thrown back her head to the farthest tension, and looked upward with an expression of such ecstatic devotion that she might have been taken for Saint Magdalena herself.

The painter worked a few moments in silence. Then he shook his head and seemed dissatisfied. Then he rose to his feet, took the pretty, rose-tinted chin in his hands, and gently moved the head, first in one position and then in another, but still with an anxious, distrustful look upon his pale, wearied face. For the first and second time she seemed willing to try and please him, and moved her head according to his directions; but when, for the third and fourth time, he adjusted her, and seemed to censure her for being restless, and spoke in a nervous, impatient way, her temper was touched; she grew angry, and became saucy and rude, and bade him leave her, saying she had already sat a good many times for painters, and they were gentlemen, and never found fault with her, and had paid her double what he offered, besides always buying her fruit; and praised her beauty, too, and had even copied her for Madonna's; whilst he, poor wretch, paid only five dollars, and did not buy any of her fruit, and had not said a pleasant word to her, and she would not get a stiff neck for his sake; and now she would remain in the way he last assigned her, and he might paint her or not paint her, as he chose, and she did not care.

He commenced again; but his hands trembled, his mind was apparently distracted and dissatisfied. The saucy little virago was scarcely now fit to represent a saint. At last he gave up his feeble efforts, packed up his things and walked dejectedly away.

Doña Maria had closely watched all his proceedings, and had wondered the whole time that he should have selected that girl as a model. At last, when she saw the painter give up his work in despair, pack up and move away, she said, in an excited way, to her maid: "You go at once, and follow him, and find out where he lives!" Clarissa hastened to do her mistress's bidding, glad of the opportunity to go out in the street and breathe the cool evening air. As Doña Maria looked again out of the window, she saw the painter just disappearing around the corner. Then she reflected how impulsively she had acted, and would have called to Clarissa to return, but it was too late; she had already passed from the house, and Doña Maria saw her go through the Plaza rapidly, following in the steps of the painter.

The sun had gone down, and the fruit women had left their stands. Twilight was creeping on slowly, and a freshening breeze was agitating the topmost branches of the trees. Doña Maria threw open wide her casement to enjoy the delicious air, and, more particularly, that she might have a better view of the street.

At last she saw Clarissa returning, and in another moment the girl was in the presence of her mistress.

"Have you discovered his lodgings?" she asked, nervously.

"Yes," said Clarissa, quite out of breath and exceedingly flushed, "and a pretty run the recreant has given me. If it had not been your command I would have given up the pursuit, for he went a long way through the remotest and meanest streets, and it was fortunate I had my veil, so that I could not be recognized in such a part of the city. And if he had entered his home by a door—but no, suddenly he stopped before a wall, and then seemed to vanish through a mere hole."

"Of course, you followed?"

"For heaven's sake!" answered the maid, smilingly; "I might have got in all right, but my patron Saint Clarissa alone knows in what state I might have come out."

Doña Maria made no further observations; she leaned back on her cushions, fingered her rosary, and seemed to be reflecting. At that moment dinner was announced, and Doña Maria, preceded by her maid, entered the grand saloon. There she dined with her mother, father, and two brothers, with proper state and ceremony, but through all the elegant courses and sparkling wines her beautiful fair brow was shadowed with a thoughtful, abstracted look.

Directly after returning to her room she called to Clarissa. "I want you to lead me to the house of the painter," she said, simply.

"For heaven's sake, what would you do?" exclaimed the maid, tragically. "You have done a great many imprudent things, for which I was reprimanded by your father, and for which I have nearly lost my place, but this would be the most foolish adventure of all, and, besides, I do not remember the way, and we would surely get lost in those small crossings."

"You know the way," said Doña Maria, in a tone which did not admit of contradiction; "and as for my father, I promise you shall not be dismissed."

She then went into an inner apartment, and soon after emerged dressed in black, and enveloped in a long velvet cloak with a hood, which entirely covered her. In her hand she carried a small lamp, and bidding Clarissa precede her, they left the house and entered the street, and although Clarissa protested that she was not sure of the way, she found it, nevertheless, very readily.

They passed through the Plaza del Oriente, and down the narrow streets, until they entered a deep lane overhung with huge aloes. This brought them, in half an hour, to the desolated monastery, and a little farther on they stood before the formidable wall. In the centre of it was a small archway, through which, in order to enter, one must stoop quite low. Doña Maria bent her graceful form and soon disappeared through the opening, notwithstanding the passionate remonstrances of her maid, who was obliged, of course, to follow. The archway led into a quiet court-yard with grass growing between the stones, and surrounded by quaint little buildings with window mouldings and parapets of stone. Doña Maria lighted her little lamp, and proceeded to move cautiously through the yard. Twilight had deepened into night, she could see the shadow of the grina old church rising weirdly and unnaturally in the gloom, and her heart began to sink when she realized her position, alone in the night, at that strange place. At the extreme end of the court-yard she saw the feeble glimmer of a light. She approached it, and the ragged edges of an old red silk curtain half revealed the dreariness of the apartment and the dark shadow of a form within. Doña Maria turned to her maid and said:

"This is the place; you will remain outside, wait two hours, and I will join you."

She then approached the door with trembling limbs; she came to a small corridor, and, turning to the right, found the room of the painter. With her hand on the latch she stopped, while her heart beat loud and fast as the imprudence and daring of her act rushed upon her. What if the painter was not a gentleman? What if her relations or friends should ever hear of this night's adventure? Her reputation would be damaged irreparably, or would she not at least be looked upon and laughed at as a fool? Then she thought again that perhaps she had been inspired by her patron saint, and she would surely protect her.

Encouraged by this last thought, she grasped the lamp more firmly, opened the door, and stood in the presence of the painter. He was sitting in deep dejection before the empty canvas, his head thrown back against the wall, his eyes closed, and a death-like pallor over his finely formed face. By the light of the lamp Doña Maria saw that the head of the pretty fruit-girl was gone from the canvas; it was blank. The young man was so absorbed in his gloomy thought and ill-success that he had not heard the light footfall of the lady, so she stood for some moments and examined with keen interest his fine features, his noble forehead, and the expression of deep despondency which had settled over his whole face and figure, and her heart filled with sympathy and love. At last she spoke.

LET'S DING THE POOR TEACHERS.

At the first sound of her voice he started from his reverie, sprang to his feet, grasped his sword, pushed back the heavy hair from his forehead, and then, overcome by what seemed to him a heavenly apparition, he sunk upon his knees.

"Señor," she said, "I am sent to serve you as a model; so rise and paint. You must not ask any questions, and you must finish the picture in the next two hours, and by the light of this lamp which I hold in my hand, and never, after I am gone, must you touch the picture again."

The bell in the cathedral struck the hour.

"You hear the bell," she said; "when it strikes the midnight hour, I am gone."

Doña Maria then stepped forward and knelt on a small prie-dieu that was standing near the canvas, set the lamp on one end next to a prayer-book, and, throwing her head slightly back, looked heavenward. By the back movement of her head the heavy masses of hair fell to the ground and enveloped her like a veil, framing the most exquisite face that painter had ever dared to conceive. His soul seemed to pass out of him in adoration. He again sank upon his knees and looked at her in silence, making the sign of the cross, until she turned her eyes back to him and bade him begin. This seemed to electrify him. He seized his brush, and, on his knees, commenced to paint her marvelous beauty. He seemed inspired; his face lighted with a glow of radiant enthusiasm; and, as he worked, he prayed and worshiped, and every stroke was a perfecting touch.

Doña Maria, at first, had been rather inclined to view the romantic adventure as a little jest of her own, entered upon to incite the ardor and skill of the unknown artist, and still more to confirm the confidence she felt in her own personal charms; but, as the moments passed by, and she was compelled to retain that saintly position, she became startled at the thought of her being so sacrilegious as to dare to affect to represent a saint, with her heart full of sinful vanity. Then she grew alarmed at her long absence from home, and a great trembling and weariness came over her whole form; and especially her head and neck, from the great strain, ached bitterly. She felt herself sinking and nigh to fainting. Then she prayed most fervently and devoutly to her saint, that she would sustain her and strengthen her sinking body, so that the picture might be finished and be the means of elevating some souls to heaven. The feelings of anguish, and bodily pain, and absolute devotion, she felt in those two hours made her face rapt in its ecstatic adoration, so that the painter, in gazing upon it, really thought it was a spiritual apparition sent by heaven, and his veins tingled with the blood which coursed as fire through his whole frame.

The two hours passed away; the bell struck twelve; the picture was finished. Doña Maria rose and walked slowly to the door, carrying in her hand the lamp. At the threshold she stopped, smiled sweetly and wearily at the young man, and stepped out into the night, leaving him in darkness. But it seemed to him the whole room was still light, as if a great effulgent radiance was around the picture. He sunk upon his couch—his eyes still resting upon the beautiful face—and at last, body and soul exhausted with excitement and pain, he slept.

When he awoke, he thought the whole occurrence a dream. The sun was shining brightly through the red curtain, and the birds, who had built their little nests in the courtyard, were singing at his window. He turned to his canvas. There, indeed, was the picture—his saint, his divinity, his heavenly apparition.

From that day his soul was filled with it, he lived alone in its light and beauty. It absorbed him. He dreamed of it at night, and all the day he paced the streets wishfully gazing up at the houses, in the half-frenzied hope of seeing the material form of the mysterious, to him supernatural, model. Aye, it was more than hope, it was to him conviction, that he would at some time, for once at least, behold its living image. But his hopes were vain. Day by day his health and spirits visibly declined. He grew more and more melancholy, and utterly forsook the world. He determined to dedicate himself to the priesthood. He devoted himself to study. He took the vows and entered a holy order and in a short time was ordained a priest. A small chapel was given him near the Plaza del Oriente.

Here he remained some years, rooming in a small dormitory attached to the church. The door of communication always remained open. Here, when not actually engaged in the sacred duties of his order, he spent his time reading and meditating, and occasionally painting sacred pictures for the churches. He never appeared outside the chapel grounds. Over the altar of the chapel he had placed his own sacred piece, before which he had a light burning day and night.

A small silver lamp, suspended by a silver chain, hung just above it, casting a subdued halo over its angelic features. Before this picture he knelt and prayed most devoutly, and often in the late hours of night he lay prostrate before it consumed by his unearthly affection. When he entered his room, he always left the door ajar so that he could hear any one that came into the church. He was still convinced that his saint would some day appear to him, and although he grew paler and weaker each day, from fasting and midnight vigils, and the damp confinement of the chapel, until he was reduced to a mere spiritual form, he still continued praying and watching, and whenever he heard a foot-fall in the church, he would appear at the door, ever hoping it might be she, never despairing of seeing her. The morning which followed Doña Maria's adventure with the painter there might have been seen on the read leading from Madrid to Barcelona a gorgeous cavalcade of about thirty cavaliers and ladies. Riding in front, a little in advance, on gayly caparisoned horses, were Doña Maria and her noble father, the Count Philip de Montana. Doña Maria looked pale and anxious. The events of the night filled her mind, and still caused her heart to beat with unwonted activity.

She was going on a visit to the estates of her cousin, Don Alphonso, one of the richest nobles of the kingdom, who had extended to herself and father, and some near relatives, an invitation to visit and remain with him until the heat of the season was over. His residence was a marvel of Moorish art. On a high cliff, overlooking the sea, when bathed in the golden glory of the sunset, it rose like a palace of fairies. Its gorgeous colorings, its unique ornaments, and gilded arches and marble columns, made it surely a fit habitation for the lovely girl, whose sad, dreamy eyes, as they approached, rested upon it in deep thought and abstraction. Don Alphonso rode by her side. His fine bay horse, under his silver-mounted saddle, with cloth of Moorish mantle striped with gold and deep fringed with scarlet, shining resplendent in the sun, looked conscious of his dignity and station. They rode gayly, in all the beauty and bloom of youth. They had known each other from childhood, and were, in fact, betrothed from their infancy. They were deeply attached to each other, and the year of their nuptials was arranged. But during the whole period of Doña Maria's visit to her cousin and betrothed, in the midst of her magnificent surroundings, the sad beautiful face of the strange painter haunted her, filled her soul, and clouded her happiness.

Three years had elapsed, and the bridal day of Doña Maria had arrived. It was arranged that the marriage should be celebrated at Madrid, in her father's palace. The grandest preparations had been made. The great banquetting hall was magnificently prepared, and everything was in readiness for the great event. The evening before the wedding day Don Alphonso left the Count's palace to be absent a few hours. Doña Maria was left to herself, and as she was much wearied and excited by the events of the past few weeks, she suggested to her maid that they walk out in the evening air. Wrapping their veils closely about them, concealing their faces, they walked through the Grand Plaza, and to the street beyond. The air was fragrant with the perfume of orange blossoms, while the peals of bells from the convent on the summit blended softly with the nearer sound of a Spanish song, sung in the rich full tones of a man. The hour was entrancing. Lighted up by the sunset was a group of gypsies, gorgeous even in their rags.

A man in a striped mantle of many hues leaned languidly against one of the trees, and talked to a dark-eyed girl with scarlet blossoms in her hair. Against the sky loomed the glorious cathedral, in which Murillo's great painting lives forever, the "Angel de la Guarda," representing a beautiful seraph with spreading wings leading a little trustful child by the hand, and directing him to look beyond earth into the heavenly light.

All these scenes of her beloved city appealed strongly to the poetic mind of Doña Maria with an intense feeling of beauty, which was heightened by the charms of antiquity and the coloring of romance.

At this moment a bell solemnly tolled. It was the hour of the oracion. In an instant every voice was hushed; the horseman reined in his steed, the footman stood still, even the hum of the city seemed held in check as by an invisible power, the very air seemed to be hushed. Doña Maria and her maid bowed low their heads. After the moment passed, in a feeling of devotion which it inspired they approached the nearest chapel, hoping to be in time for the vesper service. A small church stood at the end of the street. They entered; Doña Maria, removing her veil, walked up the aisle and sunk down upon her knees at the altar. Raising her head in an attitude of devotion toward heaven, the altar-lamp shed its soft, dim light over her beautiful upturned face.

Suddenly a sharp, wild cry was heard in the quiet, solitary church. Doña Maria started and looked anxiously about her, and clasped her hands in fear. Above her head, for the first time, she saw the picture—the picture of herself. With startled eyes and heaving breast she stood transfixed, as if turned to marble. Some invisible hand seemed to hold her in a spell she could not break. Slowly she turned. At the inner door, leading to the sacristy, she beheld the painter. His countenance was death-like. With an unearthly gaze his eyes were fixed upon her. In that intense moment soul answered soul. Quickened to adore her, his soul shining through his eyes, he fell upon his knees at her feet, and looking with rapture into her face, murmured: "O strange delight! O infinite peace! why am I thus blessed!" Then over his sad, worn, yet beautiful face, fell a death-like pallor, and convulsively extending his hands as if to clasp her, he fell backward at the altar dead.

Morning in Madrid. The marble aisles of the grand cathedral are reverberating the triumphal notes of happy love. A procession of altar-boys and little girls in white, bearing lighted candles, pass up the great central aisle and pause before the altar. The colonnades are crowded with the beauty, youth, and fashion of the fair city. Glorious dark eyes, gay cavaliers, and pyramids of flowers, lend an indescribable glow and brilliancy to the scene. Murillo's altarpiece seemed endowed with life, from the reflection cast by the softening light of a myriad of candles. A great burst of joyful melody heralds the approach of the bride. Doña Maria, leaning on the arm of her father, white as her satin robe, and with an almost pulseless heart, slowly and mechanically moves up the aisle and stands before the altar. The hand that Don Alphonso holds is cold and lifeless, and a momentary chill passes over his happy heart, as he looks upon the statuesque and deathlike beauty of his bride. The intonations of the priest sound far away and unmeaning as the ceremonial words are spoken; the responses of one, at least, of the plighted are faint and mechanical, and as the wedded pair pass out of the great cathedral, the old arched portals, could they have spoken, would have said, "a sadder or more melancholy bride ne'er passed out here before."

SAN FRANCISCO, Sept. 10, 1878.

LOTUS.

Bill of Fare for Six Persons.—Sunday, September 15, 1878.

Madras Mullagatawney.
Muskmelon.
Fried Baracouta, Mashed Potatoes.
Beef a la Mode.
Asparagus. Baked Egg Plant.
Roast Chicken, Currant Jelly.
Artichokes.
Apple Snow-balls. Raspberries.
Fruit-bowl of Figs, Grapes, Pears, Plums, Gages, Peaches, and Apples.

To MAKE APPLE SNOW-BALLS.—Boil some rice ten minutes; drain and let it cool. Pare and core some large apples without dividing them. Spread the rice on some darning cloth, tie the fruit (surrounded by the rice) separately in these, and boil three quarters of an hour.

SALAD.—A little butter and sugar mixed to a cream; a spoonful of corn-starch cooked in two cupfuls of boiling water; flavor to taste.

You may gather a rich harvest by reading, but thought is the winnowing machine.

There is a want of funds in the education board. Something must be done to curtail expenses. But the higher officials, who get $200 a month, and the exceptional teachers, who might well be spared, will not stand any reduction. So the brilliant device is adopted of obliging the inferior teachers to contribute each a half month's salary to make up the deficiency.

Now see how this works! Here is a poor female teacher, who has to support several children, and has $60 a month. Reducing her down to $30 for this month is equivalent to starvation.

Forty years ago there was a similar scheme of retrenchment in the Church of England. But, as no one thought of touching the revenues of the bishops, the proposition was to victimize the inferior clergy—to cut down the salaries of the deans and canons of the cathedrals (are our Solons copying this scheme?). Then it was that Sidney Smith, the celebrated wit, himself a canon of St. Paul's Cathedral, published the following imaginary scrap of mediæval history, which we commend to the Board of Education:

"There was a great meeting of all the clergy at Dordrecht, and the chronicler thus describes it, which I give in the language of the translation: 'And there was great store of bishops in the town, in their robes goodly to behold; and all the great men of the state were there, and folks poured in in boats on the Meuse, the Merve, the Rhine, and the Linge, coming from the Isle of Beverlandt and Isselmond, and from all quarters in the Bailiwick of Dort; Armenians and Comarists, with the friends of John Barneveldt and of Hugh Grote. And before my lords the bishops, Simon of Gloucester, who was a bishop in those parts, disputed with Vorstius and Leoline the monk, and many texts of scripture were bandied to and fro.'

"And when this was done, and many propositions made, and it waxed toward twelve of the clock, my lords the bishops prepared to set them down to a fair repast, in which was great store of good things, and among the rest a roasted peacock, having in lieu of a tail the arms and banners of the archbishop, which was a goodly sight to all who favored the church. And then the archbishop would say a grace, as was seemly to do, he being a very holy man; but ere he had finished a great mob of townspeople and folks from the country, who were gathered under the window, cried out, 'Bread, bread!' for there was a great famine, and wheat had risen to three times the ordinary price. And when they had done crying, 'Bread, bread!' they called out, 'No bishop!' and began to cast up stones at the windows; whereat my lords the bishops were in a great fright, and cast their dinners out of the windows to appease the mob; and so the men of that town were well pleased, and did devour the meats with a great appetite.

"And then you might have seen my lords standing with empty plates and looking wistfully at each other, till Simon, of Gloucester, he who had disputed with Leoline, the monk, stood up and said: 'Good, my lords, is it your pleasure to stand here fasting, and that those who count lower in the church than you do should fast and fluster? Let us order to us the dinner of the Deans and Canons, which is making ready for them in the chamber below?' And this speech of Simon of Gloucester pleased the bishops much; and so they sent for the host, one William, of Ypres, and told him it was for the public good, and he, much fearing the bishops, brought them the dinner of the deans and canons. And so the deans and canons went away without dinner, and were pelted by the men of the town, because they had not put any meat out of the windows like the bishops. And when the Count came to hear of it he said it was a pleasant conceit, and that the bishops were right cunning men, and had dinged the canons well."

Is not this piece of history apposite to the subject? We leave the Board of Education to run out the parallel.

Pony Glasses of French Brandy.

Une belle femme qui a les qualités d'un honnête homme est ce qu'il y a au monde de plus délicieux; l'on trouve en elle tout le mérite des deux sexes.—La Bruyère.

C'est le jouir et non le posséder qui rend heureux.—Montaigne.

L'amour est un plaisir qui nous tourmente, mais ce tourment fait plaisir.—Scribe.

La petite vérole est la bataille de Waterloo des femmes. Le lendemain elles connaissent ceux qui les aiment véritablement.—Balzac.

PHILOSOPHIE D'UN BOHEMIEN.

Je donne à l'oubli le passé,
Le présent à l'indifférence,
Et pour vivre déarrassé,
L'avenir à la Providence.

Une amie de Madame Scarron lui exprimait un jour son étonnement de lui avoir vu épouser un mari aussi laid que le sien.—Madame, lui répondit-elle, les amants doivent être toujours de beaux hommes, les maris comme il plaît à Dieu.

C'est en apprenant la musique que beaucoup de jeunes cœurs apprennent l'amour.

AVIS.

Je vous le donne
Ce petit avis en secret,
Si votre cœur n'est à personne,
Et que mon cœur soit votre fait,
Je vous le donne.

Le radicalisme n'est que le désespoir de la logique.—La murine.

Pour connaître l'eau, il faut remonter à la source.—Pro-verbe persan.

La bégueule est à la femme vertueuse ce que le tartuffe est au dévot.

La prude est la bégueule de bonne foi, plus bête qu'hypocrite.

Lorsque les femmes vont au spectacle, elles s'habillent moins pour voir que pour être vues.

J'ai vu des demoiselles de vingt-cinq ans affecter une naïveté enfantine qui m'a fait douter de leur vertu.

NOTICE.

The Argonaut is published every Saturday, at No. 322 California Street, by the Argonaut Publishing Company.
 Rates of Subscription: $2 per year, in advance; $2.25, three months; $1.50, six months; postage prepaid. City subscribers served for 35 cents per week. Single copies, 10 cents.
 Address all communications to The Argonaut, 322 California Street, San Francisco.
 A. P. STANTON, Business Manager.

THE ARGONAUT.

FRANK M. PINNEY, /
 FRED. M. SOMERS, / Editors.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 14, 1878.

SOMETHING BETTER THAN SIERRA NEVADA.

It is here respectfully but firmly announced that on next Friday afternoon there will be issued—as “a flyer”—from this office 10,000 shares of stock of “The Wildest Speculation Company Unlimited.” Each certificate issued will have attached an exhibit containing hundreds of sketches illustrative of the stock excitement—scenes in the Boards, on the street, and caricatures of prominent brokers and heavy operators. “Take in a few shares at bedrock prices.”

Between the two great English-speaking nations—the greater and the lesser Britain, America being in extent of territory and in population the larger—it is natural that there should be great rivalry. As England is in everything that constitutes real greatness our superior, it is doubtless natural that we, conscious of our inferiority, should constantly declare the superiority of our institutions, and boast of the grander destiny that awaits us. It is the younger rooster that ever crows the loudest. It is because we are Englishmen so recently descended from English parentage that our boastings may be regarded as somewhat pardonable. We may at least claim that this tendency to estimate ourselves at our full value is a transmitted inheritance, and charge to our ancestral race this transmitted weakness. What should make our vanity, or its display, more endurable to our European friends is, that the first and loudest claim we make to superiority is based upon the fact that we are of English descent. To quote from a former article in the ARGONAUT: “It is true ethnologically, and true in every sense, that an American speaking generally—is nothing but a transplanted Englishman. In seventy-five per cent. of the people of this country there is not a globule of blood that is not English. The glories of England are our glories. She can achieve nothing that our fathers did not help to make possible to her. The learning, the power, the refinement of a great nation, are not the growth of a century, but of many centuries; each generation builds upon the work of the preceding. For untold ages our ancestors wrought to rear that splendid pile, the civilization of England. And shall we now try to belittle the mighty structure because other though kindred hands are laying the top courses while we have elected to found a new tower in another land? The American who is not proud of his part in England's glory is unworthy to enjoy his lesser heritage in the lesser glory of his own country.”

It is but two centuries and a half of time since from out the thronged and teeming island-hive our forefathers began to find their way across the ocean. It is but little more than an hundred years that, as an independent nation, we have cut loose from the crown, and laws, and social habits of the motherland. In laying aside the crown, we preserved the essence of its power, discarding only the bauble and the head that bore it. English laws we did preserve, and built upon, as the very foundation of the fabric of the government we reared. The social habits, religious views, tastes, literature, and language we have maintained and imitated, so that to-day we are essentially English as are the English themselves, and we even boast that in many parts of our country the language is written and spoken with greater purity than in many parts of the United Kingdom.

Our forefathers thought that in severing their allegiance from the throne, and in planting broad and deep the foundations of another government in another continent, they had made a wise improvement in establishing a republican instead of a monarchical form. The experience of a century of time has demonstrated that they were partly right and partly wrong. Right in thinking that an intelligent people is qualified to select from its number officers to execute the laws of to govern; right in saying that no family has divine or other claim to be first in a free State, or to be maintained at public expense. Wrong, we fear, in declaring that only age, sex, and color should limit the elective privilege and the exercise of sovereign power; wrong, we fear, in so liberally extending invitations to immigrants from other nationalities, and making citizenship so easy of attainment; wrong, perhaps, in the liberality of laws that secure to every trial—criminal and civil—the intervention of a jury; clearly wrong in an abuse that has grown upon the country, in permitting an elective judiciary. If we had kept nearer to the example of England's institutions, and had not so widely departed from the formulas of her government, it might have been better for us. As in learning and letters, in art and the science of government, America is but the faint and stumbling echo of England, so, perhaps, it had been well if we had adhered more nearly to the constitution and laws of England in the reign of George the Third, and had not adopted French Democracy, with the wide-bottomed pantaloons introduced by Jefferson from France.

For nearly all that is good in our American civilization we are indebted to England; the errors and mischiefs are of our own creation. We have originated little, because there is little to originate, but we have unconsciously reproduced many of the discredited and abandoned systems of former ages and other countries—receiving them at second hand, but making them ours by the sheer strength and immobility of the national belief in their newness; for it is not possible to make an experiment in government, in art, in literature, in sociology, or in morals, that has not been made over, and over, and over again. That the English are our intellectual superiors is due not to the superior mind, but to the superior opportunity. An hundred years of national growth may not expect to compete with nine centuries of national development. Our institutions of learning are new; their shingle roofs, scarcely covered with the mosses and lichens of age, may not compare with those splendid seats of learning, Oxford and Cambridge, the very names of whose founders is lost in the twilight of history, and we may feel no embarrassment in admitting that our scholars, in the sum of their learning and the scope of their achievements, have not accomplished results to compare with those of England.

Based upon the political and social system of England, there has grown up a caste, an aristocracy of wealth, of leisure, of intellect. There may be serious disadvantages attending the laws of primogeniture and entail. There may be wrongs and inconveniences attending a house of hereditary law-makers, whose dignity is maintained by entailed properties; but there are certain compensations and advantages in a system under which all important trusts—political and professional, civil and military, ecclesiastical and secular—are held by educated men; that is, by men of trained faculties and disciplined judgment—and in England that is what we see. The government is composed of university men; the army and navy are officered by university men. University men sit in Parliament, and university men make the newspapers. To compare our public men with those of similar positions in England will illustrate the mistake made by the founders of the government in not limiting the elective privilege. As the stream can rise no higher than its source, so the ministerial, the legislative, and the judicial functions of our government will soon find themselves in the hands of men of average intellect and average honesty with those who elect them. This standard of intelligence and integrity is growing lower and lower every year in our republic.

Such considerations as these—comparing our government with that of England—will thrust themselves upon thinking men, when we contemplate the character of the class which is now a growing power in our land, and note the men it is evolving as the oracles of its principles and the prophets of its intentions. We look with alarm and anxiety upon this drifting away from the landmarks that we have hitherto kept in view. Our President is either an available, or an accident; our Senate is gradually sinking from its former dignity, patriotism, and intelligence; our House of Representatives no longer represents even the average of the national capacity and integrity. We can not truthfully say that, as a rule, our officials are honest and faithful. We are not without well-founded suspicions that integrity is the exception at the national capital. We make these suggestions, comparing our government and its institutions with those of England, with no hint of questioning the general superiority of a republican form of government. We are not blind to the imperfections, corruptions, and extravagance of monarchical institutions, but we can not refrain from thinking that there are many things in the government of England that we will do well to consider, with a view of retracing our steps to the point from which the fathers of our republic mistakenly took their departure.

One thing is most noticeable, that the best minds in America are not devoted to public affairs. The best of the trained intellects of the country, the most highly educated, turn their attention to some other service than that of the state, leaving lower minds and those not possessing the higher qualifications to engage in politics. We do not lack men of superior training, and of the very highest acquirements in point of learning. We see them in professional life, noticeably at the bar, and not so often upon the bench, because the honors and rewards of the bar are greater than those of the bench. A life-long service in an ill-paid judicial position may leave but lingering years of poverty after the service is done. At the head of business affairs, directing great enterprises, managing railroads, banks, and steam fleets, and in financial positions, we see in America the ablest and strongest men; but they make no effort to attain the dignities and honors of public service because they feel that it is not an honor to secure the very highest of the leading places in our government. There are men in San Francisco and all over the nation who would scorn to exchange their private positions for the very highest place in the service of the government. The result is, that meaner minds climb to the top, where, in the language of Catiline, they “hang hissing” at the nobler men below.

We recall to our minds two incidents illustrative of the different degrees of consideration accorded to our great men in the past and present time. There was a time in the history of our country when to be Governor of a State, member of the House of Representatives, or member of the Senate of the United States, was a distinguished honor, entitling the incumbent to the highest consideration of his fellow-citizens. Now, alas! except in the political circle, these positions carry with them but little honor. The incidents to which we refer are connected with the lives of Daniel Webster and Henry Clay: Now nearly fifty years ago it was announced that Daniel Webster would journey by stages through New York, stopping at the prominent villages. He was a guest at our father's house. The country gentlemen for miles around came pouring in to pay him their respects; and we shall never forget the awe and veneration with which as a boy we looked upon this wonderful and honored man. Later, Henry Clay passed through New York State. His was a triumphal procession throughout the North, in which scholars, men of wealth, and gentlemen vied with each other to pay him respect. Now, Rutherford Hayes, the President of a commonwealth of 40,000,000 people, goes junketing around the country, stopping at county fairs, making small speeches from the tail-board of a railroad car, and no one, save he who has an office or wants one, unless for curiosity, pays him the compliment of going to the depot to see the train pass. A cabinet officer visits San Francisco, and the press urges us to give him a reception “because he is the first cabinet officer that ever visited this coast,” and we are in hopes that he will build us a post-office upon Portsmouth Square.

In two other particulars we contrast our government with that of England, and not to our advantage. To the Parliament of England a constituency may send any representative who is a subject of the realm, no matter in what part of the kingdom he may reside. Thus a distinguished scholar, thinker, writer, or orator, may be chosen to represent any constituency in the council of the nation. In America we may choose a United States Senator, member of Congress, member of Assembly, or Supervisor only from the State, district, precinct, or ward in which he may reside. If Gladstone, Disraeli, Lord Salisbury, and the Marquis of Huntingdon lived at San Francisco only one would be eligible to the Assembly of California. In all other countries except that of the United States, to have filled a public position acceptably is a claim for its retention. In England the Premier may hold his power so long as the wisdom of the realm indorses his intelligence, his wisdom, his patriotism, and his political policy. A member of Parliament who has illustrated his fitness by his learning, his eloquence, or his industry, may expect to be retained. In the diplomatic service success and qualifications are the certain claims to advancement. The faithful public servant may die in the public employment, or be pensioned in advanced old age or declining powers. The subordinate rests in the assurance that if he does his duty he will hold his place. In America we are in the never-ending, never-ceasing scramble and clamor for place. Rotation in office is the worm at the root of our institutions. “To the victors belong the spoils” is a vile tradition that saps the very foundations of our government. Party spirit runs high in England. Great men, great intellects strive for power. Parliament divides upon questions of national policy, party strife and party rancor shows itself upon the hustings; but only in America does a change of administration lead to an entire out-turning of every clerk and tide-water laborer in public employment, thus disturbing all the routine and detail of official business and proclaiming to the official incumbent the necessity of stealing, in order to indemnify himself for the cost of the past election and the expenses of the next.

We visited El Dorado County this last week attending the agricultural fair. It is a magnificent county. Outside of California there is no land in the world that produces such fruit. Dried fruit is to the thermal belt that runs through our foot-hills a source of inexhaustible wealth. All this region needs is a market, enterprise, industry, and patience. We shall write at length of this county in our next issue.

PRATTLE.

"The genuine drama," says the Call's theatrical reporter, "is better appreciated in this city than any where else in America. This may sound like self-praise, but it is the honest testimony of managers." I know an honest manager who says that the genuine drama is better appreciated in Fat Squaw Cañon than it is in San Francisco. But he manages a theatre in Fat Squaw Cañon, and his judgment has perhaps a local bias from which that of San Francisco honest managers is conspicuously free. Indeed, I know of his opinion only through the village vanity of the theatrical reporter of the Fat Squaw Cañon War-whoop.

The Kearney party (says a telegram) spent the day at Coney Island, strolling on the beach and bathing in the surf.

Across the hills of Darien
A look the Atlantic threw,
And sighed to the Pacific then:
"Would I could bathe in you."

"Why," said the greater flood, "that's queer;
What for?" The lesser sea Replied: "'Tis necessary, dear,
For Kearney bathed in me."

Master Charles Owen has composed another song—'Tis Only in My Dreams. 'Tis only in mine that I am at Master Charlie's mercy; in them his song pursues me like the neighing of a nightmare.

"The writer of this article knows his own mind," concludes an irritable and abusive contemporary. That is not enough to prevent my getting the pull on him; he must also mind his own nose.

No woman living in a country where polygamy is forbidden by law can intelligently consider the various statutes affecting her happiness, and honestly aver that through masculine selfishness the balance is against her. If monogamy has any other basis than man's voluntary self-denial, I do not know what it is.

A lot in our graveyard has been, says the press,
Set apart for Chinese interments;
And justice compels us now to confess
Too strong were some former aversions.

'Twas said no good landlord would give them a lease,
But let us allow, as a penance,
For some kinds of real estate the Chinese
Are very desirable tenants.

Following are sample definitions from an unpublished dictionary for which (in behalf of the author) I am ready to receive subscriptions: "Love, the folly of thinking much of another before one knows anything of oneself." "Courtship, the timid sipping of two thirsty souls from a goblet which both can easily drain but neither replenish." "Marriage, a feminine device for imposing silence, whereby one woman is made to guard the good name of a dozen others." "Divorce, a resumption of diplomatic relations and rectification of boundaries."

Mr. William D. Pollock's poetic work is like the liver of Prometheus—constantly devoured, yet constantly reproduced. As long as he is read he will write, as long as he writes there will be fools to read him. His latest delivery in a Sunday paper was intended to inculcate the divine virtues of conjugal tenderness and forbearance. Its mechanical construction (each line broken in halves and made into two, as if to convey the impression that he is paid by the line, when we all know that his rates are ten cents per idea and he has never made sixpence) may be best set forth by the following far and feeble imitation:

Be kind to Bill Pollock,
The gentle bard, clinging
With tooth and toe-nail
To his harp for his life;
Be patient through trials
And bear with his singing,
Discharging your feelings
By kicking your wife.

It is easier and more agreeable to converse with a woman than with a man, for you may say what you will; you have only to consider how you say it. Pleasing her with the manner of your discourse you may please yourself with its matter.

President Hayes' Minnesota speech is to be printed and distributed as a "campaign document," to the disadvantage of publishers who have it already in type as a preface of a cookery book, and the unspeakable disgust of the man who wrote it some years ago as an introductory chapter to The Sunday-School Hoyle.

Says the Memphis Avant-lanche: "Many a hand in Memphis will refuse to again touch that of John Donovan, who allowed his wife and children to perish alone." And many a hand which refuses to touch that of John Donovan will have no particular aversion to John Donovan's pocket.

When Man and Woman had been made,
All save the disposition,
The Devil to the workshop strayed,
And somehow gained admission.

The Master rested from his work,
For this was on a Sunday,
The Man was snoring like a Turk,
Content to wait till Monday.

"Too bad!" the Woman cried; "Oh, why
Does slumber not benumb me?
A disposition! Oh, I die
To know if 'twill become me!"

The Adversary said: "No doubt
'Twill be extremely fine, ma'am,
Though sure 'tis long to do without—
I beg to lend you mine, ma'am."

The Devil's disposition when She'd got, of course she wore it,
For she'd no disposition then,
Nor has now, to restore it.

A friend of mine called, the other day, at the house of a lady of fashion who to considerable beauty added a rare talent for adorning it. Knowing she had been for some time seriously ill, he was as much surprised as delighted when the French maid, who had carried up his card and his tender inquiries, returned and said: "If monsieur will be so good as to wait a little half hour, madame will have the happiness to see him and say au revoir. Madame is dressing." "What! is she so soon able to go out?" "O no, monsieur, the doctor will not permit; madame is dressing for death."

Colonel Travers in his Admission Day oration (which, by the way, seems to have been cruelly cut out of a struggling newspaper) showed a genius for poetical misquotation such as not one colonel in a million is gifted withal; but when he tackled his own verses he had the civility to give them correctly. For example:

"The future, 'tis the promised land
To which hope points with prophetic hand,
Telling it is the fairy land of flowers,
That only changes but for fruits."

On the whole, I think I like Colonel Travers better when he is thanking God in sober prose "that we are no longer slaves and vassals under the domination of cruel and rapacious feudal lords;" although I am myself so basely unaware of the advantages of the present régime that I would willingly exchange any quantity of our present oppressors, the orators and poets, for marauding barons, in the proportion of one fool for a dozen robbers.

I should like, however, to keep Mr. Dan O'Connell, whose poem followed Colonel Travers' oration. In fifty lines of metrical prose he generously gave us two of poetry—

"To where the sun, at eve descending, burned
On stranger shores and unfamiliar seas."

Of a young poet who can score two out of a possible fifty—and who therefore needs not despair of being able some day to score three—it may be truly said, in the noble words of Colonel Travers: "The future is before him."

Mrs. Theresa Corlett also "raised the song" on Admission Day, but her verses seem to have been prudently withheld from publication. Some months ago this excellent lady gathered up a double-fistful of pin-back, aspired to the skymost peak of Parnassus and straddled it like a man. Apparently she did not find it a downy seat, and has descended to borrow a saddle. This rhyming is a "dreadful trade," anyhow, like that of gathering samphire, as mentioned by Shakspeare. There is this difference: the man who gathered samphire was "hanging," whereas the rhymers only deserves to hang.

One of the speakers, a journalist, at Platt's Hall, on Wednesday evening, delivered an address on the "The Freedom of the Press," which a morning journal epitomized as follows: "A free press is the foundation of republican government, and the bulwark of a free people, and when it is curbed by such laws as those in France the liberties of the people are in danger." That is a faultless crystallization of what may be called the editorial religion—nothing added, nothing omitted. It is the Thirty-nine Articles of the newspaper faith, expounded by one of its prelates, and digested by a clerk in holy orders. It is a pretty bit of bosh, immodest, shoppy, and without a grain of saving sense. There is no such thing as "the press;" there are newspapers. Except as regards their mechanical characteristics they have nothing in common; to class them under a generic name with reference to their effect on popular liberty—whatever that may be—is as indocible and impotent nonsense as it would be to include sea-serpents and stop-watches under one comprehensive designation for convenience of considering their collective influence on atmospheric tides.

The influence of some newspapers on republican government is discernably good; that of the enormous majority conspicuously bad. Conducted by rogues and dunces for dunces and rogues, they are faithful to nothing but the follies and vices of our system, strenuously opposing every intelligent attempt at their elimination. They fetter the feet of wisdom, and stiffen the prejudices of the ignorant. They are sycophants to the mob, tyrants to the individual. They constitute a monstrous menace to organized society—a formidable peril to government of any kind; and if ever in America anarchy shall beg to introduce its dear friend despotism, we shall have to thank our vaunted "freedom of the press" as the controlling spirit of the turbulent time and Lord of Misrule. We may then be grateful, too, that, like a meteor consumed by friction of the denser atmosphere which its speed compressed, its brightest blaze will be its last. The despot whose path to power it illumed will extinguish it with a dash of ink.

The editorial "creed" above transcribed would have been imperfect without the "damnatory clause" concerning French repression of the liberty of the editorial conscience. It is a pretty general truth that where the press is free from control nobody is free from the press; and this has been notably the case in France, where every loosening of the rein is followed by a kick at the dash-board. No French government, royal, imperial, or republican, ever conceded anything to the demands of the newspapers for increased "liberty" without quick reason to repent the folly. Au reste, I do not believe that all French rulers have been besotted fools concerning the one thing on which they were agreed; and I take the liberty of the press to doubt that every self-instructed lout on this side the Atlantic, who begins life as an historiographer of dog fights and soars to be a "moulder of public opinion," could order things better in France by making them serve the supposed interests of a business which he fancies resembles his own.

In empty words all rites are ever ending,
Yet men perform them with a strict decorum:
Our legislative bodies, when attending
To some one's thievish business in the forum,
Still gravely "call the roll," although depending On lobby members for a (quid pro) quorum.

A jury of the French Exposition have refused an award for the phonograph, declaring it a toy which can never be of any practical value. There is respectable precedent for this verdict; persons now living remember a learned report of the British Lords of the Admiralty that steam could never be of any use in the royal navy. This, I believe, is the only mistake ever made in forecasting the future; though Bengel, who predicted that the Millennium would begin in 1836, Miller, who set it for 1843, and Dr. Cumming, who fixed the date twenty-three years farther forward, all had narrow escapes, so far at least as concerns San Francisco.

The Bulletin reported that Mr. Oscar Lewis had committed suicide. The statement was in so far true as that Mr. Lewis had invested his capital in the Tamalpais Hotel at San Rafael. But through the strange perverse fatality which, like a visible presence, haunts the Bulletin's editorial rooms and dogs the steps of its reporters, the statement was withheld until just as Mr. Lewis had given up the hotel—an event more in the nature of resurrection than of death. By the way, I think every landlord of the Tamalpais, having that hostelry in mind, can feelingly appreciate, and will thank me for quoting, these words of "Sir Davy Dunc" in Otway's Soldier of Fortune: "'Tis a damned house, that Swan—that Swan at Knightsbridge is a confounded house!"

How wonderfully has science lengthened the arm of benevolence.—Senator Sargent. That is so; charity may now begin abroad, at points so widely separate that one hand can not know even by telegraphic advices whose pocket the other hand is relieving.

In a lecture at the State University on Wednesday last Professor Pomeroy was pleased to urge the study of politics. "the noblest subject within our limits of comprehension." Let us, O brethren, begin with the politics of our own country and time—the statesmanship of the Here and Now. Let us, with lifted faces and considering eyes, explore "the political horizon" for grand and instructive examples in the science of government. Ah, rapture! what do we see? (Denis Kearney, you odious blackguard, take your carcass aside—you obstruct our view of "the noblest subject.") What, gentlemen, do we see? (Jim Anderson, Olympic liar, be good enough to sit, and leave off making a nose—you baffle the "finite comprehension.") I repeat, fellow students, what do we see? (Ben Butler, you radiant thief, will you never have done making protrusion of your paunch across the line of inquiry? Evanesce!) Really, my friends, it isn't any use to pursue this "noblest subject." The central figures of American contemporary politics are not transparent.

Advices from Washington are a little more favorable to the Republicans. Mr. George Gorham being asked what would probably be the effect of a defeat of the Austrian forces in Bosnia, and the capture of Vienna by the insurgents, replied that his duties had not left him as much time to consider the matter as its importance required, but it was not impossible (here a gleam which the inquirer interpreted as one of hope irradiated Mr. Gorham's face) that it might result in the election of a Republican clerk by the next United States Senate.

The lady who knows herself an execrably bad singer has not as yet volunteered to take the leading part in a "vocal entertainment" for the benefit of the suffering S. & C. Her excuse is that audiences are not charitable.

TOLD IN LETTERS.

Domestic Fact and Fashionable Fancy.

MY DEAR EM.—On examining Liebes' new importation of furs and fur-lined wraps I found them even handsomer than I had thought at first glance. There are many most elegant cloaks among them, and several sacques that for beauty of material and make up could hardly be excelled. The silks used are of the best quality, and the fur lining, principally squirrel, exceedingly choice. Among the circular cloaks there is considerable diversity as to neck finishing; that is, some are furnished with fur-lined hoods, others with a narrow band of the fur, and loops, and ends of black ribbon at the back, the fastenings in front being heavy silver clasps. There is a very handsome one with a pointed hood of silk, ornamented with passementerie and ribbon loops; but the gem of all is a large, loose sacque of heavy silk, lined throughout with fur, and trimmed with a broad band of the black fox around the skirt and on the sleeves; a broad, round collar of the same finishes the neck. $140 is the price of it. I am told several of the handsomest have already been sold at the Palace and at Baldwin's. Seal skins, of course, are standard favorites. The sacques this year are larger and closer fitting than ever, consequently much handsomer, for the more snug the fit the less clumsy do all heavy goods appear, particularly furs. Real beauties, with rich passementerie fastenings and quilted linings, come from $125 to $250. The dolman in seal skin is more expensive, but is sufficiently stylish to warrant the extra price to those who find this garment becoming. Very handsome samples of fur trimmings were received at the same time, and Mr. Liebes tells me that they will be much worn, particularly the lynx, black fox, and a yellowish-brown fur that will be used to trim the heavy cuir colored beaver cloths, and even lighter goods in suitings. Being just across the street from Shreve's, what could I do but run over and take a look at the pretty things there? The lovely lace-pins that every one is wearing now, or if not, wishing they had one to wear, would delight you. Artistic and grotesque fancy seems to have been taxed to the uttermost to invent new designs, and the consequence is a greater variety than I can hope to tell you of; but here are a few of them: A spray of wheat in mingled gold and frosted silver; a whip, the handle of onyx and the lash a fine thread of gold; a golden broom, and a dust-pan of the same precious metal—an excellent hint that to young ladies who are inclined to forsake the domestic circle for frivolous pleasures; a fishing rod and line, and underneath it a tiny basket of the most perfect braid work in gold, out of which, and from underneath the closed cover, a fish projects its head on one side and the tip of its tail on the other. Then there are whips and jockey caps, for lovers of the races; guns and cartridges, for military tastes; a bird on a branch; a shovel and a rake, as reminders of rural felicity; and all manner of notions in the plain bands set with pearls and other gems, mosaics, or of onyx studded with jewels. Something in the same line is a pair of sleeve buttons in the form of silver shovels with golden handles. A single pearl rests in each. In more expensive things the most popular just now are the intaglios, and the cameo and intaglio together, the former cut out of stone and considerably raised above the surface, and the latter which is the reflection, or shadow cut in it. Warrior heads or Minervas are often used as the design for these, and red cornelian the stone most liked. A beautiful example of this work is a mailed head set in plain gold for sleeve buttons, and a similar device, but intaglio alone, on five slender bars of gold, as a bosom pin. The pink onyx cuts in this way charmingly. An Elizabethan head in cameo, showing the rosy hues of the stone to great advantage, and an intaglio shadow, almost white, is a pretty sample. Another very elegant fancy is that of the Three Graces, set in pearls, as a brooch or pendant. It is a painting on copper, and the tiny figures are as perfect as life. Mr. Shreve's great specialty, articles made in the famous Gorham silver ware, makes his store the Mecca of wedding-gift hunters; I saw no less than four parties examining with that intention the few moments I was there. And then, the diamonds! It makes one sigh to be a millionaire a little while just to look at them. The authorities have decided on a new language of gems. Here it is: Jasper means faith; sapphire, hope; emerald, virginity; onyx, innocence; aquamarine, science; amethyst, humility; topaz, wisdom and firmness; sardonyx, martyrdom; and chrysolite, penitence. These are, some of them, the meanings expressed in the embroidery of the vestments of the early church, for, you remember, emerald symbolizes John, the beloved; jasper, Peter; onyx, Philip; amethyst, Matthew; and sapphire, Andrew. Ackerman, I see, has become the agent for the famous Austrian bent-wood furniture, that attracted so much attention at the Centennial. The strong point of it is, that besides being exceedingly light to lift and graceful in appearance, it is absolutely unbreakable, there being no ugly joints or seams to come apart at the slightest warming. The seats are all cane-work, and the wood which is brought from along the rivers on the borders of Bohemia, is stained a deep, rich brown, so that every article will harmonize with whatever color you may have in carpets or other furnishings. It is not expensive either, considering that it is imported and is something decidedly unique, large arm-chairs ranging in price from $7 to $12.50, and settees from $14 to $32. The children's furniture in the same wood is quite a feature of the collection; then there are camp and piano stools, mirrors, flower-stands, walking canes, and stools and other articles, too numerous to mention. Down at Chester's there are sundry novelties in the way of fancy goods, just arrived, just enough to show that the absent chief has in mind his many lady friends, for the bulk of the fall stock is still en route. Very choice cascade ties are those of damask silk mingled with Point lace, real Point, my dear, a finger and more to each tie, and in itself is worth the price of the whole thing—$1.50. The new linen sets are very broad and often trimmed with insertions set in in strips or blocks, or with the various kinds of heavier laces now so much worn. Irish point is particularly liked. Something dainty for morning wear are cripe lisse ties, the ends finished with tucks and flutings, and others of lawn embroidered a finger deep. Cripe de chine is very handsomely made up in elaborate bows mingled with loops of the narrow reversible satin ribbons, of which, by the way, there is a very full assortment. Black tulle, or tulle's net, edged with whalebone fringe, are a novelty, as are also lace veilings with dots of green and blue chenille mixed. The castor gloves I wrote you of the other day as being so excellent for country wear and driving, I found here in the gray shades, at $2 a pair a pair. Black cashmere round capes, embroidered in silk and edged with fringe, are among the new fancy wraps, and the pretty mo-hair and worsted head coverings. "Fanchons" are being much worn again, with considerable difference in shapes, some being made of tulle, gauze, cripe de chine, trimmed with flowers and ribbons, and made in a turban shape with two pointed ends that stand up above the forehead. The Creole is a specialty for brunettes. It is made of gauze of the most vivid hues and in a shape very similar to the kerchief of the Southern negro woman. At the back is a loop with two very long ends of satin ribbon. Have I told you of the new trimming? It is a flower cut from velvet and richly embroidered, which is intended to be applied on the dress. It has the advantage of being orderable—if I may coin a word—in any flower one wants. I shall suggest it to Mrs. Koerner, if she has not already made it. Gold trimmings are being much used, and braiding on dresses and suits promises to be one of the fashionable industries of the winter. In the gold trimmings it is said that gray felt bonnets are to be so ornamented. Touched here and there with a glint of red, they will be very effective. Isn't this a cute idea? A regular leather traveling bag, but lined with strong wire caging so that no fall or chance pinch can betray its contents, which are—what do you think? Your pet poodle or pussy, whose presence in passenger cars would otherwise not be tolerated, but who, in this way, can safely elude the vigilance of the most lynx-eyed of officials. As yet these convenient deceptions have not reached us, and I know of nowhere they can be purchased except at Drévet's, 166 Boulevard Sebastopol, Paris, but when a sample does arrive in San Francisco, I shall be sure to know it and shall inform you promptly. A profus of conveniences, have you ever examined Koser's patent sofa beds? They are surely the nicest thing of the kind I have found. On opening them the bed is made up so that the length is not from end to end as with other patents, but from the upright back which acts as a headboard. The mattress inside is so thick and well-made that no other is needed. Made in rep, damask, and with puffs of a second color, they are remarkably cheap, I think, at $30. Plaids will be largely worn this fall and winter, particularly the fine bars and invisible line plaids as they are called. They are not the genuine tartans, which is one reason why they may really have a "run" where the others would fail because of their decidedly pronounced character. They will be used more as trimmings, bias bands and so on, than for whole suits, at least so Worth decrees, and he has made a great many of his Exposition suits in this way. At the White House they tell me the old, old-fashioned changeable silks are coming back. How pretty they used to look, even with the full but untrimmed skirts then worn, and white and black lace surplice trimmings at the neck. Shirtings will be used very freely in their make-up, and the new Spanish laces, the Russian, in the lighter patterns as garnitures, will render them very charming as dinner or evening toilettes. Mrs. DeLorme, Thurlow Block, showed me yesterday a very beautiful dress of this style. The whole front was a mass of the finest shirring, even to the waist itself, where it ended only across the bust at the edge of the square open neck, which was finished with full ruching of silk fringed out that served as a heading to a rich fall of Valenciennes lace—shirred sleeves with ruffles of the same falling just below the elbow. On the underskirt, as a heading to a deep kilt plaiting, was another shirring two fingers in width, with a finish of lace standing upright, and the overdress, consisting only of two back breadths, very full and very long, was edged with the same trimming, and below a row of knife plaiting, the whole being caught back with a large bow of plain blue silk, while a similar bow with ends terminated the short square basque at the back. The silk itself was a changeable blue, with the glitter of the silver cloud and the azure of the sky playing at hide and seek with each other over it. A brown silk, with trimming of brown velvet and deep fringe, was very handsome too. The design was Mrs. DeLorme's own and very rich. But I have not time to tell you to-day of a great many pretty things I have seen in the last few days. Next week, perhaps, I will tell you of some of the elegant toilettes being made at Samuels' and the White House for the coming Concordia Ball. A little oddity that fell in my way at Mr. Mayer's, on Kearny Street, yesterday, was a back comb made for some curiosity fancier, which had polished alligator teeth, a specialty there, standing up in a row of points across the top. The teeth were of shell. Must it not have been quaint? Now, what do you think, just between ourselves, of the rumor that hoops are to return before long? The idea of being put into a cage again is horrid I think, and yet I suppose we must submit just far enough not to be conspicuous, but I for one always follow the fashions, whatever they are, at a very respectful distance. So, I trust, will you should this absurdity once more assert itself. So far, imported dresses do not show any very alarming signs. I am often surprised at the incongruous selection made in laces, so little attention being paid to the relative texture of the fabric and the trimming. Point, of course, goes with anything that is sufficiently elegant, but even Point de Venise, Point d'Argentan, and Point d'Hongrie ought to be carefully considered before being laid on laces and muslins. Guipure, whatever the style, is only fit for winter wear; so with the new Russian laces; but Point d'Alençon, Mechlin or Malines, as it is now called, and Valenciennes are eminently suited to summer toilettes and gauzy fabrics. The charming new Spanish blonde laces are just heavy enough, and light enough, too—excuse the apparent contradiction—to wear with anything and at any time. Mr. Samuels tells me there will be an effort made to revive guipure this winter. It will hardly be successful, I fear, there are so many new favorites in the field. What a delicious little corner is that lace counter, too! And you almost always find the genial proprietor hovering around in its immediate vicinity, for lace is his hobby, you know.

Yours, etc.,

LEWIS DUBOIS.

EXTRACTS FROM MY DIARY.—VII.

By an Early Californian.—San Francisco, 1848.

After many efforts and long waiting our public school is opened. Dr. Fourgeaud is one of the trustees, and Mr. Thomas Douglas has been elected teacher, with a salary of $1,000. The building is of fair size, standing near the old adobe custom-house on the Plaza, and has already been in use for church purposes. Captain L. H. Thomas, a most estimable Welsh gentleman, reads prayers there every Sunday, and Mrs. Charles V. Gillespie has organized a Sunday-school—the first on the Pacific Coast. But the need of a minister who can preach, visit the sick and dying, and give consolation to those in trouble, being seriously felt, Mr. Gillespie has succeeded in raising $2,400 by subscription, and the Rev. Mr. Hunt, now at the Sandwich Islands, has been invited to settle here as chaplain. A census has been lately taken, showing the population to be about six hundred. The last time I was at Sonoma a very singular occurrence took place at "the hotel," as it is called—almost a tragedy. A party of men were playing at cards, when one of them accused the dealer of cheating. He gave him the lie, and the man returned a blow with his fist hard enough to draw blood; as the drops fell the wounded man dipped his finger in them, and, drawing a red cross upon the table, swore by it that he would have his assailant's life before sunrise. The hotel keeper soon broke up the party, and each man went his way, some to the only dormitory the house afforded—a large, unfinished, dimly-lighted garret, with beds ranged side by side along its floor—some to their homes in the village. The wounded man proceeded to the barracks and called for a friend, to whom he said that he had to leave town on business in the Clear Lake country early in the morning, and wanted to borrow a pistol for safety. The arm was procured and heavily loaded. It was now long past midnight. Quiet reigned at the hotel. There was every indication that slumber had overcome the restless spirits of the previous hours, and that a certain amount of security, from the numbers about him, attended the threatened man; at any rate he was in a deep sleep when his enemy picked his way with stealthy tread to his side; and there, by the faint light, with pistol almost touching the head of his prostrate foe, his vow was accomplished—as he supposed. Rushing down stairs, he mounted his horse and fled. Before noon a man with head well bandaged might be seen perambulating the streets of Sonoma; it was the monte dealer of the night before. The ball had entered at the cheek bone, or below it, and had passed out clear of the brain. Was there ever such an escape from—hanging? While there I called upon General Vallejo. A large apartment, on the ground-floor of his house, he had made into a school-room, with desks, maps, blackboards, etc., for the use of his children. As the ayuntamiento, or town council, had no comfortable place in which to meet, he has kindly offered them this apartment. The morning after their first meeting he discovered that the desks had suffered from their knives; and, realizing that a habit, which had become a second nature to the race about him, might assist the current of their thoughts, he had placed before each of the honorable members, at subsequent meetings, a new pine shingle. The result was as he had anticipated—the desks were spared; a pile of shavings attested to the consideration given by the law-makers to the business before them, and a barrel of kindlings came to him free of expense. The General's acute observation has led him to believe that, as he looks out of his windows, he can tell from afar much of what goes on in the community about him. He says two men will approach one another from different sides of the Plaza, one of whom will whittle away from him, and he is the would-be seller of a horse or a yoke of oxen; the other whittles toward himself, and he is a purchaser. When they meet, they sit down on a stump and shave away slower or faster as the trade halts or progresses; and, at last, after an hour's devotion to business, they rise to adjourn; both knives are brought down with a hatchet-like motion, the sticks are chopped short off and thrown away. He knows, then, that the sale has been effected, the contract, as it were, signed, sealed, and delivered. The General took me down to look at the garden in the rear of his house, which is filled with fruit trees and fine old grape vines, bearing abundantly every year. Not far away, at a summer house, I saw a tall, beautiful hedge of rosas de castilla; these surrounded quite a vineyard. Admiral C. W. Wooster, late of the Chilean navy, Doctor Victor J. Fourgeaud and I have become copartners for mining operations on the Yuba. The Admiral is from New Haven, but much of his life has been passed in South America. In Chile he has rendered important services to the government, and received from it rank, orders, and decorations, which testify to his bravery and usefulness. His conversation is interesting, and filled with historical reminiscences and anecdotes worth recording. In his youth he knew Aaron Burr, who was a friend, and it seems to me he said a relative of his father, and tells many new incidents connected with the life of that extraordinary man. The Admiral wears the medals and ribbons bestowed upon him by the country of his adoption at all our grand dinners and balls, has a toast, or a story, or a speech ready whenever called upon, and at our Thanksgiving celebration (November 18, 1847) offered resolutions suited to the occasion. Dr. Fourgeaud and family are from South Carolina. He, educated in Paris, and practicing in St. Louis, where he ably edited the Medical Journal, became interested in accounts he had received of the Pacific Coast. One evening he came home and told his wife he wanted to emigrate. The suggestion was no sooner made than acted upon—and husband and wife, and a beautiful boy of six years, soon started overland for California. They were provided with all the comforts possible, and with all the information, charts, etc., which Colonel Benton much interested in them and the success of their enterprise could supply for such a journey. They had beads and nicknacks for the Indians, a fine blooded horse for future use, and a pet dog for their little boy. After six months of the trials, adventures and dangers which attend all such journeys they reached the Portsmouth House on the 28th October, 1847, just in time to dine, and (as they said) "in a civilized manner again." Captain Folsom, Admiral Wooster, Dr. Townsend and wife, Mr. C. L. Ross, and I (happening to be there) were at table to welcome them, and soon discovered how much we were to be gainers by the association.

JAMES C. WARD.

INTAGLIOS.

Is It Over?

Oh, I dreamed I walked with him
By a lake, where herons fly
From the ever-murmuring cry
With their melancholy brim.

And he said, "The day is done"—
O my life, my heart's desire—
And the last light of the sun
Kissed the waves to lambent fire.

Then I clasped him to my breast
By the magic, mystic glow,
And I kissed him into rest,
Where the reeds and lilies grow.

Then I saw a little boat,
From the darkling east it came;
Oh, it seemed to glide and float
On a sea of fading flame.

Then my lover's face grew pale,
But he rose and sought its ride,
And he set the snowy sail
While the wan, faint daylight died.

For he said, "The day is done"—
Oh, he spoke as one who slept—
"And I go to seek the sun,"
Then I woke, and waking wept.

O my love, is heaven just?
I can only wring my hands,
I am bowed into the dust;
Is there one who understands?

For I know within my heart—
And it burns there to the core—
That the day we twain did part
Parted us forevermore.

And I dreamed no more at night
Of the lake where herons cry,
For my life has lost its light,
And I only pray to die.

Her Secret.

What if I think of you once in a while,
With a little blush and a little smile;
With a little blush that comes and goes
As the sweet, sweet wind of memory blows!

What if I picture now with care
A tete-a-tete and an easy chair?
What if I make the picture clear,
By lighting it up with a chandelier!

Can you see by the softly shimmering flame?
Can you see to read the musical name
Of him who sits in graceful state
On the little damask tete-a-tete?

Can you see me sitting before him there—
Sitting within the easy-chair?
Can you hear the laugh, can you hear the jest,
The musical laugh of my handsome guest?

Is it unwise to paint the view
In colors so warm, and light it, too?
Will somebody claim the graceful state
On the little damask tete-a-tete?

How many may lose by claiming that!
For many a handsome guest has sat
Beneath the shimmering chandelier
While the easy-chair was standing near.

How many may lose, how many may win!
Ah, vanity is a costly sin!
For the one I mean will never suppose
That for him the wind of memory blows.

Then what if I think of you once in a while,
With a little blush and a little smile;
With a little blush that comes and goes
As the sweet, sweet wind of memory blows!

NORA PERKY.

Sleep On, My Heart.

Sleep on, my heart, in peace!
The kindly night now brings
To flowers with drooping wings,
And tired eyelids, sweet, refreshing dew,
And you,
In sweetest peace, my heart, sleep on!

Sleep on, my heart, in peace!
And life below is sleeping;
Above the moon is keeping
In silent majesty—an eye of God—
Her watch, and ward,
And thou, my heart, in peace sleep on!

Sleep on, my heart, in peace!
Secure from care and fear;
The universe has care
For hearts that calmly slumber on as thou!
And now,
In sweetest peace, my heart, sleep on!

Sleep on, my heart, in peace!
E'en safe from dream of grief,
Made strong by thy belief,
While thee, fair hope her guardians set about,
Secure from doubt,
My heart, in sweetest peace, do thou sleep on!

Sleep on, my heart, in peace!
And if I should bedight
To thee, here in the night
Relentless Death shall whisper, "Rouse! depart!"
O heart,
Yonder, in sweetest peace, shalt thou awake!

Three Flowers.—To Bayard Taylor.

Herewith I send you three pressed withered flowers:
This one was white, with golden star; this, blue
As Capri's cave; that, purple and shot through
With sunset-orange where the Duomo towers
In diamond air, and under hanging bowers
The Arno glides. This faded violet grew
On Lander's grave; from Lander's heart it drew
Its magic azure in the long spring hours
Within the shadow of the Pyramid
Of Calus Cestius was the daisy found,
White as the soul of Keats in Paradise.
The pansy—there were hundreds of them hid
In the thick grass that folded Shelley's mound,
Guarding his ashes with most loving eyes.

T. B. ALDRICH.

A. B. C.

A is an Angel of blushing eighteen;
B is the Ball where the Angel was seen;
C is her Chaperon, who cheated at cards;
D is the Deutemps with Frank of the Guards;
E is her Eye, killing slowly but surely;
F is the Fan, whence it peeped so demurely;
G is the Glove of superlative hid;
H is the Hand which it spitefully hid;
I is the Ice which the fair one demanded;
J is the Juvenile, that dainty who handed;
K is the Kerchief, a rare work of art;
L is the Lace which composed the chief part;
M is the old Maid who watched the chits dance;
N is the Nose she turned up at each glance;
O is the Olga (just then in its prime);
P is the Partner who wouldn't keep time;
Q is a Quadrille put instead of the Lancers;
R is the Remonstrances made by the dancers;
S is the Supper, where all went in pairs;
T is the Twaddle they talked on the stairs;
U is the Uncle who "thought he'd be going";
V is the Voice which his niece replied "No" in;
W is the Waiter, who sat up all night;
X is his Exit, not rigidly straight;
Y is a Yawning fit caused by the ball;
Z stands for Zero, or nothing at all.

C. S. CALVERLY.

"MURDER MOST FOUL."

Gerald Holdcroft, in London "Mirth."

Constitutionally I am a timid woman. When I see a herd of cattle in the street, I make a precipitate rush for the nearest gateway; I can not summon the necessary courage to cross a road if a vehicle be in sight; and when there is the slightest noise in the house I invariably scream. But I must confess that my timidity reaches a climax when compelled to travel by railway. Experience, unhappily, has taught me that the dangers to life and limb from accident are only a small proportion of the peril that a passenger by rail is bound to encounter.

Having occasion to proceed to the north of England when I had upward of three hundred pounds in bank notes with me, for the purpose of buying some cottages as an investment, I was more than usually careful in selecting my carriage, so that I might secure respectable people as compagnons de voyage. Walking tremulously up and down the platform, I peered anxiously into each compartment, until at length I was attracted to a second-class carriage by the benevolent aspect of an old gentleman with snow-white hair, who sat opposite a young man of a singularly mild and prepossessing countenance. They immediately made way for me with great courtesy as I entered, and after another careful scrutiny I began to experience as much composure as I could expect under the distressing influence of railway locomotion.

Having carefully studied Lavater and Combe, I experienced little difficulty in forming opinions, physiognomically and phrenologically, of the two gentlemen in whose company I was placed, and the following conclusions ultimately forced themselves upon my mind, viz.: The old gentleman with the white hair had the organs of benevolence, veneration, and firmness largely developed, and plainly discernible upon the top of his bald and shining head; that he had the long curved nose that indicates the valor to defend his country and his home; and that the length and formation of his under-lip at once pronounced him a philanthropist. I was unable to make my observations of the younger gentleman with the same degree of certainty, for his hair was long and thick, and successfully concealed his phrenological developments; but from his broad forehead, and the wideness of the back of the head, I argued that his predominant characteristics were ideality and conscientiousness. His features were almost too small to permit an elaborate opinion to be formed of his physiognomical indications, but from their general character I inferred that he was intellectual, cultivated, and refined.

Whether the sciences—of which Gall and Spurzheim upon the one hand, and Lavater and Redfield upon the other, were the able exponents—proved of service to me in the selection of my traveling companions, I must leave to the judgment of my readers when they have learned the sequel.

Almost immediately upon quitting the London terminus the two gentlemen began talking, and I was at once charmed with the softness and clearness of their voices, and the amiability of their manners. But how we can be deceived, even though we may be blessed with a large amount of that perceptive quality which is termed, by courtesy, woman's wit.

"We are locked up for an hour and a half," my elder companion remarked to his friend with a smile of serenity which broadened almost into a laugh, while he saw with a grim delight my face involuntarily lengthen.

"Then we do not stop until we arrive at Blankmere?" the younger man inquired.

"No, Nestor; and, as we shall be undisturbed, we may as well discuss the details of your plot."

"Plot? Oh, dear! How my heart began to palpitate; for, although I am one of the weaker sex, I know only too well that there is never any good in a plot. By a peculiar idiosyncrasy, the bare mention of that word always suggests to my olfactory nerve the smell of gunpowder."

"I think, without being egotistical, that my plot will work well," the young man said.

"I remember having some doubts about the fire," said he of the snow-white hair. "How did you manage that?"

"The fire at the elms? Oh, that went capitally. I burnt the old man in his bed, for I wanted his money for Reginald."

"Good heavens!" I exclaimed, impetuously, unable to restrain an expression of astonishment, if not horror, at the avowed villainy of that young man, whom I had previously regarded as the impersonation of gentleness.

"I beg your pardon!" the white-haired man said, interrogatively, and with the blandest politeness possible.

"I didn't speak, sir," I replied, with the consciousness that my falsehood was justifiable upon the ground of self-preservation; for, if my fellow-passengers were aware that I had overheard the confession of burning a poor, and possibly harmless, old man in his bed, it might be necessary to silence me in a summary manner. I looked again at the benevolent countenance of the old gentleman, and could not bring myself to believe that he really approved of the young man's barbarity. Perhaps he was disguising his actual character in order to elicit from his companion a full confession of his crime.

"How about the old lady?" demanded the elder man.

"Oh, she escaped down the back stairs," replied Nestor.

"She might just as well have been burnt, too, for what good she is ever likely to be to you," exclaimed the elder man, to my great horror, for he was evidently as venal and cruel as the other.

"I shall want her for—"

At this point I experienced a singing in my ears, and felt that I must have fainted; then I let down the window, and the fresh air partially revived me; but I did not hear for what purpose the poor old lady was required, although I formed a keen suspicion that it could not have been for any good.

"I never liked her character; she was too commonplace, and not half wicked enough," resumed the elderly demon; then, with an audacity that was almost petrifying, he added: "If I'd been you I should not have allowed her to escape."

They then continued their conversation in whispers, and occasionally laughed with what appeared to be genuine merriment, but I didn't hear anything distinctly again until the meek-looking young demon inquired if I objected to smoking. They had evidently begun to make game of me; the absurdity of asking me if I objected, when, of course, they would as soon have strangled me as looked at me.

"I quite enjoy the smell of a cigar," I said, with pardonable deceit, for if there is one thing more than another I dislike, it is smoking in a railway-carriage, and the two vile men began to puff as if in a rivalry with each other until I could scarcely see their faces.

"All you seem to require for carrying out your purpose is the old lady's money, if I understand you correctly," the white-haired wretch remarked.

"Yes, that is, of course, essentially requisite."

"Then why not kill her on the railway?"

"I might do worse than follow your advice," Nestor replied, smoking as placidly as a Turk.

My feelings at this point defy description. Of course, I was to be their victim. In some inscrutable manner they must have ascertained that I was traveling with money in my possession, which they had unscrupulously determined to appropriate.

"I don't very well see how you could do better."

What opportunity more fitting than the present journey—locked in for an hour and a half? Who is to know anything of it, and you then get rid of it for good?"

There is a point at which overstrained endurance breaks down, and when I heard my fate sealed in that diabolically cool manner, I fainted, and remembered no more of what took place until I became aware that the elder man was standing over me supporting my head on his shoulder, while the young one was endeavoring to pour some liquid down my throat from a flask which he held in his hand. I am glad I had the presence of mind to resist the tempting bait, which certainly possessed a most pleasing aroma, but which, no doubt, was some powerful poison that would send me sleep forever. Finding persuasion useless, they at length desisted, and after a few expressions of sympathy from the old gentleman, and inquiries as to my state of health from the younger one, they ultimately resumed their demoniacal conversation, from which I inferred that they intended if possible to frighten me to death.

"Did you ever do a robbery of that kind before?" inquired the elder Mephistopheles. "It is wonderfully effective. I once did a capital murder in St. James'."

"No; but I fancy I remember the incident to which you allude. Was it not something of the character of a duel?"

"Oh, dear, no, far worse than that—a murder in cold blood," the wicked old man replied. "I never did anything that my wife liked better."

I could not believe that it was possible for a woman to be so fiendish and malevolent; but how a timid creature like myself managed to support the terror I can never understand. Every moment I expected that the gentlemanly ruffians would attack me, but, as if they had entirely forgotten me, they began talking in a language that was unintelligible to me, but which I have since thought must have been thieves' patter.

In a few more minutes the speed of the train slackened, and, with a joy I shall never forget, I recognized the dreary platform, which then possessed a charm for me greater than the finest landscape by Claude or Turner. I need scarcely observe that I alighted without much loss of time, and, indeed, incurred the risk of being fined for infringing one of the company's by-laws.

My first impulse was to run for my life, throw myself upon my knees in an adjacent turnpike-field, and thank Providence for my unexpected preservation. But upon second thought, I decided that a duty was due to society.

I therefore called the guard, and requested that my two fellow-passengers might be taken into custody for the commission of crimes which they had voluntarily confessed in my hearing.

"Of what do you complain?" demanded the guard.

"Of everything that is bad," I rejoined excitedly. "They have set fire to a house, burned a poor, harmless old gentleman in his bed, murdered another victim in cold blood in St. James', and they intend to rob some defenseless creature on the railway."

At this juncture I was interrupted by peals of hilarious laughter from the two miscreants.

"Have you lost anything, madame?" inquired the guard with a perplexed look.

"No, than heaven," I replied, clutching my money in my pocket with a prehensile grasp.

The elder man placed a card in the guard's hand and said, struggling with laughter: "We are both engaged in literature, and were discussing the plot of a novel which my friend is writing for one of the 'weeklies,' where a good deal of the 'blood and thunder' element is required. And all the horrors which appear to have alarmed this lady are purely imaginary."

And the guard was actually credulous enough to believe them, for, slamming the door, he gave a shrill whistle, and left me standing upon the platform, staring in stupefied amazement at the train as it lessened in the distance.

I am painfully aware that I am only a woman, and a very weak and timid member of the sex; I flatter myself, however, that I am not deficient of common sense, and since that terrible day I utterly repudiate physiognomy and phrenology, but at the same time carefully avoid benevolent gentlemen with snow-white hair, and young men who appear to be the incarnation of honesty and kindness.

A terrible accident has just taken place at Biarritz (says Galligan's Messenger of the 8th inst.). Miss Gordon, who had passed the winter in Paris, was drowned while out on an excursion. She attempted, without a guide, to go along the cliffs far beyond the point marked out by the authorities as the limit for the public to go safely. She reached a place known as Falaise de la Mort, and stooping to pick a flower, her foot slipped, and she was precipitated into a hole known as the Barbots, a spot said to have this peculiarity, that at the end of forty-eight hours, nothing more than the skeleton remains of any beings which fall into it. It contains millions of small insects which devour the body, and which are called by the inhabitants of the district barlots, and are by them held in special horror. The Duke de Frías met his death under similar circumstances a few years ago.

The love of glory, the fear of shame, the design of making a fortune, the desire of rendering life easy and agreeable, and the humor of pulling down other people, are often the causes of that valor so celebrated among men.

No one sings now "Oh, take me back to the sweet sunny South, to the sweet sunny South take me home." There is too much Bronze John around home.

Life is a casket, not precious in itself, but valuable in proportion to what fortune, or industry, or virtue has placed within.

A man who don't know anything will tell it the first chance he gets.

NEW

BOOKS

Resumption and the Silver Question. By H. V. Poor. 12mo. 75
Sir Walter Scott. By Richard H. Hutton. (English Men of Letters.) 12mo. 75
Sainly Workers. Lenten Lectures. By F. W. Farrar. 12mo. 1 25
Eternal Hope. Sermons. By F. W. Farrar. 12mo. 1 00
Duncan, T. C. How to be Plump, or Talks on Physiological Feeding. 12mo. 50
Primrose Path. A Novel. By Mrs. Oliphant. 8vo. 50
Child and Woman. From the German of Clementine Helm. 12mo. 1 50
Liquidated. The Sever. By Rudolph Lindau. 16mo. 25
Mrs. Gainsborough's Diamonds. By Julian Hawthorne. 16mo. paper. 20
The Arab Wife. A Romance of the Polynesian Seas. 16mo. paper. 25

BANCROFT'S
721 MARKET ST. S.F.

FALK'S

MILWAUKEE BEER

Is especially recommended to those desiring a pleasant, palatable table beverage. Made from pure malt and hops, and prepared especially for this climate. Try it. For sale by all grocers and liquor dealers.

CUTTING & MURRAY,
Sole Agents, 206 Front Street, S. F.

CALIFORNIA

STATE FAIR

FOR 1878,

AT SACRAMENTO, CAL.,

COMMENCING
MONDAY.....SEPTEMBER 16,

AND CLOSING
SATURDAY.....SEPTEMBER 21.

$50,000 CASH

To be Distributed in Premiums.

THE EXHIBITION WILL BE DIVIDED into Seven Departments, and the SOCIETY'S GOLD MEDAL to be awarded to the most meritorious exhibition in each department. Those desiring Premium Lists will please notify the Secretary.

The Largest Stock Show and Most Attractive Speed Display

Ever offered by any Agricultural Society in the United States.

ATTRACTIVE MILITARY TOURNAMENT

Public Sale of THOROUGHERED STOCK on Friday of the Fair.

The Central Pacific Railroad and Steamers will carry articles to and from the Fair, free of charge. Wells, Fargo & Co's Express will deliver all packages free, not weighing over twenty pounds.

Applications for stalls at the Park and space at the Pavilion should be made to ROBERT BECK, Secretary, at once.

Membership.....$5 cents
Single Admission.....50 cents

M. D. BORUCK, President.

ROBERT BECK, Secretary.

RETURNED.

HAVING RETURNED FROM THE East, I respectfully announce to my friends and the public that I shall resume practice on WEDNESDAY, Sept. 5th, 1878.

S. W. DENNIS, M. D., DENTIST,

No. 33 KEARNY STREET.

R. C. MOWBRAY, M. D., DENTIST,
224 STOCKTON ST., corner Post, S. F.

PUBLIC ADMINISTRATOR,

WILLIAM DOOLAN,

Office No. 12 Nevada Block.

T. J. PETTIT & CO'S

LABEL, SHOW CARD,
ENGRAVING AND PRINTING
ESTABLISHMENT.

528 CALIFORNIA STREET, SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

The public of San Francisco, more especially the fashionable element, is generous in its taste for amusement, and the presence of that taste would show that people are taking an antidote for Leecher. A twenty-five-dollar adeline just has written that—

"Every heart, with a stilled will,
Is a clasp of warmer steel;
Mixed with cold, in sparks of hell."

And there are doubtless enough sparks floating about this place to start afire the furnace which Beecher and Canon Farrar have put out. But it is curious to note the change of public opinion regarding Mrs. Oates. When she was here before, Noli Hill and the aristocracy generally tabooed her. She was a hoodlum; a very raucous woman; rather an attraction for fast young men than for the dames and demoiselles of society. Perhaps the real grievance was, that she moved around in wild flashes of scandal, and was bold enough to defy the scandal-mongers. She was a sort of female Ajax defying the lightning. She drew small audiences, and even male attendants were not so particularly noticeable at her performances. She was too difficult of access for the gay Lothario of the city, and she had too true a perception of her own interests to make herself a cheap flirtation. So even the baldheads deserted her, and she displayed her shapely figure and her gorgeous costumes to a sprinkling of people, who saw in her an enthusiast in her art, even if that art was only opera bouffe; a woman of indomitable spirit, who did everything she had to do with energy, and who lived her life in spite of rumor and scandal, keeping her faith steadfastly with the public. Meantime old rouds, disguised in strange, capacious cloaks and broad-brimmed hats, sat far back in the shades of carriages, outside the door of the little theatre on Rush Street, and spouted away the complaisant demoielles of the company, whose attractions were of that aesthetic character which does not bear investigation. But now society seems to be anxious to atone for its bad treatment of the lady. We will be generous, and say so, for we have not heard of late any fresh scandal about her. She has not been guilty of a single new naughtiness, so that cannot be the attraction. For whatever reason it may be, aristocracy and fashion have changed front, and on Monday night the parquette was strewn with autumn bonnets and stylish toilets. Mrs. Oates plays her parts as she thinks they ought to be played, and we dare say there is nothing more entre in her performance than there is in the French impersonations—always allowing for a piquancy which is impossible in the American girl of the same class. But Mrs. Oates and her managers deserve severe censure for the manner in which Les Cloches de Corneville was put on on Monday evening. The press and the public have both dealt leniently with them, partly owing to the obvious merits of the piece, and the favorable impression—only an impression—which the company made. The public have a right to demand that some little trouble should be taken in the production of pieces which they pay to see; and though the audience sat patiently through the whole opera on Monday night, that does not alter the fact that the stage business halted throughout, that the actors did not seem to care for their words, and that not a single voice was in proper condition to sing the music, which was freely cut out. Nearly everybody was hoarse, and it aggravates the offense that that is offered as an apology. Mrs. Oates has been here often and long enough to know what extraordinary precautions are necessary for strange singers in this climate, and it was evident that no particular care had been taken to guard against cold and hoarseness. But we can scarcely expect, in any case, that a troupe of men and women can be gathered together suddenly, hastily released in an opera new to them in Cincinnati, rushed through to the Western edge of the Continent, timed to arrive twenty-four hours before their public appearance on a strange stage, and accompanied by an unfamiliar orchestra, and do justice to their work. This was the case with the Oates Opera Company, and luck, more than good management, has saved them from disaster. The crowd that filled Mr. Lodge's little theatre on Monday night showed that anything in the shape of comic opera would be a success, and Les Cloches de Corneville has drawn full houses. It is scarcely possible yet to judge of the merits of the opera, since we have to accept suggestion rather than performance. The plot is quite pure, and in some points originally amusing. In the score there are many excessively pretty numbers, and some of them already had voice in the street, a sure sign that they please the public taste. Most descriptions of music have their representatives in it, an occasional air recalling the characteristics of comic and remembrance of grand opera. On the whole, it is considerably above the level of opera bouffe, and when Mrs. Oates recovers her voice, and the baritone, Mr. Connell, and the tenor, Mr. Beverly, obtain full command of themselves, we shall find it a most enjoyable performance. The orchestra is slowly working up to accord with the chorus, and everything progresses toward perfection. Taken on the whole, the company is stronger in musical ability than any Mr. Oates has had here. Whether or not the lady herself has improved has not yet been demonstrated, as most of her numbers have been cut, or barked; but she has as much life and spirit as ever she had, and acted her part with the old abandon. The tenor is very robust in person. His voice is light, but well trained and pleasing, and his method is good. The baritone has a fine, powerful organ, and uses it excellently. This knowledge of acting shows him to have gone through some training on the operatic stage in a heavier line. Miss Lulu Stevens, a young lady who is practically a debutante, makes a very favorable impression from a musical point of view. She sings in a very correct style, and has a moderately strong, very smooth, and pure voice. She has yet to learn the stage deportment of her profession. Amongst the company we have an admirable comedian in Mr. Taylor, and a clever second in Mr. Graham. The actor of all is Mr. Meade, who, as old "Gaspard, the Miser," makes quite a dramatic bit. The chorus will be good with a little more practice together. Le Mariage and Le Petit Duc are promised, and these are not likely to suffer from the same misfortunes as Les Cloches de Corneville.

At the California Robson and Crane are suffering slightly from the developed taste for music; but the houses have been far from bad, and with sixty per cent. of the receipts the two comedians should be satisfied. It is a question whether one would rather be Robson and Crane than a heavy holder of Sierra Nevada. They have been wonderfully lucky, the dramatic Siamese twins, and as they fulfill a function always grateful (that of making people laugh), they perhaps deserve to be, even if it is not always clear exactly what they are laughing at. On Monday night we are to have Forbidden Fruit again. We should have been better pleased with Champagne and Oysters, or that other new play which has not yet seen the light, but we presume that the two gentlemen are satisfied that they have nothing in their repertory as good as Forbidden Fruit. So much the worse for their repertory. It seems to us that success makes successful people lazy and unmindful of their duty to the world that gives them the means of being lazy. It is taking a mean advantage of success to work a popular piece to death. Although Forbidden Fruit is a funny and enjoyable play, it has drawn so much money out of San Francisco already that Messrs. Robson and Crane should take the present opportunity, when people are in a theatre-going state of mind, to give them something new. It will always draw three or four first-class houses anyway.

The Grand Opera House, after a series of adventures, has settled down to the legitimate and Mrs. Scott-Siddons for a week. The management, keeping its eye on the spectacle of Zaphu, dipped into another form of the illegitimate and shorted Sierra Nevada, a compliment which Sierra Nevada handsomely returned. Suavity and good humor, promises and flattering compliments tided over many difficulties until Saturday night, when the orchestra received an invitation to a picnic at Sausalito, and silence reigned between the acts—at least, so it was announced. The aggrieved trombone, bass fiddle, piano, and flute struck a chord of denial; but that was not of much consequence. The management secured a star in Mrs. Scott-Siddons. Her soothing presence has reconciled the inharmonious elements, and Shakespeare is played with gorgeous scenery, originally painted for Uncle Tom's Cabin. But, if we speak thus lightly of the Grand Opera House, we have no desire to slight the claims and merits of Mrs. Scott-Siddons. The inheritor of a brilliant name, she wears it most worthily, and she must command respect and attention wherever she chooses to appear. While we concede to the lady an exceptional place in the list of dramatic stars, while we admit that a refined taste and a cultivated mind fit her in one sense as an exponent of the legitimate in acting, we are not disposed to admit that the possession of those recommendations constitutes her a great actress. That she is an actress of some talent must be acknowledged, but her impersonations are given with intellectual and not emotional effect. Whether she plays "Julia" in The Hunchback, or "Juliet" in Romeo and Juliet, she shows a conception so purely that of a student that one sits and listens and watches her with quite different feelings from those Miss Neilson or Madame Modjeska inspires in the same part. If we take "Juliet," which she has played for three nights at the Grand, we find her entire reading different, and naturally her business and elocution different, from those of any other star. With her, "Juliet" is not the warm, passionate girl of the play; she is not carried away by an excitement that is half desire; she is not so absorbed in her love for "Romeo" as to be not only headless but almost unconscious of the dangers that surround her. For playing such a "Juliet" Mrs. Scott-Siddons is quite unsuited every way. Her clear cut, handsome features are not those of such a girl as Capulet's daughter; her voice is hard and unsympathetic, and the frantic passion that fills "Juliet's" soul finds no expression in its stiff, unmodulated tones. Her action is stilted and artificial; and when she leans over the balcony, or plays around the "Nurse" in the scene where she awaits "Romeo's" message, the study of attitude is clear to the most superficial observer. Her charm lies entirely in an intellectual conception of conception and delineation; but if we are to judge her by any standard of acting, she is simply not the "Juliet" of Shakespeare. Even in her elocution, in which she is undoubtedly a star, she has mannerisms and faults which mar her best work; these have been crystallized by frequent exercise, and in "Juliet" she draws some of her words even to a painful point. But with all the objections that may be brought critically against her acting, she is an actress to be seen. There is much, a great deal, to be thoroughly enjoyed in everything she does; and no one who admires a refined performance of an original and intellectual conception of character will come away dissatisfied with Mrs. Scott-Siddons. Mr. Percy has been supporting her; and his rendering of "Romeo," not by any means great, has many merits. He is a young man, and, so far, has had a fair share of success, undoubtedly deserved. But Mr. Percy has much to learn and much to unlearn. At his age nobody but a most exceptional genius could be much better or higher in his profession. If he will be patient, keep up a close study, go in for the hardest experience he can get on the stage, and not dream of starriness for a few years, his future place on the stage is certain. But he shows some disposition to overvault himself. He came here with some reputation; the favorable extracts from newspaper notices were carefully published, and he relied upon his long connection with the coast to place him at once on the highest pinnacle of success. But he had not been long enough away. There were too many of his friends still here who remembered him as an amateur; and, favorable as the newspaper notices of other places have been, they have not warranted a star reputation. So he finds that his own friends require something more of him, and the public object to take him on the strength of having left here a few years ago practically an amateur. His "Romeo" is an immature performance, showing signs of unusual talent, which only requires time and experience to bring it to perfection. If we may put it so, Mr. Percy is a rising American actor, but he must not climb too fast. The rest of the cast of Romeo and Juliet at the Grand has been, as might be expected, not very brilliant, with the notable exception of Mrs. Judah, the "Nurse" of the stage. Mr. Harry Courtaine, too, may be singled out in "Mercutio," though he lacked humor in some of his scenes, more especially in the Queen Mab speech. The Hunchback and Ingomar were played on Thursday and last night.

On Wednesday afternoon Mr. Lyster put on The Orléans for the benefit of the yellow fever sufferers, and he keeps it on all this week. Orléans has been retired, perhaps none too soon. Boucicault's play has only been put on to keep the stage for Mr. and Mrs. Williamson, who open in Struck Oil on Monday next. We cannot predict how it will draw. On ordinary reasoning it should be somewhat unattractive, but we should not wonder if Mr. Williamson's lucky star shone on it, and guided it to further fortune. It is time, however, that the worthy and popular couple get a new piece. Cracks of Fortune is said to be coming, but that piece was first given to the public here and Mr. Kennedy knows that it was not a profitable venture. The leading character has been rewritten, and perhaps Mr. Williamson may make something more out of it than Mr. Stanley did. It was possible to do that even as it was, but we fear Cracks of Fortune, even if very materially altered, will require the prestige of success elsewhere to be successful here. Mr. Maguire has returned from London and Paris, and is said to be loaded down with engagements and contracts. So far the only real tangible success reported is the arrangement with French and Sardon and d'Ennery for the production of their plays here. If this be effectually arranged it will be a great thing for Mr. Maguire. But where has he got the new play by Sardon, and the new play by d'Ennery, which he speaks of producing immediately. If anybody wants them there are fifteen or twenty plays of d'Ennery available; old plays, produced in Paris many years ago, long before the author achieved his present position. They can be translated and played by anybody, and some people say that among them are pieces as great as The Two Orphans or The Celestial Case. Mr. Maguire's principal engagements are Barry Sullivan and the Strakosch Opera Company. We hope the former will do as well as he did when he opened Baldwin's, and that the latter may net more money to Mr. Maguire than it did before. We see one extraordinary engagement noted by our enterprising lessee—that of Miss May Hart, to play in Orléans. Why repeat a failure? If the engagement was made before, why play this version of the play? However, Mr. Maguire is happy over the prospects, and we can only hope they will realize his great expectations.

The theatrical body has done, as usual, a great deal to excite the public interest in the yellow fever sufferers. On Tuesday Mrs. Oates, Mrs. Scott-Siddons, Miss Cottrell, Mrs. Judah, Mr. Robson, and Mr. Crane acted as auctioneers at the sale of boxes for the benefit on Thursday, at the California Theatre. The auction took place at the Merchants' Exchange; but though the building was packed the bidding was not lively. The bill was a very varied one, comprising contributions by artists of all lines and ranks, and the benefit produced the magnificent amount of over $2,500, remitted without deduction of any kind. At Baldwin's, on Wednesday, The Orléans was played for the same object, and that, too, showed a satisfactory result. At the Platt's Hall entertainment the dramatic was represented by Mrs. Scott-Siddons, who has done quite a lot of work. Besides these, performances of all kinds have been given throughout the city, and San Francisco will show well in the list of subscriptions.

There is music in the air about Alfons. Messrs. Clay-Greene and Thompson, having made an arrangement with Miss Katy Mayhew, by which, in consideration of their success in rewriting the play, they were to receive a certain royalty on its production, made engagements in the East for her appearance in it under her authority. For some reason she could not keep her engagements, and as Mr. Greene was held to his contract for the piece, he undertook to play it without Miss Mayhew's consent, engaging Miss Annie Pixley to take the leading part. Miss Mayhew has placed an injunction against it, but we suppose the matter will be amicably settled. MOURZOUK.

GENEVIEVE WARD'S WARDROBE.

The Splendid Series of Dresses Designed for Her by the Hon. Charles Wingfield.

The New York Sun is authority for the statement that "Miss Genevieve Ward (who recently made her appearance in that city as 'Jane Shore') has without doubt brought to America the most elaborate stage wardrobe that has been seen upon the boards of an American playhouse." It remains to be seen if the American tragedienne who has plucked her bays on British soil and won the gold from British breeches pockets (to expend in Paris for these wondrous costumes, can vie with her predecessors in wearing those costumes with French taste and chic. The four dresses which Miss Ward wears in Jane Shore, and all of her costumes in Henry VIII., and, in fact, the costumes of the entire dramatic company in the last play, were designed by the Hon. Charles Wingfield, that versatile and talented son of Lord Londonderry and brother of Lord Powerscourt, who has distinguished himself as a novelist (he is the author of the fashionable novel, "Lady Grisel"), a playwright, an actor, painter, journalist, and last, and at present, an amateur designer and painter of costumes for these fortunate ladies and gentlemen, dramatic artists, and managers who chance to be numbered among his personal friends. When the curtain rose in New York on Miss Ward as "Jane Shore" she was attired in one of Wingfield's most gorgeous conceptions; and it must be borne in mind that he is the orbiter elegantiarum on the other side of the ocean in matters of antique and mediæval costume, and that the costume of the reign of Edward IV. was extravagant and gorgeous in the highest degree. Therefore, Edward's ex-mistress's dress was one of regal splendor. It was of ruby velvet, trimmed profusely with ermine. The velvet of which the dress was made was cut from the piece manufactured especially, and used in part for the court train of the late Queen Mercedes, of Spain. The shape of the robe is not unlike the fashions of the moment. The skirt is looped on one side, showing a kirtle or petticoat of white satin, brocaded with black velvet flowers, the design of which was copied from a piece of tapestry of the reign of Edward IV., and manufactured in France to Mr. Wingfield's order. The corsage of this ruby velvet robe, for it is a trained robe, is square, and bordered, as the skirt and train is, with ermine. The stomacher and sleeves (sleeves were separate from the dress in that day) are of blue satin, trimmed on the edge of the revers with spangles (then just introduced into the wardrobe effects of king's and queen's households). The sleeves are tight to the wrist, and in the style of the period would overhang the hand to the fingers, but are slashed at the inside seams and turned back in revers with cloth of gold and edged with gold spangles. Around the hips, describing a diagonal line, is a girdle of gold medallions linked together, enameled in blue, red, and white, with the arms of London. Over "Jane Shore's" head towered a conical cap or bonnet of green velvet, with the butterfly-wing ears of the period, recorded by Paradis and Strutt, and the cone of silver and gold braid, shaded with the long white India muslin gauze veil of that date. It was the fifteenth century, and lace was almost unknown in England, or only in the form of network, until a century and a half later. The long monks, or, as we call them of the present day, "angel sleeves" of that period, introduced by Edward IV. into the costume of both men and women, appear in this robe and in all the dresses of Jane Shore, falling over the blue satin inside sleeve. They are slashed almost to the shoulder, and are lined and bordered with ermine. With this costume and in this alone Miss Ward wears a necklace of diamonds, with diamond earrings. The cost of this magnificent costume is estimated to be nearly a thousand dollars, not including the diamonds. The second dress worn in the second act is of olive-green velvet brocade of two shades; the design an arabesque pattern of the period. It is trimmed with a dark olive plush fabric, to imitate fur, and bands of two-inch wide braid, composed of chenille and beads, in shades of dark and lighter green, to produce the effect of emeralds on a velvet brocade and silver-embroidered surface. The kirtle and sleeves are of a dark brocade satin and velvet shade of olive on a sulphur satin ground of almost white and of silvery sheen. The trained overdress opens in front to the waist, showing the kirtle of this fabric with the girdle depending from the corsage, and forming a rich ornament, seemingly of emeralds embroidered on velvet with silver and gold, hanging to a point just below the knee, where it terminates in a rich tasselled ornament. The corsage is separate from the skirt in this costume. It is square in the neck, has the long no-nastic oversleeves, and is a fine exponent in all its details, even to the silver clasps and buckles, of the caprice of fashion in the rapid change in styles in the two short years intervening between the periods of Edward IV. and Richard III. The dress of the third act is of the style of Richard III. It is of dark maroon woolen stuff—a kind of soft oriental velours. It has black satin sleeves and white muslin kerchief. This is the dress which is torn off by the executioners preparatory to handing her the sheet and candle; at the same moment her hood falls off, letting down a flood of rich golden hair. This hood, too, is of the style of Richard III.; conical, but not so long nor so pointed as the hood of the Edward IV. period, and it worn more erect on the head. Spangles appear on the visor, which is shaded with a small black woolen gauze kerchief stiffened with wire and spangled on the edges. The dress of the fourth act is a rich creamy white satin and silk damasce or brocade—a sort of robe dressing-gown, slashed at the side to show the plaits of the white woolen kirtle trimmed with silver fringe at the bottom. The gown itself is trimmed all around with black miniver fur. It has white satin undersleeves and silver gauze, silver spangled angel sleeves, and a deep collar of white satin, edged with black miniver, falling off the shoulders and showing the white muslin kerchief in the neck. The girdle which confines this gown at the waist is of loops of white satin, knotted at intervals in the style of a Franciscan's cord.

Mme. Modjeska's New Dresses.

An extract from a private letter addressed to a friend in New York says: "While Mme. Modjeska was in Paris this summer her time was so much occupied in sitting for her portrait by Duran and with the constant attentions shown her by the artistic world in Paris, that she was unable to design her stage dresses as usual. Worth's styles not satisfying her artistic instincts, she was perplexed what to do, when her friends came to her rescue by taking the matter in hand themselves. Thus her new dresses, twenty in number, have been designed by as many of the best painters in Paris."

A BIG DEAL.

THE FAMOUS WILDCAT MINE.

Next Friday afternoon there will be issued from this office a Sketch Book of the Stock Market, giving scenes of the exterior and interior of the Stock Exchange and character sketches on the street.

The work will include the whole ground of stock speculation, dealing more particularly with the comic side of the business, giving caricatures of the leading brokers of the Exchanges, the well known characters of "Pauper Alley," and the indiscriminate throng of the stock arena.

It will be a very funny thing, rich in interest, and full of sketches that can not fail to be recognized by everybody interested in the business and acquainted with the sharps of office, board, and street.

Agreeable to the requirements of the market, the book will be issued in the shape of a certificate, duly executed and transferable on any books except those of the ARGONAUT Publishing Company.

Capital stock, $2,500.00; number of shares, 10,000; price of shares, 25 cents. Take in a few at bedrock prices before it is placed on the Board.

AN ELEGANT FAMILY RESIDENCE.

Those interested in the possession of a handsome house will bear in mind the fact that on Tuesday, Sept. 17th, H. M. Newhall & Co. will sell at their salesrooms, at 12 o'clock noon, one of the most elegant places in the city, the family residence and elegant grounds of A. K. Grim, Esq., fronting on Pacific Avenue and Broadway, between Webster and Fillmore Streets. The house is a handsome two-story structure, 68½ by 72, bay windows, basement, conservatory, and all the modern improvements. The ventilation and sewerage are perfect; there is also a fine well of never-failing water, tanks and force-pump supplying all the water for the extensive grounds, through which water-pipes are laid. The entire property is enclosed by a substantial picket and board fence. The grounds are tastefully laid out, choice lawn, front and rear, of Kentucky blue grass and clover. Green house, choice shrubbery, evergreens, and flowering plants.

The view is unsurpassed, and can NEVER be INTERRUPTED. The entire Lower Bay, Golden Gate, Alcatraz, Oakland, Berkeley, passing vessels, etc., etc., being a constantly changing panorama, from which the eye never tires. No finer location for view can be had in the city. Sutter Street cars pass the door, and a short distance only to California Street cars. This property can be subdivided or utilized for more houses, if desired, without moving present buildings. For residence purposes this affords a rare opportunity to secure a choice location and an elegant home in the finest part of the city, and to this attractive property we invite special attention.

For permission to examine this estate, apply at the office of the auctioneers, H. M. Newhall & Co., corner Sansome and Halleck Streets, or at that of A. K. Grim, Esq., No. 234 Montgomery Street.

BOSTON DRESS REFORM.

California "Worth" Princess Suits, Skirts, and attachable Flounces: Cashmere and Merino Union Suits for ladies and children; ladies' and misses' shoulder-brace Corsets; Abdominal Corsets. No. 430 Sutter Street. A. W. BAKER, the only Dress Reform Agent in the city.

Some three months ago we mentioned the fact that the California Street Railroad, with its clean, safe, and comfortable dummies, was fast becoming a place for moonlight rides, love-making, and flirtation. We had occasion to ride over this road late at night during the past week, and found the cars crowded with gay young people, making a merry evening in riding up and down the road. The California Street cars are what the gondolas are to Venice of a moonlight night—spots for love-making. Walking parties are going out of date, and it is now quite the thing for young people to make up a flirting party for the California Street cars. The favorite seats hold two, and they are most delightfully narrow. On one occasion last week every dummy-seat on one of the cars was occupied from eight till eleven o'clock with just the complement necessary to fill it to its utmost capacity. A more uproarious, pleasant crowd we have not seen for a long time.

Dull times seem to have no effect on those new style photographs Messrs. Danies & Hayes are making. This establishment is pushed to its full capacity. We do not wonder when we look at the beautiful, soft, and finely finished pictures each customer gets.

This paper is printed with ink furnished by Chas. Eneu Johnson & Co., 509 South Tenth Street, Philadelphia, and 59 Gold Street, New York.

For silverware, go to Anderson & Randolph's, Clock Tower Building, corner Montgomery and Sutter Streets.

Mrs. Parker, of the Ladies' Depository, has opened a new store at 126 Post Street. She will be happy to see her former patrons. New Style Lace Patterns.

LADIES—NUMEROUS GOOD GIRLS APPLY DAILY for positions at my office. Your orders are filled by my lady clerk, a competent housekeeper, who knows how to select your help. Zeelandlaar & Co., 627 Sacramento Street, above Montgomery.

WANTED—Copies of the ARGONAUT of August 3d (No. 4, Vol. III.)

THE ARGONAUT BOUND.

Sufficient files of the ARGONAUT have been preserved to bind twenty full volumes of Vol. II, from January 12th, 1878, to July 6th, 1878. Any one can be accommodated with the bound volume by applying at the business office, 522 California Street. As the number of volumes is limited, it would be well to apply early.

WEDDING AND OTHER PRESENTS OF

SOLID STERLING SILVERWARE
BRONZES, CLOCKS, AND FANCY GOODS

The largest stock of artistic novelties in the city, at much lower prices than similar goods have ever before been offered.

ANDERSON &amp; RANDOLPH,

Clock Tower Building, corner Montgomery and Sutter Sts.

We beg to inform our friends and all connoisseurs that we have received a shipment of the celebrated

POMMERY & GRENO
CHAMPAGNE,

The favorite of all gourmets in Europe and the Eastern States. We guarantee the quality of this Wine to meet the demands of the most fastidious.

L. LEBENBAUM & CO., 529 and 531 Kearny St. and 1303 Polk St.

CHURCH NOTICE.

HOWARD STREET M. E. CHURCH, Howard Street, between Second and Third. The pastor, Rev. Thomas Guard, will preach at 11 A. M. and 7½ P. M. Sunday-school at 2 P. M. Praise service at 6½ P. M.

BUSH STREET THEATRE.

CHARLES E. LOCKE.....PROPRIETOR.

Overwhelming Success—The Musical Event of the Season
—Hundreds turned away nightly.

Every Evening until further notice, including Sunday, and Matinee Saturday, the charming Comic Opera prima donna

ALICE OATES,

And her unequalled new English Comic Opera Company, their first appearance in America.

First production in America, with all the original music, of the very successful Comic Opera, in three acts,

LES CLOCHES DE CORNEVILLE.

THE BELLS OF CORNEVILLE.

Serpolette.....Alice Oates.

Rendered with full chorus, grand orchestra, new scenery, imported costumes, appointments, etc.

Reserved seats may be secured at the box office six days in advance at popular prices of admission. Matinee prices same as at evening during this engagement.

BALDWIN'S THEATRE.

THOMAS MAGUIRE.....MANAGER.
F. LYSTER.....ACTING MANAGER.
G. R. CHIPMAN.....TREASURER.

Grand Revival, with all the great effects, of the

OCTOROON.

The whole Company in the Cast. A full Operatic Chorus. Old Time Scenes. Old Time Songs.

Only Octoroon Matinee, THIS (SATURDAY) AFTER-NOON, at two o'clock.

Saturday and Sunday Evenings, positively last nights of the

OCTOROON.

Monday Evening, Sept. 16, first appearance of MR. and MRS. J. C. WILLIAMSON (MISS MAGGIE MOORE).

STRUCK OIL.

CALIFORNIA THEATRE.

BARTON & LAWLOR.....MANAGERS.
BARTON HILL.....ACTING MANAGER.

Monday, September 16th, for one week only,

THE COMEDIANS,

STUART ROBSON &amp; WM. H. CRANE.

Will appear in Dion Boucault's funniest comedy,

FORBIDDEN FRUIT, —OR THE—

BRIGHTON SCANDAL,

With new scenery by Voegtlin, and a brilliant cast of characters.

FORBIDDEN FRUIT MATINEE SATURDAY.

Monday, September 23d, Bret Harte's play,

TWO MEN OF SANDY BARI

In which Messrs. Robson and Crane will appear as "Sandy Morton" and "Col. Culpepper Starbottle." Responsible, sir; personally responsible.

DECKER BROS

EDUCATIONAL!

French, Spanish, and Italian taught by Prof. Barthelemy de Filippe, by his easy, new method, saving months of studies. Classes for beginners will be formed September 20th; also private lessons. PACIFIC BUSINESS COLLEGE, 320 Post Street.

LOCUST GROVE,
SONOMA.

FAMILIES OR YOUNG LADIES

wishing to spend the month of September in this Valley (the grape season) can, on early application, be well accommodated at this well known place on reasonable terms. MRS. A. B. LUBECK, Sonoma.

JOE POHEIM

The Tailor,

203 Montgomery St. and 103 Third St. has just received a large assortment of the latest style goods.
Suits to order from .....$20
Pants to order from ..... 5
Overcoats to order from .....15

The leading question is where the best goods can be found at the lowest prices. The answer is at

JOE POHEIM,

203 Montgomery St. and 103 Third St.

Samples and Rules for Self-Measurement sent free to any address. Fit guaranteed.

BUTTERICK'S

PATTERNS—FALL STYLES.

Send stamp for catalogue. AGENCY, 124 POST ST., San Francisco.

"DOMESTIC"
THE LIGHT RUNNING
DOMESTIC

SEWING MACHINE,

The only really light-running lock-stitch Sewing Machine in the market.

"DOMESTIC" PAPER FASHIONS

Elegant, stylish, and reliable.

J. W. EVANS, 20 Post Street, San Francisco.

ROBERTS'
DELICIOUS CANDIES

MANUFACTURED DAILY,

NORTHWEST CORNER BUSH AND POLK STS.

PIANOS ARE THE

ARE YOU

INSURED?

THE TRAVELERS

LIFE AND ACCIDENT

INSURANCE CO.

OF HARTFORD, CONN.,

GRANTS

Life and Endowment Policies,

LOW RATES, ALL CASH.

ALSO,

GENERAL ACCIDENT POLICIES

Solid Cash Assets.....$4,460,000

Surplus to Policy Holders..... 1,225,000

Parties contemplating Life Insurance are invited to call before insuring elsewhere.

ALEX. M. DEAN, Gen'l Ag't,

NO. 403 CALIFORNIA ST., S. F.

N. B.

A LARGE AND ELEGANT ASSORTMENT OF

BIBLES,

PRAYER BOOKS,

—AND—

Prayers and Hymnals,

FOR SALE AT COST.

BILLINGS, HARBOURNE & CO.,

BOOKSELLERS AND STATIONERS,

NO. 5 MONTGOMERY STREET.

RUPTURE.

BUY NO TRUSS

Until you see what has been accomplished by DR. PIERCE'S late invention.

Call, or send for New Illustrated Book. Prices reduced.

MAGNETIC ELASTIC TRUSS

CO., 609 Sacramento Street, San Francisco.

OPHIR SILVER MINING COMPANY.—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 15th day of September, 1878, an assessment (No. 33) of one dollar per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, No. 203 Bush Street, Room 9, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the 15th day of October, 1878, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction, and, unless payment is made before, will be sold on MONDAY, the fourth day of November, 1878, to pay delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertisement and expenses of sale.

By order of the Board of Directors.

C. L. McCOY, Secretary.

Office—No. 203 Bush Street, Room 9, San Francisco, California.

BEST KOHLER & CHASE
SAN FRANCISCO
& OAKLAND.

THE VERSE CARPENTERS.

Specimens of their Handiwork.

As I stoop to kiss your eyelids,
I catch your babe's breath—
ne whiff is all so sweet,
And my hopes lie prone in death.

For my nostrils never deceive me—
And, though I hate to speak,
No eardrum can see can sinther
The scent of the loaded tank.

I've a message from thy wife,
Baby mine! Baby mine!
He says I am a liar.
Baby mine! Baby mine!
But he's coming back to thee,
And, O Lord, when he meets me,
I shall pass him, one, two, three,
Baby mine! Baby mine!

Breathes there a man with soul so dead,
Whose heart is stony and cold,
"Hail, my heart, and credit here!"
It is set in the flaming lead."

—St. Louis Journal.

If such there be, mark him well,
With a pail of water 'neath his heel,
Who'd sooner in champagne get tight
Than drink the Berlin beverage white.

—Wash. Post.

Break, break, break,
For the pathless woods, oh, see!
For the tender hands that will never come back
To the Pullman car company.

—Burlington Hawkeye.

Longings.

The boy sat on the orchard fence,
His face was wreathed with woe;
To reach his home, far, far from thence,
Long miles he had to go.

Green apples that would fill a peck
He'd stowed within his hold;
And now, a writhing, tortured wreck,
Distressing to behold.

He called aloud, "O Lord! O Lord!"
But ah! he called in vain;
With venereal grip-oid cholera morbi
Just tied him up again.

—Free Press.

Beside the grand old ocean
She stood in rapt devotion;
With a look that seemed to grasp some visionary land;
Then turned about her face,
One of the bare-foot graces,
And her fairy feet retreating made post-holes in the sand.

Were it not for Eve, mankind to day
In Eden's fair garden would dwell;
And yet we have the charming daughters
Of the woman who, tempted, fell."

—Idiom.

Our baby is a little gem
Of purest ray serene;
So don't forget to watch her, dear,
And keep her pug nose clean!"

—Daily News.

"Tis sweet this lovely summer day
To play or sport,
Especially with your favorite miss;
And if she miss, the way to pay
Her fault is this—to take a kiss;
But of the whole your skin, it is no sin
To smack her back, and stop her chin
Ere she begin, for love or win,
The other way to play coquet is all too thin.

—Washington Capital.

Classic.

"What monarch do I mind you of,
My little one?" said Gaspar,
As with ever-handy arms
He suddenly did clasp her;
"I cannot tell," she made reply,
The while he sought to squeeze her;
"You can't? Why, then, I something like A modern Julia seier?"

—London Gazette.

An Improvement on "The Parson."
The Parson on the sea shore stands;
His hair is wet with spray;
He lends his head, he clasps her hands,
And meets her lips half way.

—Burlington Hawkeye.

Thro' the Rye.

Side by side at eventide,
They wandered through the rye
Lo! from afar, they saw a bar,
And quickly they drew nigh.
Then without talk they drew the cork,
And saily, saily, saily, they drank;
While side by side, the golden tide
Of rye wandered through their hands.

—Hawkeye Republication.

The Feast of the Gods.

TRANSLATION OF THE FEAST OF THE GODS.

Vulcan rose, and to her hands the tables heaved,
Which, with a "mho," the wife resumed, and then up,
Remarking, "My regards," and quitted it off.
Then to the rest he filled, only asking
If they took it straight, or how;
To which they each replied:
"No how in mine, if it please thee."
And then, in turn, applied the goblet
To his quivering lips.

Vulcan, with awkward grace, his office pined,
Observing, apologetically, that he had not Shown a better mule, or force a shudder;
Then play the barterer for a moment, and Then Juno recovered him with a smile,
And said they cared more for his amnesia
Than the way in which he was doing.
Or words to that effect;
And cried, "We won't go home again."
And "This time, boys, with me."

Thus the best of the general assembly
In feasts and merriment and select affairs,
Apollo twanged the catgut, and the ripples
With voice alternate of the chorus sang,
While good-like he for shaker, the festive sang.

Meanwhile the radiant sun to mid sight
Descending swift, and down the Western sky;
And still they did not heed him.
To their stary dimes, but lively called
For their respective nectars with a steele,
Big as the back of a twenty-five place,
Until the police happened along,
And yanked them off to the main place,
Where they were sent up for sixty days each
And fined two dollars and a half
For disturbing the peace of high Olympus.

—Old City Derrick.

ARLINGTON HOTEL,

SANTA BARBARA, CAL.

NO HOTEL ON THE PACIFIC
Coast can surpass the ARLINGTON in the airy cheerfulness and convenience of its arrangements. None can equal it in the natural and artistic beauty of its surroundings. The readers of the ARGONAUT will be pleased to know that the problem of combining solid comfort within doors, inexhaustible pleasure without, and calm contentment all the time, at a very economical rate of expenditure, has been solved at the ARLINGTON, and is respectfully submitted by GEO. L. BROMLEY, Manager.

BERKELEY GYMNASIUM

The Berkeley Gymnasium (a preparatory school to the University)—a first-class boarding-school establishment in the interests of higher education, and in opposition to the cramming system of the small colleges and military academies of the State. The next term will commence July 24th. Examination of candidates for admission July 22d and 23d. Fully requested instructions have been provided during the summer months for students preparing for the August examinations at the University. For catalogue or particulars, address

JOHN F. BURRIS, PRINCIPAL,
BERKELEY, CALIFORNIA.

NOTE.—We desire to call special attention to the organization of our Grammar Department, separate from the Academy, and which the patronage of parents and guardians of small boys.

GOLDEN GATE ACADEMY

AND CADET SCHOOL.

Next year will commence July 30, 1878.

For circulars, address
D. P. SACKETT, A. M., Principal,
Oakland, Cal.

J. C. MERRILL & CO.

SHIPPING

COMMISSION MERCHANTS,

Agents for the
SANDWICH ISLANDS AND OREGON PACKET LINES.

204 AND 206 CALIFORNIA ST. San Francisco.

REDINGTON'S FLAVORING EXTRACTS

ARE THE PERFECTLY PURE
and highly concentrated Extracts of

FRESH FRUITS

Prepared with great care. They are put up in superior style, in a bottle holding twice as much as ordinary brands of Extracts.
Comparing quality and contents, none other are nearly so cheap.
Wherever tested on THEIR MERITS, they have been adopted in preference to all others, and now are the

STANDARD FLAVORING EXTRACTS

Of the Pacific coast. Dealers will find them to give better satisfaction to the consumers than any other kind and are respectfully requested to give them a trial.

REDINGTON & CO.
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

H. P. WAKELEE & CO.,

Druggists, Importers of Foreign
and Domestic Drugs, Chemicals, and Perfumery.

No. 145 Montgomery Street, under the Oriental Hotel, San Francisco.

PARTICULAR ATTENTION PAID
to the Dispensing of Physicians' Prescriptions, the dispensing of all entrusted only to the most competent hands, while every care is taken to ensure the purity of all preparations.

GEO. W. PRESCOTT. IRVING M. SCOTT. H. T. SCOTT.

UNION IRON WORKS

(Founded 1843.) Post Office Box 2178.

COR. FIRST AND MISSION STREETS,
SAN FRANCISCO

MANUFACTURERS OF
Compressed Engines,
Air Compressors,
Rock Drills,
Portable Hoisting Engines,
Marine Stationary and Portable Boilers
Bully Hoist, complete.

CONSTANTLY ON HAND AND FOR SALE.

Direct-acting Pumping and Hoisting Engines,
Upright and Stationary Engines,
Quartz Crushing and Amalgamating Machinery
Blake's Rock Breakers,
Smelting Furnaces,
Quicksilver Pumps,
Chlorinating Furnaces,
Casting Pumps,
Steam Pumps.

All manufactured by us of the best materials, design, and workmanship, and furnished at lower rates than by Eastern manufacturers.

PRESCOTT, SCOTT & CO.

MUSIC BOXES

OF ALL DESCRIPTIONS AND OF
Standard Reputation, playing from one to over one hundred airs. The largest and best assortment in this city. MUSICAL BOXES WITH CHANGEABLE CYLINDERS always on hand. New and interesting styles constantly received. Call and examine our stock.
REPAIRING OF MUSICAL BOXES thoroughly done in all their particularities.

M. J. PAILLARD & CO.,

MANUFACTURERS AND IMPORTERS,

120 Sutter Street, San Francisco.

Branch of House, 620 Broadway, New York.

MILLER & RICHARD, SOLE MAKERS OF EXTRA-HARD METAL SCOTCH TYPE.

SPECIAL AGENTS FOR
THE CAMPBELL, HOE, AND PEERLESS
PRESSES.

No. 520 COMMERCIAL STREET,
And 205 Leidesdorff Street, San Francisco.

O. F. WILLEY & CO.,

IMPORTERS AND MANUFACTURERS OF

FINE CARRIAGES AND WAGONS

No. 427 MONTGOMERY ST., SAN FRANCISCO.

Agents for the sale of Wagens manufactured by
BREWSTER & CO., New York,
W. D. ROGERS, Philadelphia,
C. S. CAFFEY, Camden, N. J.,
WOOD BROTHERS, New York,
H. KILHAM & CO., New Haven,
COOLING BROS., Wilmington

ALSO, AGENTS FOR
HARNESS MANUFACTURED BY WOOD GIBSON,
TOMPKINS & MANDEVILLE, AND
A. H. DUNSCOMBE.

Also, a fine assortment of Robes, Blankets, Nets, Whips, etc.

J. W. BRECKINRIDGE, DANIEL Z. VOST,
Member S. F. Stock and Ex. Board.

BRECKINRIDGE & VOST,
STOCK BROKERS,
S. E. corner Montgomery and California Sts.

MOODY'S Drug and Prescription STORE,

Northwest corner Polk and Pine Streets.

Prescriptions prepared with care from the purest of Drugs and Chemicals.

CHAS. N. FOX, M. E. KELLOGG.

FOX & KELLOGG,

ATTORNEYS AND COUNSELORS
AT LAW, San Francisco, Cal.

Office, No. 530 California Street, Rooms 1, 2, and 3.

S. B. WAKEFIELD, V. W. FOSTER,
Member S. F. Stock and Exchange Board.

S. B. WAKEFIELD & CO.

STOCK & EXCHANGE BROKERS,

514 Pine Street, San Francisco.

CALIFORNIA FARMERS' MUTUAL

Fire Insurance Company

[ESTABLISHED IN 1874.]

Paid up Capital ..... $200,000
Assets exceed ..... 326,000

PRINCIPAL OFFICE, 209 SANSOME ST.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

THOS. FLINT, President. J. W. FOARD, Manager.

FRED. K. REE, Secretary.

I. G. GARDNER, General Agent.

JOHN C. STAPLES, Special Agent.

COMMERCIAL INSURANCE COMPANY OF CALIF., FIRE AND MARINE.

Principal office, 405 California Street, San Francisco.

JOHN H. WISE, President.
CHAS. A. LATON, Secretary.

THE STATE INVESTMENT

INSURANCE COMPANY, FIRE AND MARINE

CASH ASSETS ..... $450,000

Principal Office, 218 and 220 Sansome Street, San Francisco

OFFICERS:

A. J. BRYANT, President.

RICHARD IVERS, Vice-President.

CHAS. H. CUSHING, Secretary.

H. H. WATSON, Marine Surveor

SAVAGE MINING COMPANY.

Location of works, Virginia, Storey County, Nevada.

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Directors, held on the sixth (6th) day of September, 1878, an assessment (No. 35) of one dollar ($1) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 15, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the eighth (8th) day of October, 1878, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and, unless payment is made before, will be sold on MONDAY, the twenty-eighth day of October, 1878, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.

E. B. HOLMES, Secretary.

Office—Room 15, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—THE STATE

INVESTMENT AND INSURANCE COMPANY.

Dividend No. 24.—The monthly dividend for August will be paid on September 10, at their office, Nos. 218 and 220 Sansome Street.

CHS. H. CUSHING, Secretary.

San Francisco, September 5, 1878.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—OFFICE OF the Standard Gold Mining Company, San Francisco, Cal., Sept. 7, 1878.

At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above named company, held this day, Dividend No. 13 of one dollar per share was declared, payable on Thursday, Sept. 12, 1878. Transfer books closed on Monday, Sept. 9, 1878, at 3 o'clock P. M.

Office, Room 29 Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street third floor San Francisco, Cal.

WM. WILLIS, Secretary.

NORTHERN BELLE MILL AND

Mining Company.—The fourth annual meeting of the stockholders of the above named corporation, for the election of Directors and the transaction of such other business as may come before it, will be held on MONDAY, September 10th, 1878 (second Monday in September), at the hour of one o'clock P. M. on that day, at the office of the Company, Room No. 29, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California. Transfer books will be closed on Monday, September 2, 1878, at three o'clock P. M.

WM. WILLIS, Secretary.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.—NOTICE

is hereby given by the undersigned, Administrator of the Estate of MICHAEL KELLEHER, deceased, to all creditors of, and all persons having claims against, the said decedent, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers, within four months after the first publication of this notice, to the said Administrator at his place of business, Room 12, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery Street, in the City and County of San Francisco. Dated August 8th, 1878.

WILLIAM DOOLAN,
Administrator of the Estate of Michael Kelleher, deceased.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District, of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

MARY E. HENRY, plaintiff, vs. JAMES J. HENRY, defendant.—An action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to JAMES J. HENRY, defendant:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District, of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days; otherwise within forty days.—On judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony existing between plaintiff and defendant (as will appear more fully by reference to the complaint on file herein, to which your attention is hereby directed), and for general relief and costs of suit.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this Third day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight.

THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.

By W. STEVENSON, Deputy Clerk.

T. J. CROWLEY, Attorney for Plaintiff,

No. 629 Kearny Street.

COMMENCING SUNDAY, JULY 14, 1878.
Passenger trains will leave San Francisco, from Passenger Depot on Townsend Street, between Third and Fourth, as follows:
8.30 A. M. DAILY for San Jose, Gilroy, Hollister, Tres Pinos, Pajaro, Salinas, Soledad, and all Way Stations. At Pajaro, the Santa Cruz R. R. connects with this train for Aptos and Santa Cruz. At Salinas the M. & S. V. R. connects with this train for Monterey. At Soledad connections made with this train. PARLOR CAR attached to this train.

10.40 A. M. DAILY for San Jose and Way Stations.
3.30 P. M. DAILY (Sundays excepted) for Gilroy, Pajaro, Hollister, Tres Pinos, and Way Stations. Stage connection made with this train at SANTA CLARA for Pacific Congress Springs.

4.40 P. M. DAILY for San Jose and Way Stations.
6.30 P. M. DAILY for Menlo Park and Way Stations.

SUNDAYS AN EXTRA TRAIN will leave for San Jose and Way Stations at 9.30 A. M. Returning, will leave San Jose at 6.00 P. M.

EXCURSION TICKETS to San Jose and other points and return sold on Saturday and Sunday mornings. Good for return until following MONDAY, inclusive.

Also, Excursion Tickets to Monterey—good from Saturday until following Monday, inclusive.

A. C. BASSETT, H. R. JUDAH,
Superintendent, Asst. Pass. & Tkt. Agt.

SOUTHERN DIVISIONS.
Passengers for points on the Southern Divisions of the road will take the cars of the Central Pacific Railroad via OAKLAND, leaving SAN FRANCISCO via Ferry Landing, Market Street, at 4.00 P. M. daily, and making close connection at OAKLAND for SUMMER, MOHAVE, LOS ANGELES, WILMINGTON, ANAHEIM, COLTON, COLORADO RIVER, and YUMA.

NORTH PACIFIC COAST RAILROAD.

CHANGE OF TIME.

On and after Monday, August 5th, 1878, the two new, fast, and elegant steamers SAN RAFAEL and SALITO will run between San Francisco and San Rafael as follows:

Leave San Francisco.	Leave San Rafael.
From San Quentin Ferry, Market Street.	(Via San Quentin Ferry.)
7.15 A. M. for San Rafael.	6.30 A. M. for San Francisco.
9.40 " " & Junction	8.00 " " "
1.45 P. M. " "	9.00 " " "
4.10 " " "	11.00 " " "
5.10 " " "	3.20 P. M. " "
6.10 " for San Rafael.	4.45 " " "

(From Saucelito Ferry, Market Street.)
5.30 P. M. for all points between Saucelito and San Rafael.
1.45 P. M. Through train for Union Mills and way stations. Stage connections made daily, except Monday, for all points on North Coast.

SUNDAYS.	(Via San Quentin Ferry.)
(From San Quentin Ferry, Market Street.)	(Via San Quentin Ferry.)
10.00 A. M. for San Rafael.	8.35 A. M. for San Francisco.
12.30 P. M. " "	11.15 " " "
3.15 " " "	1.45 P. M. " "
5.45 " for San Rafael and Junction.	4.30 " " "
(From Saucelito Ferry, Market Street.)	(Via Saucelito Ferry.)
8.00 A. M. Excursion train, connecting at Junction with train for San Rafael.	6.45 P. M. for San Francisco.

SPECIAL NOTICE.
Round Trip Tickets between San Francisco and San Rafael have been reduced as follows: Week days, 75 cents; Sundays, 50 cents.
W. R. PRICE, General Ticket Agent.
JNO. W. DOHERTY, General Manager.

SAN FRANCISCO AND NORTH PACIFIC R. R.

Commencing Monday, July 29th, 1878, and until further notice, Boats and Trains will leave San Francisco (Washington Street Wharf), as follows:

3.30 P. M., DAILY, Sundays excepted, Steamer "James M. Donahue" (Washington Street Wharf), connecting with Mail and Express Train at Donahue for Petaluma, Santa Rosa, Healdsburg, Cloverdale, and way stations. Making stage connection at Lakeville for Sonoma; at Geyserville for Skaggs Springs, at Cloverdale for Ukiah, Lakeport, Mendocino City, Highland Springs, Bartlett Springs, Soda Bay, and the GEYSERS. Connections made at Fulton on the following morning for Korbels, Guerneville, and the Redwoods. (Arrive at San Francisco 10.15 A. M.)

SUNDAY EXCURSIONS AT REDUCED RATES.

8.00 A. M., Sundays only, via Donahue, for Cloverdale and way stations. Fares for the round trip: Donahue, $1; Petaluma, $1.50; Santa Rosa, $2; Healdsburg, $3; Cloverdale, $4. Connection made at Fulton for Laguna, Forestville, Korbels, Guerneville, the Russian River, and Big Trees. Fares for round trip: Fulton and Laguna, $2.50; Forestville, Korbels, and Guerneville, $3. (Arrive at San Francisco 6.55 P. M.) Freight received from 7 A. M. to 3.00 P. M. daily (except Sunday).

TICKET OFFICE, WASHINGTON STREET WHARF.
ARTHUR HUGHES, Gen. Manager. A. A. BEAN, Sup't.
P. E. DOUGHERTY, Gen. Pass. and Tkt. Agent.

R. P. & H. N. CLEMENT, ATTORNEYS-AT-LAW.

Nos. 2, 3, and 4, SHERMAN'S BUILDING, Montgomery Street, N. E. corner of Clay, San Francisco (P. O. Box 707).

NEWTON BOOTH, C. T. WHEELER, Sacramento, J. T. GLOVER, W. W. DODGE, San Francisco

W. W. DODGE & CO., WHOLESALE GROCERS.

Northwest corner Clay and Front Streets, San Francisco.

C. P. R. R.

COMMENCING SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 8, 1878, and until further notice, TRAINS AND BOATS WILL LEAVE SAN FRANCISCO:

OVERLAND TICKET OFFICE AT FERRY LANDING, MARKET STREET.

7.00 A. M., DAILY, VALLEJO Steamer (from Market Street Landing), connecting with the trains for Napa (Stages for Sonoma), Calistoga (The Geysers), and Sacramento. Connecting at Davis (Sundays, excepted) for Woodland and Knight's Landing, and at Woodland for Williams. (Arrive San Francisco 8.10 P. M.)

7.00 A. M., DAILY, LOCAL PASSENGER Train (via Oakland Ferry), arriving at San Jose at 9.45 A. M. Connecting at Niles with train via Livermore, arriving at Tracy at 11.30 A. M., and connecting with Atlantic Express. (Arrive San Francisco 6.05 P. M.)

8.00 A. M., DAILY, ATLANTIC Express Train (via Oakland Ferry), Northern Ry. and S. P. & T. R. R.) for Sacramento, Marysville, Redding (Portland, Or.) Colfax, Reno (Virginia City), Palisade (Eureka), Ogden, and Omaha. Connects at Galt with train arriving at lone at 3:40. (Arrive San Francisco 5.15 P. M.)

SUNDAY EXCURSION TICKETS TO SAN PABLO AND MARTINEZ AT REDUCED RATES.

10.00 A. M., DAILY, (VIA OAKLAND FERRY) Local Passenger Train to Haywards and Niles. (Arrive San Francisco 6.05 P. M.)

3.00 P. M., DAILY, SAN JOSE Passenger Train (via Oakland Ferry and Niles), stopping at all way stations. Arrive at San Jose at 5:20 P. M. (Arrive San Francisco at 9:35 A. M.)

3.00 P. M., DAILY, NORTHERN Railway Passenger Train (via Oakland Ferry) to San Pablo, Martinez, and Antioch. (Arrive San Francisco 9.35 A. M.)

4.00 P. M., DAILY, SOUTHERN Express Train (via Oakland Ferry, Northern Ry., and S. P. & T. R. R.) for Lathrop (and Stockton), Merced, Madera, Visalia, Sumner, Mojave, Newhall (San Buenaventura, and Santa Barbara), LOS ANGELES, "Santa Monica," Wilmington, Santa Ana (San Diego), Colton, and Yuma (Arizona Stages and Colorado River Steamers). Sleeping cars between Oakland, Los Angeles, and Yuma. (Arrive San Francisco at 12.35 P. M.)

4.00 P. M., SUNDAYS EXCEPTED, Vallejo Steamer (from Market Street Landing), connecting with trains for Calistoga (The Geysers), Woodland, Knight's Landing, and Sacramento, and at Sacramento with passenger train, leaving at 9:35 P. M., on Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays only, for Truckee, Reno, Carson, and Virginia. Sleeping cars between Vallejo and Carson. (Arrive San Francisco 11.10 A. M.)

4.00 P. M., SUNDAYS EXCEPTED, Sacramento Steamer (from Washington Street Wharf) for Benicia and Landings on the Sacramento River. (Arrive San Francisco 8.00 P. M.)

4.30 P. M., DAILY, THROUGH Third Class and Accommodation Train, via Oakland Ferry, Northern Ry., and S. P. & T. R. R.) connecting at Lathrop with train arriving at Los Angeles on second day at 11.55 A. M. (Arrive San Francisco 7.30 A. M.)

4.30 P. M., DAILY, LOCAL PASSENGER (via Oakland Ferry) to Haywards, Niles, and Livermore. (Arrive San Francisco 8.35 P. M.)

5.00 P. M., DAILY, OVERLAND Emigrant Train (via Oakland Ferry and Northern Railway), to Ogden, Omaha, and East. Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains: "Melrose."

FERRIES AND LOCAL TRAINS.

FROM SAN FRANCISCO, DAILY.

FROM SAN FRANCISCO, DAILY.
To Oakland.		To Alameda.		To Berkeley.		To Delaware Street.		To Daly.
A. M.	P. M.	A. M.	P. M.	A. M.	P. M.	A. M.	P. M.	A. M.	P. M.
6.10	12.30	7.00	7.00	6.10	7.00	7.30	6.10	8.30	6.10
7.00	1.00	8.00	8.00	7.30	8.00	8.30	7.00	9.30	7.00
7.30	1.30	9.00	9.00	8.00	9.00	9.30	8.00	10.30	8.00
8.00	2.00	10.00	10.00	8.30	10.00	10.30	9.00	11.30	9.00
8.30	3.00	11.00	11.00	9.00	10.30	11.30	10.00	12.30	10.00
9.00	3.30	12.00	12.00	10.00	11.30	12.30	11.00	1.30	11.00
9.30	4.00	P. M.		10.30	12.00	1.00	12.00	2.00	12.00
10.00	4.30	1.30	Sundays excepted.	11.00	12.30	2.00	1.00	3.00	1.30
10.30	5.00	2.00		1.30	1.00	2.00	3.30	2.00	2.00
11.00	5.30	2.30		1.30	1.30	2.30	4.00	2.30	2.30
11.30	6.00	3.00		1.30	2.00	3.00	4.30	3.00	3.00
12.00	6.30	3.30		1.30	2.30	3.30	5.00	3.30	3.30
.....	7.00	4.00		1.30	3.00	4.00	5.30	4.00	4.00
.....	8.10	B 7.00		2.00	3.30	4.30	6.00	4.30	4.30
.....	9.20	B 8.10		2.30	4.00	5.00	6.30	5.00	5.00
.....	10.30	C 10.30		3.00	4.30	5.30	7.00	5.30	5.30
.....	11.45	B 11.45		3.30	5.00	6.00	7.30	6.00	6.00
				To San Jose.		Change cars
				.....		at West
				.....		Oakland.
				B 11.45		3.00.

CHICKERING

PIANO WAREHOUSES,

31 POST ST., Mechanics' Institute Building.

ELEGANT PIANOS.

L. K. HAMMER,

Sole Agent for Pacific Coast.

Chickering Pianos are specially requested.
Sole agents for the Pacific Coast, 31 Post Street.

MUSIC

KNABE PIANOS,

IRVING PIANOS, ROGERS' UPRIGHT PIANOS,

Prince Organs, Waters' Organs, Sheet Music.

BANCROFT, KNIGHT & Co.,

733 MARKET STREET.

PIANOS

SCHOMACKER AND HENRY F. MILLER CELEBRATED PIANOS.

Pianos Tuned, Restored, and for Sale on the Installment Plan.

WOODWORTH, SCHELL & Co.

12 Post Street, San Francisco.

ALASKA

COMMERCIAL CO.

No. 310 SAN-OMI STREET.

WHOLESALE DEALER IN FURS.

JOS. L. HOWELL,

Importer and Manufacturer of

STATIONERY, BLANK BOOKS, LEGAL, CUSTOM-HOUSE, AND MISCELLANEOUS BLANKS.

624 Montgomery Street, Montgomery Block, San Francisco, California.

THE PACIFIC LAND AND TRUST CO.

RENT HOUSES,

COLLECT RENTS, MANAGE ESTATES

HOUSES AND LOTS FOR SALE

in this city, Oakland, and Alameda. Lands and Ranches for sale in all parts of the country. Agents in the principal cities. Collections made throughout the coast.

No. 534 CALIFORNIA STREET.

RARE ENGRAVINGS AND ETCHINGS.

H. K. VICKERY NOTIFIES HIS customers and the public that he has removed to a larger and more convenient place, at No. 227 Kearny Street (between 1st and 2nd Sts.), where he has a large collection of these beautiful and rare Works of Art. To those who cannot visit, he will send a complete receipt of a postal card, taken at the expense of engraving, for inspection at their convenience. He is also prepared to receive orders for the purchase of any of the above-mentioned Works of Art, at the lowest prices. H. K. VICKERY.

PALACE HOTEL RESTAURANT,

FIRST CLASS IN ALL RESPECTS.

QUIET AND DESIRABLE PLACE

for a family or for a party. 227 Entrance, 2nd St. A. D. SHARON.

OFFICE OF THE BODIE GOLD

Mineral Springs, R. O. C., San Francisco Stock Exchange Building, 2nd Floor, September 11, 1893. At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above named company, it was resolved to issue 2 of three dollar shares to each of the following named persons, to wit: A. W. H. LENT, Secretary.

PACIFIC BUSINESS COLLEGE,
1st St. San Francisco.

THE CAL. FURNITURE M'FG CO.

HAVE FIVE TIMES AS MUCH

FURNITURE

As any other house on this Coast, which has been purchased so low that we CAN and WILL sell at such prices that the poor can gratify their WISHES and the rich their TASTE. At the old stand.

NOS. 224 AND 226 BUSH STREET, S. F.

HERRMANN'S

FALL STYLES

ARE NOW OUT AT

336 KEARNY STREET, BETWEEN BUSH AND PINE,

.....AND.....

910 MARKET STREET, ABOVE STOCKTON.

SEND FOR ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE.

TERRACE SWIMMING BATHS

FOOT OF WEBSTER STREET, ON CENTRAL AVENUE, ALAMEDA BEACH, now open to the public, and pronounced by the "elite" of San Francisco and Oakland as the only place for a good bath on the Pacific Coast. Perfect security against masters of the deep. High water at all times of day and night.

SPECIAL ACCOMMODATIONS FOR LADIES UNATTENDED.

Reached in thirty-five minutes from San Francisco by steamer NEWARK—depart on the previous day at 1 P. M. R. to Market Station, or from Oakland by horse-cars at Broadway Station, running within two blocks of the Baths. BATHS, 25 CENTS, including Private Room, Bathing Suits, Towels, Shower Baths, etc.

R. HALEY & C. A. EDSON, Proprietors.

A GREAT INSURANCE COMPANY.

THE NEW ENGLAND MUTUAL LIFE INS. CO OF BOSTON

Is one of the greatest trust institutions of the present age. It was organized over forty years ago, and under a conservative management it has grown, and strengthened, and is now at the head of honored and trusted companies for the insurance of life in the U. S. Its policies are issued under the non-forfeiture law of Massachusetts. It charges no more for its insurance than those companies that forfeit the policy in case of non-payment of premium when due. Its present assets are $14,893,427 78, and its surplus over all liabilities amount to $2,750,965 04. Wallace Everson, No. 328 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, is the general agent for California and the Pacific States and Territories, and is ever ready to give all information desired.

MRS. R. G. LEWIS, DRESS MAKING PARLORS,

ROOMS 27 AND 28,

Thurloe Block, corner Sutter and Kearny Streets, San Francisco.

Elegant Walking Suits, Evening Toilets, Bridal Trousseau, and Mourning Costumes, manufactured at the shortest notice, after the latest Parisian modes. TAKE THE ELEVATOR.

MISS K. McCARRICK, MILLINERY PARLORS

135 KEARNY STREET, NEAR SUTTER, UP STAIRS.

The finest assortment of French Millinery Goods in the city always on hand.

HOME IN THE COUNTRY. JOHN E. QUINN, NOOK FARM.

1400 Polk Street, corner Pine.

FAMILIES WISHING TO SPEND

the Summer in the country will find this a cheerful home, and beautiful scenery of such endless variety as tempt to healthful exercise and recreation. We furnish good accommodations and an excellent table. Good fishing and boating on the premises. Four trains from San Francisco pass the station daily. Address

E. B. SMITH, Rutherford, Napa County, Cal.

THE LARGEST AND BEST SElected stock of FANCY GOODS, LADIES' AND GENTS' FURNISHING GOODS, DRESS TRIMMINGS, KID AND LISLE THREAD GLOVES,

And all the popular novelties in the Fancy Goods line, out-side of Kearny Street.

DIAMONDS, WATCHES, JEWELRY AND SILVERWARE

AT GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

STERLING SILVER SPOONS & FORKS, .925 FINE, AT

$1.50 PER OUNCE.

Geo. C. Shreve & Co.,

110 MONTGOMERY STREET.

W. W. MONTAGUE & CO.

FRENCH RANGES

(SEE LISTING)

VAN'S WROUGHT IRON

PORTABLE RANGES.

COOKING, PARLOR, AND HEATING

STOVES.

The largest stock and greatest variety on the Pacific coast. Over 1500 in stock, different styles and patterns to select from. Everything supplied to equip a kitchen complete.

Nos. 110, 112, 114, 118, & 120 BATTERY ST.

SEWING MACHINES.

THE HIGH REPUTATION OF THE

Grover & Baker Machine is the result of true worth and long years of phenomenal service.

J. W. EVANS, Post Street.

MORRIS, SCHWAB & CO.

FINE-ART DEALERS.

FREE ART GALLERY.

Also a large assortment of ARTISTS' MATERIAL, GOLD FRAMES, etc.

19 AND 21 POST STREET.

WARREROOMS, N. W. CORNER KEARNY AND SUTTER STREETS.

SHERMAN, HYDE & CO.

SHEET MUSIC, MUSIC BOOKS, MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

WAKELEE'S

AUREOLINE

Prepared by Chemist

GOLDEN HAIR

SO MUCH ADMIRER. SUPERIOR

to the imported article for reason of its freedom and the care used in its production. Price, large bottles, $2.00. Manufactured by H. W. WAKELEE & CO., Druggists, corner Montgomery and Bush Sts.

THOMAS BOYSON, M. D.

(University of Copenhagen, Denmark).

PHYSICIAN AND SURGEON. Office and Residence, 112 Kearny Street. Office hours, 11 A. M. to 1 P. M., 7 to 9 P. M. Sunday 11 to 1 only. Telephone in the office.

BUY YOUR SHIRTS AT

BEAMISH'S

The Argonaut.

VOL. III. NO. 11.

SAN FRANCISCO, SEPTEMBER 21, 1878.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

TAXATION IN CALIFORNIA.

TO THE ARGONAUT:—Our delegates will shortly assemble to frame a new Constitution for the State. Among the most important subjects which will require their attention is Taxation. Judging from the indications presented in the speeches and writings of such of these delegates as have given their views to the public, it would not appear that they have devoted much attention to the subject.

What is taxation? The name given to those systems by which governments obtain support from their constituencies. When these governments are supreme, as is the case with our Federal government, one of the means, and one of the most effective and equitable means, of taxation, is a paper currency gradually increased, as during your late civil war. When the governments are not supreme—as is, for example, that of this State—taxation is always, and even when they are supreme, it is usually confined to annual charges upon lands, polls, incomes, trade, and professional licenses and the like. In order to fix these charges in such a way that justice may be done, as nearly as may be, to every member of the community, it is necessary to be familiar with the numerous experiments that have been already made on the subject; to understand the working of these experiments, it is necessary to study the nature both of communities and taxes; and to render this sum of knowledge practically available, it is necessary to reduce it to a few general principles. Following this method I will venture to lay down, as the result of experience, the following principles of taxation:

(1.) Taxes and public services are best levied in money. The tribute of China, like our militia, jury, volunteer fire, and turnpike road services, is a cumbersome and expensive method of obtaining support for government.

(2.) As men are not alike important in the social scale, and equality of taxes would be far from equality of sacrifice, it has been found expedient to levy taxes, not upon man and man alike, but partly upon men, as in poll-taxes; partly upon property, as the possession of land, goods, or legacies; partly upon certain incidents of social activity, as imports, exports, or the sale of commodities; and partly upon profits, as in income taxes. This is mentioned as a historical fact, and not as a principle of taxation; there is no principle embodied in it, but simply empiricism—at best, expediency.

(3.) It is always to be borne in mind that revenues from taxes are obtained, not from things or incidents, but from men. To say that land is taxed at ten dollars an acre or that incomes are taxed one per cent. means that the man who owns an acre of land and whose income is a thousand dollars a year are each to pay ten dollars a year. Nor are women and children included in the term men. As a general rule these classes of society are dependent for their support upon the exertions of men. It is men, therefore, and, commonly, only men, who pay taxes.

(4.) The weight of taxation can not be measured merely by money. It is necessary, also, to know how much, by way of governmental advantages, the tax-payer receives in return. When government undertakes and performs many useful functions, a seemingly high rate of taxation may be, in reality, a very great advantage to the tax-payer. When, on the contrary, government undertakes but few useful functions, or, having undertaken them, refuses or neglects to perform them, a seemingly low rate of taxation may be, in reality, a great burden to the tax-payer. Compared with the city of London our taxes here are seemingly low; in reality they are very high. In London the city government promises the tax-payer police, protection against fire, justice, water, clean streets and sewers, good roads, cheap transit, and many other advantages; and he gets them all. His annual payments of taxes is, therefore, an economical investment. In San Francisco, on the contrary, he obtains so few of these advantages, and they come to him so imperfect a form, that his payment of taxes is almost pure waste. The police is bad, justice is partial and dilatory, water is not served by the municipality, the streets are not cleaned, the sewers are in a horrible condition, the pavements are bad, and the cab system is one of extortion. The fire department is good; but in the absence of proper building regulations, its benefits are greatly neutralized. The current rates of insurance tell the story. On dwelling houses in London they are usually 25 cents on the $100; in Philadelphia, 25 to 30 cents; in New York, 30 to 35 cents; in Brooklyn (built, like San Francisco, very largely of wood), 37½ cents; and in San Francisco, $1.50. Our public school system is also good, very good; but a tenth of our population—the Chinese, who pay at least a tenth of our taxes, and, I believe, much more—are excluded from its benefits. I do not complain of this; I merely mention it. Our children have here, also, to buy their own books, which are sold at monopoly prices. This is not the case in any other country, nor even in our Eastern States. This of itself amounts to a very considerable tax, of which no mention is made in our financial accounts. Bearing in mind the importance of these considerations concerning what the tax-payer gets for his money, it will be found that a comparison merely of the money paid for taxes in different countries and municipalities is fallacious and misleading.

(5.) It is the nature of men to seek ease and evade burdens; hence, in social life there is maintained a continual struggle to secure the largest share of benefits and the smallest of sacrifices. This struggle is kept up by taking advantage of the operation of prices, wages, and the rate of interest, for these are the invisible machines which tend to equitably level the conditions of men. However great may be the initial inequality of profit in trade, or losses by the payment of taxes, these machines will eventually overcome such inequality.

(6.) The tendency of taxation, as of commercial profits, toward equalization is continual, but it varies in rapidity with every age and country. For example, it is much more rapid in America than in Europe, and in Europe than in Asia. It is more rapid in a progressive than in a decaying country. For example, in France of to-day than in France under the ancien regime.

(7.) The strength of these tendencies and the velocity of their operation is in direct proportion to the freedom and intelligence of society. They are most rapid in the United States; they are least rapid in Russia and the countries of the Orient.

(8.) Hence, in countries or ages enjoying a high degree of social freedom, it makes but little difference how unequally taxes are laid at the outset, provided they are so laid as to be non-evadable. On the contrary, initial inequality in countries not so favored is a source of grave injustice, and this continues so long, and is so slightly and so slowly overcome by the operation of prices, wages, and interest, that if enforced for a long time it will wholly overthrow the rights of man and the foundations of society.

(9.) Of all countries this one is the freest, and thus it is that, no matter what system of taxation is pursued—provided such system is not changed so often that equalization is not defeated by new distributions of burdens—equality of sacrifice is sure to follow. Experience has proved that the most onerous and initially unequal burdens of taxation which we have ever been called upon to bear have become equalized in the course of three years' time. In most instances a single year, and in some instances six months, have been sufficient. For proof of this assertion I refer to the evidence contained in the Treasury Report on the tariff, dated December 11, 1868. Samuel Taylor Coleridge, in his Table Talk, and John C. Calhoun, in his celebrated tariff speech of August 25, 1847—these two men having been among the ablest thinkers produced respectively by England and America—both support this view.

(10.) Equality of taxation means equality of sacrifice. To quote John Stuart Mill, it means to apportion the contribution of each man toward the expenses of government, so that he shall feel neither more nor less inconvenience from his share of the payment than every other man experiences from his. Some writers have argued that such equality is attained by taxing property ad valorem. This is the view held by Mr. Laioe, the author of a draft of a new Constitution for our State. But, taken by itself, it is fallacious. In the first place, it cannot be admitted that to be protected in the ownership of, for instance, ten times as much property, is to be ten times as much protected. Neither can it be truly said that the protection of property worth, for instance, ten thousand dollars, costs the State ten times as much as the protection of property worth one thousand dollars. The same judges, soldiers, sailors, who protect the one, protect the other; and the larger property does not necessarily, though it may sometimes, require more policemen, firemen, etc. In the second place, such a view would exempt from taxation all those who possessed no property. Government is not established solely for the protection of property. It performs many other functions. Among others it protects the person. Observing this fact, other writers claim that equality of taxation is best attained by assessing polls. This view, taken by itself, is also fallacious; for every man does not require the same degree of protection. Protection to the person is necessary in proportion as a man is weak and unable to protect himself. The indigent, the blind, the lame, the idiotic, require more protection to the person than the wealthy and the sound in body and mind. Yet what would be thought of a system of taxation that assessed the poor and miserable and exempted the rich and favored? The more we reason upon this theme the more it is evident that equality of sacrifice is not to be attained by any attempt at nice justification at the outset. Happily, it is to be attained otherwise. All that is necessary to be done is to establish a system that is specific and non-evadable. The operation of prices and wages will soon make it equitable, and equality of sacrifice will be the result. This operation of prices and wages is so important in its relations to our tax system that I desire to set it forth more at length.

Let us suppose, for the sake of illustration, that we were to levy the entire amount required for the support of our State Government upon real estate. It would seem to follow that those who possessed no real estate would pay no taxes. But this is incorrect. We must all live upon the land; our food, clothing, and shelter must all be derived from it; and those who would rent us dwellings, or sell us farm or factory produce, would recoup themselves by adding to the prices of their commodities and services a portion of the taxes which they would be called upon to pay. What would restrain them from charging more than a portion? Competition. What would compel us to pay it? Competition. Perhaps it may be fancied that the millionaire, who invests his fortune in government bonds, lives in a modest dwelling, and keeps a moderate table, would escape a fair share of the public burdens. Not at all. Escape is impossible in a free country. In the first place he would have to accept a lower rate of interest upon his bonds than would be attainable were there no taxes to be paid by real estate owners, or some other class of society. Taxes come out of profits, and lower them. Low profits make low interest, and being compelled to accept a low rate of interest upon his capital, the millionaire is mulcted of his dues to the public coffers just as effectually as though he had to pay an income tax. Indeed, more effectually; for income taxes are always evadable, and taxes upon real estate are not.

Let us next suppose that the entire sum of taxation were laid upon incomes from capital, and that such taxes were non-evadable, which is not the case. It would in this case seem to follow that those who possessed no capital, and no incomes, would pay no taxes. But this conclusion is also faulty. We must all employ capital, or produce would be impossible. The food we consume is the result of a hoard of grain from last year's crop, and is therefore capital; the implements and machinery of production, transportation, and trade are other forms of capital, the use of which we must pay for to those who own them. The very street-cars belong to capitalists, who live upon the incomes which they earn. If these incomes were made to bear the brunt of taxation, we should very soon perceive an advance in the price of food, clothing, rents, and transportation, which capitalists would be required solely to bear at the outset. Equalization would take place in the same way as in the case of a unitary tax upon real estate; only in the one case the State would collect all its dues, and in the other it would not. Reliance upon an income tax would produce a deficit in the public revenues, and encourage evasion and dishonesty.

There is no system of taxation which is equitable at the outset. All systems are unfair, simply because the requirements of a State, the incidents of social life, the relations of men and things to one another, and the integrity of the social units, are all variable elements in their bearing upon a tax system. The State pays its expenses from day to day; but it cannot levy taxes every twenty-four hours. Social life is unremittent; but the citizen cannot be expected to go to the tax office every time he makes a profit in trade. One hour a man sells, the next he buys; one day he is a producer, the next a consumer; this week he profits, the next he loses; this month he is a laborer, the next a stock speculator. His relations to other men and to things continually change. The qualities of the mind are also variable. One man is honest, and pays his taxes; another is dishonest, and evades them if he can. Tax systems cannot be made pliant with this endless play of circumstances. They must be plain, non-evadable, and permanent. In a free State competition will take care of the rest.

And here let me remark that too slavish an adherence to the four principles laid down by the justly celebrated Adam Smith is apt to promote too narrow a view of this great subject. These four principles are: That taxes should be paid in proportion to revenue; that taxes should be certain, and not arbitrary; that the time of payment should be regulated by the convenience of the payer; and that taxes ought to be economical and non-obtrusive. Whatever may have been the merits of these maxims at the time and in the country when and where they were elaborated, they possess but few now and in this country. The first one, as already shown, is fallacious; the second is unnecessary, all taxes being now certain and unarbitrary; and the third has been antiquated by the introduction of the credit system. Only the fourth one is of any practical value at present, and this is covered by the requirement herein before mentioned—that tax systems should be plain and non-evadable; that taxes should be laid upon one, or, at most, a few tangible or palpable incidents of social life.

Far more important than any of the maxims laid down by Adam Smith is the requirement that tax systems shall be permanent; and as a guide to legislation, infinitely more valuable is the principle that equality of taxation can not be obtained by any justification, however nice, at the outset; and that it can be, and is always, and in a free State is quickly, attained by the operation of prices, wages, and the rate of interest.

No matter upon whose shoulders the first incidence of a tax falls, it is sure to be transferred to others. This transfer of liability occurs again and again, until, having reached to the furthestmost, it finds its way back like the answering ripples of a pond to the point from whence it started, though somewhat modified in its intensity—every intermediate individual or class having had to suffer, in the increased prices of the products or services of those immediately beyond them, a portion (as yet not quite his or their due portion) of the liability. These ripples and answering ripples of transferred liability, after repeatedly flowing back and forth into one another, come at length to a comparative state of rest, and thus each member of the community becomes in the end equally burdened.

These are the phenomena that attend the imposition of taxes in a State as free as ours. These are the principles that observation, extending over many countries and ages, through phases of progress and phases of decay, reveals to the student of man and of governments. Upon a future occasion I will proceed to apply them practically to the circumstances that surround us. ATLANTICUS.

This item from the Ohio Statesman contains mystery: "He was a long, lean, seedy-looking individual, with a blond moustache which looked as though it had at one time been cultivated by the most artistic tonsorial artist; in fact, he generally presented the appearance of one who has fallen from a high social position. He walked into a State Street saloon, went down into the second-story pocket of his pantaloons and drew forth a dime, and called for bourbon. 'Gentlemen,' says he, 'this is the last of my earthly possessions, and I want a drink. I have been a stock-broker, an owner of railroad bonds, and a leading merchant of San Francisco, but to-day I will accept a situation driving a street-car or a huckster wagon.' Receiving no reply from the bystanders he wandered dejectedly away." Who is this sufferer?

Three little girls of Baltimore, Maryland—Louise Niedhardt, Mamie Grete, and Amelia Ohlender—anxious to do something for the yellow fever sufferers, pooled their wealth and found that it amounted to two cents. With this they bought candy, horrified a table and cloth, and exposed their wares for sale. The neighbors, seeing them so much in earnest, contributed articles, and the young merchants finally sold out their entire stock for $10.50. They took the money to the station-house and gave it to the police captain, who made them a speech and turned the contribution over to the mayor in their names. Bronze John ought, in decency, to stand aside for such enterprising charity as this.

The letters of Kwang Chang Ling, giving the Chinese side of the Chinese question, communicated to this journal under dates of August 3d, 10th, 17th, and September 7th, have been published in pamphlet form, and copies can now be obtained at this office.

A MONO WIDOW.

And the Swains who Came a-wooing Her.

A rambling old farm-house, weather-beaten and dingy, stands back from the Mono trail, about six miles from Bridgeport. A well-kept orchard conceals the structure, and the towering granite cliffs fringed with fragrant sugar-pines and cedars, rising on the left, shield it from the fierce storms that sweep down from the cloud-capped peaks of the high Sierra. Barns and outhouses in various stages of repair, all neat and weather-proof, flank the main building on the right, and away to the north stretches acre upon acre of cleared land, most of which is "in a high state of cultivation."

The soft twilight of a warm June day was falling upon this sequestered nook, as a light buggy drawn by a single horse and containing two men came over the brow of the hill above the farm-house. The driver was an old man whose rugged appearance indicated long and continuous contact with the wild life of the border. His companion was much younger—a stalwart, bright-eyed, fair-haired man, with a half-impudent, nonchalant air that bespoke perfect familiarity with the customs of the free-handed mountaineer.

He evidently belonged to that class, at one time common enough in the mining camps of California and Nevada, who, although brave to the verge of recklessness, bore no analogy in disposition to the brave and desperado of these sections, and who, while they avoided the desperate characters of the mushroom cities, never failed to respond when called upon to resist wrong or resent an insult.

From the summit of the hill over which the weary horse was toiling, a clear view of the ranch below was visible.

"There's the widow Johnson's place, Dick," said the elder, pointing down upon the farm-house.

"The widow Johnson?" interrogated the other.

"Why, yes; nothing strange about that, is there?" asked the elder, whipping up. "Haven't you ever heard of the widow Johnson?"

"Not that I recollect," replied Dick. "I've heard of Johnson's—it's not a very uncommon name—but I don't think I ever heard of the widow Johnson; at any rate I've never heard of this particular Johnson. Who is she, Jim?"

"She is the widow of Baldy Johnson of Tuolumne; she's—"

"What's that? Baldy Johnson of Chinese?" interrupted the young man.

"Oh, you know him, then?"

"I should say I did. We were the best kind of friends before he died. And so this is his widow, eh?"

The last words were spoken in a thoughtful tone, as if the speaker's mind was busy with other scenes—recollections revived by the old man's words.

"Yes, she's Baldy Johnson's widow, and if you've any thoughts of marrying, here's your chance. She's called handsome in this section, and besides that she's very rich—owns two or three thousand head of stock, most of it first-class beef cattle with magnificent ranges for grazing them, this ranch of about five hundred acres, and a fine wheat ranch in Stanislaus. She's got money in the bank, and they do say that old Baldy left her enough United States bonds to paper the shanty she lives in down there. She rides like a vaquero, shoots as true as a Comstock fighter, talks broad southwestern dialect, and flirts like a Mexican señorita. In addition to all this, she smokes strong tobacco (I never heard that she chewed though), swings a lariat from the saddle, and brags extensively about Baldy. In fact, she keeps a dozen suitors for her hand at a distance by praising Baldy and mourning over the doubtful contingency of ever meeting his like again. We'll stop there and I'll introduce you. Go for her, Dick, and if you don't make her come to time you won't lose anything—if you win, why you're a cool hundred thousand better off. You needn't mind her little idiosyncrasies; you know all women have their faults, and nine out of ten are less eligible than the widow Johnson. But, by the way, Dick, I wouldn't say anything about your acquaintance with Baldy, first off, just for the fun of the thing, you know. If you say you knew Baldy maybe she won't come it so strong on his virtues, and you'll lose a treat if she don't. It's the most amusing thing in the world to hear her run on about her 'old man,' as she calls him."

"All right, Jim; that's a good idea; and as she may have heard Baldy speak of me, just introduce me by some other name. Call me Sanders, for instance," said the young man, throwing a side glance of peculiar meaning at his companion, who, wholly unconscious, continued to urge the tired horse down the hill. "How old is she, Jim?"

"'Bout thirty; just the right age for you, Dick," answered Jim. "Here we are. Hullo—well, bless me, if the whole tribe haven't come down from Bridgeport. Yes, sir; it's Sunday afternoon, and the boys have sneaked down to have a quiet chat with the widow. I'll bet they're all inside sitting each other out, and the widow laughing in her sleeve at them. You're in the nick of time, Dick, for fun, but you'll have to strike the iron while it's hot or some of them will get away with you. Make red hot love to her from the jump; don't mind the company; it'll please her, and you'll win the game."

"How do you know there's anybody here?" asked Dick, looking across the fence, toward the house.

"The corral's full of horses; don't you see? That piebald mare belongs to Steve Mellus, the richest man in the county, I reckon—and the oldest. He's got no show. That yellow mustang with the plaited mane is Jack Reynolds'; measures tape at Howson's, parts his hair in the middle, wears eye-glasses and 'Burnsides.' He won't do. She's too masculine to tie a man-woman to her apron strings. The black mare with the silver-mounted bridle is owned by Bill York—gambler. I don't know how he's likely to pan out, but I don't believe she wants to open a reform school and risk her property in a faro bank. The gray horse is Tom Murphy's; he's superintendent of the Humbug Mine, working it for a San Francisco company; he's got money, but he speculates, and that won't suit Mistress Johnson either. Then there's 'Bro Jackson's roan filly; he's an honest miner, but Ambrose is rather too slow. The claybank is Gus Thomson's; he's a stock man, and wants to consolidate his ranges with the widow's. In my opinion Thomson's got the best chance of the whole crew, if close dealing don't bar him out. But then Baldy was a close calculator, too, you know, and maybe that's in his favor. That's all, I believe—no it ain't either. Well, here, this is a convention and no mistake. That thing—"

—going over there under the apple trees completes the outfit. She belongs to Rufe Bivens—politician, wire-puller, schemer. He's cunning and plays his cards for all they're worth; he's our County Clerk. Look out for him, Dick. Now there's eight entries, three favorites—Gus Thomson, Rufe Bivens, and Dick—"

"Sanders!" interjected Dick, laughing and alighting from the buggy.

"Dick Sanders," repeated the other, tying his horse to a locust tree near the gate. "A fair field and no favor. I'll back you, Dick; now go in and win. Don't be bashful, old man; there ain't a bashful man in the whole crowd; that kind don't stand the ghost of a chance with the Widow."

With this warning Jim opened the gate and motioned for Dick to pass through. They walked leisurely up the poplar-lined avenue and knocked at the door of the house. The sound of the summons had scarcely died away when the door was thrown open, revealing a medium-sized, handsome woman; a woman well-proportioned and muscular, dressed in a tight-fitting, black riding habit. Her coal black hair was somewhat disheveled and fell over her shoulders with a graceful abandon. Her brilliant, dark eyes flashed with pleasure as they fell upon Dick's companion, and she grasped his hand with all the heartiness of a hospitable and generous nature, wringing it with the strength of a man.

"Wall, if it ain't Jim Burr. Just back from Tuolumne, eh? Bin to Sonora? How's all the folks? Come in an' take a cheer. Here, Sam, take Mister Burr's hoss round to the barn—throw him some o' that clover hay out o' the top rack; the groun' barley's in the loft. Come in, Jim; don't be standin' round the door's ef ye hedn't no welcome; come in. There's nobody here to-day but a friend or two from Bridgeport," and the widow laughed long and loud, but not unmusically, at the idea of seven male visitors being "nobody." She led the way to the door of a room from which issued the mingled cadences of many voices. With her hand on the knob, the widow turned her head, and, with a half sober air, she said:

"Don't mind my dress, Jim—but you won't, I know; your friend might; so I'll just state fur his benefit that I've bin up the road a piece on hossback, an' w'en I got home these friends o' mine [here the widow laughed again] hed arrived an' I didn't hev much show to put on my other duds."

While she made these excuses she took a rapid inventory of Dick's exterior. "Don't mention it, Mrs. Johnson," said Burr. "Anything becomes you; but you haven't given me a chance to introduce my friend. Mrs. Johnson, Mr. Sanders—Mr. Dick Sanders."

"Happy to know ye, Mr. Sanders—Mr. Dick Sanders;" and the widow took another inventory of the young man from beneath her long lashes as she bowed and half ironically repeated his full name as given by Burr. Then, as if she had been playing a part in simply acknowledging the acquaintance in the conventional way, she took her hand from the knob, and, with a laugh, stretched it toward Dick.

"Put it there, young man; I'm a woman an' you're a man, but I don't go a cent on this bowin' an' scrapin'." Jim Burr's friend o' mine, an' you're a friend o' Jim's, an' thet settles it: you're a friend o' mine, an' Phoebe Johnson gives her hand to her friends. Shake."

And they did "shake."

"Come in, gentlemen," she added, opening the door and ushering her visitors into the neatly furnished parlor.

As they entered the assembled seven were silent. The "convention," as Burr called it, was a picture. The individual members were scattered around the sides of the room, some seated in easy, careless attitudes, and others rather constrained, according to their several dispositions. Bivens was pacing the room in his nervous, excited manner, and ceased a rapidly ejaculated speech on the coming county election as the three entered.

A perfect storm of welcomes greeted Burr, who seemed to be a favorite, and as he had been absent from Bridgeport for some time, several minutes were occupied in asking and answering questions regarding matters "over in Tuolumne."

As soon as the running fire of interrogatories and answers had somewhat subsided, the widow, who had been arranging sundry bottles and glasses on the centre table, spoke:

"Come up, boys, I know yer dry. Can't ye let a body git a word in edgeways? A person thet didn't know you'd think a flock o' blue jays'd broke loose. There's old rye in the black bottle an' gin in thet white bottle (I've got my opinion of the man thet drinks gin—my old man wouldn't touch it); the red bottle's brandy, the other one's common cookin' whisky, an' Baldy used ter say he'd rather hev one pint o' thet stuff in the house'n twenty gallons o' the best brandy or wine he ever see."

It is a remarkable fact that every man present helped himself from the bottle of "common cooking whisky," thereby indorsing the verdict of the deceased Baldy as to the superiority of this particular beverage.

"Gentlemen," said Burr, "allow me to propose a toast. Here's to the Widow Johnson, the Hebe of Mono County, the fairest flower in the Sierra. May she live long, and soon meet the man who will change her weeds for a wreath."

This sentiment was greeted with unanimous approval, and the glasses were immediately emptied.

The widow was not at all embarrassed by this laudatory exhibition, and, with an assumption of stern dignity, approached Burr and laid her hand on his shoulder.

"Now, look here, Mr. Burr, you're a friend o' mine, an' I don't deny it; but you're a married man, an' you've no right to throw your compliments aroun' loose thet way. I'll let Mrs. Burr know all about it; see ef I don't. My old man wouldn't do one sich a thing, or ef he did, I'd a known the reason why. Ye can't play it in thet style on a married woman now, I can tell ye. Sich stuff ez ye got of jist now'd come with better grace from some o' the single gentlemen here—from Mr. Dick Sanders, fur instance?"

All eyes were turned on Dick.

"You mustn't mind Jim, Mrs. Johnson; he's not used to soft-soaping the ladies, and don't always succeed as well as he ought to," was the conciliatory remark of that worthy.

"Soft-soap's good. No, sir, Jim Burr nor no other man ken soft-soap me: thet's Phoebe Johnson flat-footed. I'm nobody's fool; I larned thet from my old man Baldy. He used to say, 'Keep yer eye on the rooster thet lays it on thick; he's playin' to beat ye.' An' Baldy wasn't no man's fool, you bet." The widow smiled triumphantly upon her admirers as she quoted this piece of worldly philosophy.

"Thet's so. He an' I's talked matters an' things over many a time, an' I larned mos' all I know about stock an' cattle bargains from him," said Thomson, casting a glance of concentrated admiration upon the widow.

"I reckon ye did, Gus Thomson, but you've got a mighty sight to larn yet, I can tell ye," and the widow gave the young stock dealer a rather supercilious smile.

"Perhaps Mr. Johnson's accomplished widow could finish the young man's education," remarked York, rather sarcastically.

"You're right for once, Mr. York," answered the widow; "and who knows but what she might, ef she took a notion, an' was given a fair show."

These words, striking so close to the individual interests of those present, produced a visible sensation.

"Hope I have n't offended you," said Burr.

"No offense, Jim, only don't try it on any more—for your wife's sake, ye know," answered Mrs. Johnson.

"You were very fortunate, Mrs. Johnson, in the selection of a husband. Baldy Johnson was highly respected, and possessed sterling qualities that rendered him a favorite with all. He numbered his friends by the hundred, and his strict honesty gave him unlimited credit in his business transactions. That he was a kind, loving husband no one can for a moment doubt, for we have your own words to that effect," said Bivens, following out the general tenor of the conversation, namely, praise of the deceased Baldy. This was a shrewd stroke of policy on the part of the County Clerk, based upon the apparent fact that the widow's heart lay through a due appreciation of the "sterling qualities" of her late spouse.

The widow's face lighted up with gratified pride, and it was easy to perceive that the wily politician had made the master-stroke in this insidious assault upon the lady's affections. "Burr saw it instantly, and nudged Dick, at the same time winking at him to indicate that he thought a centre shot had been made.

"Thet's squar' talk, Mr. Bivens; sounds like one o' yer 'lection speeches, an' its the frozen truth, every word. Let's shake." The widow reached across the table, and took Bivens by the hand.

"He was a man among men," said Mellus.

"And among the women, too, I should judge. I'll wager he carried Mrs. Johnson off from a dozen admirers," added Reynolds, smiling significantly upon the widow.

"A county full," said Mrs. Johnson, proudly.

"And well he might," voted Tom Murphy.

"He did n't get no more'n he deserved, though," said the widow, looking around on the assembled wooers. "Not much. He was honest ez the day is long, an' ez squar' ez any man thet ever breathed. He was the best man in the mountains, boys. He could out-run, out-jump, an' out-fight any man of his inches in forty counties. He was never whipped but once, an' you bet yer life he never heard the last o' thet from me. He got mauled down to Red Mountain Bar, on the Tuolumne, once, by a chap not near ez big or ez heavy. The only quarrel we ever hed was about that scrimmage, an' I told him then thet ef he petered out afore me, an' thet Red Mountain cuss asked me to hev him, I'd take him off hand; an' I will, too. I'm waitin' fur the man that licked Baldy Johnson, an' I won't go back on my word. I've at him time an' agin fur not goug'in' in that fight, but he held to it thet a rough-an'-tumble, Missouri fashion, wasn't a fair deal in a single-handed row with a squar' up-an'-up fighter, an' weepins was out o' the question in a tussle with an unarmed man. The chap thet whaled my old man did it fair an' squar', an' I know I could stan' up afore the parson an' say the words thet'd make us man and wife."

"Have n't you waited about long enough, Mrs. Johnson? It's about two years now since Baldy died," said Mellus.

"Well, to tell you the truth, Mr. Mellus, I was thinkin' 'bout thet the other day; and ef he don't happen 'long mighty sudden I s'pose I'll hev to hitch with some other inferior man. It'd be jist my luck, an' it's no two to one bet thet I don't take the lust that pops. Sabe?" And the fascinating, free-spoken widow laughed merrily at her own bold challenge to her assembled admirers.

"So ef any body wants me they'd better hurry up their apple cart," she continued, her dark eyes flashing mischievously upon every man present.

"I s'pose you'll give me a chance, wont you?" asked Dick, demurely.

"You're a stranger—almost," answered the widow.

"I've Mr. Burr's guarantee; he'll back me," replied Dick.

"Burr's guarantee is good," said Mrs. Johnson. "Yes, ye ken count yerself in; but that don't bar any body else out, ye know."

"Of course not; but I rather think I've got the best of the game, Mrs. Johnson."

"Mebbe ye hev, Mr. Sanders; but we don't allow no snap judgments in this yer court," responded the widow. "I'll own I'm on the marry; but I want a man, an' a man I'm goin' to hev, or die a tryin'. Almost the last words my Baldy said to me afore he passed in his checks was: 'Phoebe, don't you cotton to no galoot!—thet was his way o' talkin'—don't ye tie to no ignoramus; don't ye marry a parson or a bronco rider; ef you do I'll haunt ye, derned ef I don't.' He didn't say 'derned,' but it meant the same thing. 'No, Phoebe, says Baldy, 'don't ye throw yerself away on no common stock. You've got coin 'til ye can't rest, an' ye can take yer pick. Marry a man, Phoebe, marry a man; if he's ez poor ez Job's turkey, an' he's what I call a man, marry him.' I told him I'd marry thet Red Mountain chap; but he shook his head an' said thet'd be too much luck, an' he would n't hold me to that proposition. So, boys, thet's jest how the case stands now. Mr. Sanders hez ez good ez asked me, an' I haven't said no. 'The game's made, gentlemen, roll,' ez Baldy used ter say."

"This is rather queer, very original, I must say; but it's as good as any other way," said Burr. "What claim can you offer, York? I'll act as umpire."

"Well, I hardly know what to say," answered York. "It's rather unexpected to jump a man this way. I admit that I've had pretensions for Mrs. Johnson's hand, and if I should succeed in obtaining her affections—as I think I could if I were allowed a few moments' quiet conversation—I should endeavor to emulate the departed Baldy in every respect, guided in the path of his virtues by Mrs. Johnson's experience and knowledge of that gentleman's character. I think I could convince her of my truth if she would grant me a private interview."

"You'd stock the deck, eh?" laughed the widow. York was about to protest, when he was stopped by Burr: "Hold on, York, old man; give the other boys a chance. What do you say, Thomson?"

"Ef the widder 'll hev me, I'll treat her the best I know how. A man can't do no more, ken he? I've got nine hundred head o' beef cattle, worth thirty dollars a head, on an av'rage; ten thousan' sheep, an' the best ranges in the foothills. The increase in four or five years 'll nearly double the stock, an' we ken live quite comfortable together—me an' Mrs. Johnson." The stock man concluded with a slight cough, and looked as if he felt that the widow could not resist his solid plea.

"Live stock an' ranches is good 'nough, but beef cattle an' sheep don't perdooce a man, ez Baldy used ter say," was the widow's comment.

"Your turn, Jackson," said Burr.

"If Mrs. Johnson 'll have me, I'll quit prospecting and turn farmer. I'll manage the business for her, and love her between times."

"Thet's purty good," laughed the widow. "Bizness an' love, love and bizness. They're two things that move the world, ez Baldy used ter say; an' besides ye promise to quit pirootin' 'round in the hills an' gulches, huntin' fur quartz leads an' cinnabar. Ye couldn't offer anythin' better'n love an' bizness; an' love cant be beat in the long run, 'Bro."

"Reynolds," called the umpire.

"I can't offer much more than myself, and that's hardly worth offerin'," modestly replied the dry goods clerk. "I claim to have some taste in the matter of dress, and I could keep a wife posted on the latest styles, you know. A woman's a woman the world over, and her natural taste runs to calicos, silks, ribbons, laces, and such. Why shouldn't it? A woman should be humored, and petted, and allowed every indulgence in the way of dress. The man's a brute that wouldn't, and I am not classed in that category by my enemies even. I'm poor, Mrs. Johnson, but I'm indulgent."

This was an unfortunate speech for Reynolds.

"I don't know 'bout your categories," said the widow, knitting her brow angrily, "but I want to know what you'd do for a woman. Would ye quit playin' the fool, ef ye was a fool?"

"If I was a fool, yes," answered Reynolds, hesitatingly.

"Would ye chuck those double-gear'd gig lamps out o' the window?"

"With pleasure."

"Would ye reap them yallar stubble fields on yer face?"

"Of course, if it was so ordered."

"Well, it would be so ordered, you bet, ef I hed anythin' to say 'bout it. Would ye part yer hair like a man?"

The clerk murmured something that sounded like "Yes."

"Would ye let up on yer didos with the gals—flirtin' an' sich?"

"Certainly," was the faint response.

"Good 'nough," was the widow's comment, "ef you'll do all thet, that's some hope fur ye; an' ef of the right kind of a gal gits ye mebbe she might make half a man o' ye, ef she didn't make the raffle on the other half."

That settled Mr. Reynolds' case. His cake was all dough.

"Now, Mellus, we'll give you a chance. What can you do to render the widow a happy woman?" was Burr's next call.

The old gentleman straightened up, and, clearing his throat, prepared for the onset.

"My past experience with ladies," he commenced, "has taught me many useful lessons. Three times have I stood at the altar, a happy bridegroom; and if a man who has ministered to the happiness of three ladies is not competent to render another doubly—yes, trebly—happy in the marital state, no man living can. I would love, cherish, and protect any lady who would confer upon me the high honor of becoming my wife. No man can do more. You are a widow, Mrs. Johnson, I am a widower."

The old man sat down, conscious that he had made a great effort. But his attempt at Chesterfieldian eloquence did not protect him from the widow's cool sarcasm.

"Mr. Mellus," she said, "I b'lieve I could respect you as —a father. I go my pile on old men. They remind me of my poor old grandfather, an' I never see ye 'round but I feel just as though I'd like to kiss ye—fur yer poor dead wives. I've allers heerd that ye was kind to em, an' I respect ye fur it; but 'twasn't no more'n yer dooty, Mr. Mellus; ye don't 'low thet it was, do ye? My old man used ter say thet bigamy was all right of one wife was dead, an' he'd take his chance afore the las' judgment with any man thet married me arter he pegged out; but w'en it come to pollygamy, dead or alive, it was puttin' it on too strong. He didn't b'lieve Mormons an' Turks'd hev any show ten minits arter

Gabe'd blowed his horn. S'pose I did marry ye, Mr. Mellus, what d'ye think'd happen we all come together aroun' the great white throne? Don't ye think thet'd be a few golden harps smashed to flinders, an' don't ye think they'd rush us into the lock-up for kickin' up a muss an' spillin' each other's wing feathers? It'd be a purty how d'ye do, wouldn't it? They'll hev trouble 'nough up thar without our addin' to it by prancin' in an' fightin' over a angel."

When the laughter which this sally provoked had subsided,

Burr motioned to Murphy and asked what plea he had.

"My sincere regard for Mrs. Johnson," said Murphy, "renders me averse to this flippant style of expressing our preference, and I shall seek some other opportunity of asking for her hand in the conventional way."

"So that's all?" asked Burr.

"That's all," replied Murphy; "this method of asking a woman's hand in marriage doesn't suit me."

"Mebbe you won't hev another chance," retorted the widow;

"ye don't know but what this 'flippant style of expressin' yer preference,' ez ye call it, is in dead earnest after all. You'd better throw yer riata, Mr. Murphy."

"No, not now. I'll take my chances on its being dead earnest, and the prudent superintendent helped himself to the "cooking whisky."

"Well, Bivens, we'll bear from you now," said Burr.

Bivens immediately assumed an oratorical attitude, arranged the lapels of his coat, cleared his throat, and thrust his left hand into his trousers pocket in the approved easy style of the rural stump speaker.

"Mrs. Johnson," he began, "and gentlemen," he added,

"that we opened this highly entertaining conversation in the spirit of mirth and kindly pleasantry I have no doubt, but from a close observation I perceive that there is indeed a vein of earnest meaning permeating the subject matter of the discussion. Hence, I can not fully agree with my friend,

Mr. Murphy, in the hypothesis, that the outcome will be considered a joke by some of us here present. [Laughter.]

Therefore, I shall treat the matter as a serious affair, and refrain from any mock earnestness. [Applause by Burr.] As far as I am concerned, I mean every word I am about to utter. My idea of the true object of matrimony is mutual happiness; an end to be attained by the contracting parties only through a thorough understanding of each other. They should treat each other as equals in every respect, and while palliating the faults and condoning the foibles that may crop out in either side during the partnership, they should bear themselves with dignity, and a firm endeavor to cleave to the right under all circumstances. They should love, honor, and cherish each other. They should live in and for each other. They should do as Ruth did, his home being her home, her people his people, and vice versa. If the storms of adversity gather around them, and the clouds of misfortune hover above them, they should cling all the closer to each other, cheering and comforting each other. The man who can do this is a man indeed, and the woman who can hold to these divine principles is an angel. It would be the stern endeavor of my life, when mated with a true woman—and I know that Mrs. Johnson is worthy of any man's love and esteem—to ground these principles in my heart, and abide by them throughout all the days of my life, and until death do us part."

"Thet suits Phoebe Johnson; thet's the talk, Rufe Bivens; an' we may's well shake again." They "shook." "You're the boss orator o' these hills, an' I reckon you'll fetch up in Sacramento or Congress afore you're finally planted. Them's my sentiments to a dot, an' I reckon we'll show Mr. Murphy thet thar ain't no joke 'bout our future arrangements.

Call 'round—"

"Wait a minute, Mrs. Johnson, there's another county to hear from," interrupted Burr.

"So thar is, but ez Baldy used to say, 'what's the use o' countin' precincts w'en they can't change the majorities?'" answered the widow.

"Very true, there may be no use, but fair play's a jewel, you know, Mrs. Johnson."

"Kerrect, Jim, but it's like crowdin' the mourners," and the widow glanced around upon the somewhat chagrined wooers, who now began to see a successful rival in Bivens.

"Shovel in yer gravel, young man," said the widow.

"You haven't made a decision, have you?" said Dick.

"I won't be long makin' up my mind arter ye chip or pass the buck," answered the widow.

"Your word's good as your bond, I suppose?" persisted the audacious Dick.

"Tain't nothin' else, young man; but you'd better canter along, or you'll find yer wastin' yer breath," was the impatient reply of Mrs. Johnson.

"And you won't flare up?"

"Nary time, ef we don't clash. Yer a gentieman I reckon; come, say what yer goin' to an' hev done with it. Ken ye show a better claim to this yer ranch an' the owner than Rufe Bivens hez?"

"I can."

"Well, show it. What ken ye do better'n he'll do?"

"It's what I have done."

"What hev ye done?"

"I whipped Baldy Johnson!"

"No!"

"Yes."

"I'll bet this ranch against a Piute's blanket you didn't."

"I can prove it."

"Prove it."

"My name's Dick Walker."

"I thought it was Sanders."

"Is the name all right?"

"Thet's the name; but your name's Saunders."

"I changed it at your garden gate. Ask Burr."

Burr nodded in reply to the widow's inquiring glance.

"How do I know you're Red Mountain Walker?"

"I've got the documents."

"Show 'em."

Dick threw a time-worn letter upon the table.

The widow opened the ragged missive.

"It's his handwritin', anyhow," she murmured, as she ran her eye down the first page.

"Finest woman in the State," she read aloud. "Jist like him, he allers did say thet I was coarse gold, but I'd pan out twenty-one dollars to the ounce. 'Accomplished: rides buckin' mustangs an' handles a rifle like a man'—I'd like to see the bronco I can't break or the bull's eye I can't hit," and the widow looked at Dick with gratified pride.

"Ef I die fust an' ye ever meet her, ask her to let ye hang yer hat on the rusty spike in the kitchen." Poor Baldy, he allers was a good provider, an' his thoughts was runnin' on what'd become o' me arter he'd pegged out; poor Baldy!

'Yer a friend o' mine, Dick—the best friend I ever hed; you've bin ez true's a brother, an' my wife'll love you fur it.

Don't let any bilks jump the claim arter I'm dead an' gone.

I'm a good 'eal older'n she is an' she'll outlive me; I feel it,

Dick—jist what he was allers sayin' to me. 'She'll stick to a man till hell freezes over, an' then camp on the ice with him.' Boys, ef ther wasn't anythin' else in this yer letter to prove thet Baldy Johnson writ it, the cuss words would.

W'en Baldy cussed he meant somethin'; he cussed jist ez he hit—straight from the shoulder. Yes, sir, Baldy Johnson writ thet letter, an' you're the man thet whaled him—you're Dick Walker."

Then, turning to the crowd of rejected suitors, she said:

"Boys, the jigs up, ez Baldy used ter say. This young man hangs his sombrero on the rusty spike out in the kitchen.

You've all got an invite to the weddin'—we'll let you know w'en it comes off. Its time to vamoze, I reckon. Come down to-morrow, Dick, an' we'll talk it over."

The "boys" "vamosed," and in due course of time the Widow Johnson became Mrs. Richard Walker.

SAN FRANCISCO, Sept. 6, 1878. E. H. CLOUGH.

When Keeley was manager of the Princess Theatre, he was telling a funny story in the green-room one morning, at which every member of the company laughed heartily, save one. He gravely remarked: "I shan't laugh, I'm going to leave."

A DIALOGUE FROM PLATO.

"Le temps le mieux employé est celui qu'on perd."—Claude Tillier.

I'd "read" three hours. Both notes and text
Were fast a mist becoming;
In bounced a vagrant bee, perplexed,
And filled the room with humming—

Then out. The casement's leafage sways,
And, parted light, discloses
Miss Di., with hat and book—a maze
Of muslin mixed with roses.

"You're reading Greek?" "I am—and you?"
"Oh, mine's a mere romancer."
"So Plato is." "Then read him—do;
And I'll read mine in answer."

I read: "My Plato (Plato, too—
That wisdom thus should harden!)
Declares, 'Blue eyes look doubly blue
Beneath a Dolly Varden.'"

She smiled. "My book in turn avers
(No author's name is stated)
That sometimes those Philosophers
Are sadly mistranslated."

"But hear—the next's in stronger style:
The Cynic School asserted
That two red lips which part and smile
May not be controverted."

She smiled once more. "My book, I find,"
Observes some modern doctors
Would make the Cynics out a kind
Of album-verse coocoters.

Then I: "Why not? 'Ephesian law,
No less that time's tradition,
Enjoined fair speech on all who saw
Diana's apparition.'"

She blushed this time. "If Plato's page
No wiser precept teaches,
Then I'd renounce that doubtful sage,
And walk to Burnham-beeches."

"Agreed," I said; "for Socrates
(I find he, too, is talking)
Thinks Learning can't remain at ease
While Beauty goes a-walking."

She read no more. I leapt the sill.
The sequel's scarce essential,
Nay, more than this, I hold it still Profoundly confidential.

AUSTIN DOBSON.

The Song of a Summer.

I plucked an apple from off a tree,
Golden, and rosy, and fair to see.
The sunshine had fed it with warmth and light,
The dew had freshened it night by night,
And high on the topmost bough it grew,
Where the winds of heaven about it blew;
And while the mornings were soft and young,
The wild birds circled, and soared, and sung;
There, in the storm, and calm, and shine,
It ripened and brightened, this apple of mine,
Till the day I plucked it from off the tree,
Golden, and rosy, and fair to see.

How could I guess, 'neath that daintiest rind,
That the core of sweetness I hoped to find—
The innermost, hidden heart of the bliss
Which dews, and winds, and the sunshine's kiss
Had tended and fostered by day and night—
Was black with mildew and bitter with blight:
Golden, and rosy, and fair of skin,
Nothing but ashes and ruin within?
Ah! never again with toil and pain
Will I strive the topmost bough to gain.
Though its wind-swung apples are fair to see,
On a lower branch is the fruit for me.

LOUISE CHANDLER MOULTON.

Bathing at Narragansett.

ÆSTHETICS AND MODESTY AT A DISCOUNT ON THE BEACH.

We've been here at Narragansett just two weeks, dear, and the reason
I've not written is because I have not had an hour to spare;
What with romance, rocks, and bathing, and the very crowded season,
All my leisure is exhausted in keeping crimpings in my hair.

First, the bathing! I have never bathed, you know, because Aunt Maggie Liked the mountains, but this year the Flodden-Tompkins took my part.

Here I am, and lost in wonder at the costumes scant and baggy,
And the stockings—highest, surely, style of decorative art.

Yes, red stockings seem the custom; dress cut short and redly glancing,
In we go, and never mind the lack of what's called "embroidery,"
And for all the world we look like ancient spinsters ballet dancing,
Or a lot of withered mermaids much collapsed and out of joint.

Oh, such shapes, such ribs, such elbows! If the poet had but seen us
Who got up the antique myth (don't ask me who), it could not be Even in his wildest dreams he ever would have thought of Venus
Rising in red stockings, rising slowly from the foam-clad sea.

If we're horrid though, the men are something worse; I fairly tremble
When I see a dripping swimmer come whom I've known on shore,
Hair all lank, moustache all stringy—e'en the handsomest resemble
Swimming dogs, their hides all clammy; only this, and nothing more.

As to modesty, don't name it. The Apollo Belvedere
Wouldn't make me change opinion, art or no art. Yet I beg
That you will not mention what I tell you; but the truth is, Mary,
There's no beauty in a wet uncovered human foot and leg.

Yet these men think naught of coming, bare below the knee, and walking
On the sands, where all the tide of fashion daily ebbs and flows,
Bowing, smiling, quite unconscious of their legs, and even talking
To the girls, gesticulating meanwhile with their wet bare toes.

It is awful! For I'm sure, at least among the upper classes, Toes were always, like some verbs, things understood but not expressed.

'Twould be well to post up where this bare-legged crowd of bathers passes;
"Man never is" (you know the line?), "but always" (I think) "to be dressed."

Yes, it's awful, art or no art!

STRICTLY CONFIDENTIAL.

No. — SUTTER STREET, September 20, 1878.

It appears from a review of the past two weeks that San Francisco has again assumed her fashionable cloak of dissipation. Judging from this week's programme there bids fair to be a great deal of gayety this fall. Charitable gayety, I mean, but gayety for all that. Of course, every one knows that we young folks do not enjoy arranging and participating in the entertainments that are gotten up for the benefit of the Southern sufferers. We do not do it because we like to appear before the public, and give ourselves the opportunity of showing off our varied accomplishments to an admiring audience. Oh, dear, no! We do it purely from a charitable motive, and sacrifice ourselves upon the altar of our generosity. To begin with the "doings" of the week, Mrs. Shillaber gave the charming reception to General and Mrs. Fremont that has been talked of and anticipated for the last ten days. It was a success, of course—if brilliantly decorated rooms, handsome ladies, some of whom represented the ancien régime—early days in California—though I don't mean to say that the ladies were ancient, ravishing music, sparkling champagne, and a crowd of well-dressed humanity constitute a successful entertainment. There was an unusual preponderance of army officers present, and the navy was also well represented. The affair did not call for full dress, consequently there was a variety of incongruous toilets; some in the conventional black silk, quite as appropriate for a funeral as a reception; others were attired in evening dress, décolleté and innocent of sleeves. Mrs. Shillaber is a charming hostess, and no doubt, with her affable manners and charming adaptability, will draw around her a coterie of appreciative people. It is said that last Monday inaugurated a series of receptions that she intends giving this winter. The whole affair was elegant and recherché (that is with the exception of the ancien régime), and I only heard one criticism during the entire evening, and that's very remarkable for San Francisco society. I hope my distinguished hostess will pardon me for mentioning it to the ARGONAUT. I know 'tis very naughty to kiss and tell, no pun intended, as Fanny Fern says, but I wouldn't speak of it, no, not for the world, to any one else. It was simply this—nothing very dreadful after all—only this: I heard—yes, I actually overheard it myself, for I was standing in close proximity to the two gentlemen when they were discussing it. One said: "Don't you think so?" He omitted the "Bill," being in polite society.) "Don't you think so?" with a deprecating expression, as though he didn't think so. "Yes," said the other, a graver and more reverend seignior, "Mrs. Shillaber's punch is too strong, I feel it." Tuesday and Wednesday evenings Mrs. Gwin gave her theatrical benefit for the suffering South. It was a charming affair, and perfect in all its appointments. The ball room was converted into a little bijou of a theatre, with appropriate scenery, drop curtain, foot-lights, and all the stage paraphernalia. There was a large and fashionable audience—as the newspapers have it—mostly composed of her friends and acquaintance, though I noticed here and there a few of the ancien régime. The entertainment was a splendid success in every respect, particularly in a pecuniary point of view; they say Mrs. Gwin realized from a thousand to twelve hundred dollars. On the first evening two very nice little comedies were given, A Pretty Piece of Business and The Dowager, both of which were represented in a manner to reflect infinite credit on all the performers. It is generally the fault with amateurs to be self-conscious on the stage, and to feel a lively interest in the disposition of their hands and feet; but in this instance the hands and feet all seemed to take care of themselves, and go about their own business, and their owners were forgetful—no of their parts (though a part of them, but of the aforesaid hands and feet. I am becoming very much mixed up in this hands and feet business. I will describe the feature of the performance, which was the rendition of the "Dowager," by Miss Carrie Gwin. This was the chef d'œuvre of Tuesday evening's entertainment. She played the part with the finish, grace, and elegance of expression that characterize a true artiste, and trod the boards as though she had been accustomed to acting all her life. She looked every inch the "Dowager," and was dressed somewhat after the manner of Modjeska—in white satin, black velvet court train, and diamonds. She handled her part well, showing careful study and considerable histrionic talent. Miss Lake and Miss Maynard contributed much to the success of the play; though the latter won her laurels as "Dobson" in the first piece, and Miss Lake reserved her triumph for Wednesday evening, in the Morning Call. This was an unexpectably good piece of acting; so naturally did she play it, that the audience almost forgot that it was a play, and seemed to realize that Mr. Teal was in reality making love to Miss Lake. They have both evidently had much experience. She is a born actress, and it is a pity that she doesn't make the stage her profession; she could fill her pockets with ducats, as well as her audience with admiration. Mr. Teal's rendition of "Sir Edward Ardent" was perfect, though his form is not. He played the impetuous, ardent lover, in a very hot-headed manner; his elocution is fine, and he reads his lines as though he meant them; and his voice—oh, his voice—where shall I find a simile for his voice? As "Sir Edward Ardent" says, it is "linked sweetly long and low." Taking him all in all, he is a Barry Sullivan in embryo—not exactly in embryo either; he is in a state of chrysalis; if he were developed into a full-fledged butterfly he might even rival the immortal Barry himself. "Sir Edward" was so very ardent, so empressé, that I think "Mrs. Chillingstone" became thawed a little too soon by his alarming amount of enthusiasm, and forgot to be as cold and icily regular as she started out to be. Mr. Shepherd's role of "Mr. Babblerbrook," in A Lesson of Love, was a fine piece of character acting, and he deserves infinite credit for having handled it so effectively. I congratulate you, "Shep," shake hands, old boy. Mr. McClung was also perfect in his part, as the bashful lover—the sighing, fearing, ly—, I mean dying, love-sick lover. Would any one ever accuse Bill of being bashful or coy—except in a play, I wonder? Dear little dapper Mr. Greenway! He was clever, frisking, graceful, and at times even rose to being strong and vigorous; but his wig was not becoming. Don't wear that yellow wig again. He showed admirable skill in playing the bold lover; I am suspicious of the opinion that he is no novice in that rôle; what thinks Miss —. Mr. Pinkard was assigned a part that was too ponderous for him; he did not have very much to say, but what he did say he said with majesty and dignity; "my lady, the Dowager has arrived," or something equally tragic and grandiloquent. How's that for criticism? Won't it compare favorably with "Betsy B." or the more recent arrival, "Mourouk?" Next week I shall have a choice bit of gossip for you. FIBBERTIGIBET.

Another Communication from my Sky-parlor.

There is a commotion in Grub Street. Society in our block is shaken and agitated to its very centre. We have a millionaire among us! How long this gifted creature will remain in our midst is an unknown problem. His name is MacDooligan. Tradition saith that his mighty intellect was directed in the early days of California to the development of her agricultural resources, and he supplied those hardy sons of toil, the miners, with potatoes. We all know that his concentrated energies have of late years been devoted to the manufacture of putty. Six months ago Brannigan could not return the loan made him by MacDooligan, so he gave the latter five thousand shares of Golden Era at a valuation of ten cents a share, and then gave up the ghost. Golden Era sold last week, as everybody knows, at $220. MacDooligan sold his shares and is now a millionaire. This is a hurried résumé, and is doing scant justice to the brilliant career of one who is about to be numbered among our illustrious men, and whose heroic, chivalrous life affords such noble emulation to our young generation. Burke says: "It is an erect countenance, it is a firm adherence to principle, it is a power of resisting false shame and frivolous fear, that assert our good faith and honor, and assure to us the confidence of mankind;" and although he wrote an essay on the Sublime and the Beautiful in Nature, he had never analyzed from what an insignificant germ can in one night spring forth a full blown, fragrant millionaire, the true modern conception of the sublime and the beautiful. He was an old fogey, and I dare say is as little read nowadays as he says Bolingbroke was in his time. The present partner of the joys and sorrows of MacDooligan was once the beautiful Bridget MacShinnegan. Her ancestors are too numerous to mention. They were doubtless kings in the old country, and figured probably at the siege of Acre with Richard the Lion-hearted, and later at Fontenoy and the Boyne. The MacShinnegan coat-of-arms is a spalpeen rampant on a field of gold; their motto, "De profundis saltare." Two tender shoots have put forth from these illustrious branches. Their mother, alive to the convenances, calls them Bernard and Margaret. Their fond father calls them Barney and Peggy. Bernard has the same ingenuous countenance as his father, and the same amount of intellect is beaming in their ruddy faces. Schlegel says that genius is the almost unconscious choice of the higher degree of excellence. Bernard has been in several counting-houses, but his genius has always scorned to be confined within such narrow limits. He loves the beautiful; he believes the proper study of mankind is man; he is a great observer, and pursues his favorite study by the hour leaning against the portals of some, rosewood, cypress, marble, or walnut palace, making comments, sparkling with wit and profundity, and with the latest delicious innovations on our mother tongue, on the passing world to a few kindred geniuses. But I must not dwell too long on this favorite of the gods. A fuller description of him will doubtless appear in the Post before many days. Miss Margaret's countenance, though not strictly classical, arrests the attention, and her beauty is what so many novelists nowadays delight in, being of the style called "irregular." A dear little nose, tip-tipped. The color of her hair is matchless at any of the coiffeurs, and therefore all her own in its luxuriance; it is a beautiful deep red. She has a dear little figure, short and stout, like her mother's. The very perfection of symmetry and just proportion are her shoes and her gloves, being both number seven and a half (7½). Her conversational powers are great. Like Mrs. Malaprop she prides herself on the use of her oracular tongue, and charmingly confesses that "her tastes are not literary, for reading destroys her originality." It has been decided upon in family confab that Bernard shall take his mother and sister to Paris, while the head of the family remains here to wind up the putty business, and to superintend the erection of a palatial mansion on Nob Hill. The family are very exclusive now, and will not receive any one until after their return from their foreign tour. Madame MacDooligan wants the house to be built in exact imitation of the feudal castle of her ancestors, omitting of course the moat and the drawbridge, but the head of the family has secretly resolved to draw all the checks provided he is not consulted about Louis (Quatorze, Renaissance, harmonious effects, and such flummery. The truth is, there is a generous distrustfulness of their individual tastes on the part of all the members of this distinguished family, and each one desires, if there should be any incongruities, to have a conscience void of offense, and to be able to exclaim with Macbeth, "Thou canst not say I did it." The most delicate traits of refinement have been discovered in this charming family during the last week. With an admirable finesse they have previously hidden them from us most sedulously. Their manner is now distingué, their society recherché, their appearance débonnaire, their actions breathe a savoir faire. They will soon pass away from us to another and a higher sphere, and Grub Street will know them no more. M.

ALL ABOUT WOMEN.

Mr. Olive Logan writes over the nom de plume of Wirt Sykes.

The divorced wife of a Danbury man is the hired nurse of his second wife's baby.

If the hills would only lift their vales, what a plane countenance nature would present.

Listen to a flatterer who understands his trade, and then try to be what he says you are.

"Take away women," asks a writer, "and what would follow?" That's easy. The men.

Beauty nipped in the waist is like a rose nipped in the bud. It is the shortest lived, and falls off the quickest.

It is said that the ex-Empress Eugene is afflicted with gout, and unable to walk without leaning heavily upon a cane.

Philadelphia belles at Cape May say: "Bring me me ha!; I'll walk for a couple of squares on the beach with me mother."

First lady—Why do they call those balls foul? Second lady—Don't know, unless it's because the pesky things are continually flying over the fence.

She who exults in the loss of the reputation of other women should know that she does not win what they lose, however sadly she may be in need of it.

All hairpins are alike to men, but let a wife go off on a visit for a month and come home, and find a hairpin near the door, and she can not wait a minute to grow red in the face.

Two little girls were comparing progress in catechism study. "I have got to original sin," said one. "How far have you got?" "Oh, I am beyond redemption," said the other.

An Ohio young lady committed suicide because her father would not consent to her marriage with the hired man. An Indiana girl would have simply left a note, saying: "Dear father, we hev flew, forgiv your Tilda."

An elderly maiden, who had suffered some disappointments, thus defines the human race: Man, a conglomerate mass of hair, tobacco smoke, confusion, conceit, and boots. Woman, the waiter, perforce, on the aforesaid animal.

"So you are going to keep a school?" said a young lady to a maiden aunt. "Well, for my part, sooner than do that, I would marry a widower with nine children." "I would prefer that myself," was the quiet reply; "but where is the widower?"

As a wife was holding her husband's aching head in her hands one morning, she asked: "Are a man and his wife one?" "I suppose so," said the husband. "Then," rejoined the wife, "I came home drunk last night, and ought to be ashamed of myself."

At a fancy dress ball in Paris recently a lady was seen in a very low bodied dress of green gauze. She was politely asked by a gentleman what she personated. "The sea, monsieur." "At low tide, then, madam." The lady blushed and the gentleman smiled.

Why do two women acquaintance passing each other turn to look at the occipital elevation of each? And why is the practice so rare among men? Because men have no back hair, spring bonnets, nor tie backs, and are generally avoiding bores and creditors.

It is a poor philosophy which teaches that man can not love as truly and permanently as woman. There may be fewer instances, but there are many to prove the fact. There are fewer, because the temptations to forget the first strong, overwhelming passion of our being are more frequent with men than with women.

At a recent woman's rights congress in Paris one of the members said: "We are born naked, and yet society makes us cover ourselves with clothes, to earn which we have to work and labor. Such anomalies as these will rapidly disappear when our rights are conceded." From this time forth we are a strong opponent of the woman's rights movement.

Home scene. Husband entering, and throwing himself languidly on the sofa, as he wipes the perspiration from his brow: "Oh, dear, business is killing me; I am so tired." Wife, jumping up for a pillow: "Lie down there, like a dear, good fellow, and take a little rest." Little four-year-old daughter: "O papa, I fought 'ood be awful tired after I saw oo carrying the new hired girl all 'bout the titchen."

The young ladies who form the lovely half of archery clubs will be interested to know how Indian squaws shoot. The noble red man lives on venison, which he secures with the bow and arrow, of course, and therefore his wife must be a good shot. A Nevada newspaper tells how a Piute squaw shoots: "She will throw herself on her back, clap both feet to the bow, draw the arrow with both hands, and, letting drive, send it clean through the body of the deer." Try it.

At a Harrison County (Iowa) wedding the bride danced several charming reels within a circle of three feet in diameter. She changed shoes once on account of her new ones not sounding right against the floor. The prompter gave the very unique commands during the dance: "Rock to the right, rock to the left, grind the coffee, ring the dish-rag, rock the cradle," etc. At the wind-up of the dance the bride showed her agility by kicking the groom's hat off his head. A bride likely to last.

Beecher misunderstood. "I acknowledge being drunk, Judge, and making disturbances. A woman can't live like an oyster in a shell. One might as well be buried. Beecher was saying the other night that lots of people were going 'round dead as door nails, and not buried. When I heard about that remark I thought it applied to me, and so I concluded I'd live up. I guess the boys thought I was a lively corpse when I started in on the windows. People won't charge me with being dead if I can help it. I've been about as dead as they make 'em for two months, but I guess I'm all right now." This in Virginia, Nevada.

FABLES AND ANECDOTES.

By Little Johnny.

Some further Narratives tending to belittle the Courage and Dignity of the Forest Monarchs.—The Ass and Rabbit, a Fable as wise as an Auricle.—The Horse that would a Camel be, an Apologue for the Author's Envious Rivals.—All the Decks of a Ship—Symbolism and Soap.—Many other Matters too Instructive and Entertaining to mention, including the Glass Elephant, the Blue Bel-lied Giraffe that played the Accordion, and the Author's Sister's Young Man's Basking Buckaroo that climbed up its own nose.

My uncle Ned, wich has ben in Injy, and evry were, he said: "Johnny, did I ever tel you 'bout the tiger which I met in the jungle? Wal, Johnny, I didnt hav nothin with me for to fite with, only jest a pair of blacksmith's tongs in my hand, wich I was takin to my bungloo for to draw some nails, so I run away as hard as ever I cude hook it, yes, indeed, my boy, your uncle Ed'ard flang his feets mity lifely for a wile. But purty sune I fel, and when I turn onto my back for to strike out with my heels the drefle beast was a straddle of my brest, with his mouth wide open like a morn-in glory. Then I shet my eys and sed 'Now I lay me down to sleep,' and lay reel stil for to be et, but jest then a natif come runnin up and cot the tiger by one of its ears, and cuffed it real hard with his hand on the other, and said, the natif did: 'You mizzable critter, aint I tole you a dozen times that that other tooth aint reddey yet for to be pulled? If its a hurtin you agin you jist mosy off home and lle give you a chew of terbacker, but I aint a goin for to hav you bein a terror to this hole kingdom and a skurge to man-kin.' And then he kicked the tiger on the end of its back.

Wen Mister Gipple was in Africa, huntin lions, he had fourteen sojers, and each sojer had a gun wich wude shoot sixteen times, and a sawd, and two volvers, and there was twenty 8 horses, and forty dogs, and a hundred camomiles for to carry vittles and amunition. One nite thay camped were the lions was said to be thickest and sabbagest, and Mister Gipple he slep at the house of a mitionary. Bout midnite he was woke up by a drefle roarin, jest like a menagery busted, and he put his hed out the winder and tole his men to git reddey if thay vallewed their lifes.

Jest then he herd the mitionary say to his wife, in a other room: "Mary," the mitionary said to his wife, cos Mary was her name, "fore you come to bed I wish you wude jest go down to the spring and drive a way them lions, or the woter wont be fit for the gentlemen to drink in the mornin. And, Mary, you better take my wockin stick a long, cos them ole he fellers dont care no more for kickin than if thay was made of injy rubber."

Wen me an my father we was to the sho last summer we seen a frocious tiger in a cage, and it wore a collar, and a card was spend to it, and the card said, "Hands Off!"

And my father he sed: "There, Johnny, you see them words? Them is descriptif of the mellancolly fate of the a spirin youth wich tutchted the tiger." And I was so fraid I run a way.

Bime by we come back to the cage, and we seen the card had ben took of, and a other was put on, wich said: "Visiters Must NOT Handel this Tiger. He is Fresh Painted!"

A jackous it met a rabbit, and it said, the jackous did: "I never seen such a ugly feller in ol my life, jest notice your gait, its like you was lame."

Then the rabbit it said: "Thats jest were you are mistook, I wock that way coz it is graceffe, more like dancin."

Then the jackous it said, a other time: "Wel, mebbys so, but consider yure tail, such a dickulous tail, nothin but a little bunch of wite fuz without no handle to it."

And the rabbit he said: "Things is butifle wich is usefle, and this tail aint no slowtchen it comes to fellers cetchin hold of it for to pul me out of my burro. But if you don't like my tail, wot do you say to my ears?"

The jackous it thot a wile, and then it said: "There aint any thing wich is so ugly but wot it has got some good pints for to set off its homely."

A ole horse wich seen a camlle it sed: "I can beat you at that, my harty!" So it put all its 4 feets to gather, the horse did, and hunched its back up, and then it turned its hed a round til its nose pinted strate backerds, and then it smiled like it was happy. But the camlle it smiled, too, much as to say: "I gess I can stand that fellers vicktry bout as long as he can his ownself, I dont mind givin in to a enemy wich has to break his back for to beat me, and his neck for to enjoy it."

The camlle is call a ship of the dessert, and Jack Brily, the sailor, he says them wich has got two hunches is dubble deckers.

One time Mister Pitchel, thats the preecher, was a preechin a funerel serman on a pore, wicket gambler wich had died, and he dont always think wot he is a sayin. So he was a tellin the peeples that this wold is jest like a ship, evry man has his place of duty, we cant all be onto the quarter deck, cos there is a main deck, and a lower deck, and a gun deck, and a spar deck, and a yuker deck.

You never seen sech a stonish congation like thatn!

Once there was a preecher baptizin some fokes in a river, but fore he done it he made a little preech at em, wile thay was waitin on the bank, and tole em, the preecher did, that the baptizin wudent makem no better nor no worse, but it was jest a simble for to represent their sins was wash away. Then he ducked em in the river, one after a other, but the last one was a offle wicked feller wich evry body kanew. And wen he fassened onto his collar he sed, the preecher did: "Brethern and sisters, I am a bowt to baptize Brother Jones in my weak way, and may the Lord have mercy on his sole, but I must say that in his case I think this sad rite wude be more truly simbole if one of you wude jest go a little way up the river and dump in a barl of sope."

Wen my sister's yung man tole me that I said wasent he a shamed for to be makin fun of sech things, the notty man; and he said: "Wel, Johnny, if I had looked at yure hands I mite hav knew you thot sope too sacred a subject for to be handled with out gluv's."

But wot the fool ment by sech a rig my roll as that beats my time, and Billy he says it beats him, but sope suds is mity nice for to git out of yure eys wen you can find the towl. SAN RAFAEL, Sept. 18.

CALIFORNIA.

In all, methinks I see the counterpart Of Italy, without her dower of art. We have the lordly Alps, the fir-fringed hills, The green and golden valleys, veined with rills, A dead Vesuvius with its smouldering fire, A tawny Tiber sweeping to the sea; Our seasons have the same superb attire, The same redundant wealth of flower and tree; Upon our peaks the same imperial dyes, And day by day, serenely over all, The same successive months of smiling skies. Conceive a cross, a tower, a convent wall, A broken column, and a fallen fane, A chain of crumbling arches down the plain, A group of brown-faced children in the sun, A scarlet-skirted maiden standing near, A monk, a beggar, and a muleteer— And lo! my dream of Italy is done.

These are the Alps, and there the Apennines; Between, the fertile plains of Lombardy; Beyond, Val d'Arno, with its flocks and vines. These granite crags are gray monastic shrines Petched on the cliffs like old dismantled forts; And looking seaward, I can almost see The marble splendor of Venetian courts— Can almost hear the mournful rhythmic beat Of white-lipped waves along the sea-paved street.

O childless mother of dead empires! we, The latest born of all the western lands, In fancied kinship stretch our infant hands Across the intervening seas to thee. Thine the immortal twilight, ours the dawn; Yet we may have our names to canonize, Our past to haunt us with its solemn eyes, Our ruins, when this restless age is gone.

SAN FRANCISCO, September 9, 1878. L. H. FOOTE.

Finding Mamma.

[AN INCIDENT OF THE FEVER PLAGUE IN GRENADA.]

Some mother's prattling baby,
Lost in the city streets,
Smiling with pretty wonder
In every face he meets.

Answering in baby-fashion,
To all who bid him stay:
"I'm doin' to find my mamma;
She's went and runned away."

Strong men, with eyes o'er-brimming,
Caress the sunny head;
They know that last night they laid her
With the unnumbered dead.

And heard her pray when dying:
"God—bless—my—baby—dear—
And—bring—him—soon—to—meet—me—
I—cannot—leave—him—here."

But still the sweet lips murmur
To those who bid him "come."
"I'ae do't to find my mamma
Before I tan doe home."

The dimpled cheeks grow paler,
The eyes are fever-bright,
The little feet are weary
Beneath the falling night.

They found him in the star-light;
The rosy lips were closed,
And on the baby forehead
The peace of death reposed.

How had the mother's spirit
Found answer to her prayer?
We only know that "mamma,"
And home, and heaven were there!

CHICAGO, September, 1878. MRS. M. L. RAYNE.

The Cantalope.

Its firm and fragrant rind along each fold
Of grayish green reveals a stripe of gold;
And when the knife is cleaving through the seam,
The fibre gently yields like frozen cream;
Then from the pores the luscious nectar wells
As freshest honey from its broken cells.
There is no fruit that can completely cope
In luscious sweetness with the cantalope;
If ripe, by these few hints you'll quickly con it;
And as for dressing—you want nothing on it.

G. W. ELLIOT.

He was showing the man the new bay mule that he was working in a team with the old gray. "You warrant him sound, and perfectly kind and gentle?" the man said. "Perfectly," said Farmer John. "My wife and children drive him, and he is a perfect pet; comes into the house like a dog." "Easy to shoe?" asked the man. "Well, I guess so; fact is, I never had him shod, I don't believe in it," said Farmer John. "How does he act when you put the crupper on?" asked the man. Farmer John hesitated. "Well, pretty good, I guess," he said; "fact is I never put it on." "How does it get on?" asked the man; "who does put it on?" "Well, I kind of don't know," said Farmer John; "fact is, he had the harness on when I got him, an' it fit him so well, an' he seemed to be so kind o' contented in it, like, that I sort of never took it off'n him." "And how long have you had him?" asked the man. Farmer John chewed a wheat straw very meditatively. "Well," he said, "not to exceed more'n two year, mebbe." And the man backed a little further away, and said he would "sort of look round a little further before he bought, like." And Farmer John never saw him again, not even unto this day.

Each inhabitant in the United States pays $2.02 for the public schools, and $1.39 for military purposes. These two items of expenditure in other countries of the world are as follows: Prussia, 51 cents and $2.29; Austria, 34 cents and $1.39; France, 29 cents and $4.50; Italy, 13 cents and $1.57; England and Wales, 66 cents and $3.86; Switzerland, 88 cents and $1.

A weak mind sinks under prosperity as well as under adversity. A strong man has two high tides—when the moon is at the full, and when there is no moon.

PARISIAN BONBONS.

"Fickle and fine and French."

Experience is a fine word for suffering.

"Doctor, you must really prescribe something for me."

"My dear lady, you need no medicine—only a little rest, and then you'll be as well as ever."

"But, doctor, surely I ought to be given some medicine of some sort or other. You've only felt my pulse; examine my tongue." [He does so.]

"Precisely, madam; your tongue needs rest, too."

They were discussing the charms of an actress whom one gentleman of the company affected to regard as the handsomest woman on the stage.

"She's not bad looking," said another, "but one of her eyes is smaller than the other."

"Ha-ha!" said the other, triumphantly, "that's all you know about it. If you'd watched her closely you'd have seen that one of her eyes is larger than the other. Smaller, indeed!"

"If I should marry Eliza Jane," said the prospective son-in-law, "I should frankly confess one thing in advance—I am of rather a hasty temper and apt to get mad without cause."

"Oh, that'll be all right," blandly replied the dear old lady; "I shall go and live with you, and I'll see that you always have cause."

Thoughts from La Vie Parisienne: It is simply incredible the point to which women carry ignorance of the value of words and knowledge of their price. To touch their hearts it is better to show a closed fist than to stretch out an open palm; they are always ready to bestow alms upon a bandit. Heaven gave women tongues to ask questions with, and eyes to give answers with. Confess, ye who know the sex thoroughly, that it is often a more meritorious act for a woman to allow something good to be said of another woman than it would be for her to say it herself.

Love may be blind, as they say, but in all the records of the ages, it has never kissed the girl's mother by mistake, when it reached out after the girl.

A very handsome and richly dressed lady had given a penny to a beggar.

A moment later he hurried after her, overtook her, and gasped imploringly: "Madame, madame, *le cop** saw you stake† me, and here he is to ask you if I am beggar, and receive alms. Save me, or I shall be run in‡."

"But what can I say?" asked the lady.

"Tell him I lent you the money last week till you could sell your dog, and that you have just been returning it."

"Qu'est-ce que tu me donnes? C'est trop mince! Tu es trop fraîche!" § exclaimed the agent de police, as he removed the mendicant to the poste.

No woman can be beautiful by the force of features alone, any more than she can be witty only by the help of speech.

A facetious brakeman cries out as the train is entering a tunnel: "This tunnel is about one mile long, and the train will be four minutes passing through it." The train dashes into daylight again in four seconds, and the scene in the car is one for a painter. Seven young ladies are closely pressed by fourteen pairs of masculine arms, fourteen pairs of lips are glued together, and two dozen inverted flasks flash in the air.

Victor Hugo's definition of Paradise: "The parents always young, and the children always little."

It was among the swells of a remote country village.

"Sa-ay," says one of them; "there was a performance in the theatre at the market town day before yesterday, the paper says."

"Yes," remarks the village Adonis, "I was there."

"Good fun?"

"You bet. The leading lady was a charming girl; and I just tell you, boys—but no! that wouldn't be fair," and he winks knowingly, and throws himself back in his chair, as much as to say: "Red-hot pincers shall not draw the secret from me."

The old soldier, who is reading the county paper in the corner, breaks in: "So she was quite overcome, eh? Lucky dog!"

The young man blushes and says: "Really, Captain, you know; kiss and never tell—you know."

"Because," says the veteran, pleasantly, "the paper says it was a puppet-show by the Royal Bolivian Marionettes."

Love is truly a democratic little fellow, and is not "at all a respecter of persons."

Madame X. sent away her cook, who had too many military visitors, and replaced her by a guileless country lass. The other day she took a look into the kitchen, and there saw a superb-looking soldier tasting a bowl of soup. "Is it possible you, too, are guilty of this thing, Sophie?" "Please, ma'am, you are mistaken. This is, no doubt, one of the soldiers left over by the last cook."

The Talmud says that man was first created with a tail, and that when the caudal appendage was found to be inconvenient and ungraceful Adam prayed to have it taken off, which was done by the divine hand. And then woman was made out of the amputated limb by planting it in the ground. This is something decidedly Darwinian, and it deserves investigation by that class of philosophers and naturalists who oppose the accepted story.

* Le cop, the policeman. † Stake from stake—to bestow alms. ‡ Run in—term of Parisian argot, meaning "to be arrested." § Qu'est-ce que tu me donnes?—What art thou giving me? It is too thin! This

THE CAUSE OF HARD TIMES.

An Address Delivered before the El Dorado Agricultural Society.

Last week Frank M. Pixley, the senior editor of this journal, delivered an address before the El Dorado Agricultural Society, at its annual fair, held at Placerville. The subject of the address was "The Cause of Hard Times," and as many of the points made are universal in their application, and the handling of the topic pitily and practiced, we take advantage of the fact that the author is duck shooting in Tulare County to print it as a choice bit of reading for our bucolic friends.

Times are hard, business is depressed. Labor and capital are at war. Capital oppresses, labor revolts. This is not a local, but a universal complaint. It is not confined to El Dorado County, it extends throughout the State, throughout the nation, throughout the world. Ships lie idle, factory fires have died out, the sound of the anvil and the hammer no longer make music while the light of the forge reflects from artisan and operative the happy faces of content at cheerful labor. The farmer's boy lags languidly at his plow; the farmer looks out from his unremunerative fields and orchards with gloomy brow, and the careworn wife has lost the old-time cheerful look, that beguiled with gleeful song her happy toil. And yet they say we live in the golden age—the age of letters, of art, of culture, of progress, of liberty, of freedom of conscience, of inventions, of learning, of philosophy. Then what is the matter? The same God reigns supreme in heaven; the same sun shines for all; the same moon reflects his glory; the same stars glitter in the same blue vault; the same glad earth produces grain, and fruits, and flowers. There are no more men and women now than when God's bounty blessed us all with plenty and content. No more backs to clothe; no more stomachs to feed; no more soul-cravings to satisfy. What is the matter in El Dorado County? When we have answered satisfactorily this conundrum, we have solved the great financial, social, and economic problem for all the world. El Dorado is the type of all the world. Its men, and women, and children are types of the whole human family. What ails you, ails the race; what affects you, affects all the sons and daughters of Adam; what is a panacea for your ailments, will cure the world's disease; what will relieve you, and lift the clouds and gloom that now oppress this community, will let the clear, healthful sunlight and the bracing air of heaven in upon all. My memory of El Dorado ante-dates that of most of you. I know its mountains and its valleys, its cañons, its gulches, and its gravel beds, where precious treasures hid themselves. I know its forests and its valleys, for I have delved and toiled for gold in its river bottoms and on its mountain sides. I know its soil and climate. I have hugged its naked bosom for an entire winter, with nothing between the earth and her toiling son than boughs and blankets, with no other covering than blankets and the starry canopy. If gold could make men happy, if gold could bring content, if gold could satisfy the wants of man, assuredly this, of all places in the world, should have been the paradise. From this county came the revelation of that new dispensation for which men prayed. From El Dorado went the glad salutation to all the earth that here was the promised land. Not John, as he came crying from the wilderness; not Peter the Hermit, as he preached the rescue of the holy sepulcher, stirred the nations to so great a fervor. The promised Messiah was never, in his coming, welcomed with so glad an acclamation as the announcement that in the tail race of Sutter's saw-mill gold in quantities had been found. They came from civilized and heathen lands. The brightest and the best of the young men of our own country gathered here. And it was here the soil gave up its wealth; mountain, glen, and cañon poured forth their treasures; and, when the gold stream weakened in its volume, the hills and valleys beckoned you to woo them, and promised you an ample dowry of fruit and grain. Israelite never fled from Egyptian bondage through flood and desert attracted by so fair a promise of milk and honey. Moses, from Pisgah's height, never overlooked so fair a land. This land kept its promise, and all its promises, to you. We may not compute the minted millions of its golden wealth that it poured into the laps of you, its pioneers. And now to-day, this week, as I drive over familiar places, I observe your farms and orchards, your fields and vineyards. I see in your exhibition such a display of fruits, I taste such wines, I see such promises of abundance, and in your faces such evidences of health, in your forms such strength, in your sons and daughters such signs of intelligence and beauty, that I am led to wonder and to inquire, Why do I hear the complaint that times are hard and that business is depressed? I remember the splendid, hopeful, older days. I remember these streets of Placerville, resonant with life, crowded with eager workers, exultant with prosperous times; twelve-mule teams keeping lively step to the creaking "schooners" that labored under their heavy loads; music of horn and viol, inviting to the gambling hell. I remember that, with the blessings of abundant gold, came the curse of greed and dissipation—nights of debauchery, to be followed by days of idleness. Gold is only the root of evil. Gold misused and opportunities abused, is what was the matter with El Dorado in the early time. Men lost their pluck, lost their money, and lost heart. Gold had not brought the blessings it promised, and the county went into the dumps. The brave-hearted, energetic, prosperous men—the lucky men—picked up their blankets, gathered together their household gods, and silently stole away. In their folly they said El Dorado is being exhausted of her gold, is exhausted of everything. I stood to-day on one of your hill tops—an orchard bending with such luscious fruit as I never saw elsewhere, vines loaded with clustered grapes, a cottage home embowered in flowers—and I remember standing in the same place twenty-nine years ago, kicking the toe of my boot into the red soil and wondering if it would grow potatoes. I have traveled somewhat in foreign lands. In Ireland, where such soil as this will produce four pounds a year per acre rental; in Scotland, where half a score of landed lords own one-half its broad domain; in Holland and Switzerland, where the cow is housed with the family; in Germany, where women are yoked with horses to plow the land; in Belgium, where a woman works in double harness with a dog; in Italy, where upon the rich plains of Lombardy the toiling peasant dares not eat the fruit and vegetables he aids to grow; in all these lands, where the best years of a man's life are exacted in military service to the State—the State, of which he forms a part; where lands are entailed from father to son—where the eldest son inherits; lands, where the poorest acres that crown the summit of your hills, or the deposits formed from the debris of your mines, would, under the manipulation of toil and the fertilization of labor, become a priceless inheritance; lands, where families are ennobled in the possession of such properties as lie unappropriated within the borders of this State, and that may be had for the asking. Now, then, who is to blame for hard times, for discontent—that El Dorado County does not advance and prosper? If this county, with its lands and forests, mountains, streams, and valleys, its undeveloped mines, its unworked beds of ore, its soil of fruitfulness, was dropped down as God's free gift in any European land, where any might possess and cultivate, what should we see? First, a crazy people fighting for each acre. None so barren, none so inaccessible, none so far from market; none so thin of soil, or cry, or rocky, that it would not be regarded as a priceless gift. Then, let the Divine goodness give to this (then European) county the climate of El Dorado—where the apple and the orange grow side by side; where fruit, and wine, and grain springs from a soil rich in gold; where mountain streams will flow from mountain heights—wait a generation for results; and to these fertile acres, these square miles, let there be but fourteen thousand inhabitants. Do you think, my El Dorado friends, that with this soil and climate, this government of exemption from military duty, this people clothed with sovereign power, educated in free schools, provided with a free press, and authorized to elect their own county officers, raise and disburse their own taxes, there would be a complaint of hard times? Plant El Dorado County amid the glens of Scotland; amid the Alps; on the plains of Lombardy; within the dykes of Holland, and give to it a population of French, German, Italian, Swiss, Belgian, Austrian, Slav, or Hun, make them owners of the fee of the soil, and do you think they would complain of hard times? Then what's the matter with the people of El Dorado? Are you not the equals of Teuton, Celt, or Saxon? Have you degenerated from the races from which you spring? Are you less resolute, less enterprising, less hardy, or less reasonable than your progenitors? Have you softened in brain or muscle that you cannot accomplish results, or attain ends attainable by the foreign races who would so gladly seize the inheritance you despise? Then I say the fault is in yourselves. God has done all He could for you, and civilization has done all it could for you. What I have said for El Dorado applies to California, to the Pacific Coast. All the way from Puget Sound to the Mexican boundary stretches the grandest domain that God has given to man. Rich in everything: in forests, fisheries, mines, fruitful lands; rich in the opportunities for homes, farms, comforts; a land of health, a land of plenty, a land of inexhaustible resources, a land of liberty, of freedom of thought, of freedom of conscience, and of freedom of action under the law. When I think of this land of marvelous wealth and boundless opportunity, this climate that presents no extremes of heat nor cold, this land where a primeval race could subsist and multiply upon the fishes that crowded its streams, the animals that abounded in plain and forest, the fruitful nuts of its pine trees, the grain of its hillsides, and the berries of its river bottoms; when I reflect that succeeding this dusky race of untaught and unteachable savages there came another that lived and flourished upon flocks, and herds, and the product of half-tilled fields and the interchange of a ship load or two each year of hide and tallow for the comforts and luxuries of a higher civilization; when I reflect that Indians and early Spaniards could live and flourish in this land of bounteous gifts, I marvel that our proud Saxon family, in a later age, with all the improvements of modern invention, with inexhaustible gold mines, with an Oriental, coastways, and transcontinental trade, with an annual production of gold, silver, grain, wine, wool, fruit, and a thousand other commodities of the value of millions, find it necessary to grumble at their lot and complain of hard times, I ask what is the matter? It is not the country. Then it must be the people who inhabit it that are at fault. I can see no reason why the people of California ought not to be content with their lot. They are not, and at the risk of incurring your displeasure and hurting your pride, I will give some of the reasons why: First, more than seven-tenths of your wants are artificial. If any family would open an expense book, and in one column place the figures representing the necessities and reasonable comforts of life, and in the other the figures that represent the wants of fashion, luxurious tastes, and false pride, you will be surprised at the result. If you gentlemen could keep an itemized account of expenses growing out of the indulgence of politics, gambling, stock transactions, horse tastes, drinking, smoking, and other extravagant and hurtful proclivities; if you ladies would keep an itemized account of the cost of indulging in fashion, from French boots to French bonnets and four-button kid gloves, of educating your children in fashionable rather than useful branches of learning, and note those items of your housekeeping account that are the growth of ambitious rivalry with wealthier neighbors, you would, I think, all be surprised at the modest sum demanded for the comforts of life, and the larger amount expended for what I term artificial wants. This would not be so noticeable in the country as the towns; not so apparent in Placerville as San Francisco. I speak, I think, intelligently when I say that seven-tenths of the cost of a city life is for unnecessary wants; that nine-tenths of the poverty of the city is genteel poverty; that nearly all the real misery of the city comes from the strain and effort of keeping up genteel appearances, living in society, dressing fashionably. From this comes, in a great measure, stock gambling, defalcations of men in places of trust, the crimes of swindling, family difficulties, divorces, dissipation, suicide, and death. The tendency of the time is for families to flee from the country and to crowd the town. The country is exile to the ambitious woman or the restless man. Society for the family, education for the children, vicinage to the church, are some of the excuses and pretexts put forth to abandon the farm, and live in the town. A healthful public sentiment should have an opposite tendency. The most independent, dignified, and honorable life that man can lead is upon some of God's unincumbered acres, where intelligence prevails and contentment dwelleth. The best population in any country is that which lives upon and tills its own acres. It is with this part of the American people that liberty and prosperity of republican institutions are anchored. If I had the enchanter's wand, I would unroof the houses of San Francisco, and with the power of Asmodeus, I would enable you to look beneath the social surface, the bed quilt, the pot lid, and into the family purse. I would show you the envious heart-burnings that arise from a jealous desire to reach a step higher up on the social ladder. I would show you how the fashionable attire and jewels that adorn the persons of some ladies are obtained. I would show you the care-worn face and weary form of the husband, who toils to provide the wants that society demands. I would open up the secrets and the intrigues of the office hunter, and the anxious fear of him who holds place, and hangs by his eye-lids over the ragged edge of starvation. I would let you see the palpitant heart of the stock gambler, how it beats, and throbs, and stops, and starts, as the speculative barometer rises and falls. I would have you note the anxious brow of the business man, as his eye runs up and down the ledger, and plans and plots to put far away the evil day when the community shall know what he knows of his own insolvency, and contemplates with fear the hour when the inevitable catastrophe of failure must come. I would have you realize the anxious solicitude with which parents contemplate the future for their boys and girls—boys who are uneducated to labor, and girls whose chiefest learning is the accomplishment of music. And after studying well what the unroofing of a great commercial city will disclose, I would have you, men and women of El Dorado County, return to your mountain homes, better content with the beautiful spot that the good God has given you for an inheritance.

"Stop my Paper."

How to make a newspaper that will please everybody is one of those conundrums impossible of solution. The world is composed of all sorts of people, of all sorts of tastes, of all standards of opinion, all shades of intellectual thought, all kinds of religious belief, all sorts of national prejudice, all degrees of superstition. What is one man's meat is another man's poison. A journal is never of uniform excellence—good last week, bad this, better next. The story in prose or the poem that will please a young girl or a romantic boy will not suit the dignified old Paterfamilias who delights in solid facts and the inexorable logic of figures that never lie. If there is in it too much of fun, it does not suit the sedate and grave. If it is too solid and severe, it does not please the gay and thoughtless. If too political, the non-political grumble. If it does not explain all the complicated diplomatic questions and elucidate all the subtle points of international complication, it is incomplete. If it does not grapple with every abuse and boldly endeavor to reform the world, there are philanthropists who will criticize. If it does not contain all the news and all the sensations of the world, it is imperfect. Now, a journal is like an individual. It has its peculiarities. We have acquaintances who are not altogether clever fellows, not always companionable, and yet because of their idiosyncrasies we would not altogether dispense with them. They are in variable moods, pleasant to-day, disagreeable to-morrow. Not unfrequently they wound with their wit or sting in malice, and yet on the general average are worth holding on to. We have some friends who are specialists and bore us with their one idea. Some are stupid, but genial. It takes all sorts of traits to form a character, all sorts of people to form a world, all sorts of actors to play a piece. One's best friend is grouchy in the morning and good natured after dinner. He is in an amiable mood at one time, and in a devilish humor at another; he is flush and generous; he is in a corner and shabbily mean; he is dyspeptic and ill-tempered; he is at ease with himself and all mankind and is a splendid good fellow. So with newspapers; each one has its character, each its peculiarities. They are to be estimated as one estimates an acquaintance. They are to be endured, put up with, avoided at times. Sometimes we "shake" a friend; we have the right to "shake" a newspaper. Sometimes we cut a friend dead and ignore his existence; just in this way the newspaper ought to be treated. As one is not justified in dropping an acquaintance unless he becomes utterly unbearable, so we ought to hang on to our newspaper until it commits some unpardonable offense, and then it ought to be kicked. Our friend may differ with us in opinion, but he must do it courteously; so must a newspaper. Our friend may bore us at times; so may a newspaper. Our friend may be dull and uninteresting; so may a newspaper. We have written all this nonsense just for the opportunity to say that a person who stops his paper because it contains opinions with which he is not in accord is an ass.

Kearney Phenologically.

From the New York Sun.

"I have been to see Denis Kearney to get an outline of his head and gauge his character," Professor Graham, the phenologist, said yesterday. "Of course he would not let me touch his head; but I didn't need to do that. I could see the lines through his short hair, and (getting pencil and paper) I can give you a drawing of his head. It is shaped like this:

"Where the 1 is his intellectual faculties are exhibited, and the figure 2 represents his self-esteem. I will give you a diagnosis of his faculties in short order. They are: Small moral brain; large animal; small in thought; fair perception; very large self-esteem; will try to rule or ruin; large combativeness and destructiveness; will look after things for himself; a 'No. 1' man."

No photographer has any business to tell a sitter to assume a pleasant expression of countenance. If a man wants to look piratical, that's his affair.

SNUBBING.

Thackeray wrote a book on "Snobs," Dean Swift an essay on "Boors," and, some years ago, one of our ablest local pens did justice to "Humbugs;" but Snubbing is a field of virgin soil, in which the pen of neither author, essayist, nor poet has deemed it profitable to plow or harrow; yet, as a social nuisance, it is widespread, and, of all domestic wrongs, it is probably the most vicious.

With no intention to recognise here the canaille, who use in their families language profane or abusive, which would entitle them to a place in the category of mere blackguards, or whose indecencies of tongue are within police cognizance, we shall discuss the more refined class—people who claim to be respectable, delicate, and genteel—who live in good houses, and number in their ranks the wealthy, educated, and fashionable.

As defined by lexicographers "snub" means to nip, to check, to suppress, to extinguish, to put down, to treat with contempt; and, in the hands of an expert, when wielded with vigor, the snub is a formidable weapon. And though we admit that, until intrusiveness and impertinence are ostracized from society, its use will remain an indispensable accomplishment to ward off familiarity or repel boorishness; yet its purpose should be a buckler and not a spear; it should be used to defend and protect, but never to slay or wound; and to attain skill in its point and parry is the acquisition of a fine art. The science may be divided into political, literary, social, and domestic.

Passing over the political flunky, or party hack, who is tolerated while useful, and snubbed when importunate; the moonstruck poetaster diseased with scriphobia; the philanthropist who would right all wrongs; the reformer with a mission; and the meddler without one—all snubbed in self-defense. The author who regales you with his philanderings, and the punster with his atrocities, when extinguished with a sneer, or crushed by a bon mot, is entitled to no pity.

The snub social in intricate, complicated, and hydra-headed. The Snooks are not invited to Mrs. Shoddy's ball; the Busters won't return Mrs. Shoddy's call; Miss Bangup forgets last summer's introduction; Mrs. McGuzzle omits to make a dinner call; Misses Flash left no "P. P. C.'s;" somebody made no call of condolence, and somebody else gave no response to the mystic "R. S. V. P.;" Dr. Quack won't meet Dr. Pellet; Miss Baggs is always "not at home" when young Gimlet calls; Bishop Morphine gives two fingers to a parishioner, one to a rector's lady, and none to a curate's wife. And these, according to the fine arts, are divided into the several subdivisions of the snub-social; they are believed to be justifiable, but are invariably the fruit of ignorance, arrogance, and folly; they pertain to a class of big-headed dunces, or light-headed fashionables; they sting others, and are stung back; they are snubbed, and snub in return. It is the ill-natured effort of Lilliputian minds to maintain a doubtful dignity in the pigmy scales of social consequence, and is, therefore, the controversy of equals, and does no harm.

The domestic snubber when feminine is also innocuous, for besides the contempt the masculine poltroon earns by submission to the ordeal, the infliction is too rare to deserve comment, and female snubbers of this class, at best, are never more than a partially developed variety of the species. But the male snubber is always venomous, and, like rattlesnakes and rodents, they should be declared noxious reptiles, hunted from the pales of civilization, and a government bounty offered for their scalps.

They are beings in whose anatomy souls were omitted, and gizzards inserted in the place of hearts; in temperament they are nervous, restless, and fussy; in character timid, cautious, and cowardly, or impatient, imperious, and dictatorial, as fear of consequence or immunity from resentment warrants; self-opinionated but superficial, they sneer at etiquette, scoff at society laws, and, in justice to the Almighty, proclaim that they are "self-made men," in habits bad feeders, poor sleepers, and usually of unsound health; their appearances are never of the bon homme or fat and rosy order, but lean representatives of the class that Julius Cæsar hated:

"Let me have men about me that are fat;
Sleek-headed men, and such as sleep o' nights.
Yond' Cassius has a lean and hungry look;
He thinks too much; such men are dangerous."

When you see intelligent women restless but silent in the drawing-room, you may be sure of this vermin's presence. When a dining table presents the quiet of a church yard, or monopolized by the masculine diapason, pregnant with tedious repetitions, and unresponsive to nothingnesses, you may be sure this dread iconoclast is there. The cowed aspect of children, their whispered questions and signaled answers, their nervous gesticulations of head, hand, or brow, all denote his depressing influence; no gushing love or playful romp welcomes the oppressor's return, no prattle or joyous shout invades that home; the hush of seeming fear heralds his entrance, and real silence accompanies his presence. I know of no sadder sight than the undue suppression of the young, whose dread of the snub paternal changes them from intelligent human beings, with lungs, and tongues, and brains, into voiceless, monotonous and oppressive automata.

Domestic snubbing is the meanest and most cowardly of incivilities, but, like the Australian boomerang, it recoils upon the perpetrator, and while he succeeds in paralyzing home intercourse and happiness, by the conversion of his house into a rat-pit that he may play terrier, he excludes himself from the sympathy, love, and confidence of his family; or if commercial pride induces the maintenance of a palatial dwelling and costly table, he pays exorbitantly for the privileges of a gilded manger, in which to browse, snarl, and sleep.

The dependence of wife and children upon the moods and manners of husband and father is so absolute, that they lay unshielded at his mercy, where, by the laws of God and man, he is required to minister to their happiness, and to be to them practically "the source from whence all blessings flow;" instead of which, the domestic pessimist is ingenious in discovering petty errors, hunts up omissions, nurses small grievances, invents imaginary ones, and revels in fault-finders, until the soul-bruised wife in this "house of correction" degenerates into mental sterility, and the snubbed children (tutored by parental discords) learn with their infant training to growl, snivel, and snub, till time develops them into sulky girls and boorish boys (unmannered cubs), who answer with a snap, like the shutting of a Jack-knife, and assert with a growl, like the snarl of a bull dog; they expect to be snubbed and get in their say defiantly; their very tone of voice is indicative of desperate resolution or dogged courage. And the evil never ends with the perpetrator of this crime, for he is sure to beget progeny, inflict his race upon posterity, and the infection of example serves to hand down to generations after him this patent right of misery.

The family table has a purpose beyond the greedy consumption of food; it is the reunion of minds, where each one brings his or her quota of healthy intelligence, the current events of that day's life, social chat, and political gossip, European news, literary discussions, and such contributions of wit and fancy as make dining an intellectual as well as a physical feast. And there, too, children, like young birds trying their unfledged wings, make their first essays in being agreeable; there they learn to converse without being intrusive, and to joke without rudeness; there, too, the little courtesies of life are imbibed, and the eye and ear of boyhood drink in words and actions, that mould the character and make the after man. And it is just as unreasonable to expect that a Chesterfield or Grandison can be nurtured amid the incivilities of social life, as that deformity can beget symmetry or vulgarity produce elegance.

I know one family where the hospitality of the host is neutralized by the silent inanition of the rest of the family; but, in his absence, the amiability of the mother is only excelled by the wit and brilliancy of her daughters. Alas! his presence is the upas tree; and such sentences as "Well, what of it?" "What do you know about it?" "Of course, you know a good deal?" "What fool told you that?" "Where did you get that nonsense?" "Don't talk like a fool?" "Don't talk about what you don't know?" and kindred sentences, are the poison that stifles social intercourse, and inflicts upon his family insults that no stranger would tolerate. But his wife (because it is her misfortune to be his wife) must bear the insolence, and his children (because they are his chattels) dare evince no resentment. Unrebuked he plays the tyrant and bully; unpunished he crushes souls, hearts, and brains; and yet he pretends to be a gentleman, is known to be a man of culture, and claims to be a man of honor—with justice, too, for this class invariably belong to the order sans tache, of successful business men, moral pharisees! who are publicly irreproachable, but privately infamous; whose word on 'Change is current as a gold note, and his check better than a government bond; Christian hypocrites! who flaunt white cravats and church-memberships, pass the plate, and teach Sunday-school.

Probably it is unreasonable to expect the sordid money-getter to part with his coin to wife or children (who, by the arithmetic of his avarice, are consumers and not producers) without the ordinary snub, conjugal or parental, just as it would be unreasonable to expect another class of these grumbling, snarling putterers not to usurp jurisdiction over the female sovereignties of the kitchen, the pantry, and the laundry, not to interrogate servants, regulate the petty expenditures of wife and daughters, interfere generally with matters beyond their control, or be otherwise than fussy, meddlesome, and disagreeable. But such men are martyrs to the Juggernaut of economy; they love, hate, act, and move with that object, and if forgetful of the rights of others, if they make wife and children barter their pride and self-respect for food and clothes, they hope to save money and grow richer, which is their sole object of life, and are, therefore, brutal for a purpose. But the "domestic snubber" is a volunteer ruffian, a creature without reason; he is insolent without an object, tyrannical without cause, wounds without a motive, is despicable without reward, despotic without a purpose, loses by each victory, and, like Beecher's profane swearer, "his is the only vice for which the devil pays no recompense."

G. F. S.

An Antidote for the Suicidally Inclined.

EDITOR ARGONAUT:—Not a hundred years ago, nor a thousand miles from the Pacific Coast, a young man of possibly twenty-four sat at midnight in a small and sparsely furnished room, and reflected. His gaunt companions were Hunger, Despair, and Misery. He was without money and without employment. Unfortunately, he had friends; and he had pride—that deep, false pride, inseparable from a nature high-strung and sensitive as his. "Should I die to-night—should I send a bullet crashing through my throbbing brain and relieve the terrible pressure there," murmured he, "I should be at rest." Then came before his imagination a picture of his acquaintance meeting: "So M— has shot himself! Poor devil, was he drunk?" "No, believe not; they say he was busted." "Ah, that's worse!" "I always thought he was a little queer," said a third friend. "Damn fool," remarked another, laconically. But his best and truest friends, he noticed, said little or nothing. Then came the newspapers, and the strictly accurate account of his taking off that his far off family would have to read in their agony and shame. "Losses in stocks," "drunk," "crossed in love," "insane," according as the ubiquitous reporter of the different papers felt, or the amount of beer imbibed up to the time of obtaining the item. He was tired of struggling with the world, with poverty, and humiliation; but these visions of what he knew must follow hurt him quite as much as the weariness and pain of living, and stayed his hand as it was about to snap the thread of life. Then, as he sat meditating thus, his thoughts began to flow, and he wrote. Soon he forgot his hunger and misery, and wrote on as the minutes sped. There are moments of inspiration when the pen drops a divine thought from the soul of genius at every stroke, and so it was with him—and he wrote, knowing it not. He only felt a something that he did not see in the faces of other men; for who can say what genius is! Truly not those who are afflicted with it. When at last he dropped his pen there was a more peaceful and contented look upon his tired face. Quietly he folded his manuscript, and early the next day took it to the ARGONAUT. It was rejected without comment.

NEMO.

St. Bernard puts it well when he says: "Humanity is, of all graces, the chiefest when it doesn't know itself to be a grace at all."

"Dying in poverty," says a modern moralist, "is nothing, it is living in poverty that comes hard."

PONY GLASSES OF FRENCH BRANDY.

L'amour, dans le mariage, serait l'accomplissement d'un beau rêve, s'il n'en était trop souvent la fin.—A. Karr.

Les rides sont le tombeau de l'amour.—Sarrasin.

S'il se trouve quelque part des femmes qui meurent sages, il faut qu'elles aient combattu toute la vie.—L'abbé Prévot.

L'amour n'est qu'un oubli de la raison.—St. Jérôme.

Les femmes appellent repentir le doux souvenir de leurs fautes et l'amer regret de ne pas pouvoir recommencer.—Beaumanoir.

—Eh quoi! vous passez devant moi sans me regarder, disait une dame à Fontenelle. —Madame, répondit-il, si je vous eusse regardé, je n'aurais point passé.

La société des femmes gâte les mœurs et forme le goût. Montesquieu.

Bacchus, endormant la raison,
Par sa liqueur traitresse,
A bien souvent sur le gazon,
Renversé la sagesse.

Le temps est tôt ou tard le vainqueur de l'amour, l'amitié seule dompte le temps.—Mme. d'Arconville.

La sympathie est une parenté de cœur et d'esprit. Entre deux personnes de sexe différent les sens entrent aussi dans la famille.—A. Dupuy.

Un homme de lettres rencontre un jour dans la rue un individu qui l'aborde en disant:—Bonjour, mon cher ami, comment te portes-tu? —Bien, mon cher ami, comment te nommes-tu?

L'amitié est impossible entre un grand et un petit, fort difficile entre un jeune homme et un jeune femme. Entre deux jolies femmes, c'est une fiction poétique.

Un vaudevilliste rentrant un soir au logis, après avoir caressé un peu trop la dive bouteille, sa moitié lui parut double:

Grands dieux! s'écria-t-il,
Je n'avais qu'une femme et j'étais malheureux,
Par quel forfait épouvantable
Ai-je donc mérité que vous m'en donniez deux.

Fontenelle aimait beaucoup le saumon. Un jour il dinait chez Madame du D. où se trouvaient plusieurs convives peu lettrés. Comme il retournait une seconde fois au saumon, l'un d'eux lui dit d'un air un peu goguenard: —Eh! Eh! Monsieur de Fontenelle, je ne savais pas que les philosophes aimassent autant les bons morceaux. —Probablement, répondit-il sèchement, que Monsieur s'imaginait que Dieu n'avait fait les bonnes choses que pour les sots.

L'amour est un duel à l'épingle.

CONJUGAISON.
Je t'aime,
Tu m'aimes,
Il ou elle m'adore,
Nous nous marions,
Vous vous trompez,
Ils se séparent.

Les romans ne sont pas dans les livres, ils sont dans la vie.

Une dame et son fils âgé de six ans s'arrêtent devant un bureau à tabac. —Maman, achète-moi une pipe. —Mais, mon ami, les dames n'achètent pas des pipes. —Tu diras que c'est pour moi.

Un Monsieur rend visite à une famille de sa connaissance et demande à un petit garçon de cinq ans: —Qui aimes-tu le mieux, ton papa ou ta maman? —J'aime le poulet, répond l'innocent.

L'amour est la poésie des sens.

EPITAPHE.
Marthe, dit-on, fut toujours sage,
Jamais personne n'eut son cœur,
Mais cette vertu, je le gage,
Elle la dut à sa laideur.

Pour les hommes une coquette est ce qu'est un jouet pour un enfant. Tant qu'il l'amuse, il le conserve; le jour où il ne lui plait plus, il le brise.

Les illusions tombent l'une après l'autre, comme les écorces d'un fruit, et le fruit, c'est l'expérience. Sa saveur est amère, elle a pourtant quelque chose d'acre qui fortifie.—G. de Nerval.

Il faut avoir beaucoup étudié pour arriver à savoir qu'on ne sait rien, ou, du moins, pas grand chose.

Mieux vaut une erreur qui rend heureux qu'une évidence qui désespère.

L'amour console de tout.

Qui peut gouverner une femme peut gouverner une nation. —Balzac.

Monsieur le comte de N..., âgé de soixante ans, voulant soustraire Mademoiselle de P... au despotisme d'une mère capricieuse lui offrit de l'épouser en ces termes: —Mademoiselle, voulez-vous être ma veuve?

—Ma femme qui me croit vertueux! disait un jour un mari à Balzac, comme elle sera étonnée au jugement dernier. —Je ne sais qui le sera le plus de vous ou d'elle, lui répondit le sarcastique écrivain.

La coquette est une femme qui met son honneur à la loterie; il y a quatre-vingt-dix-neuf à parier contre un qu'elle le perdra.

Chaque passion a ses termes adoucis: L'orgueil s'appelle dignité; l'égoïsme, charité de soi-même; la faiblesse, modestie; l'avarice, économie; ainsi des autres.

L'immense majorité des sots ayant fait les lois qui régissent les usages du monde, ces lois sont naturellement au bénéfice des sots.

Fort alai, plus fort relève.

On raconte qu'au moment de mourir Alexandre Dumas dit à son fils: —Ouvre ce tiroir, tu y trouveras un louis; je te le laisse. Je suis arrivé à Paris, il y a quarante ans avec deux louis dans ma poche, il m'en reste un, tu vois que je n'ai pas trop dépensé.

SAN FRANCISCO, Sept. 15.

L. G. J.

NOTICE.

The Argonaut is published every Saturday, at No. 522 California Street, by the Argonaut Publishing Company.
Rates of Subscription, $4 per year; six months, $2.25; three months, $1.50—payable in advance. Postage prepaid. City subscribers served for 35 cents per 4 weeks. Single copies, 10 cents.
Address all communications to "The Argonaut, 522 California Street, San Francisco."
Branch Office, Cooper's Bookstore, 716 Market Street
News Dealers and Agents in the interior supplied by the San Francisco News Company, No. 412 Washington Street, to whom all orders should be addressed.
A. P. STANTON, Business Manager.

THE ARGONAUT.

FRANK M. PIXLEY, }
FRED. M. SOMERS, } Editors.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 21, 1878.

EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

PLACERVILLE, Sept. 15, 1878.—We thought we knew something of California, and we do, but we do not know it all. In response to an invitation from the El Dorado Agricultural Society we visited that county during the past week. We mined there in 1849; we have from time to time visited it; but never, till this last trip, did we fully appreciate its wealth. There is a thermal belt—of we do not know how many miles in width—skirting our foot-hills, with a climate and soil peculiarly adapted to the raising of all kinds of products. To enumerate them is to schedule all the grains, fruits, and vegetables that may be grown in the temperate and semi-tropic latitudes. The apple and the orange we saw growing side by side; wheat, barley, rye, oats, potatoes, and every variety of grain and vegetable thrive there in luxuriant growth. There is no variety of grape that we have ever seen that we did not see there in perfection. Such orchards as we visited do not exist elsewhere in the world, outside of California. It is doubtless true that through Shasta, Tehama, Butte, Yuba, Nevada, Placer, Amador, Calaveras, Tuolumne, Mariposa, Merced, Fresno, and Tulare, this same fruitful belt extends. We are now writing of El Dorado, and only of what we saw. Our first surprise was to observe that the deep, productive soil extends to the summit of the hills. We had somehow come to think that the orchards of El Dorado were confined to the bottom lands of the deep valleys and the water-courses—such spots as Coloma; and we had thought that a great part of this rich soil had been sluiced away in search of gold. The facts turn out to be that the best orchards and the best vineyards are upon the slopes of the hills. The chaparral land, when redeemed, is strong, good soil. The principal trees are pine and white oak—the white oak indicating the best land, but the land is all good. Even where the soil has been washed away the land is easily restored; and upon gravel banks and deposits of debris, when leveled off, we saw some excellent orchards. The system of ditches, originally constructed for mining, brings water to the tops of the highest hills; and there is not a mountain farm that may not be cheaply supplied with water from these artificial water-courses. In our extensive ride over the county we did not see an acre of barren land. The whole county is dotted with fruit farms—and such fruit! We saw orchards that looked like tangled swamps of bending willows—the trees fairly resting their boughs upon the ground from their weight of fruit, gleaming in the sunlight with the rich colors of apple, pear, peach, plum, and fig. Another marvel: Inclosed lands of the best quality may be purchased for from five to ten dollars per acre, while there are hundreds of thousands of acres of land subject to entry at government price. There are homes in this county for a hundred thousand people to be had for the taking. There is not a tramp or bum in the county, nor an unoccupied man, nor a poor man, unless he has met with misfortune, or unless he is constitutionally lazy, or unless he drinks whisky. The climate is simply perfect. There are in this belt of country a thousand fortunes awaiting men of energy, capital, and organizing ability. Every five miles square will employ enough capital to build a fruit-drying establishment, a still, and a cider-mill. There is a wealth of fruit going every year to decay because it has no market. The fruit-growers have been swindled from two causes: First, their own stupidity and criminal lack of sufficient enterprise to inaugurate a coöperative system of fruit-drying, cider-making establishments, and stills to make peach and cider brandy, cherry and other cordials, and the many other incidental industries belonging to fruit culture; and, secondly, by fruit-dealers, who, by a fraudulent system of under-valuation of fruit, have given the farmers nothing for it, brought it to San Francisco and thrown it into the bay to keep prices up to the consumers. The farmer has received for grapes, peaches, plums, cherries, apricots, pears, figs, half a cent per pound, and for apples less. Thousands of tons of fruit have been allowed to decay every year for want of a market. A peach as large as a coffee-cup, of the most delicious flavor, rich, red, and juicy, its cheeks painted by the divine Artist, weighing a pound, has brought the farmer half a cent; while some middleman will throw it into the bay unless we pay a dime for it. There is fruit enough to be raised in this broad fruit belt, which, if dried and canned, would supply the world. There is wine enough to be produced that would rival the vintages of France, Germany, Spain, Portugal, and the Canary Islands, not only in quantity but quality. It is a miserable affectation that despises the wines of our State, and drinks the thin, cheap, and nasty clarets of France, and the white, sour swills of the Rhine. There is a wealth in these foothills greater than all the gold mines of the western Sierra and all the silver deposits of the eastern slope. It demands capital, organization, enterprise, energy, industry, and patience to work out for El Dorado and the other counties around a wonderful destiny. There is more money in the wine, cider, cordials, nuts, fruits (canned and dried) of this region than in any other industry we know. The people of El Dorado County are a sleepy set. They have no organized fruit business, only one cannery, no banks, poor roads; they have repudiated part of the county debt; the railroad comes within twelve miles of Placerville and there it stops. Its villages are filled with groggeries and around them the usual throng of idle, whisky-drinking vagabonds. Money demands from one and a half to two per cent. a month interest. When the Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank failed in San Francisco it was ascertained that a large number of its depositors lived in El Dorado County. Only think of the absurdity of the few rich men sending their accumulations to San Francisco to be loaned to stock gamblers, instead of loaning their money to their neighbors and thus building up and developing the resources of their own county. El Dorado ought to own all the ditches that bring water within its borders. Cheap water is more essential to the farmers of El Dorado than to the citizens of San Francisco. The county should buy the ditches and thus furnish cheap and abundant water. Get in debt. The increased value of property will give increased revenue from taxation. There is no economy nor sense in being mean and narrow. Oranges will grow in El Dorado. It is a mistake think that orange trees are hurt by frosts. There should be orange orchards planted without delay. They will pay an hundred per cent. per annum on their cost. Orchards can be bought now for one-quarter of their value, because there has been no market and people are discouraged. The man who sells his orchard is a fool; the man who buys it is a wise man. It would be better for the county that new men get into it. It needs new blood, new energy, and more capital, and that is all it does need to make it one of God's favored garden spots. Our trip to El Dorado has destroyed all the sympathy we have ever had for the sand-lot bummers. If these idle and worthless foreign malcontents would stop blaspheming God and cursing republican institutions, go to El Dorado County and go to work, make for themselves homes and farms, they could become what now they are not, respectable, decent, law-abiding citizens. P.

The Bulletin wants a clause in the new Constitution to prohibit lobbying. In our humble opinion a much more effective remedy would be to prohibit special legislation; for then, Othello-like, the occupation of the lobby would be gone. The lobby is born of and owes its existence to special legislation. The same men who run the lobby run our primary elections; and it is just here where the trouble begins. When the primaries are about to meet the whole army of contractors, schemers, and political tricksters is up in arms looking out for its interests, while the well-meaning citizen is resting on his oar in conscious security. The contractor whose case had no standing in court, and the schemer who wants a thieving bill enacted, are on the alert. The first act is to find a successful member of the third house, to whom their case is stated; a bargain is struck, and a plan of systematic public robbery is put in train; the primaries are stuffed with pliant, purchasable tools, who nominate men who are owned body and soul by the parties of the first part. This accounts for the number of legislators who represent themselves at the capital instead of their constituents. In the Legislature the member from San Francisco meets the member from Yreka; "tickle me and I'll tickle you" is the word, and between them the public is plundered. The material by which we have been represented at Sacramento is no criterion by which to judge the men of this city. This community is not wanting in men of sterling worth and integrity, but under our primary system they have no more show of being nominated or elected than the scriptural camel has of passing through the eye of the scriptural needle. To be successful in politics nowadays a man must "crook the pregnant hinges of the knee," and do everything else that is nasty and distasteful to the man of principle, self-respect, and independence. If the gentlemen of the Convention will prohibit special legislation, they will eliminate from our political system one of its most demoralizing elements.

AN APOLOGY FOR THE SUICIDE.

"Then is it sin to rush into the secret house of death ere death dare come to us?" The query is that of the melancholy Dane, unanswered as yet, even by the muffled reports of the pistols whose obedient bullets have within the week sent two of our prominent citizens to "that undiscovered country from whose bourne no traveler returns"—the one with a shattered heart, the other with a suddenly scattered brain. Is this thing to become fashionable? Will conscience eventually make cowards of us all, leaving no one—

"Who would bear the whips and scorns of time,
The oppressors' wrong, the proud man's contumely,
The pangs of despised love, the law's delays,
The insolence of office, and the spurns
That patient merit of the unworthy takes,
When he himself might his quietus make,
With a bare bodkin?"

It is a question most seriously to be considered. Already the city has a suicidal reputation, a fearful record in the method and the material of those who here shuffle off this mortal coil. San Francisco is the proud city of self-destruction—the insane asylum of the world; and it is so natural that it should be that extenuation can even be extended the self-destroyer. Every condition here is favorable to the development of the disease. Here meet the wild and the reckless, the daring and the desperate. It is the dernier resort of the adventurer, the Mecca of the ambitious, the forlorn hope of the financially distressed and the bodily diseased. If fortune does not favor here there is no other place to look for it; if ambition finds no goal, achievement no triumph, on this western fringe of the continent, the spirit sinks hopelessly within; if the climate brings no healing balm, there is "a shuddering shape, a quiver of breath, and Life's story is told to the angel of Death." And outside of the unusual—and that is all that insanity and suicide are—the whole restless community runs away. Society here is full of failures, full of men who never have succeeded and who fear they never will; full of women who in the first half of their days did nothing but eat, and sleep, and simper, and who now can do nothing but perpetuate their weaknesses; full of people weary of their own presence; full of broken and bruised reeds; full of dissatisfaction and distress. Business is a boil and a bubble. The human machine runs at high pressure. One's own friends hang on the safety-valve and only step aside for the flying pieces of the financial boiler. Social life is a lamentable lie. Home is almost a myth, especially to the denizens of lodging house and hotel, and there are thousands upon thousands of them. Man is a morbid animal. He lives his life with restless excitement, follows his pursuits with feverish impatience, is buoyant to the highest notch, or else securely locked in his cave of gloom he can be found mourning over wasted energy or nursing a strangled hope. This is the dangerous moment. We all know it because we have all stared the spectre squarely in the face. "To be or not to be" is a question as familiar as the memory of troubles we have had. Conditions ripen. Sleep is denied. The brain gets in a tangle. Your thoughts run away with you. You live a whole life over again. You begin to run up the debit and the credit account in the ledger of existence. The balance you carry over in the red ink of despair, and it is against you. There is no one near to side-track you from the ringing rails of an impending fatality; no loving hand of sister, mother, or wife to soothe with gentle hand your burning, throbbing brain; no caress that will bring on the forgetfulness of a peaceful, perfect rest; no voice to murmur a soothing even-song or whisper to your spirit something of its own quiet strength and patient trust, that things will all come out right by and by. But there is an impulse that toys with life. There is the weary, storm-tossed, tempest-driven voyager's longing for land, the wanderer's yearning for home, the craving for the solace of sleep that knows no waking—then the convulsive clutch of the laudanum bottle or the nervous touch of the trembling trigger, and the terrible deed is done. And why terrible? Why cowardly, as some sarcastically put it? Cowards rarely snap for themselves the slender thread.

"He is dead—
Not by a public minister of justice,
Nor by a hired knife; but that self-hand
Which writ his honor in the acts it did,
Hath, with the courage which the heart did lend it,
Splitted the heart."

But it needs not the sable Hamlet to tell the temper of those who voluntarily take the short step into eternity. Two splendid asylums in this State hold hundreds afraid to take the antidote, and as many gibbering idiots proclaim the death of life in a moving body. Better death than degradation; better "to sleep, perchance to dream," making your desolation to begin a better life; better "do that thing which ends all other deeds, which shackles accidents and bolts up change, which cancels one's captivity," than lack the strength of spirit and the nerve to dismiss yourself, and suffer the tortures of the mentally damned. It may appear heartless and unnecessary to justify the act, and it would be were it not for the crowd at the cross-roads where ignorance and superstition meet, and where the the traditional sharpened stake is being so industriously driven through the bodies of the two latest emancipations.

PRATTLE.

A Mr. Benjamin F. Eaton is to the fore with a published letter recounting his services and sufferings in the civil war as claims to government employment, which a year of tireless effort, however, has not enabled him to obtain. I have the honor to remind Mr. Eaton that when flaunted by an individual for personal profit "the bloody shirt" is as offensive as when given to the breeze by a party for political power. If a man would have office or employment let him state his qualifications, not his deserts—his necessities if he will, but his "claims" never. Merit was born dumb, and as certain richly colored plants pale in the sunlight, so scars lose their honor by exposure.

It were better that this country had been destroyed than rescued by men who tally their fatigues and map their wounds for personal advantage. How dare you, Mr. Eaton, immodest tramp and calculating patriot, debit your country with services of duty? It is you and your unwholesome kind who have brought the name of "Union soldier" into an offensive condition of nasal disfavor. If in the recent brotherly squabble office was the bone of contention, I am sorry it was not borne off by the other dog.

Look ye, comrades—soldiers of the "Grand Army of the Republic," "Boys in Blue," and patriots-continuant of all sorts of kinds—I am vain enough to think (and it seems necessary to explain) that I did the country some service myself in a soldiering way. I know I got my head broken like a walnut at that business, and that the best Government on the face of the earth had the honesty to cheat me out of five months' pay, while exacting to the last cent the price of my clothing and subsistence during the same turbulent season of "bloody noses and cracked crowns." I do not discern, however, that all this constitutes a "claim" to any further favor than it would be for my country to pay what it justly owes me; and should, I hope, have the dignity to decline any one of the ninety-odd thousand "Government places" if indelicately tendered me from any considerations other than ability to intelligently perform its duties. But, God bless my soul, how competent I am!

If I were King of Judea, and that fellow Lazarus should come down from Paradise, displaying the scars of the sores which the dogs licked, explaining that he got them in the royal service (I have always suspected they were "bed sores," made by the paving-stones at rich men's gates) and asking for a better "place" than Abraham's bosom, I should instigate my dogs to take him by the throat.

Concerning wounds, the most honorable one I ever saw given was delivered by a barbarous dog from whose teeth a vagrant negro was rescuing a scurvy pig with its ears in rags and tatters. The darkey, when he got his hurt, was in ignominious retreat, too, with the roaring porker in his arms. Now this pig was not only a stranger to him but an enemy to the neighborhood; in its succor there was neither profit nor glory—nor much satisfaction, for it, also, bit him. The suffering incurred was of a vulgar, unheroic sort, for which lamentation would be derided, and to which resignation had not the dignity of martyrdom. But I did not then think, nor do I now, that that African's wound could with propriety be presented as a moral claim to "sit at the receipt of customs"—even had it not been a physical disqualification to sit anywhere.

The callid Call doth impetrate a curse
Upon a neighbor's elegiac verse.
O Pickering, deceptor, I opine
The verse, if crasser than thine own, is thine.
No bolder wing than thine affronts the sky—
Only thyself thyself can underfly.

Our local theatres having resolved to discontinue dead-heading, I beg to submit the following suitable notice to be placarded at the doors:

"Free list entirely suspended, the public press only excepted."

I am partial to that announcement, not because (like Mr. Bayard Taylor and the late Mr. William Cullen Bryant) I am a member of the public press—of which I am entirely ashamed—but because (like Mr. Hector A. Stuart and Mr. William D. Pollock) I am a poet—of which I am exceedingly proud; and the line above given has been pronounced the most faultless of English hexameters. As such it is hereby commended to the study of all my brother poets; and I venture to add the hope that they will not enviously condemn it on the ground that it has six feet, whereas they have but four each. Let them remember their countervailing age of ears.

The boldest dash at literary criticism that I have recently observed outside the columns of our local dailies is that of the St. Paul (Minn.) Pioneer Press. This arbitrator literarum pounces upon Mr. Boyesen's story, "Falconberg," in Scribner, because, the scene being laid in Minnesota, the author afflicts one of his characters with ague, and makes his hero wade through "deep red mud." There is no ague, no red mud, in all Minnesota, yells the censor!

Did sunbeam ever gild a lout
Of such a fatful favor,
And man-in-moon fall sick at snout
Impested with his flavor,
Blow breezes! Breezes blow, and clear
The literary atmosphere!

A local bard makes use of a cow-county journal to deride the failure of my attempts to rid San Francisco of its poets. True; I am like the two slaves mentioned by Lusitanus, who were constantly, but unavailingly, engaged in gathering into baskets, and carrying to the shore, and drowning in the sea, the vermin that multiplied on the body of their master.

Gen. Lew. Wallace, recently appointed Governor of New Mexico, and now en route for his post of duty, says that if he is pleased with the country he will remain there; if not, he will resign. This is not the language of patriotism. The American true statesman, proud to serve his country even at a sacrifice, would remain in New Mexico whether he liked it or not, so long as the salary suited.

"Africa," says Bishop Simpson, "has no science; India and China have no science. How comes it that this science exists only where Christianity is?" It is a coincidence, your reverence: what [really] produces, fosters, encourages, and conserves science is the silk stove-pipe hat. The silk hat is not worn in Africa; India and China have it not. Wherever the silk hat is planted on the human head, there science has taken root; no silk hats, no science—ignorance, error, superstition, moral and intellectual night. It is the silk hat that has given us the graces, the refinements, the splendors of modern civilization—copious largess of wisdom and abundant benefaction of light. It is the beacon, the pharos, of humanity, in the broad benignity of whose blaze our laden argosies elude the rocks and shoals of social disaster. Your reverence's theory (grotesque as it is) has this value: It marks the hitherto unobserved coincidence that the silk-hatted, and therefore scientific, nations happen to profess Christianity. It has not yet been observed that they practice it.

Speaking of science, I should like to know what is meant by the clever opponent of Kwang Chang Ling in last Saturday's ARGONAUT, when he writes as follows: "Political economy, as generally taught, is a cold, calculating, commercial science (if indeed it should be called a science). It looks at things as they are, not as they ought to be. It takes for granted that whatever is right. It ignores the great Godlike principle of human sympathy." This is indeed a terrible indictment. A science that will not put on spectacles painted according to somebody's notion of how things ought to seem to appear; that will not even question the propriety of the natural laws which it expounds; that is content to leave the great Godlike principle of human sympathy (whatever kind of "principle" that may have the eccentricity to be) to those who make a separate profession of it—such a science, I say, is almost as trivial as astronomy, as base as geology, as wicked as logic or arithmetic. Its professors are miscreants of no common order, and might with advantage to themselves and us be compelled to pursue their cold commercial calculations with blind fingers amongst the bolt-heads of prison doors.

Following this really melting complaint against political economy is such a pen-picture of the political economist himself, with his evil thoughts about him, as would amaze and pain even the most hardened of the gang who follow in the footsteps of that devil, Adam Smith. But, thank heaven, they are not all pirates and cannibals: "There are political economists, however, of eminence and respectability, who recognize the element of humanity, even in political economy." Ah, yes, there is Carey, "the white-plumed Navarre of the nostrum"—which is protection to Pennsylvania industry. And there is that eminent authority, Horace Greeley, in whom, also, the element of humanity (which I take to be the same thing as the great Godlike principle of human sympathy) was so strong that he spent his shining life justifying the taxation of every man, woman, and child in the country, to support a few thousands of persons in employments useful to nobody but themselves. And there is Denis Kearney.

Considering that the great and Godlike principle of human sympathy is always, in this country, engaged in making a corner in the necessities of existence, or in cheating creditors, or in some such charitable scheme for exacting money from one man's pocket to put it in another's, I have the honor to suggest that it be called, for greater accuracy, the great and Godlike principle of human scampery. And whereas the element of humanity is now engaged, within the same geographical limits, in an angry crusade against the material welfare of the neediest of God's creatures because they are aliens, I suggest also that it (if it is not the same thing as the other thing) be renamed the element of Americanity. I do not say the element is not right, in a cold, calculating, commercial sense; I only say that a sentiment (to give it at last its true name) which concerns itself with the well-being of only a part of mankind can not call itself humanity without an exercise of effrontery so cold that impudence of the next lowest temperature might advantageously be used for cooking eggs.

To meet the needs of American publicists, politicians, editors, and women of affairs generally, why not so modify the sciences as to give the sentiments and emotions a recognition and influence which they are now compelled to seek in other fields? Sentimental science might be taught in the schools and universities. Let us take Logic. While in many cases the syllogism might retain its present cold, calculating character, given premises heartlessly compelling a certain conclusion as surely as an acid and an alkali make soap, yet in deference to the great Godlike principle it might be in other cases profoundly modified. For example, it might be conceded good logic to say, with Aristotle: "All A is B; C is A; therefore C is B"—these being mere abstract terms, and not appealing to the element of humanity; but at the same time it might be decreed better logic to say: "All poor men are honest; John Jones is a poor man; therefore John Jones is beautiful as the hours and wise as Zobeide."

Take Arithmetic. Let it remain true, in dealing with mere numbers, that twice two are four; concerning things, it should depend. Would it not better satisfy the emotional side of our nature—which is the divine side—to say: "Twice two hearts with but a single thought are five beating as one?" Government, which, as the truly good well know, can discharge a debt with a promissory note, can do anything. If it should declare that twice two cold bones given to a beggar make ten, the charitable instinct would be so gratified by the mere repetition of the words that such additional satisfaction as giving the bones would be superfluous; and the indigent alone would then endure the reproach of seeing things as they are, not as they ought to be.

Sentimental arithmetic would not be such an innovation as one might think; it has long been in public use on this coast. Every one must have observed that with reference to Chinese immigrants, twice two are not four, nor five, nor even six, but four hundred and fifty-six. And what lady dispensing the elements of humanity at a charity luncheon table does not know that when fired with the great Godlike principle of human sympathy he sits down to a dish of dead pig, once one sturdy beggar of the sand-lots is a dozen?

Mr. J. W. Dwinelle, writing to a contemporary, is pleased to be dissatisfied with the low morality of this our day and generation, when in discussion of public measures one is compelled to explain in advance that he has not an interested and dishonest motive. I do not perceive that this implies a low morality; on the contrary, a people that requires a suspected rogue to give his word of honor, and believes a thief would hesitate to lie, can have no practical acquaintance with rascality.

Mrs. White, of Visalia—Madam,
Disorders, no doubt, you have had 'em;
Your symptoms of late,
It's my duty to state,
Disclose a bad case of "Old Adam."

Your skip, it is plain, is too pory;
I fear you will go, ma'am, to glory (Convey, please, my love To Doc. Mehring, above)
If your blood is as thin as your story.

"Our civilization," says a contemporary, "is superior, at least in the matter of drinks—and their manner. We have not only a greater variety than our ancestors had, but have invented the art of compounding and combining them." Let us go to our Gascoyne (Delicate Diet for Daintie-mouthed Dronkardes—London, 1576) and see: "We must have March beere, dooble-double, Beere, Dagger ale, Bragget, Renish wine, Gascoyne wine, Sack, Hollocke, Canaria wine, Vino greco, Vinum amabile, and al the wines that may be gotten. Yea, wine of itselfe is not sufficient; but Suger, Limons, and sundry sortes of Spices must be drowned therein." If the dainty mouthed drunkards who had the honor to be our ancestors were savages it must at least be admitted that they had taken a few steps toward the light—very wavering and unsteady steps they must have been, too, with all that load aboard.

I wonder how many, even of the Jews, know that Jerusalem is on the equator. I confess I did not know it myself until recently, when I came upon this, written in the fourteenth century by Sir John Mandeville: "Jerusalem is in the myddes of the world; and that may men preuen and schewen there, be a spere, that is pight in to the erthe upon the hour of mydday, whan it is equinoxium, that scheweth on schadwe on no syde. And that it sholde ben in the myddes of the world, David wytnesse the it in the Psautre." Elsewhere Sir John avers the earth to be 31,500 miles in circumference, "afre myn opynyoun and myn undirstandunge;" but of what value are the opinion and under a man who couldn't spell any better than that?

TOLD IN LETTERS.

Domestic Fact and Fashionable Fancy.

MY DEAR EM:—Is there anything more vexatious in life than to do a thing exactly as you want it, rather a rare occurrence with me, by the way, and have some unlucky fate step in and mar it all with a word or a pen-stroke? Two weeks ago I wrote you of the charming new "bouclé" dress goods, the brocades and velvets, and the exquisite chenille shawls I had just seen at the Ville de Paris, and by that same unlucky fate omitted to say where I had seen them. The windows there are a delight to the eye this week; some of the most remarkable goods I have had the pleasure of seeing in San Francisco are among the novelties displayed. Those brocades in fine geometrical figures and every color of the rainbow, and the brocaded satins in delicate écrus, creams, pinks, and blues, the design a small sprig, just a flower and leaf or two, are just enough to make one sacrifice one's last stock certificate to become possessed of them. Just received are the costume dresses of camels' hair, with silk embroidered vests, and pieces to match for sleeves. The embroidered portions, and sufficient to make overskirt of the plain material, are marked at only $10. The colors are amaranth, navy blue, sage green, leather color, and black. Very tempting, too, are the velvet kilt skirts at $10. The manufacture of hosiery will certainly come to be considered as one of the fine arts before long. All kinds grow prettier each year, and the very acme of the perfection is found in those dainty silken hose, fine enough to have been spun for Titania's own wear, and studded with flowers of the most exquisite shadings and workmanship, that are a specialty at this house. The open work Lisle thread, too, in all colors and sizes, are as pretty as pretty can be, and, moreover, exceedingly durable. You remember how, long ago, I told you I had bought a pair of their Bassez-Preville gloves—six weeks, isn't it? Well, I have worn them every day since, sometimes all day, and they are quite fit for respectable society yet. You will be delighted at the innovations at Keane's. Additions have been made and departments altered, so that you would scarcely know it except for the familiar faces; but the alterations are all for the better. For instance, since the cloak and suit department was added, the trimmings and buttons have been removed to the extreme right of the store, next to the handsome case of laces (a new feature as well), and the silks, black on one side and colored on the other, occupy the middle aisle, where they have the best light. As to the new department, par excellence, every one is talking of it, and it has proved a success even beyond the most sanguine expectations of its founders. I went down into the work-room yesterday, where some forty or more women were sewing, and which occupies the immense basement under the whole building, and saw the cloaks and suits already finished, as well as the Worth importations. Will you think me a heretic, Em, that I liked those made in the store better than the great man-milliner's productions? It is a fact, and there was one of the latter made in that delightfully mysterious fashion of his of mixing materials till you don't know which is dress and which is trimming, all of that gold and many colored brocade, and dusky green-brown velvet, with a perfect tangle of parti-colored passementerie and rainbow beads, with many-hued acorn fringe edging it, running up across one hip, and losing itself somewhere in the intricate evolutions of the collant overskirt and train; and another in olive green silk and velvet, similarly trimmed with chenille fringe. But their peer, I think, is the black costume, of brocade and plain silk combined, trimmed with broad spiral coils of passementerie and beaded fringe. Of out-door wraps there are even more already completed, many of which are orders from both old and new customers of the firm. An exceedingly handsome, and at the same time original design, was a dolman of matelassé cloth, with a deep round cape, which was so contrived that the underskirt came only to the waist line, leaving a single thickness only of the goods over the shoulders. The trimming of this model was unique in the extreme, and consisted of a row of small round-pointed tabs, bound with silk, and laid on overlapping each other in a double row, with the effect of wheat sheaves. I have not given you the idea, I fear, as I ought, but you can conjure it out. The front was fastened with clusters of the same trimming mingled with lace, and both cape and skirt were bordered with the same, from under which you could catch occasional glimpses of a rich whalebone fringe, that acted as a background. This wrap will be christened the "Golden Gate Park." But the prince of all, which I prophesy will have made the great sensation at their opening of Wednesday last, is a deep sacque of corded silk and satin combined, and trimmed with the broadest and heaviest of whalebone trimming, a quarter of a yard in width, on sleeves and skirt. The body of the sacque is made in alternate stripes of silk and satin, and is quilted and wadded throughout. I wish I had time to tell you of more of them, but I have not, for, like poor Joe, I must "move on" to something else. The children's suits in poplins and silk are very handsome samples of what is to be done for the little ones, and there are pretty suits for quite large children, as low as six dollars. I may mention, passing, that it is the intention to present black cashmere suits for ladies, in the next week or so, ranging from $30 upward. I am told that corduroy is coming in again for traveling suits. It is made up in combination with cloth, and the cloaks to wear with them are of soft Angora cloth, have capes bordered with silk, lined loops, and the short sleeves are made to resemble elephant pates. Some have pointed hoods. The newest coatings for suits are loosely woven, and not twilled, as heretofore, with occasional dashes of Thurs red or mandarin yellow. The leading colors, indeed, will be this fall these two, together with navy blue, hazel brown, reseda and drabs. These coatings are intended for entire suits, either with a long cloak, casaque à la Louis Quatorze, or coat and vest. As kilts will be very heavy in these materials, plain gored skirts, trimmed around with flat braids, will be the style most in vogue. Very handsome samples of these are to be found at Doane & Henselwood's. Foulards are steadily gaining ground, and plushes still be used over silk for demi evening toilets. I see there are some of those lovely eiderdown bed quilts at Keane's, just received. They are made up in satins, and handsomely embroidered. The new mottled dress goods in silk and wool, and of the heavier grades, are there in dress patterns, just enough for a polonaise, or skirt and basque, in each. Their black embroidered velvets are of the latest patterns, and those which they have now are even handsomer than they have ever yet been, I believe. Mr. Chester prides himself somewhat on his stock of laces, and very justly, too, for there are some lovely barbes and ties. Samuels, at the Lace House, is running some other stores very hard in the matter of fans. I saw some tortoise shell and gray marabouts, this morning, that were just perfect, and there were also skeleton fans of the same, but without tops, in order that one may have the latter made to order, if desired. These last are only $16. You don't know where Koser's is? Why, on Market, not far above Bancroft's. By the way, I saw another patent there this morning, cuter in its way than even the sofa beds I told you of. This was a single instead of a double bed, which, when closed, makes a large, easy arm-chair. The price of this is $25, and it is just what you need for your sitting-room. I must not forget to tell you that our good friend, Mr. Vickery, has removed to No. 23 Kearny Street, next door to Snow & May's, and is daily expecting a large collection of the choicest and rarest ceramics, now being selected for him abroad by a connaisseur in such matters. More, too, of those old and rare engravings you have heard so much about. What on earth, you will exclaim, is the Wing-Wang? Well, it is a strip of paper four times as long as it is wide, and with pointed flaps attached to three sides of the upper quarter of its length. The two lower quarters are folded together, making a square sheet, this is then folded down twice upon itself, bringing the little pointed flaps uppermost for sealing, and is one of the latest devices in note paper for bothering correspondents who are fully committed to the simple old-fashioned square envelopes and plain sheet. This, I doubt, not I shall find at Billings, Harbour & Co's., on Montgomery Street, at Beach's old stand, when all those big packing boxes come to be undone next week. In the stock already on hand, which they are selling off this week under cost, I found several different styles of lap tablets, for travelers' or invalids' use, that are so fashionable at the East just now. They come in the genuine Russia leather, lined with silk and satin, and in canvas bound in Russia. With the Mackinnon pen, one could have nothing left to desire in the way of literary equipment. While on such matters, let me advise your reading Clarence Cook's book, "The House Beautiful," a collection of his charming essays on house-furnishings and decorations, that lately appeared in Scribner's Magazine. He says some wise things and makes many excellent suggestions, as, for example, making a wardrobe and decorating it with pictures cut from that wonderful contribution to childish literature, Walter Crane's Baby Opera. The wardrobe should be made of plain, pine wood, thoroughly shelledacked, and, in a short time, it will come to look as rich as satin wood. It would certainly be a desirable addition to nursery furniture. On pages 62 and 63 are cuts of a settee convertible into a table; and there is on another a sofa with movable cushions, that struck me as being an admirable suggestion for the use of the Vienna bed wood furniture—at Ackerman's—I mentioned in my last. The book itself I found at Roman's. What pretty hats they are getting up nowadays for little boys. I have noticed several lately in the street, and, thinking likely you might like to know something of the incoming styles for Harry, I stopped in at Miller's, on Montgomery Street, and looked over some just got in. The turban, in several varieties, seems the reigning favorite. Very pretty ones, of diagonal striped cloths, with broad velvet band, fancy bow, and gilt ornament, come at from $1.50 to $2, and all velvet somewhat higher. The Glangary always maintain what the politicians call a respectable "constituency," especially among the English and Scotch residents on this side the water; but it is seldom an American uses so distinctively national an article of dress. They come very handsomely gotten up. In straw, that have almost had their day now, the most desirable is the mixed black and white Durham braid, that will bear any amount of abuse, and is, therefore, a most fitting headgear for Young California. A pleasant little episode was the visit of Postmaster-General Key and party to the Diamond Palace, on Monday. I hear they expressed unbounded delight at everything there, and substantially, too, for the Postmaster-General himself carried away between six and seven hundred dollars worth of the quartz and moss agate specimen jewelry alone. "The Colonel" has some charming new designs in dead-gold jewelry, and particularly in the long pins, set with diamonds. The only gold jewelry I have ever seen that I really like is that made up in the form of roses and buds, half open walnuts and leaves, and similar devices, in oxidized gold, three or four different colors being employed.

Yours, always,

LILIAS DUBOIS.

Bill of Fare for Six Persons.—Sunday, September 22, 1878.

Crab Soup.
Mushroom.
Broiled Quails on Toast.
String Beans. Baked Tomatoes.
Roast Veal, Sweet Potatoes.
Asparagus Salad.
Blackberries and Cream. Sponge Cake Pudding.
Fruit-bowl of Figs, Grapes, Peaches, Pears, Plums, and Apples.

TO MAKE CRAB SOUP.—See Vol. I, No. 27.

TO MAKE SPONGE CAKE PUDDING.—One and a half cups sugar, two cups flour, half a cup cold water, three eggs, one and a half teaspoonfuls baking powder, a little salt. Beat eggs separately. Steam in pudding mould one hour, and serve with a rich liquid sauce.

A Scotch clergyman has pointed out a remarkable misprint occurring in all editions of Shakspeare's works, and never before noticed, by which the bard is made to say: "Sermons in stones, books in the running brooks, and good in everything," when what he really said was undoubtedly, "Sermons in books, stones in the running brooks, and good in everything."

What free-born American would have stood on a barrel on the public square twenty years ago and predicted that the day would yet come when every grocery in the land would brazenly tack up the sign of "Don't Ask for Credit?"

Calumny and detraction are but sparks, which, if you do not blow them, will go out of themselves.

Be rigid to yourself and gentle to others.—Confucius.

EXTRACTS FROM MY DIARY.—VII.

By an Early Californian.—San Francisco, 1848.

Admiral Wooster is having a gold-washing machine prepared similar to those used in Chile. As soon as it is ready the Doctor and he will go to Yuba. My business keeping me here, I shall supply them with provisions and whatever else they want, and receive such returns as the mining may produce. In March, 1848, at Captain Sutter's request, Dr. Forgeaud, bound to secrecy at the time, tested a gold specimen, and found it pure. This test of gold was the first scientifically made in California. Neither Davis nor I knew of it when the Sacramento traders called upon us. I passed Tuesday evening at the Gillespie's, then living on Washington, corner of Brenham Place. House beautifully furnished with Chinese furniture, much of it carved; large porcelain vases and bronzes adorned the rooms, and our surroundings were so tasteful and comfortable that we could have imagined ourselves in some eastern city. They have brought with them three Chinese servants, perfectly trained—two men, and one young woman named (I suppose by themselves) Marie. They are curiosities, being the first natives of the Celestial Empire who have taken up a residence in California. They are much attached to Marie, and she is very faithful to them. The Chinese, they say, make excellent servants, and it may be, although lovers of their own country, that more may come to us. Kanakas who were good-natured served pretty well before the mines were discovered, but it is hard to keep any one at present. We are more fortunate than our neighbors in having Jackson, of whom I have written before, and of whom F— doubtless has given you an account. A good-looking fellow with perfect manners and a pleasant voice, he is an excellent cook and valet. In the latter capacity Charles Dickens had him with him for a while on his southern tour. Mr. C. V. Gillespie was supercargo and a part owner of the merchandise brought in the clipper brig Eagle, which arrived here from Canton on the 2d of February, 1848, after the short passage of 45 days, perhaps the shortest yet made between the two ports. The Eagle brought an assorted cargo of choice goods. It might be called a sample cargo of the choicest goods—too choice in some respects for this new country. We have reveled in some of its delicacies, chow-chow, curry, ginger, etc., but particularly in teas with flavors "undreamt of in your philosophy." This may be particularly owing to the shortness of the voyage and their consequent freshness, but probably more to their superior quality. Teas which cost, in China, $1.50 per pound we bought for 75 cents and under. We are drinking or rather squandering them daily, regardless of the fact that we may never "look upon their like again." The town has met with a great loss in the death of William A. Leidesdorff, one of its most enterprising merchants. He came to the country in 1841 in the Baltimore clipper Zuliana, a vessel of about one hundred tons, owned by J. C. Jones, for some time United States Consul at Honolulu. Owing to the jealousy of foreigners then existing in the minds of the officials of the country, he was unable at first to have a lot granted him, and was obliged to hire the one-story buildings belonging to Juan Fuller, an Englishman, who, married to a Californian, owned and lived on the hundred varas fronting on Kearny Street, east side, and between California and Sacramento Streets. In one of these he stored his goods, and in the other took up his residence. The City Hotel, one of our most imposing buildings, an adobe with overhanging roof and wide piazza, where I passed my first night in California, was built by him. And the first steamer that ever plowed the waters of the bay, the Silka, afterward christened, on obtaining American papers, the Firefly, was imported by him from New Archangel. It is not larger than one of our launches. During Mexican rule he became Vice-Consul of the United States, and I understand that, as far as in his power lay, by rendering useful services and dispensing generous hospitality, he represented her respectably. When I arrived he still used the consular uniform—only that the coat had changed its buttons—the waistcoat still retained its pristine splendor, and he wore a navy cap. Short, of good figure, and erect, he had quite a military carriage; of dark complexion, with black hair and eyes, he looked more like a Spaniard than a Dane. But he claimed Santa Cruz as his birthplace. Under a blunt and somewhat rough manner he carried a kindly heart, and no one questioned his sincerity. Leidesdorff had been much at sea, visiting the principal ports of the world and perhaps some of its central cities. His life has been filled with adventures and dangers, and a certain mystery hung over such portions of it as were portrayed in his after-dinner reminiscences. Having noticed the improvement and rise of property in the Atlantic States, he thought he foresaw what would happen on the Pacific, and the view he took of San Francisco and her future—of which the gold prospect formed no part—may be prophetic. But his enthusiasm carried him farther than prudence would counsel. A little ahead of his time, he hired money at anywhere between three and ten per cent. per month for business operations, building purposes, and real estate speculations of too great magnitude for the moment. In consequence of this, when his sudden death occurred, his affairs were found to be much involved; he owed $80,000, and his estate was pronounced insolvent. As no will was found, William D. M. Howard was appointed its administrator, with C. V. Gillespie as agent and manager. Soon after Leidesdorff's death James Lick came to the administrator with his note for $1,600, bearing ten per cent. per month interest, which he offered to sell for $800. However, owing to the delay that must attend the settling of the estate, the discovery of gold, and the probable rise of its lots, it is thought it will in time pay every cent of its indebtedness. I can not give a better idea of Leidesdorff's character than to say, that when the auction sale of water lots took place, hearing that one of the owners of property on Montgomery Street, then absent, had instructed his agent not to buy the lots in front of his land, he went to the gentleman and told him he must buy. "Bid them in," said he. "If—won't take them, I will." Of course, the lots were bought and kept, and became a large fortune to their owners. Such was Leidesdorff—always full of impulses of a generous nature. Water and gas projects for the future city already figured in his active mind, and an overland railroad was a part of his creed.

JAMES C. WARD.

INTAGLIOS.

My Wolves.

Three gaunt, grim wolves that hunt for men,
Three gaunt, grim wolves there be;
And one is Hunger, and one is Sin,
And one is Misery.

I sit and think till my heart is sore,
While the wolf or the wind keeps shaking the door,
Or peers at his prey through the window-pane,
Till his ravenous eyes burn into my brain.

And I cry to myself, "If the wolf be Sin,
He shall not come in—he shall not come in;"
But if the wolf be Hunger or Woe,
He will come to all men, whether or no!

For out in the twilight, stern and grim,
A destiny weaves man's life for him,
As a spider weaves his web for flies;
And the three grim wolves, Sin, Hunger, and Woe,
A man must fight them, whether or no,
Though oft in the struggle the fighter dies.

To-night I cry to God for bread,
To-morrow night I shall be dead;
For the fancies are strange and scarcely sane
That fit like spectres through my brain,
And I dream of the time, long ago,
When I knew not Sin, and Hunger, and Woe.

There are three wolves that hunt for men,
And I have met the three,
And one is Hunger, and one is Sin,
And one is Misery;
Three pairs of eyes at the window-pane
Are burned and branded into my brain,
Like signal lights at sea.

—Francis Geary Fairfield in Scribner.

Through the Mist.

We walked one night, the moon was down,
And yet we never wist
'Twas so, for all the quiet stars
Were shining through the mist.

Right through the field, across the brook,
How tight I held her wrist!
She could not see the stepping stones
By starlight through the mist.

And when we neared her garden gate,
Ah, how could I resist,
When all the stars were winking so,
And shining through the mist?

Oh, happiest night of all the nights,
When first my loved I kissed!
While silently the blessed stars
Were shining through the mist.

E. P. MATHEWS.

Folded Hands.

They were so helpless when I saw them first,
The tiny fingers could not clasp a thing,
But folded lay upon the breast that nursed,
Too weak to wander and too frail to cling.

I saw them when the years had given them strength
To clasp life's joys with passion's impulse bold—
Two restless hands that found their rest at length,
And folded lay within another's hold.

I saw them strained with labor's patient strife,
Worn with the burden that they could not bear;
First weakly raised against the woes of life,
Then folded in the calmness of despair.

One day we found them lying waxen white
Upon a breast grown strangely calm and cold;
We softly hid them then from out of sight,
The folded hands that never shall unfold.

—Harper's.

Discontent.

Two boats rocked on the river,
In the shadow of leaf and tree;
One was in love with the harbor;
One was in love with the sea.

The one that loved the harbor
The winds of fate outboard,
But held the other, longing,
Forever against the shore.

The one that rests on the river,
In the shadow of leaf and tree,
With wistful eyes looks ever
To the one far out at sea.

The one that rides the billow,
Though sailing fair and fleet,
Looks back to the peaceful river,
To the harbor safe and sweet.

One frets against the quiet
Of the moss-grown shaded shore;
One sighs that it may enter
That harbor nevermore.

One wearies of the dangers
Of the tempest's rage and wail;
One dreams, amid the lilies,
Of a far-off snowy sail.

Of all that life can teach us
There's naught so true as this:
The winds of fate blow ever,
But ever blow amiss.

C. R.

Thorwaldsen.

We often fail by searching far and wide
For what lies close at hand. To serve our turn
We ask fair wind and favorable tide.
From the dead Danish sculptor let us learn
To make Occasion, not to deny;
Against the sheer, precipitous mountain side
Thorwaldsen carved his Lion at Lucerne.

T. B. ALDRICH.

Under the Lindens.

Under the lindens lately sat
A couple, and no more, in chat;
I wondered what they would be at
Under the lindens.

I saw four eyes and four lips meet;
I heard the words, "How sweet! how sweet!"
Had them the fairies given a treat
Under the lindens?

I pondered long, and could not tell
What dainty pleased them both so well;
Bees! Bees! was it your hydromel
Under the lindens?

WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR.

The Penitent at Prayer.

Beneath the grand cathedral's lofty dome
The penitent kneels upon the marble floor,
With eyes uplifted to the heavenly home,
Which never seemed so far away before.

Slowly and reverent he tells his beads,
And meditates upon the love of Christ;
For him once more his dying Saviour bleeds;
Once more the Lamb of God is sacrificed.

Peace comes to cheer his heart, and while he prays
Through the high windows of the dome there steals
A flood of golden sunlight, and the rays
Fall like a benediction where he kneels.

And through his tears he fancies he can trace
A smile upon the Virgin's pictured face.

ROMANCE OF A POSTAGE-STAMP.

May and December not Mated.

I breathed more freely after it was over. It was a temptation resisted—but I felt better after having done it. As I was assorting the letters, preparatory to putting them in the mail bag for New York, one letter turned up and sent a jealous shock through me that set my heart throbbing and my brain swimming with a sudden dizziness. I might have expected to have seen it, but not the less did it affect me when I did see it—"Joseph Norris, India Dock, New York." That was the address—and I knew that it was his. I had a dear little note in that same handwriting next to my heart then—a few graceful words thanking me for a book I had sent her—a little note I had read over countless times, and kissed as often, wondering would it displease her to know how fondly I cherished it. I thrust the hateful letter out of my sight, and, leaning my head on the table, lived over again the hopes, the fears, the wretchedness of the last twenty-four hours.

The day before, while distributing the mail matter, I came across a letter addressed to myself; and, on opening it, I learned that through the generosity of a distant relative, whose name I bore, I had been left in California an inheritance of $20,000. What a change a few strokes of a pen had made—transforming Karl Bergmann, postmaster of a secluded Connecticut village, into Karl Bergmann, the possessor of a competence, well invested, yielding a certain income! And how, before my good fortune, I had thought of Annie Merrill as one separated away from me by my poor circumstances—my salary barely supporting my mother and myself—and how could I ask any woman to share my poverty? Now that the burden of poverty was most unexpectedly lifted from me, I felt at liberty to tell her the hopes I never dared to entertain till now. What would her answer be? That I would learn that very night. In the same mail with my letter was one addressed to her, postmarked New York. Her correspondence all passed through my hands, but I had never seen that writing before. That was no weak, wavering, feminine style; it was large, clear, decisive—the writing of a self-possessed man. Who could the writer be? Annie's uncle, Dr. Merrill, had male correspondents in New York; but this letter was the first that had come to her since she came orphaned from the great city a year before, and had been received into her uncle's heart and home. But other thoughts put the question of the letter out of my mind. I sent by a messenger a few hurried lines to my mother to prepare her for our good fortune, and then counted the hours that would pass before I could offer my inheritance to Annie, encumbered with its possessor. When I reached home I found her there before me; my mother, who had taken her into her favor from the first—her sweetness and orphaned situation proving a passport to her heart—had sent for Annie to communicate the good news to her. She was strangely quiet, I thought, and there was a troubled look in her blue eyes I never saw there before. In fact, after a while, a subdued feeling stole over us all. Annie's disquiet seemed to impart itself to us. I was thinking how I could venture to tell her all my hopes, and my mother, guessing what my thoughts were, left us together most of the evening, but my heart failed me. It was only when I was walking home with Annie to Dr. Merrill's that I found courage to speak. She led me on by saying that I must not think from her silence that she did not rejoice in the happy change in my prospects, but no one could be more sincere in their congratulations than herself. I answered, that my good fortune would be valueless to me unless I could share it with the girl I loved.

"The girl you love?" she repeated, questioning.

I felt her hand tremble on my arm.

"The girl I love," I answered, in tones that she might have interpreted, but failed to do so.

"She ought to be a happy woman," she continued.

"May I ask if I know her?"

"If you know her!" I cried; "If you know her! Oh, who could it be but you?"

"Me?"

She drew her hand quickly away from my arm and stood quiet still before me.

"Me! Oh, did you say me?"

And then I saw the moonlight falling on her face, and it was not the face of a girl shining with happy confusion when she hears the story of his love from the man whom she prefers. It was pale and shocked, and then she hid it from me in her hands and burst into tears.

"Don't cry, dear," said I. "I never thought to wound you."

"I thought you knew," she went on, sobbingly.

"I thought my uncle might have told you. I am going to marry Mr. Norris. Oh, can you forgive me?"

She stretched out her little hands imploringly. I took them in mine and kissed them—they were sacred to me; they belonged to another, and I kissed them while my heart was breaking.

"Forgive me, my darling!" I said. "I would forgive you if it killed me, I think. Don't grieve, Annie; I will try to bear it."

We parted at her uncle's without another word, and I went home to the motherly heart that I knew would suffer with me, but whose tender sympathy would uphold me in this hour of bitter trial.

The next day I sent off my resignation to Washington, for my mother and I agreed to leave the village where we had passed so many quiet years. It was in the afternoon of the same day that the letter of which I had spoken, that I now knew was for my rival, attracted my attention. I took it up reluctantly—I felt that I would as readily have touched a poisonous snake—and was just about to put the postmark on it when I saw that the stamp upon it, instead of being a postal one, was a revenue stamp, and that the letter, instead of speeding off on wings of love to New York, must be consigned to the Dead Letter office, in Washington. With a thrill of savage delight I flung it into the box appropriated to the reception of such eastaways, and went on with my evening's work. With that work I went on mechanically, but my thoughts were not agreeably employed. That, then, was the answer to the missive she had received. But it should be long before he would get it—get it too late, perhaps, for an explanation, for a misunderstanding between lovers had often arisen from a slighter cause than the non-arrival of an expected letter. I pictured him waiting and longing for the letter that would not come; and she, poor girl, how her tender heart would be tortured by her imagined neglect when no answer would be forthcoming! She, I knew, would suffer in silence, and I fondly hoped that he would do the same. So I locked up the mail-bag and waited for the messenger to carry it to the station. The express would pass in an hour and half; and then a struggle began in my heart. The mis-stamped letter seemed to look reproachfully at me from the box into which I had thrown it, and seemed to whisper to me that one little act of mine could send it unimpeded on its mission.

No one, I believe, unless he was in my situation, actuated by the same despairing, selfishly hopeful feelings that were over-mastering me, could understand what a base impulse I conquered when at last, after a hour's temptation, I took that letter from its resting place, substituted a postage stamp for the revenue one, opened the mail bag and let it go. Then after it was done some hot tears gushed to my eyes. It was my last hope, and I could not help indulging some weakness over its grave.

The next mail from New York arrived three days after. I had the poor satisfaction of seeing the results of my good action in a letter in the handwriting of my rival, addressed to Annie, make its unwished-for appearance, as I knew it would, and shortly after Dr. Merrill took it away with him as he called for his mail. Loungers came in and out of the office, and went away, finding me little disposed for conversation. Nothing yet was known in the village of my acquisition, so I was spared the pain of listening to congratulations that I was in no mood to hear. When I went home that evening I was surprised to find my mother absent, and still more surprised when, on opening a note she had left for me, I learned she was with Annie at Dr. Merrill's, and that I was to follow her there. Hopeless as I felt, the prospect of seeing Annie again promised me only a painful pleasure, but still the thought of being near her had a sweet and sad fascination that I could not resist. When I reached the doctor's I found himself and my mother seated in his office, so intent on the moves of a knight's gambit, that a mere nod on my entrance showed their consciousness of my arrival. Annie was not there; I found her in the parlor standing upon her golden hair and a glow of eager, happy expectation in her look that was new to her sweet face.

"I am glad to see you," she said, giving me her hand. "I have been impatient for your coming—I will tell you why. There is a question I want you to answer. It perplexes me, and somehow I think I can look to you for its solution. You remember a letter I received in the early part of the week?"

She hesitated and cast down her eyes.

"I have too good a reason ever to forget it," I answered bitterly.

I saw her face flush. She went on.

"I answered that letter the next day. It was of vital importance to me that it should go then, as there would be no other mail for several days. I was troubled when I wrote it, and stamped it on my uncle's desk while the messenger was waiting to take it to the office. I found, too late, that I had mis-stamped it. I have been utterly wretched for the past few days on account of that mistake. I knew too well what the fate of my letter would be. Judge then how relieved I felt when my uncle brought me this"—taking from the mantelpiece the letter that had come that morning. "If it escaped your keen observation, how did my letter pass the eyes of the New York officials undetected? This is my question."

"Her eyes searched my face.

I took her hand in my own."

"Annie," said I, "I believe I could make no one understand what it cost my jealous love to rectify the mistake, but I did it. I knew it must be in answer to that letter that you spoke of a few nights ago. It ought to prove to you how unselfishly I love you, my darling, when I re-stamped it and sent it on its way to him. I never thought you would find it out. I did it to spare you a moment's uneasiness. If the man you love cares for you as much as I do, he will make your life a happy one."

"How can I repay your generosity?" she said, in a voice tremulous with feeling. "You could not have acted better if you had had a peep at the contents of that letter. But your reward may be claimed when you read this."

She handed me the letter and glided out of the room. I took it over to the shaded lamp and read the following:

"DEAR ANNIE:—When beside your father's dying bed we entered into an engagement of marriage, I felt as he did, that the interest of the firm of which he and I were partners would be best sustained by our union."

"I wrote to you notifying you of my readiness to fulfill my part of the agreement, and requesting you to be ready to return with me on Saturday as my wife. You say to me that I must not come. There is but one explanation to this refusal, and that is that you have seen some one who pleases you better than your humble servant. It is but natural, child; I cannot blame you. The young should mate with the young, and I am too much your senior to expect to awake in your youthful heart feelings that have long been lifeless in my own. I release you from a promise that I am now aware was made by you under the pressure of the sad circumstances. But this fact can never affect the fatherly regard I have entertained for the only child of my dear old friend."

I read no further. Here was my reward. And how nearly I had lost it by the desire of gratifying an ungenerous impulse! Annie has since assured me that had Joseph Norris arrived on the day designated, so great was her awe of her father's old partner, that she never would have had the courage to contend against her destiny. Indeed, the circumstance of having made the error she did, in mis-stamping the letter, seemed to her troubled mind significant of a deep meaning, and that even beyond the grave her father sought to control her actions.

Annie did not return to the parlor. I found her seated in the Doctor's office, apparently interested in the game which just at the moment of my entrance he brought to a victorious conclusion.

"Check—"

"Mate," I cried, finishing the word for him, and, catching Annie in my arms, heedless of the astonishment of the elderly pair, I demanded my reward.

Well, Joseph Norris, gray-haired, common-place, and unromantic, came to Greenwell to other nuptials than his own. He gave away my dear one with the best of grace, and, after the marriage, congratulated me on my admission into the firm. My ignorance of his meaning was so apparent that, with a grim smile, he enlightened me. With my bride I acquired a half interest in an East India firm in New York and Calcutta. If Annie had chosen to appeal as an orphan, dependent on the bounty of her uncle, she had the after satisfaction of knowing that the love she had won was offered to herself alone, and not to the golden store that attracts so many suitors.

"My dearest," I sometimes say to her, "who would think that, in a great measure, we owe our happiness to a little postage-stamp?"

NEW

BOOKS

Resumption and the Silver Question. By H. V. Poor. 12mo. $1 50
Sir Walter Scott. By Richard H. Hutton. (English Men of Letters.) 12mo. 75
Saintly Workers. Lenten Lectures. By F. W. Farrar. 12mo. 25
Eternal Hope. Sermons. By F. W. Farrar. 12mo. 60
Duncan, T. C. How to be Plump, or Talks on Physiological Feeding. 12mo. 50
Primrose Path. A Novel. By Mrs. Oliphant. 8vo. 50
Child and Woman. From the German of Clementine Helm. 12mo. 50
Liquidated. The Seer. By Rudolph Lindau. 16mo. 25
Mrs. Gainsborough's Diamonds. By Julian Hawthorne. 16mo, paper. 20
The Arab Wife. A Romance of the Polynesian Seas. 16mo, paper. 25

BANCROFT'S
721 MARKET ST. S.F.

FALK'S

MILWAUKEE BEER

If you are going overland, or on a picnic, or making a trip by steamboat or steamer, or visiting in the country, let us suggest that you take with you some of this celebrated Beer. It is the very best for these trips.

For sale by all dealers.

CUTTING &amp; MURRAY,

Sole Agents, 206 Front Street, S. F.

EDUCATIONAL!

French, Spanish, and Italian taught by Prof. Barthelémy de Filippi, by his easy, new method, saving months of studies. Classes for beginners will be formed September 20th; also private lessons. PACIFIC BUSINESS COLLEGE, 320 Post Street.

BUTTERICK'S

PATTERNS-FALL STYLES.

Send stamp for catalogue. AGENCY, 124 POST ST., San Francisco.

ALASKA

COMMERCIAL CO.

No. 310 SANSOME STREET,

WHOLESALE DEALER IN FURS.

HOME IN THE COUNTRY.

NOOK FARM.

FAMILIES WISHING TO SPEND

the Summer in the country will find this a cheerful home, and beautiful scenery of such endless variety as tempt to healthful exercise and recreation. We furnish good accommodations and an excellent table. Good fishing and hunting on the premises. Four trains from San Francisco pass the station daily. Address

E. B. SMITH,
Rutherford, Napa County, Cal.

RETURNED.

HAVING RETURNED FROM THE

East, I respectfully announce to my friends and the public that I shall resume practice on WEDNESDAY, Sept. 5th, 1878.

S. W. DENNIS, M. D., DENTIST,

No. 33 KEARNY STREET.

R. C. MOWBRAY, M. D., DENTIST,
224 STOCKTON ST., corner Post, S. F.

T. J. PETTIT &amp; CO.'S

LABEL, SHOW CARD,
ENGRAVING AND PRINTING
ESTABLISHMENT,

523 CALIFORNIA STREET, SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

The moral tone of San Francisco is in a somewhat unsteady state just at present, and, while disappointing comic opera drew all the fashion last week, unstable society has permitted the naughty French play to be produced at the California this week without any great interest. Are we grown virtuous, and shall there be no more cakes and ale? Shall ginger be hot 't the mouth no longer? 'Twas not thus a short year ago. Then Crane and Robinson were the heroes of society, and the shining dollars poured into the treasury of the theatre—the greatest part of them falling over into the pockets of the lucky actors; then the inhabitants of the world of scandal sought the play with avidity to obtain fresh material for new lies about their acquaintances; then the fashionable hotels sent forth their high-toned hordes—the hotels, those Palaces of Truth, where each woman carries the charmed basket; those stately piles, in whose dim corridors the Forbidden Fruit grows, and is plucked, and eaten; those Paradises, where modern Eves play the old, old apple scene with modern Adams, till the avenging angel comes as a messenger from the office bearing the flaming sword of a demand for raised room rent; then gallant youths, clad in dainty raiment that knew no tailor's receipt, gazed through opera glasses—souvenirs, perhaps, of delicate flirtations—upon smiling flames, whose toilets had a secret history known only to the milliners and themselves; then blooming damsels, who had but a vague idea of what it was all about, occupied the time between the acts in searching vainly for familiar wrinkles in their mothers' faces, and went home after the play was over, thinking that it was so much better to be a free and independent woman of pleasure than a true wife—an affectionate mother; then female beauty was represented by studies in crème de lis and rouge, and Indian ink threw into brilliancy the unhealthy flash of restless, wicked eyes; then virtuous women were recognized by the old-fashioned, almost obsolete beautifier, nature's own patent, erstwhile called a blush; and men of principle moved uneasily in their seats as the moral of the play was disclosed. Are we grown wiser or more virtuous? Do we look now upon Forbidden Fruit as a play unfit for moral senses? No, my dear friend, no. The truth is, the dose is not strong enough now. We have passed such feeble excitement, such tame denouements, and seek something much more violent in the shock it gives us, some much more brilliant fracture of the seventh commandment. We are getting to a point where we are not even satisfied with suggestion, and the cry in all departments is, realism. When, in private life, the sight of an outraged husband chasing a gentleman in comfortable, but unbecoming, night-dress out of his wife's room with a revolver, is no unusual spectacle, and the divorce court is filled with shyster lawyers fattening on the sickening details, the picture of two unfaithful husbands caught in a little escapade at Crenmore is a mere fillip to the appetite. When the daily papers give us every now and again a couple of columns of plain and unvarnished facts, throwing in an occasional diagram of the situation to help our feeble imaginations, even French plays, with all their naughtiness and freedom of suggestion, fall into uninteresting insignificance. Already, in some quarters of the globe, some people are praying for a new vice, tired of all the old ones. Forbidden Fruit, or Charge it to Buster, is presented to us with entirely the same business as before. It is not a play that admits of much elaboration, because it is one in which the situations carry all the weight, and little is left to the actors save to make those situations as amusing as possible. It is an ingeniously constructed piece of work, full of surprises; but in that fact lies one of the reasons why it should not live to any age. When one has seen it, and knows exactly what he is to expect, the effectiveness of the surprise—which is the basis of the plot—is weakened, and a second visit is much less enjoyable. Behind this surprise, there is nothing which appeals to the intellectual faculty. There is no solidity in the ideas which emanate with some crispness and even occasional brilliancy from the people in the play; there is no character sketching which remains afterward in one's mind to recall it; there is nothing but a very amusing chain of ridiculous and more or less impossible situations, and even the actors do not live in memory beyond the performance. If we saw any actors, not altogether unsuited to the parts of "Cato Dove" and "Sergeant Buster," in the piece, we should not enjoy it much less; the only advantage in seeing Robinson and Crane being one of perfect satisfaction, which enables us the better to appreciate all the points. There are no two men better fitted to make it go than those two companions. The contrast is complete, and if Mr. Robinson had been born for "Cato Dove" he could scarcely have been made in more suitable mould. The same may be said of Mr. Crane as "Buster." As a play it is very much superior to Our Bachelor; but it does not give the leaders the same chance to develop their peculiar powers; and consequently we think "Jowler" and "Fangle" show Messrs. Robinson and Crane to better advantage than the two lawyers. Of the company little can be said yet. Miss Gussie de Forest has not apparently found her line, and it is unfortunate for the lady, probably, that she has opened here in two parts in which she does not shine. Not only does she not have the opportunity to do her best, but she gives an impression of not being a very brilliant leading lady. She competes, in the part, with our recollection of an actress who was eminently graceful, and perfectly suited in natural manner to such a part as "Mrs. Cato Dove" and the comparison goes much against her. Her performance is not devoid in any way, and she does not look like a young lady of the necessary simplicity and innocence. Miss de Forest, had she been "Mrs. Dove," would have been as sharp as "Mrs. Buster" was to discover the trick her husband was playing. Miss Long is a stiff soubrette. She wants the ease and abandon necessary for "Zulu," and she scarcely rises to the aggressive vulgarity becoming the character. Her voice does not seem to be capable of the modulation indispensable to the line. The two members of the old company maintain their reputation against the new-comers. Mr. Wilson's "Old Podd" is a better performance than before, and Mrs. Saunders is an exceptionally natural "Mrs. Buster." On Monday night we are to have the pleasure of witnessing Mr. Robinson's unfortunate venture, The Two Men of Sandy Bar. But it will not be in the least astonishing if it prove a great success here. The weak point of the piece in the East was Mr. Robinson's playing "Colonel Starbottle," and as he has given that to Mr. Crane, who is eminently fitted for it, we fully expect that it will retrieve its fortunes. There is a good deal of curiosity to see it, Bret Harte having so many admirers in the city. On Friday night The Two Dromos will be played, with Crane and Robinson as the servants, and Barton Hill and Beck as the masters.

Since Mr. Maguire has reduced the prices to the balcony and the gallery of Baldwin's house has taken on a much more cheerful and cosy appearance, which is a satisfaction to both audiences and actors. That dreary expanse of empty balcony, from the balustrade of which the gaunt and hungry flies went to gaze with envious eyes upon the tempting bait below, has been well filled during the week, and the obnoxious intruders have been nearly all removed by the audience. The change was needed, and its success shows that there is a large class of the community who can not go beyond fifty cents for a visit to the theatre, and who do not care to go to the gallery at any price; and Struck Oil was a good piece with which to inaugurate the new arrangement. It is entirely to the credit of Mr. and Mrs. Williamson that that piece, so dead a failure on its first production here, has maintained a popularity almost unequalled for such a length of time. The play is one of a class whose days are numbered, and which, for the sake of art, we shall not be sorry to bury forever. To begin with, it is a plagiarism of a pretty fanciful story to bring its coarse elements within the appreciative capacities of a second-class audience. Rip Van Winkle supplies most that is good, and all that is finest in Irving's story is left out. The introduction of Mrs. Williamson's "Lizzie Stofel" is an idea borrowed from the variety stage, and although it rises considerably above that, it does not come up to dramatic art. The plot is thin, and requires expedients not supposed to belong to the legitimate stage to elude it out for three acts. The dialogue has not a shred of intellectual ability, and there is nothing in the play throughout which appeals to the educated mind. Those who appreciate the exquisite art and fanciful beauty of the story of Rip Van Winkle feel a twinge of almost annoyance that it should be travestied, even if that travesty is as clever a performance as that of Mr. and Mrs. Williamson. That "John Stofel" and "Lizzie Stofel" are coherent, complete, and admirable sketches is true enough, but they are of the variety school, and appeal to that class of audiences. The second act is not materially different from some of those performances given by the Dutch comedians in minstrel shows, and it is not to the credit of a legitimate audience that the blunders and foolery which have been so entirely exhausted in farces and nigger performances, should be considered sufficiently good to fill up half an hour in a drama. The absurdities of "John Stofel" are not only childish, but in the construction of the play are mistakes. The seriousness of the situation, in which a daughter takes leave of her father when he is supposed to be entering on a battle which may cost him his life, is considerably broken into by the levity with which she sings a song about her young man just before the parting. And there is such a thing as consistency to be thought of when we see him marching into the field loaded with all sorts of conestibles, while his comrades keep strict order in the ranks. We might quarrel, too, with the childish conception which makes the "Doctor" leave a case of instruments open on the head of an oil barrel in the open air, in order to admit of "John Stofel" making a joke about a butcher's shop. But the piece will not bear criticism, and as it serves but to move superficial emotions, and has just enough of the pathetic thrown in to make laughter a little of a relief, it calls for no deep consideration. Mr. Williamson has made out of "John Stofel" a character which has given him a reputation. It shows not so much great dramatic talent as steady perseverance and a close study of effect. As an elaborated and detailed picture of an amusing and, in some sense, quaint personage, it is worthy of all praise, and its main effect for good should be on the profession. From a crude and incoherent jumble of the higher and lower arts he has worked it out to at least a coherent and effective character, and in the third act he rises to something like strong acting. The semblance of madness is natural, and it betrays capabilities which he has, so far, not utilized to their full extent. It may be admitted that Mrs. Williamson is the best Dutch girl on the stage, and "Lizzie Stofel" is a much more probable being than even the old father. She has improved very considerably since she was here before, more especially in voice. Her singing, now, is quite the feature of her performance. We should like to hear that sympathetic tremolo that runs through her voice in some play more worthy of a place on the stage, and probably some day we shall. Meantime, she does not aspire to the dramatic, and she is wise in one way, that she adheres to something that she can do. We are sorry to see such a capable actor as Mr. Bishop confined to such a miserable part as the "Deacon." He makes a capital "Deacon," but we shall be very glad when he comes across a character worthy of his talents. The rest of the cast may be permitted to rest in peace. The Chinese Question—Mr. Clay Greene's farce—is, perhaps, as poor an effort as ever raised a laugh. Mr. Greene's weakness is making all his characters misquote Shakespeare—a kind of fun which becomes absolutely melancholy. We have Mr. Williamson as a butcher boy, who imitates John McCullough. The original is enough, and imitation is a waste of time and talent. Then Mrs. Williamson, as the Irish girl, gives us long screeds from "the play," which, having no bearing whatever on the piece, and not being clever enough to be absurd, grow very wearisome. As the Chinese, the principal fun is to smash things, and chatter in some indelible tongue, which might pass for any language we do not know. Franks of Fortune is underlined, with Mr. Williamson in the part of "O'Flaherty," but as Struck Oil seems to draw well, we presume the management will exhaust it before putting on another play.

Les Cloches de Corneville have been keeping better time this week. Mrs. Oates has been slowly recovering her voice, and perhaps when Groffe comes on, or the next new opera, we shall be able to say whether or not she has made any progress in the musical department of her art. Meantime in the bouffe department she shows a considerable advance. She has had time last week, while she was unable to do any singing, to attend strictly to making things lively for the company and the audience; and beginning nearest the stage, she has concentrated her emotions of gratitude into an open and quite meaningless grin, for the special benefit of the occupants of the first few rows of the parquette. We trust she will not be so mean as to bestow all her smiles in one quarter. She has many admirers in the dress circle, and, though most of us may go to hear the opera, we are not sufficiently unselfish to permit all the attention to be given to a few. We could, perhaps, do without her occasional remarks to the orchestra, and it distracts us sometimes to have to try to catch a disjointed ejaculation shouted in the middle of a tenor or baritone solo. It would not decrease our enjoyment, either, if she would let the others sing their humble parts without her fondling caresses or mischievous antics. And we shall be perfectly satisfied if she will sing the music as the composer has written it, leaving out the interpolations, which do not always sound harmonious. She has lately been able to go through some of the music of her part, and we shall be glad when she finds herself free from the necessity of forcing "Serpente" before the audience so prominently. Unfortunately, her levity is proving contagious, and private conversations are often heard above the music. The piece has gone very well, and the first judgment on it is confirmed by the experience of this week. Miss Stevens, who gets one bouquet every night, with a suspiciously big card attached to it, has established herself as a favorite, although she is likely for some time yet to be painfully stiff in her stage movements. The tenor has not developed the voice expected, a predominance of head notes being the feature of one of the largest bodies on the stage. Still he sings his part very nicely and correctly. Mr. Connell is now in admirable trim, and rolls out the lively and striking airs of the opera with enthusiasm. Mr. Taylor, an English comedian, is one of the best actors in the line we have had here. He has filled up "The Bailiff" with all sorts of business, and what the profession call "gags," till it is one of the leading features. Mr. Graham is also developing "The Notary" to some purpose. The chorus, evidently selected with a view to the avoidance of marital trouble among the first families of San Francisco, sing very well together, and enter into their work with considerable spirit. Groffe-Groffe is to be the next performance. We presume this is to give time for proper rehearsal of La Marjolaine and Le Petit Duc. The opera has been played to death here, and Miss Catherine Lewis throws off "Brindisi" whenever a chance occurs even now. Still we would much rather have that for a few nights, if Les Cloches de Corneville will not draw—which is not at all certain—than see the company repeat the misadventures of that piece with the new one.

The Grand Opera House, that mausoleum of so much gold coin and brilliant histrionic and managerial talent, has had its doors open for a few weeks burying further contributions of the same kind. It has a funeral appearance; and its atmosphere, unimpregnated by carbonic acid gas from the lungs of applauding audiences, and but faintly disturbed by the "bated breath" of unpaid actors, chills the souls of the infrequent visitors. About the entrance lounge a few employees; but even the reflected talent of the stage, the self-constituted comedy stars and the crushed tragedians, for whom the managers have a very brief but expressive name, leave it to a hapless fate. Within the little box-office, steadily watching for an audience, like a "patient, sleepless, eremite," sits the forlorn treasurer; and even the little boys, who lie on the steps in front and beg the thirsty spectators' checks, seem to have made up their minds that it is a failure. Occasionally, as one passes, he catches faint shouts, as of weak-lunged stage crowds, and bursts of merriment that have that melancholy, half-hearted sound of unpaid enthusiasm. When one is inside the feeling is only intensified. The somewhat scattered orchestra are thoughtful; and even the music seems to feel the chill of an empty treasury, for the chords always come in late. The very words seem to issue from the actors' mouths with an effort, as if they knew they were not paid for, and the ears of the audience take them in as if they did so under protest. The wardrobe shows a recklessness which speaks despair. A gentleman in a long black, apparently velvet, ulster, comes in side by side with a villain of mixed periods. With a poverty that speaks ill for Gonzague's generosity, which even paints meanness on the part of that high-toned scoundrel, he has provided one sword for two conspirators; and while the valor shows in every movement of him who carries the weapon drawn, the sneaking coward with the scabbard seeks the undignified background. The little some gypsies, those free and usually unkempt children, and the rural districts, loaf about new tents and assume unfamiliar attitudes of questionable grace, and greet the entering aristocracy with clamorous requests for money which seem natural. The female costumes are exceptionally attractive and beautiful; and one feels that gypsies must indeed be happy people, roaming through the bramble-bushes down in the shady forest dells, clad in the balloon-shaped ballet costumes, and startling the wild inhabitants of the woods with the twinkling of limbs not made for ornament, clad in tights of more or less graceful mould. And, amid those melancholy surroundings, a capable young actor ruins a reputation in an unreasoning and vain effort to be a great star. As for the others who play in The Duke's Motto and Rip Van Winkle, their case is different. They seek to earn an honest livelihood, and they are justified in playing when they have a chance, seeing that they have nothing else to do and the risk is in their favor. But the doom of the venture is sealed, and why the management should fight in face of such a plain result we can not see. The Nevada Bank is most impartial. It does not refuse to the church what it offers to the devil, and on Sunday Bishop Simpson preached to a packed audience. On Thursday the green plush seats were treated to an act of The Marble Heart, an act of Michael and Solon Shingle; and on Monday the company propose to amuse themselves with The Two Orphans.

Mr. Maguire has Sardon's new piece, translated, in the East under the name of Mother and Son (Les Bourgeois de Port d'Arce). We hope he will give it a more attractive name than that. He has also a play of Ennery's; both to be produced after the Williamson engagement. Following those, Miss Clara Morris comes. If she means to play the French pieces well, it will be necessary that the stage management be considerably strengthened.

Miss Mayhew telegraphs that she has won her case. Now for her moral obligations. MOURZOUK.

THE MORALITY OF THE STAGE.

Views of Leading Managers about the Character of Actresses.

It is a mooted question whether actresses are chaste as ice. Certainly they have not escaped calumny. The tongue of scandal has wagged to their detriment; and a New York Star reporter has been industriously at work attempting to locate the cause in their extravagant style of dressing. He called on various theatrical managers.

"I don't know of any women on the stage who are living extravagantly and beyond their means," said Stephen Fiske, the co-manager of the Fifth Avenue Theatre with Dan Harkins.

"There has been no such actress since the days of Mrs. John Hoey, and she spent her husband's money. She was, besides, one of the loveliest women on the stage, against whom nothing could be alleged. I think the actresses of New York were never more modest and conscientious than to-day. Leading actresses can afford to dress handsomely in private life. Few ladies of wealthy husbands have $150 a week for personal expenses, and actresses who earn that, or more, have a right to dress elegantly if they choose.

"Some time ago there was much complaint that Mrs. Hoey ruined other actresses by the magnificence of her dressing. Few could afford to dress as she did. I remember writing a criticism in the  Herald on a play of hers—I think it was Ernestine—in which she acts the part of a poor girl compelled to marry a rich man whom she despises, in order to save her father from imprisonment for a debt of 1,000 francs. I suggested that it would be in better keeping if the heroine had sold the diamonds and real lace she wore, to save her father and avoid the dire alternative.

"When the old Fifth Avenue Theatre was started the system of dressing in the French style was inaugurated. Mr. Daly bought and paid for the splendid costumes which the actresses wore who appeared in his pieces. At that time he was paying low salaries, and calling himself the author of the plays he produced. He took pride in placing them on the stage with splendid costumes, as well as elegant furniture and magnificent scenic effects.

"Mr. Wallace, spurred out of his old English routine by Mr. Daly's example, adopted the same system. In every contract with a leading lady, whose part demands extraordinary costuming, you will find a clause stating that the management provides for all modern costumes above two for each play. This was in Ada Dyer's contract, and Miss Davenport's, and no doubt it is also in Rose Coghlan's.

"I know that one of the richest dresses Miss Coghlan ever wore in New York was presented to her by her brother. All the bridesmaids in Boucault's Marriage, who wore such elegant costumes, received their dresses at the hands of Lester Wallace, from slippers to orange wreath. Generally speaking, stars provide their own dresses, which are part of their capital. When a star, like Modjeska or May Anderson, earns $500 or $600 a night, she can well afford to patronize Worth.

"But, so far as I know, there is not now, and has not been for some time, any actress on the New York stage who earns $30 or $50 a week and wears dresses costing $500, or playing any part where any grossly extravagant dressing would be allowed by the management. Outside of character costumes, as in Two Orphans or in The Celebrated Case, the management finds all the dresses. There is no play before the public where an opportunity is offered for extraordinary dressing."

"Would you discharge an actress, Mr. Fiske, if you knew she was immoral?"

"I'll answer that by reading a clause in the rules of every well conducted theatre: 'Any person whatever belonging to the company, or in the employ of the theatre, who shall by any conduct whatever publicly bring disgrace or discredit upon himself or herself, or the company or theatre, and by such conduct injure any of his or her associate members, or the business or character of the theatre, shall be subject to a forfeit of $20 to $50, or be discharged by the management, or suffer both punishments.' That covers your question completely.

"It has been alleged that there are actresses of notoriously bad character who play at leading theatres. Is that true?"

"Not that I am aware of. People will talk. There has never been a more notorious scandal than the Beecher affair, yet he's not removed from the pulpit. For people who live in the light of publicity, actresses, I think, are remarkably above reproach. You know, you can't go into their private life to rake up their past histories. We know nothing about them, as is the case with scores of people in other pursuits."

Chandos Fulton, of Edgar & Fulton, managers of the Broadway Theatre, said:

"In proportion to their numbers, actresses are not more immoral than society itself. It may happen that an actress is playing on a certain night to an audience, one-half of whom are not so chaste as herself. If a single woman makes $50 a week on the stage and spends $500, the inference is that she has inherited money or made it in stocks. Some women are very shrewd. They know how to husband resources and make good investments.

"My experience teaches me that actresses have a hard time of it, and are generally economical. I think the great majority of them live within their means.

"It's one thing to call a woman unchaste and another to prove it. Nothing is easier than the former. A man can affirm that only of which he is informed. Mere talk proves nothing. There are women of high social standing who are yearly injured by scandal which they do not merit. Some thoughtless remark starts a rumor that travels far and wide, and at last reaches the subject of it, who is often innocent. So it is with actresses.

"They certainly have more temptations than any other class of women, exposed as they are to a running fire of flattery and admiration. But there has been altogether too much mud flung at the profession. Anything that can be caught up involving the reputation of actor or actress is magnified threefold. Many gloat over instances of depravity alleged against the stage as marking the depth of iniquity to which it has fallen.

"Actresses, it must be remembered, are closely watched. They live so completely in the glare of publicity that every action is noted. Other professions have their black sheep, but the fact is not so much insisted upon.

"If I knew there was in my employ an impure woman I would immediately discharge her. I think it an insult to the public to put unchaste women on the stage. Of course, we can act only so far as we know a woman's character by well-authenticated report. It is true that while on the stage they are not private individuals, and actresses; still their private life may give rise to scandal if they are not correct in their deportment. In that case they should be, and undoubtedly are, condemned severely.

"I must confess," said Mr. Fulton, in conclusion, "I don't know of any actress who spends large sums of money above her salary. I think you have barked up the wrong tree."

William Henderson, manager of the Standard Theatre, said:

"That's an old country idea of actresses living off other people's money besides their own, and it ought to be exploded. My experience of New York life is not so extensive as other managers', but so far I have seen nothing of the kind. It certainly is not the case in my own theatre. My actresses are trying, how to live the most economically. I suppose I shall pay $1,200 a week for salaries this season. When an actress is earning a nice sum of money she has the privilege of dressing as well as wives of men earning no more. A cashier, for instance, receives $3,000 a year, and by keeping his house expenses low obtains credit of earning $5,000 or $6,000 a year by the display he is able to make. In the same way, if an actress wishes to board cheaply and spend her money on her person, I don't know who can object. But as a rule, I think, actresses are as modest and economical as most women."

"When an actress comes in town to play at my theatre I am often asked where she can board the most reasonably. I could point out to you leading women who have been in my company living on Sixth Avenue or the smaller hotels. There's no brown-stone arrangement there, and yet they made very handsome salaries."

"The greatest scandal arises about an actress after she has married out of her profession. Watch it and see if, nine cases out of ten, the man doesn't marry her to live off of her earnings!"

"Since the telegraph has been in use, old folks say, on reading the morning papers, 'What a wicked world it's getting to be.' This is because the crime of a day is gathered and published more fully than in their younger days. For a similar reason, people think actresses are so much worse than women in society, for an eternal watchfulness is directed toward their patrons, and everything wrong put in its strongest light."

"A manager is not supposed to know of the private life of the professionals he employs. He simply manages for the public. McCullough plays at the Fifth Avenue Theatre and at the Grand Opera House in the same season to make money and increase his reputation, and so a manager caters to the public taste. If a play has a high moral tone, and becomes popular, so much the better. But if people don't like a play all the morality in the world won't save it from failure. An actress who has the elements of popularity will be engaged by a manager; her private life is not investigated, but her professional ability. Of course, an actress notorious for immorality would not be tolerated in my theatre."

"A proof of the chastity of women on the stage is the excellent wives they often make. Mr. and Mrs. Waller, and scores of others I might mention, have lived together more than twenty years, and happily, we have every reason to believe."

Lester Wallack was riding in a car when accosted by the reporter.

"It's all bosh," he said. "I don't think there is anything in the subject to pay the newspapers for sending out reporters to write it up. I don't care to say much about the matter beyond this. Do you think I would go to my master mechanic, for instance, and inquire about his morality? I am satisfied so long as he works well. In the same way actresses are engaged by reason of their ability, and their private affairs are none of mine. If an actress wishes to dress handsomely, it's nothing in which I am concerned; and if she can pay for her clothing, however elegant, it's a matter of perfect indifference to me. I think they are a chaste class of women as a rule. There are black sheep, however, in every flock."

Greene & Thompson, the literary firm, are looming up in New York. It is said a comedy of theirs, Sharps and Flats, having direct bearing on the late Sierra Nevada or any other deal, is to follow Bronson Howard's Hurricanes at the Park. W. C. Crosby and wife have taken an Irish drama from them; too, and will travel with it.

A most attractive display is that made at the Pavilion by S. & G. Gump, Nos. 581 and 583 Market Street. This long-established and popular firm always keep on hand the latest styles of Mirrors, Cornices of all styles and prices, and Gilt Frames of every description. The beautiful specimens now on exhibition at the Pavilion are but a mere hint of what is to be seen at their extensive warehouses on Market Street. Their taste in framing pictures is unsurpassed. They manufacture a great variety of what might be termed novelty frames. Some of their patterns are simply exquisite. They are unique and original in design. There is a real science in the matter of adapting and adjusting a particular frame to a particular picture. It makes all the difference in the world how a picture is framed, there are so many points to be taken into consideration. An artistic taste in these matters is invaluable. Messrs. S. & G. Gump are never consulted in vain. It should be mentioned, in this connection, that their frames are made of the best of material. The gilding does not tarnish. Those who desire the best work at the most reasonable rates should go to 581-583 Market Street.

The Alta California, September 17: "Yosemite cologne, put up by Slaven, is as pure as the waters of the Vernal, Bridal Veil, or Yosemite Falls. Wouldn't it be nice if these waters could be scented as deliciously as Slaven does his cologne?"

This paper is printed with ink furnished by Chas. Eneu Johnson & Co., 509 South Tenth Street, Philadelphia, and 59 Gold Street, New York.

For silverware, go to Anderson & Randolph's, Clock Tower Building, corner Montgomery and Sutter Streets.

Mrs. Parker, of the Ladies' Depository, has opened a new store at 126 Post Street. She will be happy to see her former patrons. New Style Lace Patterns.

LADIES—NUMEROUS GOOD GIRLS APPLY DAILY for positions at my office. Your orders are filled by my lady clerk, a competent housekeeper, who knows how to select your help. Zeehandelaar & Co., 627 Sacramento Street, above Montgomery.

A BIG DEAL.

THE FAMOUS WILDCAT MINE.

Yesterday afternoon there was issued from this office a Sketch Book of the Stock Market, giving scenes of the exterior and interior of the Stock Exchange and character sketches on the street.

The work includes the whole ground of stock speculation, dealing more particularly with the comic side of the business, giving caricatures of the leading brokers of the Exchanges, the well known characters of "Pauper Alley," and the indiscriminate throng of the stock arena.

It is a very funny thing, rich in interest, and full of sketches that can not fail to be recognized by everybody interested in the business and acquainted with the sharps of office, board, and street.

Agreeable to the requirements of the market, the book is issued in the shape of a certificate, duly executed and transferable on any books except those of the ARGONAUT Publishing Company.

Capital stock, $2,500.00; number of shares, 10,000; price of shares, 25 cents. Take in a few at bedrock prices before it is placed on the Board.

CHAMPAGNE.

Over an hundred years the art of Champagne making was surrounded by a veil of mystery, and to be candid, but a few of the many admirers of this sprightly and elegant wine have ever cared to know how it was made. They emptied glass after glass, and only sought its life-giving and soul-inspiring exhilaration, quite content to escape a headache next day, the usual penalty of their indiscretion. But now there are champagnes made, and made in this city too, which are absolutely pure, and which will not give a headache, no matter how immoderately they may be used. We allude to the Extra Dry Eclipse, the Sparkling Muscatel, and the Private Cuvée of Messrs. Landsberger & Co. In producing these wines they have accomplished a public good.

George H. Tay & Co., formerly Tay, Brooks & Backus, Pioneers, established in 1848, manufacturers of tin, copper, brass, and sheet-iron ware; have steam punching and stamping works—the only ones on the coast; make a specialty of stationers' japanned goods, tin cans and boxes of all kinds. Proprietors of the Alvarado Stove Foundry, where they manufacture a variety of patterns of cooking and heating stoves, French ranges; parlor grates, cauldrons, etc. Also manufacturers of the "Backus Water Motor," ranging from 1-16 to 6-horse power, and extensively used for sewing machine and all light machinery. Salesrooms 616, 618, and 620 Battery Street.

BOSTON DRESS REFORM.

California "Worth" Princess Suits, Skirts, and detachable Flounces; Cashmere and Merino Union Suits for ladies and children; ladies' and misses' shoulder-brace Corsets; Abdominal Corsets. No. 430 Sutter Street. A. W. BAKER, the only Dress Reform Agent in the city.

WANTED—Copies of the ARGONAUT of August 3d (No. 4, Vol. III.)

THE ARGONAUT BOUND.

Sufficient files of the ARGONAUT have been preserved to bind twenty full volumes of Vol. II, from January 12th, 1878, to July 6th, 1878. Any one can be accommodated with the bound volume by applying at the business office, 522 California Street. As the number of volumes is limited, it would be well to apply early.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

Roxy. By Edward Eggleston, author of the Hoosier Schoolmaster. 12mo, cloth, illustrated. $1 50
Almost an Englishman. By M. L. Scudder, Jr. 16mo, cloth. 25
Sibyl Spenser. By James Kent. 16mo, cloth. 25
A Concise History of Music. By H. G. B. Hunt. 1 vol., 16mo, cloth. 1 00
Medieval Church History. By R. C. Trench, D.D. 1 vol., 8vo, cloth. 3 00
Fall of Damascus. By Russell. 1 vol. 12mo, cloth. 1 50

NEW STATIONERY

RECEIVED DAILY.

BILLINGS, HARBOURNE & CO.,

BOOKSELLERS AND STATIONERS,

NO. 5 MONTGOMERY STREET.

RE-OPENED.

HAYWARD WAREHOUSES

Are now receiving

GRAIN ON STORAGE.

THE PATRONAGE OF FARMERS

and others is respectfully solicited. Storage, one dollar per ton for the season. Advances and Insurance effected at the lowest rates.

Refer by permission to Chas. Webb Howard, President Spring Water Valley Company, Bray Bros., M. Waterman & Co., San Francisco; John Zeile, Hayward's; J. West Martin, President Union Savings Bank, Oakland.

R. H. BENNETT, Proprietor.

DECKER BROS

WEDDING AND OTHER PRESENTS OF

SOLID STERLING SILVERWARE BRONZES, CLOCKS, AND FANCY GOODS

The largest stock of artistic novelties in the city, at much lower prices than similar goods have ever before been offered.

ANDERSON & RANDOLPH,

Clock Tower Building, corner Montgomery and Sutter Sts.

We beg to inform our friends and all connoisseurs that we have received a shipment of the celebrated

POMMERY & GRENO CHAMPAGNE,

The favorite of all gourmets in Europe and the Eastern States. We guarantee the quality of this Wine to meet the demands of the most fastidious.

L. LEBENBAUM & CO., 529 and 531 Kearny St. and 1303 Polk St.

BUSH STREET THEATRE.

CHARLES E. LUCKE.....PROPRIETOR.

Saturday and Sunday Evenings and Saturday Matinee,

ALICE OATES,

And her unequalled new English Comic Opera Company.

Positively last performances of the successful Comic Opera,

LES CLOCHES DE CORNEVILLE.

THE BELLS OF CORNEVILLE.

Serpolette.....Alice Oates.

Monday Evening, Sept. 23, Lecocq's masterpiece, in 3 acts,

GIROFLE-GIROFLA.

Girofle-Girofla.....Alice Oates.

The cast embraces the entire strength of the company.

New wardrobe, scenery, and appointments.

Reserved seats may be secured at the box office every day.

Prices as usual. Matinee: Prices—Admission, 50 cents; Reserved Seats, 75 cents. Children, half price.

BALDWIN'S THEATRE.

THOMAS MAGUIRE.....MANAGER.

F. LYSTER.....ACTING MANAGER.

G. R. CHIPMAN.....TREASURER.

Unprecedented success of

MR. & MRS. J. C. WILLIAMSON

(MISS MAGGIE MOORE),

Every Evening, including Sunday, and Saturday Matinee,

STRUCK OIL.

John Stofel.....Mr. J. C. Williamson.

Lizzie Stofel.....Mrs. J. C. Williamson.

To conclude with the original Californian Topical Sketch,

THE CHINESE QUESTION.

Billy the Butcher, alias Ah Ka Funga Slim, Mr. J. C. Williamson.

Kitty O'Shane, alias Sam See Lo.....Mrs. J. C. Williamson.

PRICES OF ADMISSION—Dress Circle and Stalls, $1; reserved seats, $1 50. Balcony, 50 cents; reserved seats, 75 cents. Gallery, 25 cents. Matinee, 50 cents to all parts of the house.

CALIFORNIA THEATRE.

BARTON & LAWLOR.....MANAGERS.

BARTON HILL.....ACTING MANAGER.

Saturday, September 21, last night of

FORBIDDEN FRUIT.

Monday, September 23, last week of

STUART ROBSON & WM. H. CRANE,

And first production in this city of Bret Harte's great play,

TWO MEN OF SANDY BAR!

In which Messrs. Robson and Crane will appear as "Sandy Morton" and "Col. Culppepper Starbottle."

Friday Evening, September 27, Joint Farewell Benefit of

MESSRS. ROBSON AND CRANE.

Last Robson and Crane Matinee, Saturday, September 28.

Seats at the box office six days in advance.

Monday, September 30, brief engagement of the popular favorite, MR. FRANK MAYO, in his great creation,

DAVY CROCKETT.

JOE POHEIM

The Tailor,

233 Montgomery St. and 103 Third St., has just received a large assortment of the latest style goods. Suits to order from.....$20
Pants to order from.....5
Overcoats to order from.....15

237 The leading question is where the best goods can be found at the lowest prices. The answer is at

JOE POHEIM,

233 Montgomery St. and 103 Third St.

amples and Rules for Self-measurement sent free to any address. Fit guaranteed.

OFFICE OF THE BANK COMMISSIONERS,
No. 202 SANSOME STREET,
SAN FRANCISCO, Sept. 11, 1878.

GUSTAVE MAHE, Director and Secretary of the French Savings and Loan Society:

DEAR SIR:—The visit of the Bank Commissioners to your institution, and the fact that their report was not immediately made, having apparently caused a feeling of apprehension among your depositors, I desire to say that the estimate so far furnished by such experts as Maurice Dore, Gen'l Cobb, R. H. Sinton, S. P. Middleton, and W. H. Bovee, of the present value of the real estate held, and much of that loaned upon by your Bank, nearly coincides with the figures at which said property stands upon your books, while some estimate of property outside of the city loaned upon still remains to be furnished. I see no reason to doubt that your Reserve Fund is more than sufficient to meet any shrinkage that may arise, and I consider that your institution is in a solvent condition.

(Signed) EVAN J. COLEMAN,
President Board of Bank Commissioners.

PIANOS ARE THE BEST KOHLER & CHASE SAN FRANCISCO & OAKLAND

THE POOR INDIAN.

Lo, the poor Indian, whose untutored mind
Sees God in clouds, or hears him in the wind,
His soul, proud science never taught to stray
Far as the solar walk or Milky Way;
Therefore a scientific alchemist
Is something which we never hope to see,
But, seeing, shall immediately go
And report the same to Mr. Barnum's show,
Which will prove a bigger attraction than
Jenny Lind and the wholly horse driven tandem,
Or the Cardiff Giant transported
On two freight cars, with their intrigues
Sticking out of his mouth and ears.

Vet simpler nature to his life has given,
Behind the cloud-topped hill a humbler heaven—
Some safer world in depth of woods embraced,
Some happier island in the waters waste,
As if a safer world than this could be,
Where Freedom is kind, and howards flee
From the shadow of an Indian
As if the very Old Scratch was after them
With a seven-pronged pitchfork.
And, reaching a telegraph station,
Immediately sent word to the Associated Press
That they have caught up with the red demons,
And killed seven hundred and fifty Sioux,
Eleven hundred and seventy-five Comanches,
Four thousand Putes, and untold numbers
Of Grows, Cherokees, and Black Feet, among The slain being Sitting Bull, Hole-in-the-Day,
Spotted Tail, Old Stick-on-the-Mud,
And all their braves and papouses.

To be, contents his natural desire;
He asks no angel's wings, no seraph's fire,
But fire-water is his heart's delight,
Whether it comes in the form of Bourbon,
Robinson County, forty-rod, alcohol, aquadortis,
Or nitroglycine with a stick in it.

Old City Derrick.

One day a Turkish joker borrowed a great kettle of a neighbor. When he had done with it he returned it and a little saucy along with it. The neighbor asked what this meant, whereupon the joker said, "The kettle had a young one." On hearing this, the neighbor readily accepted both. Some time afterward the joker again borrowed the kettle, but, after waiting a long time to have it returned, the owner at last went for it, and knocked at the joker's door. "What do you want of me?" "I want my kettle," replied the neighbor. "I see that you look quite well yourself, but I am very sorry to say that your kettle is dead," returned the humorist. "Nonsense! Kettles don't die," cried the neighbor. "Certainly they do," opposed the joker; "if a kettle can have a young one, it can die."

Our Choir.

There's Jane Sophia,
And Anna Maria,
With Obadiah,
And Zedekiah
In our choir.

And Jane Sophia soprano sings
So high, you'd think her voice had wings
To soar above all earthly things.
When she leads off on Sunday;
While Ann Maria's alto voice,
Rings out in such harmonious voice,
That sinners in the church rejoice,
And wish she'd sing till Monday.

Then Obadiah's tenor high
Is unsurpassed beneath the sky;
Just hear him sing "Sweet by and by,"
And you will sit in wonder;
While Zedekiah's bass profound
Goes down so low it jars the ground,
And wakes the echoes miles around,
Like distant rolling thunder.

Talk not to us of Patti's fame,
Or Nicolini's tenor name,
Or Cary's contralto—but a name
Or Whitney's poudrous basso!
They sing no more like Jane Sophia,
And Anna Maria, Obadiah,
And Zedekiah in our choir,
Than cats sing like Tomasso.

A recent advertisement contains the following: "If the gentleman who keeps the shoe shop with the red head will return the umbrella of a young lady with whalebone ribs and an iron handle to the slate-roofed grocer's shop, he will hear of something to his advantage, as the same is the gift of a deceased mother now no more with the name engraved upon it."

"Dot Leedle Loweeza."

How dear to his heart was mine grand-child, Loweeza,
Dot sheet leedle laughter off Yawcob, mine son!
I offer was tired to hug and to squeeze her
When home I gets back, and der day's work was done.
Vee I was away, oh, I know dot she miss me,
For when I come homevards she rushes bell-mell,
Und poots out dot sheet leedle mouf' for to kiss me—
Her "darlin oldt gampa" dot she lofe so vell.

Katrina, mine frau, one could not do midouht her,
She vas sooch a comfort to her day py day;
Dot shild she made effer von happy about her,
Like sunshine she drife all their troubles away;
She boldt der vool yam while Katrina she vind it,
She bring her dot camfire bottle to smell;
She fetch me mine pipe, too, when I did not find it,
Dot blue-eyed Loweeza dot lofe me so vell.

How sheet when der tolls off der veck vas all offer,
Und Sunday vas come mit its quiet und rest,
To walk mit der shild among der daisies und clover,
Und look at der leedle birds building their nest;
Her pright leedle eyes, how they sparkle mid bleavure,
Her laugh it rings outt shut so clear as a bell;
I dink there vas nopdy had sooch a treasure
As dot shmall Loweeza, dot lfe me so vell.

Vhen winter vas come, mit its coldt, shstormy wedder,
Katrina und I vas must sit in der house,
Und dalk off der bast, by de fireside together,
Or play mit dot daughter of our Yawcob Strauss,
Oldt age mit its wrinkles, prays to remind us
Ve gonnot shlay long mit our shildren to dwell;
Budt soon ve shall meet mit der poya left behind us,
Und dot sheet Loweeza, dot lfe us so vell.

CHARLES F. ADAMS.

He said he rather guessed he knew how to sail a boat—but the gentle zephyrs that kiss the wavelets o'er his watery grave mournfully whisper: "He luffed not wisely."

There was nothing but a plain slab at the head of the mound, but the simple inscription upon it tells its own sad story: "He was unwise in a close game."

A greenback orator shouts: "Give us greenbacks ere we starve!" "Water, pass the watermelon that way; the wild eyed son of toil wants nourishment."

Painful question by the Sultan: "Is this Turkey?" "It merely portions of England, Russia, Austria, and other countries?"

ARLINGTON HOTEL,

SANTA BARBARA, CAL.

NO HOTEL ON THE PACIFIC

Coast can surpass the ARLINGTON in the airy cheerfulness and convenience of its arrangements. None can equal it in the natural and artistic beauty of its surroundings. The readers of the ARGONAUT will be pleased to know that the problem of combining solid comfort within doors, inexhaustible pleasure without, and calm contentment all the time, at a very economical rate of expenditure, has been solved at the ARLINGTON, and is respectfully submitted by

GEO. T. BROMLEY, Manager.

BERKELEY GYMNASIUM

The Berkeley Gymnasium (a preparatory school to the University)—a first-class boarding-school establishment in the interests of higher education, and in opposition to the cramming system of the small colleges and military academies of the State. The next term will commence July 24th. Examination of candidates for admission July 22d and 23d. By request, instructions have been provided during the summer months for students preparing for the August examinations at the University. For catalogue or particulars, address

JOHN F. BURRIS, PRINCIPAL,
BERKELEY, CALIFORNIA.

NOTE.—We desire to call special attention to the organization of our Grammar Department, separate from the Academic, and solicit the patronage of parents and guardians of small boys.

GOLDEN GATE ACADEMY

AND CADET SCHOOL.

Next quarter will commence October 7, 1878.
For circulars, address

D. P. SACKETT, A. M., Principal,
Oakland, Cal.

J. C. MERRILL & CO.

SHIPPING

—AND—

COMMISSION MERCHANTS,

Agents for the

SANDWICH ISLANDS AND OREGON PACKET LINES.

204 AND 205 CALIFORNIA ST. San Francisco.

REDINGTON'S

FLAVORING EXTRACTS

ARE THE PERFECTLY PURE
and highly concentrated Extracts of

FRESH FRUITS

Prepared with great care. They are put up in superior style, in a bottle holding twice as much as ordinary brands of Extracts.

Comparing quality and contents, none other are nearly so cheap.

Wherever tested on THEIR MERITS, they have been adopted in preference to all others, and now are the

STANDARD FLAVORING EXTRACTS

Of the Pacific coast. Dealers will find them to give better satisfaction to the consumers than any other kind and are respectfully requested to give them a trial.

REDINGTON &amp; CO.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

H. P. WAKELEE & CO.,

Wholesale and Retail

Druggists, Importers of Foreign and Domestic Drugs, Chemicals, and Perfumery,

No. 120 Montgomery Street, under the Occidental Hotel,
San Francisco.

PARTICULAR ATTENTION PAID

to compounding Physician's Prescriptions, the dispensing of which is entrusted only to the most competent hands, while every care is taken to ensure the purity of all preparations.

GEO. W. FRESCOTT. IRVING M. SCOTT. H. T. SCOTT.

UNION IRON WORKS

(Founded 1849.) Post Office Box 2128.

COR. FIRST AND MISSION STREETS,
SAN FRANCISCO

MANUFACTURERS OF

Compressed Engines,
Air Compressors,
Rock Drills,
Portable Hoisting Engines,
Marine Stationary and Portable Boilers
Baby Hoist, complete.

CONSTANTLY ON HAND AND FOR SALE,

Direct-acting Pumping and Hoisting Engines,
Upright and Stationary Engines,
Quartz Crushing and Amalgamating Machinery;
Blake's Rock Breakers,
Smelting Furnaces,
Quicksilver Pumps,
Chloridizing Furnaces,
Cornish Pumps,
Steam Pumps.

All manufactured by us of the best materials, design, and workmanship, and furnished at lower rates than by Eastern manufacturers.

PRESCOTT, SCOTT &amp; CO.

MUSIC BOXES

OF ALL DESCRIPTIONS AND OF

Standard Reputation, playing from one to over one hundred airs. The largest and best assortment in this city. MUSICAL BOXES WITH CHANGEABLE CYLINDERS always on hand. New and interesting styles constantly received. Call and examine our stock.

REPAIRING OF MUSICAL BOXES thoroughly done in all their particularities.

M. J. PAILLARD &amp; CO.,

MANUFACTURERS AND IMPORTERS,

120 Sutter Street, San Francisco.

Branch of House, 680 Broadway, New York.

MILLER &amp; RICHARD,

SOLE MAKERS OF

EXTRA-HARD METAL SCOTCH TYPE.

SPECIAL AGENTS FOR

THE CAMPBELL, HOE, AND PEERLESS
PRESSES.

No. 529 COMMERCIAL STREET.

And 205 Leidesdorff Street, San Francisco.

O. F. WILLEY &amp; CO.,

IMPORTERS AND MANUFACTURERS OF

FINE CARRIAGES AND WAGONS

No. 427 MONTGOMERY ST., SAN FRANCISCO.

Agents for the sale of Wagons manufactured by
BREWSTER & CO., New York,
W. D. ROGERS, Philadelphia,
C. S. CAFFREY, Camden, N. J.,
WOOD BROTHERS, New York,
H. KILLAM & CO., New Haven,
COOLING BROS., Wilmington

ALSO, AGENTS FOR

HARNESS MANUFACTURED BY WOOD GIBSON,
TOMPKINS & MANDEVILLE, AND
A. H. DUNSCOMBE.

Also, a fine assortment of Robes, Blankets, Nets, Whips, etc.

J. W. BRECKINRIDGE, DANIEL S. YOST,
Member S. F. Stock and Ex. Board.

BRECKINRIDGE & YOST,
STOCK BROKERS,
S. E. corner Montgomery and California Sts.

MOODY'S

Drug and Prescription STORE,

Northwest corner Polk and Pine Streets.

Prescriptions prepared with care from the purest of Drugs and Chemicals.

CHAS. N. FOX, M. B. KELLOGG.

FOX &amp; KELLOGG,

ATTORNEYS AND COUNSELORS
AT LAW, San Francisco, Cal.

Office, No. 530 California Street, Rooms 1, 2, and 3.

S. B. WAKEFIELD, A. W. FOSTER,
Member S. F. Stock and Exchange Board.

S. B. WAKEFIELD &amp; CO.

STOCK &amp; EXCHANGE BROKERS,

314 Pine Street, San Francisco.

CALIFORNIA FARMERS' MUTUAL

Fire Insurance Company

[ESTABLISHED IN 1874.]

Paid up Capital .....$200,000
Assets exceed..... 326,000

PRINCIPAL OFFICE, 209 SANSOME ST.
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.,

THOS. FLINT, President. J. W. FOARD, Manager.

FERD. K. RULE .....Secretary.

I. G. GARDNER.....General Agent.

JOHN C. STABLES.....Special Agent.

COMMERCIAL

INSURANCE COMPANY OF CALA,

FIRE AND MARINE.

Principal office, 405 California Street, San Francisco.

JOHN H. WISE, President.
CHAS. A. LATON, Secretary.

THE STATE INVESTMENT

—AND—

INSURANCE COMPANY, FIRE AND MARINE

CASH ASSETS.....$450,000

Principal Office, 218 and 220 Sansome Street, San Francisco

OFFICERS:

A. J. BRYANT, President,
RICHARD IVERS, Vice-President,
CHAS. H. CUSHING, Secretary,
H. H. WATSON, Marine Survevo

OPHIR SILVER MINING COMPAny.—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 10th day of September, 1878, an assessment (No. 33) of one dollar per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, No. 203 Bush Street, Room 9, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the 15th day of October, 1878, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction, and, unless payment is made before, will be sold on MONDAY, the fourth day of November, 1878, to pay delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertisement and expenses of sale.

By order of the Board of Directors.
C. L. MCCOY, Secretary.
Office—No. 203 Bush Street, Room 9, San Francisco, California.

OFFICE OF THE BODIE GOLD

Mining Company, Room 3, San Francisco Stock Exchange Building, San Francisco, September 10, 1878.—At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above named company, held to-day, a regular dividend of three dollars ($3) per share was declared, payable on Saturday, the 14th day of September, 1878. WM. H. LENT, Secretary.

SAVAGE MINING COMPANY.

Location of works, Virginia, Storey County, Nevada. Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Directors, held on the sixth (6th) day of September, 1878, an assessment (No. 35) of one dollar ($1) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 15, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the eighth (8th) day of October, 1878, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and, unless payment is made before, will be sold on MONDAY, the twenty-eighth day of October, 1878, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.

E. B. HOLMES, Secretary.
Office—Room 15, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—OFFICE OF

the Standard Gold Mining Company, San Francisco, Cal., Sept. 7, 1878.—At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above named company, held this day, Dividend No. 12 of one dollar per share was declared, payable on Thursday, Sept. 12, 1878. Transfer books closed on Monday, Sept. 9, 1878, at 3 o'clock, A. M.

WM. WILLIS, Secretary.
Office, Room 29 Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street third floor San Francisco Cal

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District, of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

MARY E. HENRY, plaintiff, vs. JAMES J. HENRY, defendant.—An action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to JAMES J. HENRY, defendant:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District, of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days; otherwise within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony existing between plaintiff and defendant (as will appear more fully by reference to the complaint on file herein, to which your attention is hereby directed), and for general relief and costs of suit.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this Third day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight.

(SEAL OF COURT.) THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.
By W. STEVENSON, Deputy Clerk.
T. J. CROWLEY, Attorney for Plaintiff,
No. 629 Kearny Street.

CHICKERING

PIANO WAREROOMS,
31 POST ST., Mechanics' Institute Building.
ELEGANT PIANOS.

L. K. HAMMER,
Sole Agent for Pacific Coast.

Owners of Chickering Pianos are specially requested to leave orders for tuning at warerooms, 31 Post Street.

MUSIC

KNABE PIANOS,
IRVING PIANOS, ROGERS' UPRIGHT PIANOS,
Prince Organs, Waters' Organs, Sheet Music.
BANCROFT, KNIGHT & Co.,
733 MARKET STREET.

PIANOS

SCHOMACKER AND HENRY F. MILLER CELEBRATED PIANOS.
Pianos Tuned, Rented, and for Sale on the Installment Plan.
WOODWORTH, SCHELL & Co.
12 Post Street San Francisco.

"DOMESTIC"
THE LIGHT RUNNING

SEWING MACHINE,

The only really light-running lock-stitch Sewing Machine in the market.

"DOMESTIC" PAPER FASHIONS

Elegant, stylish, and reliable.

J. W. EVANS, 20 Post Street, San Francisco.

THOMAS BOYSON, M. D.

(University of Copenhagen, Denmark).

PHYSICIAN AND SURGEON. Office and Residence, 112 Kearny Street. Office hours, 11
A. M. to 5 P. M., 6 to 8 P. M. Sunday 11 to 1 only. Telephone in the office.

RARE ENGRAVINGS
AND ETCHINGS.

W. K. VICKERY NOTIFIES HIS customers and the public that he has removed to a larger and more convenient office at No. 23 Kearny Street (next door to Snow & May's), where he has a large collection of these beautiful and rare works of Art. To those who cannot visit his collection, he will be glad, on receipt of a postal card, to take a portfolio of Engravings for inspection at their residence any forenoon or evening. 23 Kearny
Street. Hours, 11 to 5 P. M.

THE PACIFIC LAND AND TRUST CO.
RENT HOUSES,
COLLECT RENTS, MANAGE ESTATES

HOUSES AND LOTS FOR SALE
in this city, Oakland, and Alameda. Lands and Ranches for sale in all parts of the country. Agents in the principal cities. Collections made throughout the coast.

No. 334 CALIFORNIA STREET.

RUPTURE.

BUY NO TRUSS

Until you see what has been accomplished by DR. PIERCE'S late invention.
Call or send for New Illustrated
Box. Prices reduced.
MAGNETIC PLASTIC TRUSS
CO., 600 Sacramento Street, San Francisco.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—OFFICE OF the Furea Consolidated Mining Company, Nevada Block, Room 2, San Francisco, Sept. 14th, 1898.—At a meeting of the Board of Directors, of the above named company, held on the 14th day of September, 1898, it was resolved to pay a dividend of $1.00 per share, payable on Friday, Sept. 20th, 1898.
The dividend will be paid at the office of the company, 21st floor, closed until Saturday, the 21st inst.
W. W. TRAYLOR, Secretary.

THE CAL. FURNITURE M'FG CO.

HAVE FIVE TIMES AS MUCH

FURNITURE

As any other house on this Coast, which has been purchased so low that we CAN and WILL sell at such prices that the poor can gratify their WISHES and the rich their TASTE. At the old stand,

NOS. 224 AND 226 BUSH STREET, S. F.

HERRMANN'S

FALL STYLES

ARE NOW OUT AT

336 KEARNY STREET, BETWEEN BUSH AND PINE,
& 910 MARKET STREET, ABOVE STOCKTON.

SEND FOR ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE.

TERRACE
SWIMMING BATHS

FOOT OF WEBSTER STREET, ON CENTRAL AVENUE, ALAMEDA
BEACH, now open to the public, and pronounced by the "elite" of San Francisco and Oakland as the only place for a good bath on the Pacific Coast. Perfect security against monsters of the deep. High water at all times of day and night.

SPECIAL ACCOMMODATIONS FOR LADIES UNATTENDED.

Reached in thirty-five minutes from San Francisco by steamer NEWARK—depot on the premises; or C. P. R. R.
to Alameda Station, or from Oakland by horse-cars at Broadway Station, running within two blocks of the Baths.
BATHS, 25 CENTS, including Private Room, Bathing Suits, Towels, Shower Baths, etc.

R. HALEY &amp; C. A. EDSON, Proprietors.

A GREAT INSURANCE COMPANY.

THE NEW ENGLAND MUTUAL LIFE INS. CO
OF BOSTON

Is one of the greatest trust institutions of the present age. It was organized over forty years ago, and under a conservative management it has grown, and strengthened, and is now at the head of honored and trusted companies for the insurance of life in the U. S.
Its policies are issued under the non-forfeiture law of Massachusetts. It charges no more for its insurance than those companies that forfeit the policy in case of non-payment of premium when due. Its present assets are $14,893,427 78, and its surplus over all liabilities amount to $2,759,965 04. Wallace Everson, No. 328 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, is the general agent for California and the Pacific States and Territories, and is ever ready to give all information desired.

MRS. R. G. LEWIS,
DRESS MAKING PARLORS,

ROOMS 27 AND 28.

Thurlock Block, corner Sutter and Kearny Streets, San Francisco.

Elegant Walking Suits, Evening Toilets, Bridal Trousseaus, and Mourning Costumes, manufactured at the shortest notice, after the latest Parisian modes. TAKE THE ELEVATOR.

MISS K. McCARRICK,
MILLINERY PARLORS

135 KEARNY STREET, NEAR SUTTER, UP STAIRS.

The finest assortment of French Millinery Goods in the city always on hand.

MRS. M. M. COLEMAN,
DRESS MAKING PARLORS

NO. 115 KEARNY STREET,

Rooms 13, 14, and 15, over Keane, O'Connor &amp; Co., San Francisco.

PUBLIC ADMINISTRATOR,

WILLIAM DOOLAN,

Office No. 12 Nevada Block.

PACIFIC

BUSINESS COLLEGE,

30 Post St., San Francisco.

BUY YOUR SHIRTS AT

MORRIS, SCHWAB &amp; CO.

FINE-ART DEALERS.

FREE ART GALLERY.

A complete assortment of ARTISTS' MATERIAL, GOLD FRAMES, etc.

19 AND 21 POST STREET.

WAREHOUSES, N. W. CORNER
KEARNY AND SUTTER STREETS.

SHERMAN, HYDE &amp; CO.

SHEET MUSIC,
MUSIC BOOKS,
MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

A WORLD'S TRIUMPH.

THE CURRENT OF

TRADE REVERSED.

TO EUROPE.
STEINWAY & SONS
ORDERS FROM EUROPE

have increased to an extent, necessitating the establishment of Warehouses in London, England, and connected with it is a Concert Hall, the whole combined making the most elegant Piano Warerooms in Europe, and stands there as a monument of American genius and industry.

It is impossible to mention in the limited space of an advertisement the innumerable triumphs of this energetic firm. They stand foremost in the world in Piano building in America, and in that respect, no small compliment to their inventions is the undeniable endorsement of all their competitors, as shown in their imitative efforts. Certain principles of the Steinways are however so completely protected, that no imitation or substitute is attempted at all, and the shallow method of crying such inventions down are resorted to and relied upon.

The Steinways designed and perfected the Over-strung and Iron Frame systems. The application of the Agraffe Arrangements to Square and Upright Pianos. The Patent Duplex Scale creating the most beautiful treble tones. (The Duplex Scale is of recent invention and only to be found in Pianos sold recently). The improved Double Dampers. The later idea extending the Agraffe to every string in the Piano. The highest finish to all parts of the instrument, including first qualities of Ivory, ebony, felt, cloth, etc. The wood work and varnish of such first-class character, that the employment of large capital and experienced men permits.

The name of Steinway has become a "household word" in American homes, and the satisfactory record of 18 years (and on the Pacific Coast, in itself assures the purchaser that the investment is no speculation, but one of perfect security.

The oft-repeated story of rival makers claiming to have been Steinways' foreman, etc., should have no weight with purchasers. An immense manufacturing business like the Steinways is divided into departments for the various classes of work, and a foreman of one department superintends that alone, and cannot be perfected in other details.

The Steinways (a numerous family) are the inventors and designers of the principles of their Pianos, and are alone responsible for the thorough execution of their own ideas.

In the Machinery Department at the late Centennial Exhibition Steinways were awarded a special medal for an invention for testing their iron frame under a pressure of 5,000 lbs. to the square centimetre. (This award was distinct from their medal for the best Pianos exhibited). The iron frames in Steinway Pianos are the only ones so tested, and while other makers rely on castings from an ordinary foundry, the Steinways maintain their own foundry, and manufacture a frame of composite metal, which adds greatly to the resonant qualities of the instrument in general.

It frequently occurs that the attempt is made to raise the character of Pianos constructed on less costly principles to the rank that the Steinway maintains, by naming a price, the same or nearly so.
This method is frequently exposed by the perfect willingness of the dealer to make astonishing discounts for cash or extremely long credits; systems not entertained in any first-class business. In selling a Steinway Piano, a guarantee of worth is given protecting the purchaser for 6 years, and catalogues issued by the Pacific Coast Agencies have a uniform rate of prices in gold, and where desired a liberal installment plan is offered to responsible buyers, with an additional charge of simple interest on deferred payments. Catalogues mailed on application to

M. GRAY, General Agent,
105 Kearny Street, S. F.

WILL REMOVE ABOUT OCT. 15TH TO

117 POST STREET.

PALACE HOTEL RESTAURANT,

FIRST CLASS IN ALL RESPECTS.

QUIET AND DESIRABLE PLACE
for Ladies, Gentlemen, and Families. Entrance south side of Court. A. D. SHARON.

BEAMISH'S

CAPITAL : $2,500,000

San Francisco Sept 20th 1878

184-11-44

10

M. J. Muldoon - Trustee
— Gen — Shares of the Capital Stock of

THE WILDCAT

SPECULATION
INCORPORATED

COMPANY

SEPT. 1878

Transferable on the books of the Company by Joe. D. Strong Jr.

SECRETARY

endorsement hereon & surrender of this Certificate.

Fred. M. Somers,

PRESIDENT

100,000 SHARES

25 CENTS EACH

THE ARGONAUT PUB. CO. 522 CALIFORNIA ST

H.H. NOBLE
& Co 435.

STOCK & MONEY
BROKERS
435.

STOCK REPORT

H.H.
STO
BRO

Catching a Glimpse of the Latest Quotations - Cal. St.

Another Cal. St. Scene.

Bodie.

Scorpion 150's.

A Bird.

Sold at 28.

An Incline.

Heavy Operators

Characters of Pauper Alley

A solid Man.

Nerve

"A put & a Call"

Ladies Broker N° 1

Ladies Broker N° 2.

Operators, O. G.

Retired Barber.

A Pointer.

Fresh from Virginia.

Too Long.

Too Short.

A retired Mason.

Canson.

Peno.

Interior of S.F. Board.

San Francisco Stock Exchange Pine St.

A lively Session.

The Centre.

A Lobby Speculator

The Bird Cage - S.F. Board Carantes.

Lobby Characters

"I'm a chipper Jam"

Short

Close on the Market

14

A point on Lady Bryan.

Merchant's Exchange Wine Rooms.

Weddelorff Street

News Boys.

A pauper Alleyite

Scene on Montgomery St. Making a break for the Entrance.

Explaining the Situation.

Floating a few Shares.

A Bonanza Biddy.

Offices T.R.E.A. Building
Montgomery St.

EUGENE E. DEWEY.
308
STOCK BROKER.

COFFIN, SANDERSON & COOK,

COFFIN, SANDERSON
& COOK STOCK
BROKERS.

Scene 308 Pine Street.

The deal of the Newsboys.

Making a Memorandum.

Office Exchange Build? Cal. S.

Sarge Arms of Pacific Board.

Gallery Gods

The Haulum Board, Por. w. AZLEV.

"Take 500 more!"

Julia.

The Argonaut.

VOL. III. NO. 12.

SAN FRANCISCO, SEPTEMBER 28, 1878.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

OLLA-PODRIDA.

It will be observed that the ARGONAUT has improved of late. This is attributable in part to the fact that the senior editor has been absent delivering agricultural lectures at county fairs and duck shooting at Tulare Lake, leaving the juniors of the office greater freedom in making up the paper. The ARGONAUT has decidedly improved since its establishment, both in tone and in the general character of the enterprise. It has taken a higher range of thought than was its original purpose. It has found a better lead of literary matter to work than its proprietors supposed existed on the Pacific Coast. It has purposely avoided the acrimonious phase of political discussions, preferring to cut itself loose from any party association, and leaving its columns free to the discussion of all national questions—free, indeed, to the discussion of all questions; preferring to make itself the vehicle of independent thought rather than the organ of any class or the advocate of any party. It will be observed that on all questions on which the community is divided in opinion the columns of the ARGONAUT are open to a free discussion. The editors of the journal are Republicans by early association, education, and conviction; but, recognizing the fact that the party has fallen under most humiliating and dishonorable leadership, appreciating the littleness of his excellency, the goody-goody Mr. Hayes, and being somewhat distrustful of the integrity of the administration of the financial part of the government, and remembering the utter infamy of the ring transactions in land, naval, Indian, and internal revenue affairs of the last administration, are not altogether in love with the present Republican party. In a Republican government the long exercise of power is apt to beget abuses. This has been illustrated in the recent history of party affairs in our country. There is no honest man in the ranks of the Republican organization who does not wish that the election of President Hayes had been brought about in a different manner. There is no intelligent person who does not wish that the party at Washington was less under the influence of national banks and moneyed corporations. There is a somewhat well defined impression among Republicans that perhaps a change of party may not be a national calamity. The ARGONAUT, as we are confidentially informed by its editors (who are now both absent, and whose absence we take advantage of to make this announcement), will hold itself in position to advocate that candidate for the next presidency who comes nearest to the standard of patriotism.

With reference to State politics it will be equally independent. The present administration is an exceptionally good one. Governor Irwin, so far as our observation extends, is making an intelligent and honest administration of his office, and the same remark may equally apply to the Lieutenant-Governor, Attorney-General, Secretary of State, Treasurer, and Comptroller. Our State finances are in a most healthy condition, and there seems to be no very good reason why the political administration should be taken out of the control of the gentlemen who now form the State government. Of course the Democracy will plot and scheme to tear down and destroy their present faithful servants that other persons may have their places; of course the Republican party leaders will intrigue to place in nomination such candidates as may, by aid of money, party machinery, and stump yawp, be successful. We understand, of course, that the wires are being pulled to accomplish these results; we know half a dozen not very able Republicans, and as many more Democrats of not very great ability, are now passing sleepless nights in planning how to succeed Senator Booth. We wish Senator Booth might be reelected, because he is scholarly, intelligent, honest, and what is better than all this—a gentleman. He has been more useful than demonstrative. He thinks where others only talk. He has head, and brains are becoming at discount in the Senate of the United States.

We had not intended this to become a political dissertation; but, as it has, we must not omit mention of the municipal administration of the city of San Francisco. Again we find ourselves in the position to commend rather than scold. Mr. A. J. Bryant has made and is making a most excellent Mayor; none better was ever chosen to direct our city government. If he lacks—and we do not know that he does—any of the amenities that distinguished his predecessors, Messrs. Selby, Alvord, and Otis, he is quite the equal of any in executive and business ability. We have never heard any one question his integrity, and only with reference to the sand-lot uprising have we ever heard complaint of his executive firmness. In this, some thought him slow and lacking in resolution; others thought him unjustifiably severe in repressing the freedom of speech; but let us speak well of the bridge that carried us over the crisis without serious disturbance, without the loss of a single life or trampling upon the rights of any citizen. Mr. Bryant deserves well of every member of the community who was interested in the preservation of order. The financial condition of our city is in good shape; our police is efficient and well ordered; and, taking the city government as a whole, we may be thankful that it is so efficiently and so well directed. And yet in a few months all this tranquillity will be disturbed; the pot will begin first to simmer around the primary edges and at the corner of California and Montgomery Streets; seedy loafers with bad breath will begin to talk of the "party"; bums will wipe their Bardolphian noses upon their greasy coat sleeves and offer their patriotic services to ward manipulators; ward statesmen will meet in solemn conclaves at groggeries to consult on the best interest of the city, State, and general government; demagogues, whose reputation is as broad as the county in which they live, will look wise and agitate themselves in obedience to some higher influence; politicians, county committees, State Central Committee men, candidates for city and State offices, officials now in place, expectants and parties in possession, from the man who flings the lariat for dogs to the statesman who aspires to a seat in the Senate of the United States, will wriggle, and plot, and scheme, and intrigue, and drink whisky, and smile, and combine, and pay money, and lie, and make promises, and break them, and bribe, and bargain, and make speeches, and shake hands, and kiss dirty babies, and do dirty things, in order to obtain an office—an office in which there is no money if honestly administered, no honor if not, and in which they will from the beginning be compelled to live a life of subserviency in order to secure a reelection. All these things seem inseparable from a republican form of government. It seems as if no good thing can be attained without some unpleasant preliminary labor. Heaven is only reached by a life of self-denial. The promised land of milk and honey was reached after forty years of travail in the desert. The best duck-shooting is found in the farthest clump of tulcs, to which you must wade through deep water and tude mud. In politics there is a vast amount of preliminary nastiness through which to wallow in the attainment of the higher honors of official life. An outspoken, honest, and fearless utterance of political opinions consigns the one who utters them to the hopeless obscurity of private life. The demagogue, the flatterer, the obsequious and the unprincipled, the cautious and the intriguing, may, and often do, wiggle their way successfully to the most exalted stations, and attain to position by means which honorable men despise. Hence it is that the best intellects, the higher and better men of the nation, are disinclined to politics as a pursuit in life.

A gentleman—one whose opinions we highly appreciate—said to us the other day: "I wish the ARGONAUT would dispense with society gossip. I have," said he, "old-fashioned notions about seeing ladies' names in print. It always wounds my sense of propriety to see the name of any lady friend in the ARGONAUT, and pray tell me what right has any journalist to invade the social circle, even to announce that Mrs. A or Miss B were present? And still further, answer by what rule of social propriety are you justified in saying that this one looked beautiful, or that one was tastefully dressed in rich and fashionable attire?" A few days since we received a very severe note from a gentleman, and the subject of his complaint was that in these words our society correspondent had alluded to a member of his family: "The bride is a charming young lady, well known in society." Our answer to these complaints is, first a plea of guilty, and next a plea of justification; as lawyers say, we confess and avoid. So far as we ourselves and the ladies of our family are concerned, we should prefer to avoid newspaper notice. But society likes it—yes, demands it; and this journal would be a failure without it. It is a fact that one week's omission of "The Only Jones" or "Flibbertigibbet" causes more notice, and is the subject of greater complaint, than to have left out all our ponderous and well-written editorials. One line of social gossip is worth a whole column of "Olla-podrida," and it would be better to omit any mention of a foreign war than to fail to announce a wedding in fashionable society. An encyclical letter from the Pope, the proceedings of an international congress, the Queen's speech, or a change of national administration, are incidents of less importance to the average lady of society than what was played, and who played it, at the amateur theatricals given by Mrs. Gwin. Who gave a party, and who were there, and how they were dressed, and who is in love, and who engaged, and where the fashionables spend their summer months, and who goes to Europe, are matters of serious consequence to a great many very intelligent people who take this paper, and who, for the sake of "The Only Jones," "Flibbertigibbet," "Lilias Dubois," and "Betsy B," pardon us for lumbering our other columns with such stupid and heavy stuff as the letters of Kwang Chang Ling, "Atlanticus," and H. N. Clement.

Our people of San Francisco are not peculiar in this respect. London has its Court Journal, the Times notes all the movements of the Queen, the nobility and gentry of England, and not an entertainment is given by fashionable people that is not noted, described, and commented upon by the leading journals of Great Britain. This is also done in all the capitals of Europe. New York, Boston, and Philadelphia have their journals especially devoted to society news. It is an utter affectation for any fashionable female to assert that it is displeasing to have herself, her daughters, her jewels, her dress, her equipage, receive kindly mention in a reputable journal. Why do women array themselves in velvets, silks, and laces? Not for their mirrors or their husbands, but for society. Why is the marriage ceremony made a pageant and spectacle in churches adorned with flowers, gas lit by daylight, with attendants in sweeping trains, and bride adorned in flowers and bridal veil? Not for the parson, or the bare-headed urchins that congregate on the sidewalk; nor yet for the spectators that crowd aisle and gallery; but for the reporters, the press, the sensation that attends a fashionable wedding in fashionable society. Why do persons give grand entertainments, and turn their elegant homes into a corral, restaurant, bar-room, and dancing hall? Half the guests they despise, the other half they are indifferent to. The answer is display, and the best and widest display is secured through the columns of the press. This journal notices only the movements of good society, and if there is a line in its society gossip that wounds or offends, or even stings, it is there by accident, and not design.

This is a very good place to observe that the paper will be grateful for society news, and if society people will furnish it the chances of errors are greatly lessened. Society in San Francisco is just beginning to crystallize; it is just getting itself into shape. In every city of importance there is a circle that ranks first—in point of birth, education, wealth, and that styles itself "good society," and is accepted as such. The ARGONAUT is aiding in this process of crystallization, and it is the only journal that can aid in this work. The Post jumbles things, and makes the elegant and accomplished daughter of a tinker's apprentice a fair mate for the brave eyed, manly sons of Colonel Jackson. The Chronicle and Call, in grandiloquent language, portray as a "splendid and fashionable gathering" a ginger-bread party where sand-lots dance to the music of "The Arkansas Traveler" played on a single fiddle, and thus mix the upper ten and the lower million in a social hodge-podge. The Post, the Chronicle, and the Call find the names of fashionable society in their advertising columns, and for a first-class announcement of a soap factory would praise its proprietor and his estimable lady as the upper crust of the social pie. There are some curious things that we have always observed—everybody who is not in society affects to despise it; everybody who is poor affects to look with great contempt upon wealth; every female who can not afford to dress elegantly and expensively affects to admire simplicity of costume. All men are gentlemen and all women ladies—in their own opinions. We never knew a person who did not claim to be well-born, and it is very rare to find one who does not claim to be the possessor of all the virtues.

Money is the open sesame to society in San Francisco as it is the world over. Intelligence, birth, culture, and good character ought to be the qualifications for admission to the select circle. To illustrate our meaning we might take Debrett's Peerage, and we should find that that family of the English nobility or landed gentry which has not been enriched by the purse of the plebeian is the exception. The number of bankers, merchants, manufacturers, and successful business men that have become barons, earls, and dukes nearly equals that of those who have come to the ranks of the nobility by services upon the bench, or in literature, in science, or on the battle field. The number of daughters of fat brewers, bankers, and mechanics, of rich opera singers and actresses, that have united their purses with noble names is by no means small. In our own country there is very little good society that does not trace its goodness to money bags. The blue blood of Beacon Street comes down through a long line of pirates, negro-traders, and codfishers. The aristocracy of New York, who claim to have descended from the Patroons, are ancient and ignoble Dutchmen enriched by lands and vegetable gardens. The chivalry of Virginia is that portion of the people of the Old Dominion that had the most niggers, and the best families of the South were those of broadest acres, and on whose acres niggers and cotton had given opportunity for education, refinement, and culture. The first society of San Francisco is that now, and will be that, which has the greatest wealth, lives in the best style, and spends the most money. We are not moralizing, we are only stating facts. The children of the wealthy stock-speculator, or the successful business man, will as certainly take their rank at the head of the social structure as if we had a college of heraldry, and their names were enrolled as the descendants of a long line of illustrious ancestors.

A correspondent asks the cost of getting a home in El Dorado. Now, that depends. A workingman can preëempt a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres. The land costs only the price of official fees. Then he would want an axe, price $1.25; three hundred and sixty-five pounds of bacon, say ten cents per pound, $36.50; two or three barrels of flour at $6 per barrel; one hundred pounds coffee, $15; twenty-five pounds tea, say $12.50; a barrel of sugar at eleven cents a pound; a double-barreled shot gun, with powder, buckshot, and No. 8 for quail; a baking kettle, coffee-pot, frying-pan, pewter plate, tin cup, and sheath knife; two pairs Mission Woolen Mill blankets; one pair of army shoes, cost $2.75; one pair rivet-fastened overalls, price $1.25; two shirts, and a straw hat. After he has grubbed out the chaparral, he may hire a piece plowed for garden and orchard by exchanging days' labor among his neighbors. He makes his fence of stone or rail. He makes his cabin of logs and lays up his fire-place and chimney in stone and mud. His bed is pine boughs and blankets. In three months he has vegetables; in six months, chickens and grain. In a year he has a start; in two years fruit. In three years he has a farm; in four years he is independent; in five he is in condition to go to the Legislature. If he can get an industrious young woman, who is fond of picknicking in the country and not afraid of tarweed on her stockings, the whole thing can be accomplished more easily. It requires nerve, resolution, industry, patience, self-denial, and an honest purpose to accomplish a result. The workingman in health can make himself independent beyond the possibility of failure in five years, and a wealthy man in ten. Our fathers did it in New England, fighting a rigorous climate, Indians, and an unexplored continent. They did it in the Genesee country, now Western New York, in Ohio, Michigan, and the great Northwest, and in the valley of the Mississippi. The pioneers have done it in California. It is a better and surer way to get a living than to blaspheme God, curse Republican government, and damn one's luck on the sand-lot.

In the present aspect of national politics, with "Kearneyism" (which includes Fenianism) and "Butlerism" to the front, it may be well to consider what effect their success would have on our relations with Great Britain. It is certain that the accession of General Butler to the Presidency would put a strain upon these relations which they might not bear. There is probably no living American who so bitterly hates England and everything English as General Butler, nor one who is so warmly detested in return. The last number of the London World utters English opinion on this matter with English moderation when it says: "Should an unforeseen combination place General Butler in the Presidential chair, the consequences will be more serious to England than any election which has ever taken place in the United States since the days of Washington." They would probably be still more serious to ourselves, and not the least of the circumstances which would make them so would be the power which the man Butler would be able to

A TRAGEDY AT DOWNIEVILLE IN 1851.

In Three Acts.

ACT I.

The celebration of the Fourth at Downieville, Sierra County, twenty-seven years ago—that is to say, in 1851—was not the elaborate affair we make it nowadays. Downieville was then a mining camp, and one, by the way, of the very roughest description, where gold dust, fresh and glittering from its native earth, passed current for coin; where values were computed not by dollars, but by “ounces,” and where the miner paid for his whisky not in dimes or quarters, but in “pinches” of gold dust. Downieville, therefore, had no mounted cannon, no cavalry, no infantry—in short, none of the accessories of a well-appointed State militia, whereby to celebrate the Nation's Birthday with the pomp of a mimic war, with thundering cannon and martial music. Hence, on the Fourth of July, 1851, there was no procession in Downieville worth talking about. But what the miners lacked in military appointments they made up for in uproar, in deep drinking and boisterous carousals, in abundance of newly-coined oaths, and some square fighting. They celebrated after a fashion of their own.

The occasion was too good to be neglected. Not every day would come a Fourth. It was therefore commendable, and quite becoming, to improve the occasion as much as possible. So they began a week or so before the time. Then grog shanties plied a lively trade, firewater was at a premium, and many a plethoric “shummy” bag was depleted of its glittering contents in “pinches” paid for tanglefoot. There is more than one millionaire to-day in California who obtained his start in the world by retailing grog to the miners during that week at Downieville.

The first day of this remarkable week was given to the rough hospitalities of the camp. Work was everywhere suspended; the miners visited at each others' tents—each tent having laid in a whisky keg for the occasion, when the tin cup from which the miner usually drank his coffee was made to do duty in serving whisky to the guest. As cooking in holiday times was out of the question, pork and beans enough to last a week were cooked in the bulk; and as each guest felt hungry, he went to the home-made safe and helped himself. Thus fortified, the revelers resumed their carouse, the tin cup once more went briskly around, tanglefoot was swallowed in huge gulps, talking gave way to singing, and Night spread her sable mantle over the inebriate scene.

Nothing could have been more natural than, on the following day, “to take a hair of the dog that bit”—than to drink more tanglefoot for the purpose of “curing” the effects of yesterday's excess—and therefore the second day began with “doctoring,” and then getting drunk again, and ended very much like the day before, with the exception that there was not, perhaps, upon the whole, so much effusive friendship among the revelers, and that the prolonged debauch developed the animal, and brutalized the man to a greater or less degree.

At noon on the third day the whole camp was reeling drunk—was, in fact, mad. The fighting spirit was now in the ascendant; for tanglefoot had done its work. The most acceptable talker was he who talked loudest and longest on the glory of fighting with bowie knife and revolver, and hence Jim—Jim the Slasher—was the orator of the hour.

He quarreled with the Gimlet—a gentleman so called from the deftness with which he could bore a hole in the body of an antagonist—and the Gimlet gave Slasher the lie. “That's more nor I'd allow my own father to do—to give me the lie,” quietly retorted the Slasher. “I suppose you know the consequences?”

“I don't know as I do,” replied the Gimlet, coolly. “Well, step this way and I'll show you,” said the Slasher, walking outside to the square plot in front of the saloon. The Gimlet followed.

When the miners observed the two notables going out together on the Square they knew what was going to happen, and immediately scores of the spectators lined the sidewalk on both sides of the straggling street, but no one attempted to interfere between the Slasher and the Gimlet. The Square was left entirely to themselves, and each spectator felt instinctively at his weapons, for all carried knives and revolvers.

“How will you have it?” asked the Slasher.

“Any way you like,” was the reply.

“I most always begin with the shooting-irons and finish up with the knife,” observed the Slasher.

“I don't know as any arrangement could be prettier,” replied the Gimlet; and the two retreated simultaneously a few paces backward, keeping their eyes steadily and murderously fixed on each other as they did so.

You could have heard a pebble drop in the street. Mutually satisfied as to the distance, they drew their revolvers and fired together, each advancing on the other at every discharge during the four following shots, when, both being wounded, they rushed at each other knife in hand. At close quarters neither deigned to parry or fend, and thus waste his waning strength, but both struck out desperately and wildly. The Slasher, putting all his strength in a single effort, struck the Gimlet on the neck, inflicting a fatal and gaping wound, and both fell together—the Gimlet from his death-wound, and the Slasher from exhaustion and the force of his own impulse. They clinked and squirmed and wallowed in each other's blood for a few seconds, when the Gimlet, with an expiring effort, plunged his knife in Slasher's heart, and both died in fiendish embrace.

When two dogs get to fighting, all the dogs in the street jump at each other's throats: it is the animal instinct. So it was on this occasion with the drunken miners. The remainder of the day was consumed in drunkenness and fighting, in combats here and there of a more or less savage character. It was a saturnalia of debauch and bloodshed. And thus was ushered in the morning of the glorious Fourth of July at Downieville in 1851—a red-letter day in the annals of that mountain town: a red-letter day indeed in a sense more terrible by far than attaches even to the frightful death-scene of the two gladiators just related.

ACT II.

Henrietta was the familiar name by which a young Peruvian woman was known to many of the miners of Downieville. She lived with her husband back of the saloon in which the Slasher and the Gimlet had had the difficulty, and which was a popular resort with the miners when loose on a jamboree. She was young, not more than nineteen, had been married only a few months, and in a short while would become the mother of her first child. Canova might have taken her for a model, so chiseled was every feature, and so faultless the contour. One could not help wondering how a creature so gentle and so beautiful could have elected to relinquish her home, her friends, and her associations for the sake of making her home among the roughs of Downieville. But the unholy thirst of gold had seized on her husband, and she would accompany him to the California mines, or anywhere in the world, at whatever sacrifice. Tomas had been an employe on her father's estate in Peru, when, in an evil hour, she eloped with him, and Tomas, loving her for her own sake alone, and scorning with that pride begotten of the Spanish blood in his veins to accept pecuniary assistance from her parents, set out for the mines to build a fortune for himself independently of the haughty Hidalgo, her father. But notwithstanding her high lineage, Henrietta conformed herself to the new situation, was affable and courteous to every one around her, and comforted herself with an unassuming yet decorous air, even toward the white savages of Downieville.

Late in the afternoon—about seven o'clock—she was seated on a bench outside her cabin door, when Charley Roper, a miner of some thirty years of age, accosted her as he was proceeding on the way to his tent. Charley was of medium height and thick set; had thick lips, a large mouth, ugly teeth, and a fetid breath. Nature stamped him a lecher, ignorant and brutal.

“Good evening, Henrietta,” he said.

“Good evening, senor.”

“How have you enjoyed the Fourth?” he asked, seating himself familiarly beside her on the bench.

“Oh!” she exclaimed, shocked at the scenes she could not help having witnessed during the day; “oh, not at all! Americans drink and fight so much!” and she gasped for breath, for in her delicate and weak condition the recollection of all she had heard and seen had nearly overpowered her.

“Some tall fighting—wasn't there?” insinuated Roper, leering at her with his small, blood-shot, fishy eyes. “Will you take a glass of wine, Henrietta, if I fetch it?”

“No, thank you, senor; I don't feel well, and I never drink wine.”

“Where's Tomas? I hain't seen him all day.”

“Tomas is not at home,” replied Henrietta, wearied with the man and disgusted with his appearance.

After a few more remarks Roper, seeing the lady was in no mood for talking, bade her good-bye and left.

Alone and sick at heart, Henrietta retired early to bed. She could not sleep. In her desolate situation, her mother and the members of her family recurred to her mind, as did the respectable and comfortable home she had abandoned. And now at her accouchement, which soon would come, she hadn't a relative in the world to tend and comfort her. The scalding tears saturated her pillow. Thus she lay till about twelve o'clock, when a knock at the door summoned her from her bed.

“Is that you, Tomas?” she asked with anxiety.

“Yes,” said a voice; “open the door.”

“Who is there?” she demanded, on hearing a stranger.

“Who are you? What do you want?”

“Open the door,” said the voice; “I want to come in.”

“Go away!” cried she, indignantly. “You can't come in here to-night.”

“I must come in. Open the door and make no noise.” And before Henrietta had time to reply, Charley Roper burst in the door and stood before her! He made a motion to embrace her.

Instantly Henrietta plunged a knife into him, and he fell dead at her feet.

What! Dead! Dead! She did not intend to slay; she only meant to protect her honor. It was the act—the impulse of a moment. But he moves; O surely he is not dead! She stoops and lays her hand on his chest. He is stark and rigid. The motion was but the last quivering agony of departing life. Horrified, she stood motionless and agast over the dead body. O for the power to restore that life which had just departed! A murderess! ay, a murderess! Whither, O whither shall she flee? And, panting with undefined fear and horror, she trembled like an aspen—like the fitful shimmering on a sun-lit lake. The fury that had nerved her arm in defense of her honor—which to a virtuous woman is dearer than life—that fiery indignation evaporated like dew before the morning sun, and her woman's nature stood confessed in all its timidity and helplessness. She fled from the detested abode, and sought refuge with a married couple in the neighborhood, ejaculating in her flight, “A murderess! ay, a murderess!”

Ye Powers attest, whether the self-accusation was false or true!

ACT III.

The midsummer morning sun blazed slowly and majestically above the edge of the horizon, piercing with his penciled rays the rejoicing foliage of the surrounding forest, and flooding the air, the camp, the mountains with a sea of amber light. Day was in its infancy, and, save the chirping and fitting of birds, the ticking of myriad insects, and the indefinite animation that stirred nature to salute the morning—save these, all was still. Man as yet had slumbered; heavy and overcome with debauch and the unnatural excitement of the last few days, the miners still slept. Sleep on, sleep on, ye hard-conditioned men! Sleep till your senses return; sleep till the maddening fumes of alcohol exhale from your brains; sleep till your better nature is chastened by reflection; sleep, ay, forever, ere you witness—rather, before you enact—the scene which follows.

Before an hour a few stragglers, bleary-eyed and shattered, appear on the street and seek the saloons for stimulants, now, in their exhausted condition, excusable if not absolutely necessary. Then a few more stragglers, and so on until between six and seven o'clock, when, considering the early hour, the street was well filled, and men were seen talking together in knots, and evincing more than ordinary earnestness and excitement. This new excitement, whatever it might have been, craved for more drink, and they resorted to the saloons and drank freely till ten o'clock in the forenoon. They now began to talk, not mysteriously in knots of two or three, nor in undertones, but in loud and violent voices. It is needless to say that Charley Roper's assassination was the subject of discussion. Some one in the crowd termed Henrietta “a fiend,” and the word was hissed from mouth to mouth with intense, and still intenser, emphasis until the drunken mob lashed itself into fury, and demanded her death.

“Crucify him! Crucify him!” was shouted of old; “Hang her to the nearest tree!” shouted the Downieville miners, and the angry multitude surged and swayed, swore and blasphemed, as it moved on and on, as by individual impulse, toward the cabin in which it was known Henrietta was sequestered. Arriving in front of the domicile the tumultuous wave of turbulent men came to a stand, and a hundred voices cried aloud: “Murderess, come forth!”

“I'm here—I'm ready!” replied Henrietta, in a firm voice, as she stepped lightly to the door. “What is your wish, señors?” she added, with an almost imperceptible smile.

Half a dozen rushed to seize her.

“Nay!” she exclaimed, recoiling from the foul contact; “do not put your hands upon me. I will go with you quietly. But touch me not with your hands.”

Woman, oh, what a strange enigma! She pales at imaginary woe; she weeps at the distress of others; a sudden tumult makes her nervous; her poodle sick she is inconsolable. But in presence of mortal peril she is calm and she is self-possessed. In such a situation she becomes the embodiment of the heroic sentiment. Mary Queen of Scots walked calmly and gracefully to the block; Lucretia fell upon her husband's sword rather than survive her violated honor; the wife of Hasdrubal, holding her two children by the hands, plunged with them into the flames of burning Carthage sooner than be taken captive by the younger Scipio; and the Maid of Orleans, when burning at the stake, poured forth her intrepid soul in sacred song to the great Eternal.

The crowd now, with Henrietta imprisoned in its midst, surged back to the square—that square where the Gimlet and the Slasher had murdered each other the day before, and which was fresh with their blood. Here William Speare, an ambitious young lawyer, made a speech denouncing Henrietta as a fiend and a murderess, and deserving of death. “But,” he said, in conclusion, “we must not forget we are American citizens, law-abiding, enlightened American citizens; and, therefore, are bound to give the prisoner—even this horrible murderess—a fair trial. I propose that the gentlemen present nominate of their number a judge, and twelve men as a jury. [Cheers.] If you will accept my humble services, I will undertake to prosecute on behalf of the people, and discharge the duty to the best of my limited capacity. [Several voices: “Bravo, Speare, we'll elect you District Attorney next election.”]

A circle was formed, and a chair for the judge and forms for the jury were brought from the saloon, and the court was in session in the open air in less than ten minutes.

“May it please your Honor, and gentlemen of the jury,” began the prosecuting attorney, stretching himself to his full height, as duly impressed with the honor and distinction of his position, “this case, which I shall proceed to lay before you as briefly as possible, is one of unparalleled atrocity—one that deserves the reprobation of every right-minded man in the land—a crime that has been met with condign punishment in every age, and in every clime, from Cain, the first murderer in the Garden of Eden, situated in the Holy Land, up to the present time [applause from the crowd], and a crime, your Honor, and gentlemen of the jury, which, I hope, will not escape punishment on this occasion. [Hear, hear.] A quiet and respectable citizen is returning home from his work, and calls, in a neighborly and friendly manner, at the cabin of an acquaintance, to inquire after his health, and cement that fraternization and brotherly love which should subsist betwixt miners on this glorious Coast and in the rugged wilds of the Sierra Mountains. [A voice: “What a splendid orator.” Second voice—“You bet.”] He knocks at the door, and obtaining no reply, quietly opens it and enters, when (horror of horrors!) he is set upon by a female fiend—the prisoner at the bar—and murdered in cold blood.

Judge—The court would like to ask prisoner to state the manner of entry.

Henrietta described Roper's assault as already stated.

“Of course, your Honor and gentlemen of the jury,” continued the prosecutor, “the prisoner puts her own version upon the foul, murderous act; but there is no one who knew the lamented Roper, and the antecedents and character of this criminal, will put any faith in her false statement; for the woman, or man, who is capable of committing such a murder as she has committed, will not hesitate to tell a lie to palliate the wickedness.” [Hear, hear, from the crowd.]

After some more remarks of a similar character from the prosecutor, and certain observations from the learned judge, the case was given to the jury, who, after whispering together for a few seconds, returned a verdict of guilty in the first degree. The prisoner was asked if she had anything to say why sentence of death should not be passed upon her.

“Nothing more,” replied Henrietta, in scornful irony, “than that you are all—judge, jury, and prosecutor, not forgetting you, señors,” pointing with her little hand to the human wolves composing the mob—“that you are all very manly and very learned gentlemen.”

She scorned to beg her life of such a crew.

The crowd felt relieved, for they feared she might make an appeal for mercy, such as would soften men's hearts, and so spoil the sport. As the case stood, it was as good as a show; better, in fact, than a circus. And so a rope being procured, one end was thrown over the limb of a tree which stood in the Square, and a noose made on the other.

THE CATASTROPHE.

The mob fell back and a lane was formed, through which Henrietta was directed to move to the place of execution. She walked calmly and quietly to the foot of the tree, around which the mob formed itself into a large circle, in order that no one should be cheated of a full view of the interesting spectacle.

Just here a gentleman elbowed his way through the crowd, for even in this blood-thirsty mob there was, babbly for the honor of our kind, one man imbued with feelings of humanity.

He stood in the circle and took off his hat.

"Gentlemen," he exclaimed in passionate tones, "I ask mercy for the woman. I appeal to you as men, as Christians. I call upon you in the name of the great God to relieve the woman, and, O my God, to spare the young life in her womb!"

"We'll hang you, too!" cried a voice in response. "Hang him, hang him!" shouted a hundred voices. The man was hustled out of the circle, narrowly escaping with his life.

The self-constituted hangman approached to put the noose around the victim's neck.

"Stand off!" exclaimed the heroine. "Do not put your hands upon me. I will adjust the rope myself."

Instantly taking off her little Panama hat, she shied it at an acquaintance in the crowd, and then deliberately lifting her flowing, exuberant hair out of the way, she put her head in the noose.

"A word or two before I die," she said.

There was breathless attention; for does not every incident enhance the pleasure of witnessing an interesting spectacle?

"I did not mean to kill, but only to protect myself from a vile assault. There is a just God above us all, and, as sure as He is just, some of you will follow me soon. Remember my prophecy!"

Then, clasping her hands in prayer and looking up to heaven, she said in a calm, audible voice: "Have mercy, O my God, upon my soul. Forgive me all my offenses, and forgive my executioners!"

Then, unclasping her hands and slightly bowing to the crowd, she said: "Adieu, my friends. I am ready!"

Twenty men hauled rapidly on the rope; in a second her neck was broken against the limb overhead; and all that was mortal of the Peruvian heroine was dead!

THE JUDGMENT.

In less than two weeks, upon the sober afterthought, the judge, jury, and prosecutor became, first, unpopular, and next detested and shunned. William Speare, the prosecutor, went to Oregon, where he became a sot and traded in whisky with the Indians. The Indians, in one of their drunken orgies, accused him of cheating them, and, first taking his scalp while alive, they tied him to a stake and burned him. D. Houston, the judge, going home drunk one night, fell on his face and hands into a pool of soft sludge and was smothered to the death. Harry Smith, the foreman of the jury, committed suicide by cutting his throat with a razor. Not one of the jury, as far as can be ascertained, died a natural death. Henrietta's prophecy was verified, and the justice of God was vindicated.

JOHN MANNING.

SAN FRANCISCO, Sept. 19, 1878.

Pony Glasses of French Brandy.

Toute femme porte en elle une arme mystérieuse, incon nue, que la nature a caché au plus profond de son âme, l'instinct, cet instinct vierge, incorruptible, sauvage, qui fait qu'elle n'a besoin, ni d'apprendre, ni de raisonner, ni de savoir; qui fait plier la forte volonté de l'homme, domine sa raison souveraine, et fait pâlir nos petits flambeaux scientifiques.—Alfred de Musset.

L'amour est l'accord d'un besoin et d'un sentiment.

Il est aussi absurde de prétendre qu'il est impossible de toujours aimer la même femme qu'il peut l'être de dire qu'un artiste célèbre a besoin de plusieurs violons pour exécuter un morceau de musique.—Balsac.

La femme est la partie nerveuse de l'humanité, et l'homme la partie musculaire.—Hallé.

La douleur apprend la vertu.

Amuser le public, quelle triste situation pour un homme qui pense.

Tous les hommes ont des désirs, mais tous les hommes n'aiment pas.

Les femmes ont choisi le parti de se défendre et laissé aux hommes le soin de les attaquer. C'est peut-être parce qu'ils auraient trop résisté s'ils s'étaient défendus.

VERS GRAVES SUR UN ORANGER!

Oranger dont la voute épaisse
Sert à cacher nos amours,
Reçois et conserve toujours
Ces vers enfants de ma tendresse,
Et dis à ceux qu'un doux loisir
Amènera dan ce boeage
Que si l'on mourait de plaisir
Je serais mort sous ton ombrage.

La marquise de Pompadour ayant demandé à l'abbé de Bernis une définition de l'amour, il lui répondit par ce quatrain:

L'amour est un enfant, mon maître,
Il l'est d'Iris, du berger et du roi;
Il est fait comme vous, il pense comme moi,
Mais il est plus bardi, peut-être.

L'amour est une pure rosée qui descend du ciel dans notre cœur, quand il plaît à Dieu.—Arsène Houssaye.

PROVERBES SUR LES FEMMES.

Il faut choisir une femme plutôt avec les oreilles qu'avec les yeux.

Il faut être le compagnon et non le maître de sa femme.

Rien n'est meilleur qu'une bonne femme.

La plus honnête femme est celle dont on parle le moins.

Prends le premier conseil d'une femme, non le second.

(Les femmes jouent mieux d'instinct que de réflexion.)

L'homme change, la femme est toujours femme.—Virgile.

La femme est un oiseau que l'on ne tient que par le bout de l'aile.

Femme rit quand elle peut, et pleure quand elle veut.

Ce que le diable ne peut, femme le fait.

Temps pomelé et femme fardée

Ne sont pas de longue durée.

Rien n'est pire qu'une mauvaise femme.

Qui femme a, noise a.

Dites une fois à une femme qu'elle est jolie, le diable le lui répètera dix fois par jour.

Les femmes ne mentent jamais plus finement que quand elles disent la vérité à ceux qui ne les croient pas.

La langue des femmes est leur épée, et elles ne la laissent pas rouiller.—Proverbe Chinois.

SAN FRANCISCO, Sept. 20, 1878. L. G. J. DE FINOD.

IONE.—A FANTASY.

Day after day in solitude I worked

To mould a white block into human shape.
With every chisel-stroke the form that lurked
Within my brain took clearer outline there,
And sliding days brought out its beauty rare.
Yet still the steel against the marble smote,
But lightly now, and carved the broad low brow.
The oval cheek, and slender, graceful throat
Uprising from the rounded breast below.
One polished arm the drapery caught back,
Half falling from her shoulder as she leaned
With downcast eyes, intent to hear, it seemed,
If living thing had followed on her track.

Complete at last, ev'n to the lightest touch,
I placed my statue in a small recess
Against some crimson drapery, and stood
In silent contemplation. Ah, so much
Of loveliness had needed nothing less
Than soul to make it perfect humanhood!

My white Ione! All the night her face
Serenely fair was flitting through my dreams,
Yet changed, since lacking nothing of the grace
Warm life had given. I woke: the moon's pale beams
Were shining on the bending marble head,
Across the rippling hair, the noble brow,
And pallid cheek, in ghostly radiance.

Then, while I looked, a strange light growing red
And vivid slowly filled the silent room,
And reaching in the alcove lit the gloom
And flushed the marble with a rosy glow.
Slowly the white lips took a tinge of red,
The cheek grew tinted, and the purer snow
Of neck and bosom gained the flush of life;
The proud lips parted in a slow, sweet smile,
The lids drooped over eyes of tender gloom,
The shoulders gleamed through waves of ebony hair,
And the red glowing light stained all the air.
Then, slowly still, my pure Ione stepped Down from the alcove softly to my side,
And gazed on me with eyes that never wept
At the world's falseness or its hollow pride.

I reached my hand to her in dumb amazement;
She clasped it in her own, warm, white, and strong;
And while around us fell the crimson rays
She spoke in accents sweet as any song:

"Be not amazed, O thou who gave me form!
Thy God alone hath power to give me breath.
Ask not the mystery. Canst make the storm
Bend to thy will? Canst triumph over Death
As I have done? Ah, I have lived before
In other forms—ay, always, since the stars
First paled with envy at the aureate moon.
I am imperishable evermore!
I have been crushed in flower-shapes, unknown
By those who breathed unthanked the odorous boon,
My life's ethereal essence, on the air.
The hly fused in marble mocks decay,
And smiles at the sad march of change. And now,
Seeing myself so fair, I knowest thou
Art author of this change. Ask what thou wilt
Of earthly gifts or fame enveloped way
Thy Maker gives me power to fulfill."

Inspired, I reached my yearning arms to her:
"Give me, Ione, what my weak soul craves,
And, gaining, has naught dearer to prefer.
Give me thyself. Yield me the faith,
The secret understanding that past graves
And primal elements have made sublime.
Give me thy bright soul-radiance to save
And guide my footsteps through all future time;
But, dearer yet, share with me by Love's law
The growing knowledge thou hast gained from earth
Disorganized and integrate again.
Advance me to thy height in perfect worth;
Live as a fountain whereof I may draw
The inspiration that may give us fame."

I paused. Ione stood with lifted head
As conscious of those things I could not see
With my dim vision. Gravely then she said:
"Nay, son of earth! I could not if I would Make my life as thine own, nor dwell with thee.
My conscious elements are bound by Time
And Nature in obedience of God's laws.
Ask thou what earthly gift there may seem good—
I have not power to grant thee aught divine."

"Ione, there is nothing else that earth
Can give that I would willingly retain,
If thou, who art coeval with the birth
Of moon and stars, forbidden must remain
In this extremest hour of need. Oh, yield
Thy guidance to my erring human soul,
Full conscious of the power thou canst wield,
And let thy wisdom all my acts control."

"In vain thy plea; I may not grant thy prayer.
Oh, human love is not for me to know
Till chiliads hence, when my soul, grown more fair
Through countless transmutations, shames the snow
Of the unyielding garments I now wear.
I work repentance for primeval sin,
And though hereafter I to hope may dare
To meet you in some shining world afar,
The present offers nothing but—farewell!"

I caught her white hand in a closer grasp
As the red light began to fade away;
It turned dead-cold within my passioned clasp,
Unwarmed by kisses, tears, prayers for delay.
The crimson light grew dull and faded out,
My grasp relaxed, oblivion ended doubt.

In ash-gray dawn I lifted up my head
From folded arms, and watched the coming day.
The morning-star its pearly radiance shed
Within the recess where Ione stood
White as a winter moon on snow-spread way.
The sky grew pearly and luminous with dawn,
While low I said: "O heart! O soul! be good.
Have I not seen the idol of my dreams,
That other self for whom my soul has longed?
Now can I live content, knowing my fate
From one whom God sent visitant to me
In silent watches of the night. O soul!
Behold in future what a clear day beams,
When thou shalt leave imperishable youth,
And wander through the maze of endless worlds
With her at whose touch mysteries unroll,
And the forgotten past is as a scroll
Unfolded to the shining spear of truth."

NORTH COLUMBIA, Sept. 21, 1878. MAY N. HAWLEY.

Time borders upon eternity. It requires but an instant to make the passage from one to the other.

EXTRACTS FROM MY DIARY.—VIII.

By an Early Californian.—San Francisco, 1848.

Leidesdorff's pretty cottage is planted in the middle of a beautiful garden—our first garden—on the southwest corner of Montgomery and California Streets. One can not enter its doors without remembering hours passed in friendly intercourse with its late host, nor without faintly discovering in each apartment the ghost of this most worthy Dane. Seven or eight years ago the Hudson Bay Company, having an agency here, bought of Jacob P. Leese, brother-in-law of General Vallejo, a house he had built a little while before (south side of Montgomery, between Clay and Sacramento Streets), and which was the first good house erected in town, although both he and Captain Richardson had put up inferior buildings on the hill (Stockton Street). It is a large, commodious, and comfortable-looking building, with a broad piazza in front, and with out-buildings; and, nearer the beach, little houses for launch hands, Kanakas, etc., and for storing hides, tallow, and other merchandise. When the agency was discontinued I heard that all this property was bought by Mellus & Howard for five thousand dollars, which sum was paid partly in cash, and partly in hides, tallow, dry goods, and other articles too numerous to mention—among which was a large organ, which Mr. Howard, with his ear for sweet sounds, had purchased from a whaler some time before, and which was transported to, and long ground music for, that portion of her Majesty's dominions lying north of us. This mansion, office, and storehouse combined was, I have heard, the seat of unbounded hospitality during the company's reign. I can answer for its continuance during that of its successors. Many were the dinners and suppers we have done justice to, and many the fêtes we have celebrated within its precious walls. But a change is coming "o'er the spirit of its dreams." Mr. Howard has moved to Leidesdorff's cottage, and now gives his agreeable parties there. Office and store are absorbing the pleasant domicile of other days, and gold dust, not wine, is offered at its festive board. Its bottles are used to store the dust in, and jars and crockery, designed for a baser use, are now filled to the brim with precious ore. A lofty neighbor, too, is rising to cast somewhat in shade its respectable predecessor. Yes, a real, (not sunburnt) brick store is going up on the corner of Clay and Montgomery, the first that has appeared in town, which will soon be in use by Mellus & Howard. Larkin has become interested with Vallejo, Semple, Cook, and Colonel Stewart in the Benicia speculation, and wants to open a store there, and stock it with Mexican and other goods. As there is a vessel up for Mazatlan, he begins to look for money. Meeting Brannan the other morning near his lot (southwest corner of Montgomery and Washington street, now worth $250,000), he asked if he did not want to buy it. Brannan said he didn't know until he heard the price. "Well," said Larkin, "I will take five thousand silver dollars, or ten thousand dollars in gold dust for it." "How long will you give me the refusal of it?" "Till two o'clock." Brannan went immediately to Howard. "Howard," said he, "how many silver dollars have you on hand?" "Not more than a thousand." "Where can I get them?" "There are none in town." "Have you ten thousand dollars in gold dust?" "Yes, as much as you want." "All right; Larkin wants to sell his lot, and I'm going to close with him for it." "What!" exclaimed Howard, "ten thousand dollars! Isn't that high?" "Can't help it if it is; I'm going to have it." He happened to see Larkin passing, called him in, and told him to make out his papers and take his money. "Well," said Larkin, "I was kind of hoping you wouldn't take me up." "You don't know me then," returned B. How many tens of thousands of dollars the bottles, etc., of the Hudson Bay Company's building could pour out before they would become empty I can not say, but its treasury is large. As one of the proprietors of Benicia thus showed his want of faith in San Francisco by getting rid of a fifty-vara lot for ten thousand dollars, another proved his by ridding himself of another for nothing. One day Dr. Semple was telling his usual story of "the rise and fall" to Mr. J. C. Buchanan (Recorder during Alcalde Bryant's administration), and said, moreover, "he was going to give some of the boys (Bear party, I suppose) lots here and there in Benicia, and when the city was built and flourishing he would get up in the morning and walk around just to enjoy their smiling faces." "Well, Doctor," said Mr. Buchanan, "I think I'll take my lot here if you have no objections, particularly if they are worth nothing." "You shall have one right away, if you will accept it. Come into the office, and I'll sign the deed." No sooner said than done; and there stands recorded lot No. 264, from Robert Semple to John C. Buchanan, on the 15th of April, 1847. (This lot forms the southeast corner of Kearny and Pine streets, and is now worth in the neighborhood of $400,000). Semple is a pretty good fellow after all, and "gives a reason for the faith that is in him." The Russians, wishing to supply themselves with furs—particularly sea-otter skins—and grain, took possession, many years ago, of land on the coast above the Bay of San Francisco. Villages were built at the ports of Ross and Bodega, with, I believe, a fort or stockade at the former. Russian River was named for or by these settlers, and quite a domain was under the control of the civil officers of the Russian-American Company. Petro Kostromitoff (afterward Russian Consul in San Francisco in 1856) was at one time its Governor; and Alexander Rotcheff was in command in 1841, when the company concluded to wind up its affairs there, and take its hunters, traders, and clerks back to Sitka. The buildings and movable property, but not the land, was bought by the ever enterprising Sutter for the sum of $50,000, I believe, payable in yearly installments of wheat, beans, and manteca. JAMES C. WARD.

The father peeped out of the hall-door and saw a youth sitting in the moonlight talking to his eldest daughter. The old man made a rush, the young man drifted out into the shrubbery, and as he went over the fence pater made a good line shot and kicked. Then he carried himself into the house on one foot and sat down and wept, and called for witch hazel and arnica, and yelled: "Emeline! What does that young fool plate himself for?" And Emeline said: "Why, pa!" And she and Ferdinand laughed about it the next night till the moon went down.

OUR LIBRARY OF OLD FAVORITES.

LII.—The Battle-Field.

Once this soft turf, this rivulet's sands,
Were trampled by a hurrying crowd,
And fiery hearts and armed bands
Encountered in the battle cloud.

Oh! never shall the land forget
How gushed the life-blood of her brave—
Gushed, warm with hope and courage yet,
Upon the soil they fought to save.

Now all is calm, and fresh, and still,
Alone the chirp of flitting bird,
And talk of children on the hill,
And bell of wandering kine, are heard

No solemn host goes trailing by
The black-mouthed gun and staggering wain.
Men start not at the battle cry—
Oh! be it never heard again.

Soon rested those who fought; but thou
Who mingled in the harder strife
For truths which men receive not now,
Thy warfare only ends with life.

A friendless warfare, lingering long
Through weary day and weary year,
A wild and many-weaponed throng
Hang on thy front, and flank, and rear.

Yet nerve thy spirit to the proof,
And blench not at thy chosen lot;
The timid good may stand aloof,
The sage may frown—yet faint thou not.

Nor heed the shaft too surely cast,
The foul and hissing bolt of scorn,
Yet with thy side shall dwell, at last,
The victory of endurance born.

Truth crushed to earth shall rise again—
The eternal years of God are lest;
But error, wounded, writhes in pain,
And dies among his worshippers.

Yea, though thou lie upon the dust,
When they who helped thee flee in fear,
Die full of hope and manly trust,
Like those who fell in battle here.

Another hand the sword shall wield,
Another hand the standard wave,
Till from the trumpet's mouth is pealed
The blast of triumph o'er thy grave.

BRYANT.

PSYCHE AND I VISIT MONTEREY.

One day Psyche and I, wandering through a picture gallery, chanced upon a picture which charmed us by its very simplicity. It was an old, brown church, with a dash of blue sea and a sweep of golden grain-field as a background. Reference to the catalogue informed us that this was the old, ruined church of the Monterey Mission, which was founded in 1770. The simple little painting haunted us; so we determined to visit this relic of a bygone time, when the zealous Jesuit fathers reared their churches, planted their orchards, and baptized their Indian converts.

So one bright June morning found us exploring the narrow, crooked streets of the town, and peering into the doors and windows of the adobe houses that are built right out on the apologies for sidewalks. As we passed one of these long, low buildings, we stopped to admire a beautiful cloth-of-gold rose growing beside the wall. While we were looking at it a young Spanish girl, with those lovely, Moorish eyes, that we see only in Andalusian pictures, stepped out of the open door. She gave us a cordial, welcoming smile, and we, emboldened by it, expressed our admiration of the lovely roses. She filled our hands with the large, yellow buds, soon to open and disclose their rosy hearts, and then invited us to walk into the courtyard. It was like stepping into Fairyland.

The house was built after the fashion of all Spanish houses, with an open court in the centre, and this was filled with flowers; a fountain played in the middle of the yard, and the roof was covered with soft, green moss. High up on one of the eaves a vagrant nasturtium had lodged, sprouted, sent forth long, trailing arms covered with pale green kidney-shaped leaves, and then blossomed, making the corner of the roof a perfect bower of beauty. Little multiflora roses climbed up the whitewashed walls, honeysuckle vines were trained over the doorways, and the odd little square windows were covered with clematis. We turned our backs upon the door which led into the street, and fancied ourselves in another world while we listened to the voice of the girl who spoke her English with the soft liquid intonation of the Spanish language.

A voice, humming a fragment of some old Castilian ballad, floated out from the house. Had we not been transported to another land by some enchantment? Was it possible that there was a narrow, dusty street outside? We bade the lovely Moorish eyes good-bye and stepped out into it with only the flowers which filled our hands to remind us that we had visited Fairyland indeed.

This same afternoon we made our long-talked-of visit to the ancient church. There was a large party of us; one was a dear, old lady, whose bonnet was constantly falling off, and her daughter, who constantly rearranged her mother's head-gear. Then there were two "inseparables," who rode on the post of honor, the front seat, all the way, thereby aggravating the rest of us; a young lady with lips and cheeks so red that with one accord we named her Cherry Ripe; Psyche and I.

The road wound through a lonely-looking country; no farms such as one sees while riding through Sonoma and Napa counties; no pleasant farm houses, embowered in vines and surrounded by well-cultivated fields; only hills thickly grown with chaparral, deep ravines, and long stretches of country covered with short grass, and our hardy wild California poppy. A sudden turn in the road brought before our eyes the most curious effect that I ever saw, produced by the outline of tall trees and low branches against the sky.

Some one exclaimed: "See that pretty stream of water, with those trees growing along its banks!" The driver said: "That's no stream of water." We all looked and insisted that it was and that we caught a glimpse of a white cottage through the trees. He laughed us to scorn and iterated his former statement, adding: "Everybody says the same thing when they first make this turn; it's only some trees growing along the bed of a dry creek."

As we neared the spot we saw that he was right, but nothing else could have convinced us that the blue water and the white cottage we fancied we saw were only an optical illusion. We were speculating on this strange appearance when Cherry Ripe exclaimed, "The church, girls!" We gazed eagerly in the direction she pointed, and there stood the old church distinctly outlined against the blue sky, with the golden grain nodding in the ruined door. In the distance we could see the waters of Carmelita Bay dancing in the sunshine. Carmelita, meaning in the Spanish language, little Carmel. The church was still a quarter of a mile away from us, for we had to drive around the grain field in which it stood. We passed an old adobe wall overhung by the pear trees planted so many years ago by the Fathers; then a low adobe house, the open door of which framed a picture worthy of an artist's pencil. A bare-legged, chubby, rosy-cheeked child stood in the doorway. A mass of tangled curls crowned its head, and from under the clusters flashed the lovely Moorish eyes.

"What a picture!" cried all, while Psyche declared we were on enchanted ground, for who would have dreamed of seeing one of Murillo's heads in far away California!

We threaded our way through the grain, and at last stood within the church. The walls are all that remain intact, and they are crumbling into decay. The roof has long since fallen in, and the tiles are scattered on the floor. Looking at the building from a distance one would not imagine it to be such a ruin as it really is. The picture in the gallery represented the front, with its triple arched door and hexagonal shaped window above the central arch. This part still remains firm, but the sides and back are beginning to totter. We saw where the altar once stood, and the remains of the reading desk. Built off from the main part are two small rooms; one is where the priests changed their robes during service. The ancient baptismal font is also in this room. The walls of the other room are completely covered with inscriptions in Spanish.

Like all Spanish churches, this had no floor, the worshippers kneeling on the bare ground. The body of the church is filled with grass-grown graves, for in those days the dead were buried inside the church walls. Seventeen Alcaldes sleep peacefully in the shade of the old ruin. Cherry Ripe found a narrow, winding stair, which we ascended. It led to a narrow arched doorway, which we conjectured must have opened into the gallery where the singers once sat. But the gallery has long since fallen to the ground, and we stood on the narrow ledge and looked far over the surrounding country.

Psyche and I climbed up to a small door back of the reading desk; this opened into a room whose walls were made of earth. There was no sign of window or any entrance, except that by which we came. The floor was also of earth, and both sides and floor were covered by trailing vines and grass. In this room Psyche found a bird's nest, which she keeps not only as a remembrance of our visit but as a curiosity, for it really consists of two nests, one built on top of the other; the upper nest being placed on the back of bird sitting on the lower.

The two nests can be plainly seen, the dead bird making the division between them. This bird must have died on her nest, and another, undeterred by the fate of her predecessor, built her own on its back. We scrambled down to show our treasure, and found the rest busily engaged in cutting their names on the walls. This was abandoned while all went nest-hunting, without any further success.

The lengthening shadows warned us it was time to depart. Still we lingered, reluctant to leave the old ruin standing there so lonely. We thought of the eager hands that reared it; the earnest spirits that once worshipped under its roof; the hopes and fears, the doubts and longings to which those walls had listened, and the wearied hearts now forever at rest within its shadows. The sun was just sinking in the west when we reached the turn in the road where we caught our last glimpse of the church standing just as we saw it in the picture, the blue water in the distance, the golden grain touching the brown walls with mute caresses, and the crimson light of the sunset sky over all. We rode home in the gathering twilight, while Psyche said in an undertone:

"No more, no more
The worldly shore
Upbraids me with its loud uproar!
With dreamful eyes,
My spirit lies
Under the walls of Paradise."

SAN FRANCISCO, September, 1878.

1.

A lady in Melbourne, who had advertised for domestic aid, received a call from a pretty maid with unexceptionable references, a pleasing manner, and a willing disposition. The lady was charmed, and engaged her on the spot. "But I have always had a whole day's leave of absence every fortnight," the young girl remarked, pausing on the threshold, "and an evening a week besides." "You shall not be deprived of them," was the encouraging reply. "And this is a very lonely place, ma'am," the girl rejoined, "and I could not come home by myself. Would the master mind coming for me?"

Mr. Edmund Yates writes in the London World: "Amidst the profusion of English laurels which Lord Beaconsfield has received, he may not disdain what Bret Harte, in his memorial lines on Charles Dickens, called 'a spray of Western pine.' The people of California have, it seems, taken a lively interest in the Eastern question, and a movement has been successfully organized by the English inhabitants of the Pacific coast to present to Lord Beaconsfield a costly casket of gold and silver, which is, I am told, a veritable work of art."

All but sixteen of Brigham Young's widows have married. Amelia Folsom, his favorite wife, was jerked to hymen ten days ago.

The soul is never so large and lofty as when its conceptions more than fill a crowd, exceed, transcend it.

"Take any shape but that," as the aeronaut said to the collapsed balloon.

CURIOSITIES OF JOURNALISM.—II.

Many unpleasant mistakes get into newspapers on account of bad manuscript. This has been particularly the case with the New York Tribune in the days gone by. Horace Greeley's manuscript was very bad and was called by his printers "Koran."

When Colonel Forney, in 1859, started the Philadelphia Press, he wrote letters to his paper from Washington, signed "Occasional." In one letter he used the words "Federal Government" seven times, but he abbreviated the word Government thus: "Govt." The little "v" was taken for an "a," and the article made ridiculous in its several allusions to the "Federal Goat."

But one of the most laughable of all the funny mistakes that have appeared in newspapers is traced to the editor of the Wheeling (W. Va.) Intelligencer: This hombre wrote one evening, grandly: "To-day is the anniversary of the death of Louis Philippe." When the proof was sent down stairs the name read "Sam Phillips." The editor thought a mere reference to the mistake would be sufficient, so he inserted a caret after the word Phillips, and wrote on the margin of the proof-sheet, "Who in hell is Sam Phillips?" Next morning the item read as follows: "To-day is the anniversary of the death of Sam Phillips. Who in hell is Sam Phillips?" But the conundrum was never answered.

Some years ago the Galaxy had a short article entitled "Lucky Misprints," which gives some very interesting specimens of typographical blunders and their effects. The article is short, so I will quote it entire:

"Everybody has been 'sold,' it would seem, about Carlyle's 'Liturgy of Dead Sea Apes,' as applied to spiritualism. People exploded with admiration over the phrase, and it ran a wild round of the newspapers. An inquiring creature here and there did perhaps ask of his own soul what 'Liturgy of Dead Sea Apes' meant; what species of ape was peculiar to the Dead Sea, and what was their liturgy. But even these inquirers were too timid to put the question openly, and so it passed into a public law that Carlyle had said something wonderfully clever when he spoke of a Liturgy of Dead Sea Apes. But behold, it now turns out that Carlyle never said any such thing. He wrote 'Dead Sea Apples,' and a bewildered printer made it 'Dead Sea Apes!' * * * The whole story is that of Sidney Smith and the 'kimes' over again. Sidney Smith wrote of some body being 'wounded with knives.' A printer's blunder converted 'knives' into 'kimes,' and the public supposed these latter to be some awful weapons used in foreign torture, and were, therefore, impressed far more profoundly by the story than would otherwise have been possible. We know of another instance of a somewhat similar kind. A journalist had to write an angry editorial about a certain person in Rome being committed to the tender mercies of the 'Papal Gendarmes.' The printers made it 'Papal Zendaives.' The article went around all the newspapers, and 'Papal Zendaives' figured everywhere. One journal actually inserted after the mysterious words a parenthetical line or two, explaining that these Zendaives were 'torturers kept in the Pope's prisons!' Now, the whole effect would surely have been spoiled by an untimely announcement that there are no such beings as Zendaives, and that the awful word was only a misprint for the familiar, commonplace gendarmes. We are, therefore, emphatically for the 'Kimes,' the 'Zendaives,' and the 'Dead Sea Apes.'"

Perhaps the most dreadful and, at the same time, most unpardonable blunder that ever appeared in an American newspaper occurred in the New York Daily Times in 1858. This journal was, in my opinion, the best newspaper in the United States, and admitted by all who are competent to judge as the most perfect sheet, typographically, in the country. It is to-day a marvel of typographical perfection and excellence. At the time I speak of Henry J. Raymond was managing and political editor; Hurlburt, now of the World, and Stewart (at that time lessee of Wallack's Theatre) wrote the European articles; Cordova, the lecturer, had charge of Spain and Cuba; Briggs, then editor of Pulnam's Magazine, Ed. Swinton and Conant were literary editors; Maverick, now of the Evening Post, was city editor; Norvall was the financial editor; Crounse was Washington correspondent; "Podgers" (Dick Ogden) wrote letters from San Francisco; and Webb, William Swinton, and Joe Howard were roving correspondents; "Dick Tinto" (young Goodrich, son of "Peter Parley"), and "Malakoff" (Doctor Johnson, of Ohio), gossiped from Paris, and Mrs. Henry J. Raymond was the resident correspondent at Venice.

During the summer of 1858, Mr. Raymond went to Europe, and left the paper in charge of Briggs as managing editor, and Hurlburt as editor-in-chief. As no positively distinctive line was drawn touching their respective positions, Briggs and Hurlburt had a multiplicity of disgraceful rows as to which should be recognized as the editor, and occupy the private rooms of "Henry J." Hurlburt, however, secured possession of the sanctum key, and at once arrogantly announced himself as cock of that literary walk. Briggs (now dead) modestly acquiesced, although recognized by all the staff as manager. The same day Hurlburt got drunk, and was taken to the Astor House by some friends and quietly "put in his little bed." About midnight of the same day printers, proof-readers, and editors were assembled to make sense out of "a Hurlburt article," in which such words as "quadrilateral squares," "sewers of Pairs," and "elbows of the Mincio," etc., were "mixed up" in inextricable confusion. The deuce was to pay generally throughout the Times establishment. Hurlburt had issued written orders that his copy was "first on the hook," and "never to be left over" under any circumstances. The "forms" were "kept open" until nearly daylight, during which all the clubs and other fashionable resorts had been ransacked in a diligent search for the editor. At three o'clock in the morning "proof sheets" were sent to Mr. Briggs, who perused the same with unmistakable gusto, and then sent word to the foreman that, while the article would make the Times a laughing-stock, according to the instructions of Mr. Hurlburt it must go in. And it did go in, and is considered to this day in New York the most famous blunder in modern journalism. All the daily and weekly papers paid it their respects, and up to the present time, when the Herald wants to say something bitter regarding the Times, it vaguely refers to the "elbows of the Mincio," or to the "sewers of Pairs," and "quadrilateral squares." BEN. C. TRUMAN.

FABLES AND ANECDOTES.

By Little Johnny.

The Thoughtful Stock Raiser' who amused his old Father.—The True Story of the Circus that went Courting, but did not Remain to the Performance.—The Peerless Romance of a Feathered Flap Jack, an Incubation; following, however, the Tale of the Disappointed Dog.—The Author's ungallant Opinion of Crowing Hens, and sincere Admiration of a local Brigadier.—Model Instructions for the Guidance of a Picket Guard, and how they were to Preserve the Peace.—Captain Gipple's memorable Campaign and its Disastrous Result. How Colonel Jackson of the "Evening Post" routed a Regiment of Turtle-doves with one Hand tied behind his Back, and Major-General Lewis begged to be Excused from Replying to a Toast because He is a Man of Action.—With much else that Johnny has Forgotten to Record.

A man wich raised horses for a livin he cos a father wich was so old he cudnt do no werk but jest set in the corner, and mosy a round the farm, and eat his grool like he was sick, but wen Billy my brother was sick he et a pickel cummer and hollerd. So one day the mans naber he said: "Yure poor father was a mity smart, spri man one time, but he is failin fast, wot do you do for to amews him an make the evenin of his days nice for him?"

Then the man he spoke up and sed: "Wel, you know a feller wich owns sech a pile of horses al ways has got some wich is ole and plade out, and noboddy will bi em, and they got to be kil, taint hard work for to shoot em, and I jest let the ole man do that for to ocpie his mind, and make him feel like he was sum account."

Then the other feller said: "How thotfle!"

But ole man aint no boddys fools, I bet, cos once there was a ole man had a girl, and a sojer wich had come home from the war, and was ol over gole braid, and bras buttons, and stripes, and ol kinds of prettys, was a courtin the girl, but the ole man he didn't likim. So the ole man he see his boy Tom a cumin up the wock before the house, and he hollered out, the old man did, loud enough for the sojer feller to hear: "Tom, you go an rig up a spring board reel quick in the back yard, an git a fether bed on the ground, coz we got a vizit from a man wich is a circus, and I spoze he wil be wontin to turn some flip flaps."

But flap jacks is the fellers for me an Billy, and Bildad, thats the new dog, he likes em too, mity wel, I can jest tel you, and one time he seen sum on a plate in the kitchen, bout a duzen in a stack. Bildad he thot no boddys was lookin, and he et em reel quick up like litenin, and evry one wich he swollerd he tost his head up and hunched his back up, like cammlers backs, but they was all et evry bit in jest no time. Then my father, wich is neer sited, cept wen he has got spetticles on, he said to Bildad, my father did: "Serf you rite, you got no bizness for to go round smellin, but, bles my sole, wot cude have been rubbd onto that plate, wich jest one wif cude give a dog sech con vulsions!"

But Bildad he loked up at my father reel incen like, much as to say: "You are mistook, wen I seen this plate I thot mebbey there mite be a flap jack on it, but you see there aint, and wot you call con vulsions was only jest strugs of dizzy-pintment."

Wen Mary, thats the house maid, was tole by my mother to cook sum flap jacks she put a big spoonful of batter onto the griddle, and then she went into the pantry for to git sum thing. And my mother she was rippin up some pillers. So Billy he tuke a hanfle of fethers, and snook out in the kitchen, and put em in the flap jack which was cookin onto the griddle, and you never seen such a lukin flap jack as thatn, no in deed, more like a chickin. Bime by my mother she herd Mary holler, an went in the kitchen for to see wot was up, and Mary she said to mother, Mary did: "O, if you pleese, mam, you have put too much eggs in the batter."

Hens is chickens wich has grode up, but the he feller he is a rooster and croes, but wen there aint no rooster for to cro the ole hen she croes too, for to teech her little he chicks, but sech croun you never seen, jest like Mary, thats the house maid, tryin for to say hip, hip, hooray, like me an Billy wen Gennle MacCobm goes by on his horseback, with his big sawd for to slotter the ennimy.

Wen Mister Gipple was a capten in the war the army be was in was close to the rebble army, and one nite Mister Gipple's cumpany was pickets, but not a picket fence, jest watchmen for to keep the rebbles from sprisin the other fellers. So Mister Gipple he marched his sojers to the place were thay was to watch, and there he was giv his orders, sined by the Gennle as follers, I cote from remember:

"One, the pickets is giv permission to ocpy empty houses on the line.

"Two, if the ennemys pickets is in a house first oun is forbid to disturb em, there is houses anuf for us all.

"Thre, if our pickets gits in any house first, and the ennys pickets cums in aftwards, thay got to be put out.

"Fore, if there aint houses anuf, and both parties stay in the same one, thay got to ocpy sepet rooms, and the ennymus keep theifselfs to theifselfs, and its the duty of the ofsir of the gard to see that the doers is lock by tween.

"Five, no sassin thru the ke hole."

Mister Gipple says one day he was a marchn his sojers for to attack the rebbles, and thay had stop for to spen the night under a tree in a planters yard, and Mister Gipple he sed to the planter, Mister Gipple did: "Here, you feller, yure one of them wich made this war yure ownselfe, now my sojers is jest wore out with wockin, but yure fresh, you got to stan gard wile we sleep, and Ile hole you sponible."

But in the nite the rebbles thay snook up and sroundend em, and shot em all ded, but jest Mister Gipple his single self, wich went back and jined the main body. Then the Gennle, wich was hoptn mad, he sed: "Captn Gipple, you careless feller, you hav let yure selfe be sprised."

Mr. Gipple he sed: "Sprised aint no name for it, Gennle, I was a stonished!"

But if you cude see me and Billy dror our wuden sawords for to attack Uncle Ned wen he comes up the wock you wude say: "Them's the bravest sojers wich ever fot, make em both Majer Gennles and put em in the Custom Hous."

SAN RAFAEL, September 27, 1878.

MEN WHO MAKE STATES.

Also, Men Who Make Mouths.

There are two classes of men that seem to be, more than any others, the subjects of criticism and assault. They are the men who, more than any others, have contributed to the progress and prosperity of the Pacific Coast, and to the building up of a great commercial emporium. We refer to the railroad builders and to the mine operators. Among the railroad builders we embrace the names of Stanford, Huntington, Hopkins, Crocker, Colton, Latham, Donahue, Mills, Davis, Newhall, Wilson, and others. Among the mine men we number Flood, O'Brien, Mackay, Fair, Hayward, Jones, Sharon, Baldwin, Sherwood, Lent, Morrow, Skae, Graves, and others, all of whom have been successful in their operations, all of whom have achieved great fortunes, and all of whom have from time to time been subjected to assault from the press, and seem to have been the subjects of great popular detestation. We should be humiliated if compelled to make the confession that all this contumely is the result of jealousy, and all these unkind animadversions come from motives not dictated by any consideration for the public good, or restrained by any respect for truth. It is popular to assault rich men just now. The moral influence of the sand-lot is in the ascendancy, and abroad in the land there is a general disposition to embrace all successful and money making enterprises in the catagory of monopolies, and to arraign all wealthy men as oppressors and tyrants. The unthinking masses are easily led astray by the shallow reasoning of the demagogue who wields a facile pen or easy-wagging tongue. Energy, enterprise, sagacity, and industry are put forth for the purpose of making money. It is an evidence that the successful business man possesses these qualifications for success. If we allow ourselves to denounce the man of wealth, do we not to that extent condemn the exercise of the faculties we have enumerated? We applaud all business rivalries, and we regard every industrial enterprise as worthy of encouragement, yet where the enterprise fruits in success we pounce down upon the man who has achieved it as an enemy to society. The railroad builders have taken nothing from this community, but have done that which has largely contributed to its prosperity. If they have obtained national subsidies they have expended them in our midst, and given us a railroad system that enriches us and extends our commercial jurisdiction. Every line of road that reaches northward to Oregon, eastward to Nevada, or southward to Arizona, gives us the trade of the locality to which it is built. If our railroad system shall push itself to Puget Sound, to Idaho, to the Gulf of Mexico, it will centralize in our harbor of San Francisco the business of all this vast area, and bring to us the commerce of eastern nations. In view of what the railroad builders are accomplishing for our city and coast, all the complaints of unjust fares and freights, of discriminations against localities, seem but insignificant and puerile. If the interest is not paid on the Government bonds, if the reserve does not accumulate to meet the obligations falling due in another decade, let Maine and Florida complain, let the next generation find fault, but let the business men of California and of to-day hold their tongues. If the mines of the Sierra had been left to conservative men, to newspaper editors, to those who do not gamble in stocks, to those who expend their energies in scolding the successful, in finding fault with the adventurous, there would have been no mining in California or Nevada; on the exhaustion of the placer diggings the miners would have gone home, or turned their attention to farming. We are not prepared to say that mines are desirable; we are not altogether convinced that California would not have been in a more healthy condition if gold had been exhausted in ten years after its discovery; but if mines are desirable, if it is well to work them, if it is well that hundreds of millions of gold and silver should have been extracted from the hills and put into circulation to infuse new life into the commerce and industries of the world, let us not withhold from the stock exchange and the gamblers in mining shares testimony of the influence they have had in producing these results. The great fissure of the Comstock would to-day have been but a furrow along the line of Mount Davidson if it had not been for the adventurous gamblers of our stock exchange. It was their daring and their courage that called the turn from the lower levels, and produced bonanzas from the very heart of the earth. It was the unenterprising and the cowardly who sat by and copped the game, and when it was won they could only scowl and scold that they had not dared the hazard of the deal. We might write homilies upon the evils of stock gambling; we have done so. There has been, and is, fraud in the manipulation of mines. We wish that everybody were as open, as honorable, and as generous in the conduct of mines and stock operations as editors are in the conduct of their journals; but this is of course impossible, as only the best men own newspapers. We wish that poor people, men and women, would keep from stock gambling, but they won't. We see the buoyant, flushed countenances on the street when stocks are up, and we wish everybody would sell, but they won't. We see the pale faces of despondent wretches clutching at straws to save them from drowning when the market turns, and we are sorry for them. We are sorry to see mechanics, workmen, clerks, servants, putting their accumulations upon the wrong card, and trying in vain to guess where the little joker lies, and risking their homesteads and bank accounts in their endeavor to put their finger into the right loop of the string game. But they will do it; everybody does it—preachers and godly men, business men and workmen. A negro barber in the country cut the writer's ear last week in his excitement about Sierra Nevada. We are sorry people will gamble, but the result of it is a system of mining on our Eastern Sierra that exceeds anything the world has ever witnessed: the extraction of millions upon millions of the precious metals, the encouragement of great enterprises, the employment of thousands of laborers, mechanics, merchants, and artisans, the building up of San Francisco; and it is at this point that our philosophy comes in. We look around our city, and mark the costly commercial blocks, the splendid buildings, the elegant and palatial dwellings; we note our busy foundries and machine shops, our thriving merchants; we observe the splendid equipages driven in our parks, and we see the result of mine working and stock gambling, and we say to ourselves, if anybody is justified in moralizing over the sin of gambling in mining stocks, it is not we of San Francisco. We are reaping the advantage of all this wickedness—so let the wickedness go on. Personally, we do not deal in stocks. It is not virtue; it is cowardice. When stocks are down we lack the courage: when stocks are up we lack the coin. We would gamble if we were certain we would win; hence our modesty in writing homilies upon the sin of stock gambling. We should like a pass over all the railroads; we wish some one would carry us in stocks. We would exchange money with any of the gentlemen we have named, and with their coin take all the sins of its accumulation; but then we agree with Canon Farrar and Henry Ward Beecher: we do not believe there is any hell.

All About Women.

A Spanish woman walks in the Paris boulevards leading a dove with a ribbon.

A Boston girl spoke of Lord Beaconsfield's new honor as the "order of the elastic."

One of Queen Victoria's carriages has a seat that rocks with the motion of the vehicle.

One of the few remaining vivandières of Napoleon Bonaparte's armies died lately in Milan, aged ninety-nine. She went through the campaigns in Russia and Spain without a scratch.

Eleven thousand women are telegraph operators in Great Britain, and it is said that generally they keep the secrets intrusted to them except when they know some of the parties concerned.

Charlotte Thompson is mildly acting in Nova Scotia. Charlotte is suffering from nervous prostration brought on by an inconsiderate brute of an author who offered her a new play.

The newest styles in ladies' finger nails is to wear them long and sharp pointed, resembling claws. The ladies who have adopted the fashion look as though they had to scratch for a living.

Spanking a baby in a rude or angry manner renders a mother liable to prosecution for assault and battery, according to the decision of a justice in Lafayette, Indiana, who remembers his own sainted mother.

A woman in Ludington, Michigan, shot and killed a neighbor's pet bear that strayed into her house. On the following night she sent a bullet into a burglar who entered by the same door, which is still unfastened.

The Baltimore Gazette says, editorially, of Mrs. Hayes: "As an elegant, refined, matronly woman, she is far superior to Mr. Hayes." Of course she is. As a woman, Mr. Hayes is not to be compared with his wife.

In Spain there appears to be a fashion in grave clothes, amongst the higher classes especially. The young Queen expressed her wish, when dying, to be buried in the habit of the Nuns of "Vierge de las Mercedès."

A fashionable young lady, by accident, dropped one of her false eyebrows into her opera box and greatly frightened her beau, who, upon seeing it, was very much shocked, under the impression that it was his moustache.

A man may sneer at a woman all he will because she can't sharpen a lead pencil, but she has the smile on him when he stands holding an unoccupied suspender button in his hand, and wondering whether it will hurt less to pull the needle out of his thumb the same way it went in, or push it on through.

If the Sultan notices one of the girls about his palace or in the seraglio, even so much as to say to somebody else that "she is a pretty girl," the damsel is at once promoted to a "guienzde," has a certain revenue, and a suite of apartments. A Sultan's smile is also indication of promotion, and has a certain rank in it for the recipient.

Sarah Bernhardt, the famous Parisian actress, has made the discovery of a new cure for delicate lungs and health. She passes hours now daily in successive ascensions in the ballon captif of the Tuileries gardens, finding more and more healing for her shattered health and delicate lungs, as well as general reinvigoration, the higher she rises.

"The number of women here," writes a Parisian correspondent, "who wear moustaches is astonishingly large. I scarcely ever go into the streets without meeting several fine moustaches worn on feminine lips, and I have in a crowd, just for amusement, counted up the hairy adornments, including chin whiskers as well, upon the ladies, and the total number in sight frequently exceeded fifty!"

Among the young ladies who sat at the receipt of custom in a Western church fair, and retailed kisses at the nominal value of ten cents each, was a vinegar-visaged old maid, who had crowded herself in on the gauzy pretense that she felt it her duty to do her share toward helping along the good cause. But she could have earned just as much by staying away from there and making tating at ten cents the hundred yards.

Miss Jeannette Bennett, the sister of James Gordon Bennett, was married on the 19th instant to Mr. Isaac Bell, Jr., at Newport. Mrs. Bell is one of the beautiful and accomplished "sweet girl graduates" of the Convent of the Sacred Heart. She is amongst the last of her schoolfellows to mate—some are married and some are dead—but she is not forgotten, and many heartfelt prayers for her happiness ascended from the cloisters on the heights above the Hudson.

At a recent fire in Sandusky a young lady in ball costume seeing the men did not take hold to extinguish the flames by forming a bucket-line (no engines being present) seized a bucket and made one, for an example. And she kept on working, passing the buckets as steadily and quickly as any one, looking like an angel of light in her pretty party dress and her diamonds glistening in the light of the burning building. Her name—pass it along—we have not forgotten.

THE CRYSTAL BELL.

A Traveler's Story.

It was in a country tavern; and I sat in the bar-room for lack of something better to do. Heaven knows there was little enough to amuse one in that dreary temple of Bacchus. There were five newspapers—the newest a month old—lying on the table. I knew every advertisement in them. There was a picture of the favorite Presidential candidate hanging over the fire-place, which, if it at all resembled the gentleman in question, entitled him to a glass case in a museum of curiosities rather than to a chair in the White House. A book for registering names lay on a sort of desk in the corner, but since my arrival the pages, though dated, were destitute of a single new comer's name. Apple-jack, bad gin, blazing brandy, and wicked whisky, in bottles of eccentric colors, filled a glass press behind a counter which, by courtesy, was called a bar; and behind this stood a wooden image, by courtesy a landlord.

When a man has no books and no acquaintance at a country tavern, he is apt to fall back on the landlord. I have met, in my time, very amusing landlords—landlords who could talk to you about fishing and shooting and politics, and perhaps retail to you some of the gossip of the neighborhood; for it is wonderful how a man in the strait in which I then found myself will find amusement in the doings of people he knows nothing about. But the landlord of the Hotscotch House was not to be relied upon in such an emergency. You were not to take any such liberties with him, sir, let me tell you. He took you into his house, as it were, under protest. He gave you a bed with an air which seemed to say he regretted doing it, but still did not like to refuse; and you ate your dinner before him in fear and trembling, lest he should reconsider his hospitality, and order you out of the house.

Whether it was a natural inflexibility of joints, or whether it was a high sense of personal dignity, I do not know; but certainly General Piper, the landlord of the only hotel in the village of Hotscotch, was the most dignified man I ever saw. The halo which he threw around a glass of whisky and water was perfectly wonderful. You might have imagined you were drinking "Green Seal," to judge by the lofty expression of his countenance as he handed you the bottle. At the dinner table he fairly awed the appetite out of one; and I shall never, as long as I live, forget the thunder-cloud which gathered on his brow when, one day, I unluckily asked to be helped twice to soup. He was especially great in referring to the privileges connected with the Hotscotch House. What these privileges consisted of he alone knew, for I never experienced any nor knew of any one who had. In personal appearance the General was of ordinary stature, rather stout, and with a visage nearer resembling wood than anything I ever beheld.

As I was saying, I sat in the bar-room. General Piper stood behind the bar, counting the contents of the till with Olympian dignity. Quarter dollars seemed to become thunderbolts in his hands. I was very weary—very of Hotscotch; weary of Piper; weary of the Presidential candidate over the mantel-piece, who seemed to have been born with a patch of strawberries on each cheek; weary of the old newspapers; weary of everything, except the memory of my little sweetheart to whom I was engaged and on whose account I had left New York and immured myself, in mid-winter, at the Hotscotch House, in order, before our marriage, to settle some matters connected with my property, which lay near Hotscotch. I yawned in the very teeth of General Piper.

The door opened ere my teeth closed again, and a man entered. Shaking off the snow that lay in thick flakes on his coat, he advanced to the wood-fire that blazed and crackled on the broad hearth, and spread out his hands to the cheering warmth. He was a very seedy-looking man. He had but one coat on—an old threadbare evening coat—which was tenderly buttoned across a chest that seemed afraid to breathe too hastily lest it should burst the frail buttons. His shoes were old and soaked; his trousers wet and very scanty, shrinking from contact with his shoes as if he had not had a dinner in his stomach, nor a cent in his pocket, for a very long time. As he entered, the General raised his head from the till and glared sternly at him. I saw the poor man cower a little; but presently he seemed to muster up sufficient courage to go to the bar.

"May I have a bed here to-night?" he asked, in a timid voice.

"Full, sir, full!" said the General, frowning until his old eyebrows fairly creaked; "besides, we seldom have accommodations for strangers."

The poor man gave a glance at his threadbare coat and smiled; but oh, how sad that smile!

"It is a very bad night," he said, pleadingly, "and I am not particular where I sleep; anywhere will do for me."

Unphilosophical stranger! A worse plan than a confession of heedlessness of comfort could not have been adopted to win the General's favor. If he had blustered up to the bar and shouted for a bed of roseleaves with every leaf ironed out, the majestic Piper might have overlooked the seedy coat; but not to care where he slept—that settled him.

"Sorry, sir, but can't accommodate you;" and with this brief intimation the Jove of Hotscotch recommenced making the quarter dollars to look like thunderbolts.

The stranger sighed, looked wistfully at the bright fire, gave another hopeless glance at the wooden Piper, and then moved slowly to the door. It was more than I could stand. Olympus had no terrors for me at that moment.

"Stay!" I said, advancing from the obscure corner in which I had been seated: "stay, sir, for a moment. The weather is too inclement for any human being to wander in at night. I have not the pleasure of knowing who you are, but there are two beds in my room, and I esteem it my duty to offer you one of them. Pray accept it."

I almost lost the murmured words by which the seedy man thanked me for my offer in consideration of General Piper's countenance. I never before beheld such a picture of astounded dignity. My heart sank after my speech was fairly out, for I really expected nothing short of being turned out myself; and, what is more, I believe that I should have gone.

The General gasped.

"Is Mr. Prince aware that the privileges of this house are reserved for its guests, and not for outsiders?"

"I can't help it," said I, speaking firmly, but with trembling limbs; "I intend having my own way in this matter?"

"Very well," said the General.

For the first time the truth burst upon me that the General was not so awful as he looked, and that by the aid of a little resolution he might even be reduced to the position of a landlord. I plucked up courage from this supposed discovery, and, having opened the breach, pushed on.

"I want some supper, General Piper!" said I, peremptorily.

"Sir, you have had your supper," answered the General, clutching madly at the last rag of his importance that was being torn so ruthlessly from him.

"No matter, I wish to sup again. I sometimes sup frequently during an evening."

I was reckless with victory, and began to talk wildly.

"You shall be served, sir."

And the General abdicated his thunderbolts and disappeared into the kitchen. I had conquered. A hand was laid gently upon my shoulder, and the stranger now spoke audibly to me for the first time.

"I am very much obliged to you," he said, "for all this kindness; but if, in getting this supper, you put yourself to inconvenience on my account, may I beg you will countermand the order?"

"Not at all," I replied, diplomatically; "but, since you have reminded me of it, perhaps you will favor me by joining in the meal—that is, if you have not already supped!"

"I have not," he answered, with a feeble smile. "I see through your ruse," he added, "and to a gentleman who can act as generously as you have done, I feel little shame in confessing that it was because I had no money."

"Come, come!" said I, trying to bluster away those confounded tears that always will get in my eyes when I hear such things; "come, we'll have a jolly good supper together, and then we'll talk of business matters afterward. Let us sit up by the fire until it is ready, and, meanwhile, drink this."

So saying, I invaded the General's Olympian domains, and, pouring out a stiff horn of applejack, forced it upon my new friend. It did him good, I am certain, for I saw the dim eyes brighten, and the cheeks flush, and it was not the firelight that did it, cheery as it was.

I never met a more delightful man than this seedy stranger. He had been everywhere, seen everything, done everything, knew everybody. He was a finished scholar, an original thinker and critic, a delightful singer, an epitome of wit. He so fascinated me that we sat up in my room until almost twelve—an unearthly hour in Hotscotch, where the people go to roost with the chickens—and it never once entered my head to ask him why he was wandering about in the snow without any money. I even went to bed without securing my valuables.

It was the gray dawn of morning when some one sitting on my bedside awoke me suddenly. I started upright in an instant and beheld my friend. He was completely dressed, and in the dim light seemed like a departing ghost. For a moment, in the incoherence of my senses, I had a confused idea that he was about to rob me, and seized him instinctively by the arm.

"Don't be alarmed," he said, with a smile. "I intended to awake you; and, before I went—for I am going now—I wished to thank you for your extreme kindness to me. God bless you for it! I have but little to offer you in the way of return. Here is a crystal bell," and he drew a tiny glass bell from his pocket—a thing like a child's toy. "It was forged in distant lands, and, while in the furnace, its maker sang over it the spells known only to the children of the East. It is the touchstone of truth. Whoever utters a falsehood to him who bears it, on that moment the bell will vibrate. Scoff at the story now, if you will, but try the talisman. It will never betray you. Farewell!"

And, laying the little bell upon the counterpane, before I could collect my scattered senses, he glided to the door and went out, closing it softly after him.

I took up the bell mechanically and examined it. It was entirely formed of what seemed to be the purest crystal. The tongue was also of crystal and as flexible as the finest watch-spring. I tried to ring it; but although the ball at the end of the pendant tongue visibly struck the clear sides of the bell, it did not emit the slightest sound. I tried it again and again but always with the same result.

I arose and looked for my watch. It was safe. My pockets were untouched and my valuables intact. My seedy friend, therefore, was not an imposter. Again I returned to the mysterious bell and shook its crystal tongue—but in vain. Not even a muffled tinkling was to be drawn from it. Had the pendulum been a feather it could not have been more silent.

All day long I felt wretchedly uncomfortable with the crystal bell in my pocket. I scarcely answered the sneering inquiries after my seedy friend with which General Piper assailed me. I scarcely took the trouble to inform him that I had not been robbed. I was indifferent to the display which he made of counting his spoons in my presence. The last words of my mysterious guest rang continually in my ears: "Whoever utters a falsehood in your presence, on that moment the crystal bell will vibrate."

Annie Gray! Why was it that your face continually rose up before me whenever I touched the magic bell? Whenever I drew it forth and looked through its crystal walls, why was it that your countenance seemed dimly visible within, but always clouded with some horrible shadow? And, when I thought of you, why did the name of that hateful George Smithson always flicker in sparkling letters before my mind's eye?

I suffered positive agony. Here was I, engaged to be married to one of the sweetest girls in all New York, beloved by her to my heart's content, and rich enough to satisfy her every whim; when in comes a stranger, who puts into my hands what he calls a talisman for testing truth, and straightway I began to doubt the dear girl whom I had never doubted before. Did she really love me? The more I tried to conquer this abominable phantasy of jealousy, the more positive it became, until at last I had worked myself into such a fever of excitement that I could bear the suspense no longer. Yes, I would instantly hurry to New York and test this wondrous gift. It was folly—madness. I knew that well enough, but still I would test it, and test it all the more willingly because I had such faith in Annie. But why did she encourage that empty daody, George Smithson?

In less than two hours I was in New York, ringing madly at Annie Gray's door. As I hastily entered the room, out walked Mr. Smithson. We smiled coldly; but I could have strangled him where he stood.

I must have been rather pale and disorderly looking, for I had hardly entered the room when Annie's first words were:

"O Howard! has anything happened?"

Dear girl! how could any one but a madman doubt that anxious, fond look, that quivering lip? I kissed her forehead and reassured her.

"Annie, dear! Why do you have that Mr. Smithson here in my absence? You know I don't like him."

"Why, Howard, I really can not help it if he does call. I don't care about his visits, I assure you; but I cannot be rude to him, I have known him so long."

Gracious heavens! was it fancy? or did I really hear a faint crystalline tinkling in my pocket? A cold shiver ran through my frame; but I endeavored to dissemble my agony, and with a forced smile, went on:

"So you really don't like him, you little puss? Come, now; confess that at one time you did care a little—a very little—for Smithson, your old playmate."

"Why, what ails you, Howard? you look so queer! I assure you I never cared anything for Mr. Smithson."

Tinkle! tinkle! tinkle! in my pocket. I felt the blood rush to my head. It was a Niagara of emotion; but I endured it.

"And you love me, then, better than any bobby else—better, even, than the old school-fellow you have known so long?"

"How foolish you are, Howard! Of course I do!" and she kissed me gently.

Tinkle! tinkle! tinkle! in my pocket—plain, clear, distinct. Every vibration of the crystal bell thrilled me to the marrow. If the bells of all the cathedrals in the world had pealed together in my ear, they could not have moved me half so much as that sharp, shrill, crystal ringing of that tiny bell.

I could bear it no longer.

"Traitor!" I shouted, flinging away the tender arms that encircled my neck; "hypocrite! I despise you! Yes, madam! the eyes of your dupe were opened in time."

"Howard, are you mad?"

"Not quite; though a week after our marriage I would have been, imposter that you are! But I know you now—know that you do not love me—know that you have lied to me three times since I've been here."

She tried to embrace me, but I flung her off. She wrung her hands, the big tears rolling down her cheeks, while her gentle head bent as if stricken with some great blow. She acted her part excellently well.

"What do mean, Howard? I have never deceived you in thought or word. If you have proof of my hypocrisy, advance them; but do not storm me down with assertions."

"My proofs are here!" I cried, holding up the bell in triumph—the triumph of despair. "Here! look on this talisman, basest of women, and tremble!"

"But, Howard, are you sane? I see nothing but this bell."

"And this bell, as you call it, has told me that you are a worthless woman."

One tigress-like leap, and she caught it from my hand. With flaming eyes she held it aloft, and then dashed it to the ground.

A crash like the bursting of a thousand bombs; a thundering of great bells, that seemed to shake the world, and—looking up I saw General Piper standing over me in a dignified attitude.

"Mr. Prince," said he, "the dinner bell has been ringing these ten minutes; but you appear to have been sleeping so soundly as not to have heard it. Dinner waits."

And so it was a dream! No seedy friend, no talisman, no falsehood in sweet Annie Gray.

I rubbed my eyes and went in to dinner; but as I ate my soup under the awful eye of the General, I confess I regretted the non-reality of that portion of my dream in which I had subdued the thunderer of the tavern.

I never told Annie Gray that I had ever doubted her, even in a dream, until we had been a month married.

SANTA BARBARA, September 20, 1878.

H. B. P.

Singular Suicides.

In the year 1500, William Dorrington threw himself from the parapet of the Church of St. Sepulchre, in London, leaving behind him a note, stating as his reason, "that he wanted to go to the opera that night but had not money enough to purchase a ticket of admission."

A farmer in Allendale, England, got a gun barrel, loaded it, and placed the stock end in a hot fire, and leaned his stomach against the other. The barrel soon became hot, and exploded, killing the unfortunate wretch instantly.

A blacksmith in New Orleans, in 1841, killed himself in the same manner, blowing his bellows until the fire was hot enough to explode the gun barrel.

A young lady at a boarding school, in England, drowned herself in a rain cask, because she was made to study from an old book. She was "sweet sixteen."

A Greenwich, England, pensioner, who was put upon short allowance for misconduct, in 1846, sharpened the ends of his spectacles, and with them stabbed himself to the heart.

In a French newspaper of 1862, we find an account of a man who, his wife having proved unfaithful to him, called his valet, and informed him that he was about to kill himself, and requested that he would boil him down, and make a candle of his fat, and carry it to his mistress, handing her at the same time the following note: "Dearest Therese:—I have long burned for you, and I now prove to you that my flames are real. Yours, PIERRE."

A young lady, nineteen years of age, having gambled away a large fortune, hung herself at Bath, England, with a gold and silver girdle. The following note was found in her hand: "Thus I tie myself up from play!" This was worthy of a French woman!

George Augustus Sala quotes the man who imagined mors omnibus was Latin for a hearse; but an equally good story, and of a cognate kind, is that of the man who translated Père la Chaise into "the governor's four-wheeler."

SECTARIAN SCHOOLS.

The Reverend Father T. N. Burke, an eloquent priest of the Catholic Church, delivered at Bray Parish, Ireland, July 28th, a sermon in aid of parochial schools, extracts from which we herewith publish. We do this in accordance with our purpose of making the ARGONAUT the vehicle of independent thought upon leading topics. That we are in favor of secular, and opposed to sectarian, teaching in our public schools is no reason for withholding so able and eloquent an argument as we think this to be—we mean, of course, able from the Catholic standpoint. The text of this discourse is St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans, 6th chapter:

"To whom does the apostle speak all these words of accusation? Who were they whom this inspired man described as being so enslaved and so degraded? We might, perhaps, imagine, and naturally, that he was speaking to some savage tribe—untutored, uneducated, wallowing in their vices, because they were steeped in ignorance, and knew no better. We can imagine such words as these addressed to some barbarians of the North—to the wild, unclothed Scythians. But no, my dearly beloved, it was not to the savage, nor to the uneducated and uncivilized man; it was not to a race or nation of barbarians that the apostle addressed these words. It was to the Roman people, and at a time and in an epoch when Rome—pagan Rome—had attained to the very climax of its civilization, of its education, and its intellectual glory. Now, reflect upon this. The Augustan era had dawned; it was yet in the full blaze of its intellectual splendor; never was education so widely spread abroad; never was art and science so highly cultivated. The Coliseum of Rome, newly built, was yet shining fresh from the masons' hand in all the unrivaled splendor and majesty of its proportion. The arch of Titus was about to be raised, whose simple, tasteful grandeur impresses the eye of the most refined and civilized traveler of our own day; the Palatine Hill of Rome was being covered with the splendors of the grandest palace that ever the hand of man reared—the golden house of Nero; and in the midst of all this intellectual splendor, whilst Rome was listening enchanted to the strains of her poets—to the glorious measures of Virgil, to the shrewd philosophy embodied in acutest verse of Horace; while the newly-composed pages of her greatest historian, Titus Livius, was enchanting the eyes of all who read them; while the wealth and civilization of the East and ancient Greece was pouring itself into Rome, which, risen above mere material glory, had come to appreciate intellectual splendor: in the midst of all this stands the rugged Apostle, speaking to this highly educated people, and he says: "You have knowledge indeed, but you have not God in your knowledge; you have education indeed, but you have not the higher knowledge in your education. God has given you up to a reprobate sense; you are the slave of sin; you have yielded the very members of your body, as well as the powers of your soul, to uncleanness, and to working iniquity unto iniquity; you are the bondsmen of hell." What does all this prove? What conclusions are we to draw from this deliberate indictment, brought by a man inspired by the Holy Ghost, against this refined and highly educated people? It is this, dearly beloved, that man may be educated, he may be instructed in every law of nature, every mysterious force and power at work in this material world may be made known to him, and laid open before him. The very constellations of heaven may lose the mystery with which vastness and distance surrounds them, the earth may be sounded to its deepest depths, the sea may be investigated into its lowest abysses, every element of knowledge may be called forth, every fountain of education may be opened, and if but one thing be absent—namely, the knowledge of God—all the education and refinement will only make a man worse, instead of making him better; will leave him still under the thrall and slavery of his reprobate senses and wicked passions; all the education will fail to purify the blood in his corrupt veins; all the education will fail to provide him with one vivifying principle, with one purifying element; and, therefore, with all his knowledge, but without God, he stands a fool and a slave in the presence of the Lord God who made him; unfit for the highest purposes of life, unfit entirely for the society for which he was created—that of the angels and the saints in the kingdom of the living God. We are assembled here to-day for the highest and greatest purpose which can bring us together, namely, to take thought for a great question, and to make provision for a great want that exists in all Christian society—the Catholic, Christian, and godly education of the children of our people. It is a grave question, occupying every mind of the present day. It is a great question, fiercely assailed and as stoutly defended. It is the question of questions in senate-house, in church, and in state. It is the question upon which philosopher and statesman, priest and bishop alike are united in this—that the future of the people depends upon it. All agree that a people uneducated is a people vainly created; that education is the first, the primary, the most necessary want of man; that without it life is robbed of nearly all its sweetness and more than half its efficacy; that a man uneducated sinks to the level of the brute and beneath it; and if that man is ever to be raised from this degrading ignorance, he can only be raised up to the enjoyment of his intellectual, spiritual, and moral life by the blessing of education and instruction. On this all are agreed, that it is the great question on which the Catholic Church stands alone on one side, and the whole world with all its power and influence is arrayed against her on the other side. The great question, the great battlefield, on which this great warfare is being fought out every day is: what manner of education shall the children of our people receive? The worldly-minded, the philosopher who knows not God, the statesman who has only his own political aims in view, the false-minded and traitorous Catholic who, from indolence or perversity, refuses to give to this question the consideration it deserves, refuses to join in this battle with the enthusiasm of the Son of God. These men say that education in human knowledge alone brings with it such a refining influence, opens and expands the minds so by knowledge, raises and develops, and strengthens the intellectual faculties of man; that this alone suffices for the future well-being of the child. Is this proposition true? If it is, I have no business whatever to stand in this pulpit before you to-day; I have not an inch of ground to stand upon. I have no argument to put before you; I have no reason to ask you to put your hands in your pockets and to help your parish priest in the peculiar kind of instruction which he is bound to provide for the children of this parish. Is this proposition true? Ah! my brethren, let us consider what is that child that mentally now stands before us and clamors for his right of education; what is that child? Man is made up of two distinct natures, the material or bodily, and the intellectual, spiritual, angelic element of the soul, that is within him—the material nature in man is represented by the body, and the spiritual element represented by the soul; one is created for time to wither away at the breath of death, to descend once more into meanness and corruption from which it was brought forth by the creative voice of God; yet still the bodily nature possesses crude faculties, strong passions, decisive and overwhelming inclinations, and all these tending to that which is gross and earthly, defiling and sinful. The spiritual element of the soul in man has its life like the body, but it is an immortal life that never can perish. The breath of death that kills the body only lets forth the soul in all the fullness of its freedom as a disembodied spirit to go out into that eternity which is so congenial to it. This soul in its turn is made up not only of the intelligence of the mind, but there is also in it the affective power, or spirit, as it is called—the seat of love, the seat of affection, the seat of its desires. There is, moreover, in this soul the still higher attribute of freedom of will, by which it can determine itself either for heaven or for hell—either for God and virtue or for sin and the devil. Now, the purpose of education is to meet the wants of this soul of man. The education which the philosopher and the statesman proposes to give all falls into the intellect; the intellect—which is one, and only one, of the powers of the soul—is, strictly speaking, the seat of knowledge. Knowledge alone, no matter how clearly imparted, no matter how deep its research, no matter how extensive in its range—knowledge alone merely forms and informs the intelligence in man. Knowledge alone cannot touch his heart; knowledge alone cannot influence his will; knowledge can only make him clever—can only make him learned—can only make him instructed. When it has done that, it has done all. And when the system propounded by the statesman and the philosopher has done all that it can do, it leaves that heart as untouched, it leaves that will as unrestrained, as if that man had never received one single element of education. Now, I ask you, is this education—is this training of the soul—that only touches one of its faculties, that only instructs and enlarges one of its powers? Is this a bringing forth all these glorious faculties? Ah! let us understand the nature of man. It is not by his intelligence only that he operates upon his fellow-man; it is not by his intelligence only that he lives. Even in our ordinary mode of speaking we look for much more than mental cleverness and intelligence in those with whom we associate; we prize much more other gifts than the mere gift of knowledge. It is the faculties, fully developed, of the heart and of the will, that produce the moral effect upon a man's life. Knowledge, however varied and however profound, gives no real vivifying influence. It may establish barren principles, but there is no strength of will to carry them out—there is no tenderness of a pure heart to love them. Some of the greatest philosophers of antiquity were the most degraded and the most vicious of men. Even in our own day, it is not mere knowledge that the world stands in need of. We have abundance of intellectual light; but what we want is the power to make a man chaste, the power that makes a man honest, the power that makes a man dutiful and kind to his aged parents—the grace that makes a man a faithful friend, a reliable servant, a trustworthy companion. These are the faculties that we demand. It is upon these that we live in our communion with each other; these are the things that make life pleasant and sweet, that lighten its burdens and enhance its joys; and these are the things that no knowledge alone can supply. Therefore, the system of education that says: "Let us exclude that which will purify the heart, that which will rectify and strengthen the will, that which will influence a man in the practical dealings of his mortal life—let us exclude these and confine ourselves to the mere instruction of his intellect;" that system is in itself not only deficient, but it is false in principle, for it is a practical and impious denial of the higher and better faculties in the soul of man. What wonder, then, that whilst the world glories in intellectual excellence alone, that whilst men boast of their scientific success, that whilst the man of the nineteenth century imagines that he is a god—because he can summon the lightning from heaven and make it the messenger of his thoughts unto the ends of the earth in one moment of time, because the sea has no longer any mysteries from him, because the earth has been sounded to its deepest depths by him, because the stars of heaven, even those for distant ages hid to man, are now like an open book for him, because he can analyze the air he breathes and weigh the sunbeam that falls upon him—he fancies he is a god; for all this, he fancies it is all in all. But beside him stands the Church of God, the Catholic Church, and says: "You have only begun the work of education; you know nothing about it in its highest interpretation; you are only a pedagogue; you can only read into the dome of the human soul. There is that within which you can never reach; there is that heart, oh! so strong for good or evil; there is that soul, so omnipotent in its power even of resisting Almighty God, if it only chooses, in the fatal attribute of its magnificent freedom. I alone," says the Church of God, "can educate. God alone can do it, and God works through me. The grace of God must touch that heart in order to keep it pure and purify it; the grace of God, operating through faith and love, must show to that young soul of the child, whom you pretend to educate, higher beauties than those of earth—that he may love them, higher duties than you can suggest—that he may fulfill them. The grace of God alone can so strengthen that heart against its own weakness that every unruly passion will be subdued, every inordinate affection chastened." The man that is thus reared up will grow as a child of God until in the maturity of his education Christ Jesus the Lord will be revealed to him. The Church says to the statesman, and these men, "there is in that child a free will, and out of that free will must come every motive that ever is to guide him in life, every virtue that ever he is to practice, every duty that ever he is to fulfill, everything that is moral and pure and good in him, even for the purposes of the world, even for those social, domestic, and civic things for which you pretend to educate him; you can not do it because in all these relations he must act through his will, and not through his intelligence; and you can not touch that will. God alone can do it. God's grace alone can determine it, God alone can put by divine faith and by grace and charity sufficiently strong motives to determine that free will to God rather than to the evil to which he is naturally inclined. Give me, therefore, the child, the Church says, "give me the child, suffer him to come to me, I only can open the arms of Jesus Christ, who said: 'Suffer the little children to come to me, for of such is the kingdom of Heaven.' I alone can keep him in the grace of his baptismal innocence; I only can bring out these graces in the full maturity of his glorious, immortal, and spiritual manhood; I alone can bring out the graces in the man. Give him to me, and all that the world can teach his intellect I will give him, as well as at the same time hand in hand with the growth of his mind will grow his heart unto love and his will unto virtue." Which of these two systems is the true one? Oh, my friends, there are a great many mysteries in this enlightened and advanced age of ours; there are a great many strange things that we see, and for which we find it extremely difficult to account, but the greatest mystery of all, and the strangest thing of all, is that an unprejudiced man can not see, looking into his own nature and examining in himself and his fellow-men, that the Catholic Church alone understands the meaning of the word "Education." Yes, they would fain give us knowledge, and only knowledge; they would fain send home the child just educated enough to despise his father and mother for their lack of the knowledge which he enjoys without the stern voice of conscience saying to him: "Honor them in their simplicity; honor them even in their ignorance." "Honor thy father and thy mother, that thy days may be not cut off, but may be long in the land of the Lord thy God in Heaven." They will send us home our children educated, indeed, with wits sharpened and intellect enlightened, for what purpose—for purposes of self, and only self. They will send us home those bright intelligences with no better idea of success, no better object in life, than to live for themselves, to centre around their own selfish passions, to provide for their own pleasures and enjoyment, to cater for their own desires, to make this life charming and pleasant to themselves, no matter at what expense to others. The wife may break her heart, the father and mother may go down with gray hairs steeped in sorrow to the grave, society may suffer, employers may be plundered, laws may be violated. The commonest privileges dictated by the reason of man may be overturned and triumphantly denied, as they are by the highly educated, but irreligiously educated man of the nineteenth century—all must yield, God in Heaven, society upon earth—all must be sacrificed upon the altar of self, for this man, highly educated, but unrestrained, has never been taught to worship a higher God than his own inclinations. Who will deny that this is the bitter fruit born of the education without religion of this age? Who will deny it? Who sees the strange principles of Communism and Socialism, the rebellion against all authority, the utter scornful rejection of all law, the murderous hatred of emperors and rulers, and those who represent law and authority, to whom, in the language of the scripture, God has entrusted the sword upon this earth, that they may keep the law and enforce its observance. Who can deny witnessing all this, seeing whole nations perverted by these principles of mere selfishness, that education without religion is no education at all; that it gives a man power, because knowledge is power, I grant you, but power to be directed toward evil things and bad purposes, and therefore accursed. Rather than see this Irish people thus trained, rather than see them thus educated, rather than see them raised up with intellectual power without morality, without faith, without love, I would turn to the days when penal laws enforced ignorance upon my fathers who are in their martyred graves, I would turn to the dark days when everything was denied to Ireland and to her people save the one thing that man could not take—because God resolved that it should remain—namely, their Divine faith; and I would say to them, moriamur in simplicitate nostra—let us die in our simplicity, let us die in our comparative ignorance, let us die in our simple, trusting faith, stronger than all the power of earth and hell, rather than live under the curse of this unholy education.

A traveler relates the following: "Riding during the summer in Syria, I lost my sheets. For four nights I did not sleep, although I was ready to drop with fatigue. On the fifth night I fell into a sort of delirium, rose from my bed, and got on my horse, which was tethered with its saddle on, and made a long speech. The Arabs all sat round me staring for an hour, then the dragoman stepped forward, took my hand, and led me back to my tent. The curious thing was, that after this performance—the particulars of which were told me the next day—the Arabs regarded me as a holy prophet."

Ladies who wear bangles would find it advantageous to also wear, in a conspicuous position, a notice to the effect that their "bracelets were bangles, and did not fasten up." It must be annoying to them to have people continually coming up and saying, "Your bracelet is unfastened!" but it's still more distressing to a timid representative of our sex, who, after five minutes' hesitation, makes up his mind to call attention to the probable loss of the bracelet, to be told, "Thanks, but bangles don't close!"—the remark being accompanied with a look as much as to say, "I pity your ignorance!"

It is stated that silk stockings, with open-work lace fronts and clocks, are to be the prevailing mode for evening parties. Dear sakes, what are we coming to?

Bill of Fare for Six Persons.—Sunday, September 29, 1878.

Gumbo File.
Fried Flounders. Broiled Snipe.
Oyster-plait. Green Peas.
Roast Venison, Wine and Currant Jelly Sauce. Mashed Potatoes.
Lettuce, French Dressing.
Blanc Manger. Strawberries and Cream.
Fruit-howl of Apples, Figs, Grapes, Peaches, Pears, and Plums.

To MAKE GUMBO FILE.—See No. 35, Vol. I.

TO ROAST VENISON.—Lard well with some salt pork; cover the outside of the meat with a thin coating of butter; put a small quantity of water in the pan, and after baking fifteen minutes add a small teaspoonful of white wine, one teaspoonful ground cinnamon, half teaspoonful allspice, quarter teaspoonful of cloves, and some grated nutmeg; baste frequently. Just before it is cooked, add one teaspoonful of sherry wine, mixed well with half a cup of currant jelly and a little thickening. The leg is the best to roast, and it must be done rare.

NOTICE.

The Argonaut is published every Saturday, at No. 522 California Street, by the Argonaut Publishing Company.
 Rates of Subscription: $4 per year; six months, $2.25; three months, $1.50—payable in advance. Postage prepaid. City subscribers served for 35 cents per 4 weeks. Single copies, 10 cents.
 Address all communications to "The Argonaut, 522 California Street, San Francisco."
 Branch Office, Cooper's Bookstore, 746 Market Street
 News Dealers and Agents in the interior supplied by the San Francisco News Company, No. 413 Washington Street, to whom all orders should be addressed.
 A. P. STANTON, Business Manager.

THE ARGONAUT.

FRANK M. PIXLEY, }
 FRED. M. SOMERS, } . . . . . Editors.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 28, 1878.

The letters of Quang Chang Ling, the Chinese Literate, whose remarkable presentation of his countrymen's views on the Chinese question have attracted such wide attention, can be obtained in pamphlet form at this office. Price ten cents per copy—$1 per dozen.

EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

We have been duck shooting upon Lake Tulare. It is a long trip to this lake; the weather was warm, the journey tedious, but the lake is the home of all the game that flies, from the little sand-piper, with its querulous cry, skimming the water's edge, to the honker goose, that bears himself upon ponderous wings, and the stately pelican, that with graceful flight sails the air. Teal, butter-balls, spring-tails, widgeon, gadwalls, and mallards abound; snipe in flights as thick as black birds; plover and curlew, and all sorts of winged game. Of geese the expert shot may fill a wagon, but then, while it is fun to bring down the great clumsy bird with his long neck, wings, and legs tangled as he tumbles to the earth, it seems a pity that he must be left the food for coyotes and 'coons, for he is not worth bringing away. But it is not of the shooting part of our expedition we would write, but of the country we passed over, its possibilities, its capabilities, as the home of a great population. All the way from Martinez, where we left the bay of San Francisco and its grateful breezes, we passed through broad plains, down the great wide valley of the San Joaquin. Two hundred miles we rode through an uninteresting country, looking dry and arid, but upon this exceptional year producing splendid crops of grain—crossing the rivers San Joaquin, Tuolumne, Calaveras, Stanislaus, Merced, Kings, Cottonwood, Mariposa, Kaweah, Cowchilla, Dry Creek, Elk Bayou, and ever so many other beautiful streams; a valley sixty miles in width dotted with splendid lakes; Tulare, larger than the bay of San Francisco, Kern, Buena Vista and others; a country whose fertility of soil is unequalled by any other that God's sun shines upon; a country broad enough for an empire, and one which ought to be the hope of happy millions of people—an unoccupied, abandoned, God-forsaken, desolate, dry, and dirty plain; a land of coyotes, jackass-rabbits, Missourians, sand lappers, and land grabbers; a land accursed of indolence, waste, and greed. From the town of Tulare we rode for forty miles across this broad desolation, conveying our drinking water and wood for camp purposes, passing over natural meadows, and on the whole forty miles we only saw six attempts at farming, and such farming! Only one place where there was enough of enterprise to plant fruit and shade trees and watermelons. A rickety cabin, with a melancholy corral and a dilapidated fence, is the San Joaquin farmer's idea of a country home. Here and there, scattered throughout this broad domain, is a prosperous rancho with flocks, herds, fenced fields, comfortable house, spacious barns, vines, and fruit trees. Just enough of these oases scattered throughout the great southern desert to contrast the goodness of God with the utter worthlessness and total depravity of the people who inhabit it. Through this country runs the Southern Pacific Railroad, with its comfortable cars and sleepers, and freight trains bearing away wheat, the single product of the plains—a crop may be raised once in five years. This land without water is almost valueless: with water it is invaluable. The land is measured by the hundreds of square miles. The water runs its inexhaustible wealth unused to the sea. Not only is there abundant water in the lakes and rivers, but by artesian wells, water flowing in inexhaustible quantities may be obtained at less than three hundred feet in depth. Reservoirs may be made in the foot hills capable of storing millions of gallons. If this land was in any other country it would not be unused, divorced from water, unfruitful, and unproductive.

We had heard of the California Central Colony established by Mr. Bernard Marks, with the capital of Mr. W. S. Chapman, at Fresno. Having finished our sport, and packed our small game in ice, we determined to lie over a day and for ourselves inspect this enterprise. We stopped at the village of Fresno—a new railroad town, with a fine court-house, a spacious hotel, the usual number of country stores and groceries, a respectable depot, warehouses, and the other unpicturesque and unromantic surroundings of a Southern California village. The colony is three miles from the town, lying out in the sun upon the bare plain. To reach it we plod along a dusty road, the unfenced prairie on either side; not a shrub, or tree, or house—even the weeds hugging the soil as lichens cling to decaying wood; when suddenly, from out the desolation, we see the distant trees; and, as we near the place, we note cosy cottages embowered in vines, shaded in groves. On either side of avenues, tree-lined, are streams of running water. The place contains 4,000 acres, with twenty-three miles of avenues—Elm, Cherry, Walnut, Fruit, and other avenues, bordered with the trees that give them names—divided into two hundred farms of twenty acres each, all sold, and nearly one hundred families living in comfortable homes; industrious, prosperous, happy, and contented families, making a good living, with schools, and luxuries, and comforts, off twenty acres of land. Little twenty-acre farms, divided into "checks" of an acre each; each acre dyked and irrigable from ditches on every side. An acre of alfalfa will support five cows; an acre of assorted orchard gives the family fruit; an acre for garden, another for Egyptian corn, the balance for the raisin grape. The special industry of the colony is to manufacture the Malaga and Muscat grape into raisins. It is a pleasant and profitable industry; no failure of crop; no curculio—for the vineyard may be flooded, and this is death to the curculio. A raisin vineyard comes to perfection in five years, and an acre produces several hundred dollars worth of raisins when dried and boxed. The vine once planted, the balance of the work may be done by girls or women; to cultivate, trim the vine, pick the cluster, dry the grapes, and box the fruit, is work for children. We saw great clusters of luscious grapes twenty months from the cutting, and pears, apples, peaches, quinces, from trees less than three years old. The colony is not yet three years old, and Mrs. Smith, on the day we visited her, had shipped one hundred twenty-pound boxes of raisins to San Francisco. The soil is prolific beyond belief. Watermelons grow so large that they are uncomfortable to handle; sweet potatoes, tomatoes, and peanuts grow in abundance. Nearly every farmer has a few cows, and of course they are choice, because experience has taught them that good stock is as easily and cheaply raised as bad. Such pigs! and all of good breeds; so fat! We would rather be a pig at this colony than a sand-lot orator. Only three years, only twenty acres, and one hundred prosperous families secure, content—are healthy, happy, and accumulating something for old age, for a marriage dot to the children, or capital for another allotment when the colony is extended. Two school houses and a town hall; not a church, not a saloon, not a hoodlum, not a pauper, not a vagabond in the colony. We visited nine farms owned and worked by women—not worked as Solomon built the temple, but we found them actually toiling in the field; one fed the fanning mill while her husband turned the crank; a mother and daughter hoeing in the field; another mother and daughter at work gathering Egyptian corn; and down in the vineyard Miss Austin, an accomplished, cultivated, comely lady, in chip hat and cotton gown, packing raisins—rejoicing and proud of her escape from a San Francisco school room to the freedom, health, and independence of a raisin farm in Fresno.

And of such land there are millions of unoccupied acres—idle, useless acres—basking in the sun, with the water running to waste in Tulare Lake, and through the San Joaquin to the ocean. This colony interested us, and we have no doubt there are others in the State that are equally successful, and have demonstrated the problem of small farming. Messrs. Marks and Chapman deserve something better than to have a monument built over their remains, when dead, upon which shall be chiseled the achievements of their lives; they deserve to be encouraged in extending their most beneficent work of providing homes for the toilers. They have shown, in their small enterprise, that great things are possible; they have laid, broad and deep, the foundations of an empire upon the plains of the San Joaquin that may develop to colossal proportions. Given, this vast area of land, this boundless wealth of waters, divide the land into twenty-acre farms, and to each give a family of five persons, with flocks, and herds, and schools, and churches, and trade, and business, and contemplate the vast proportions of a community that lives in honest toil. That a family may be maintained by the industry of its members upon twenty acres of San Joaquin valley land is a great pregnant fact, worthy of the consideration of capitalists, "humanitarians," and political economists. It is a solution of the social and industrial problems that now, more than any other, are engaging the attention of thinking minds. If we are correct in our facts concerning the thermal belt, that runs for four hundred miles along our foothills, and of an average width of twenty-five miles, carrying a rich soil to the summits of the highest elevations, watered by a network of ditches, and capable of raising grain, fruit, and wine; if we are correct, that the great valleys of Sacramento and the San Joaquin, with the thousands of other valleys stretching from Del Norte to San Bernardino, through ten degrees of latitude, are all fruitful, and, with irrigation, capable of supporting a family upon each twenty acres; and if it is true that there is water sufficient to irrigate their whole broad area, then assuredly the future of California is secure. We may look confidently forward to the development of an empire upon this coast grand in its proportions and permanent in its structure. If to these lands of mountain side and valley we shall bring into subjection the tule lands, with their inexhaustible fertility of soil, then indeed ours is an empire—depending not upon mines, commerce, or manufactures, but with its foundations laid deep and broad in farming lands. The suggestions that follow these statements are the importance of some general system of irrigation and reclamation, and the necessity of so dividing these lands that each working man may have his allotment; of so legislating concerning water and land that the ultimate end shall be attained of placing the soil in possession of those who till it.

We shall know more about tule lands next week than this, as we are going upon another duck hunt to Union Island, the guest of General Naglee, who has spent a great deal of money in, we understand, a successful effort to fight the water fiend, and keep the San Joaquin from overflowing. P.

We had just made up our mind to go into stocks, and we said to ourselves we will mortgage the ARGONAUT and put the money into Sierra Nevada. We chose that particular mine because everybody said they had found a bonanza, and that it would go to $500 a share. We could borrow $10,000, and, paying a margin of fifty per cent., at $200 a share, we could purchase just one hundred shares. We would sell at $500—clear up with a profit of $30,000. It seemed so perfectly clear that we should make a nice transaction. And then we thought again, and we said: Don't be too sure, old fellow, that you are long-headed enough to outwit Bob Morrow, Head, Schloss, Miller, Williams, Glazier, and the balance of the syndicate; the mine you never saw and they know every inch of it—incline, cross-cut and level, tunnel, winze, and stope; they are in correspondence by telegraph and cipher with the men in the mine, and all you know is street rumor; Johnny Skae is down in the ground 2,200 feet with a diamond drill, and knows as much about the ore as an old rat does of a cheese in the heart of which he has made his nest. And then we made this observation: Is it likely that Bob Morrow, Head, Schloss, Miller, Williams, Glazier, and the other philanthropists who form this syndicate, will sell you one hundred shares of this mine at $200 if they are worth $500 a share; and if there isn't any bonanza there, or if it is only nine feet wide—only a slab—won't those "humanitarians" scoop up your ten thousand dollars? And then we thought what a nice man Morrow was, and what a nice little eleemosynary syndicate it was, and we remembered all their benevolent acts, and how they went round doing good and giving away things worth $500 for $200, helping the widows and orphans, and heaping blessings upon the head of poor editors, and we said: We guess we won't purchase Sierra Nevada this time; and we didn't. Just as likely as not we shall be sorry; we shall be very sorry if it goes to $500; we shall feel exceedingly bad over it. But if it goes to $500, Mr. Morrow, and Johnny Skae, and Mr. Head, and Mr. Schloss, and General Miller, and Mr. Glazier, and all the balance of them will feel so bad themselves to think that we did not make anything, and they will have so much and feel so benevolent that perhaps they will draw us a check for the amount and send it to us with their compliments. They will be just as likely to help us get rich that way as to sell a stock for one dime less than it is worth. If we are mistaken in our estimate of these gentlemen, and stock dealing is not an institution in which generosity and benevolence are the guiding motives of action, but selfishness and greed of gain are the controlling incentives of action, then we are certain that we would better continue to give an undivided attention to this journal and let these gentlemen milk that portion of the community that has less brains and more money than we have.

We note with pain that with regard to the proposed constitutional enforcement of "the Christian Sabbath" the truly good are practicing (unconsciously, no doubt) a bit of deception. No one, so far as we have observed, has had the honest hardihood to advocate this measure on the distinct and declared ground of a religious issue. "It has been abundantly proven"—we quote a representative argument—"by the foremost physiologists of this country and England that man and beast, for health and effective service, require a hebdomadal rest." It has been abundantly proven that they require nocturnal rest, in addition; why not compel them to take it? It has been abundantly proven that men require an occasional bath! No one objects to their taking it; all would object to compelling them to. If a man require "a hebdomadal rest" we think he can manage to obtain it under the present laws.

AFTERMATH.

Some of the views which Mr. Timothy Lynch recently held, and perhaps still holds, regarding the conjugal relation—if conjugal that relation can be properly called in which the yoke is worn by but one neck—appear to belong rather to a former than the present stage of civilization. This gentleman was last week on trial for the murder of his wife, with whom he had lived some forty years, and, testifying in his own behalf, he explained that having been to a fire he had naturally taken too much liquor. When he was in this condition the late Mrs. Lynch had the bad judgment to discuss the Chinese question with him, a topic which “always worked him into a frenzy.” Still, by a supreme effort of self-control, he abstained from cutting her throat, and might not even have knocked her down, but the lady, emboldened, no doubt, by his forbearance, remonstrated with him for his drinking habits, “usurping,” continued Mr. Lynch, “an authority which neither God nor nature has given a wife over her husband.” At this point in the family discussion the usurper unfortunately died. Had she lived to stretch her authority still further we should have had the advantage of Mr. Lynch’s opinion on other disputed points touching the limitations of a wife’s prerogatives.

Referring, no doubt, to Mrs. Lynch’s hardy usurpation, not, certainly, to his own shining success in resisting it, Mr. Lynch testified on his oath that “this is a wicked world;” and now that he is bereft of his liberty as well as of his wife he must be more stubbornly fixed in that opinion than he was before. To a mind so tenacious of its rights as his he must appear the victim of a pretty widely ramified conspiracy against the liberties of husbands; but whether the liberty to cut up one’s wife with a jack-knife is a natural and inalienable one, or is merely the outgrowth of social conditions, and therefore justly subject to statutory limitation, is not so simple a question as he seems to think.

Mr. Clitus Barbour was recently introduced to an audience of sand-lotters as “the Ben Butler of the West,” but modestly disclaimed “the high-sounding title.” This looks like humility, but it is only the crouching of the lion before it leaps. The time will come when General Butler will be proud to be called the Clitus Barbour of the East.

The ruffians of Reno, who recently took the law in their own dirty hands and tarred-and-feathered a man whom they merely suspected of a crime, blinding and so blistering him that he will probably die, have a ready apologist in the Chronicle of this city, which calls the outrage “a just punishment.” Other city journals, and most of the country papers that we have observed, have taken an equally liberal, humane, and edifying view of the matter, and it cannot be too often repeated that the Press is the bulwark of popular liberty, the conservator of morals, and the corner-stone of civilization. It is alarming to think what our rascals might become if deprived of it.

We are told by the Press that there are two bulwarks of liberty—itsself and trial by jury, but we are sorry to note a disposition on the part of the former to extend itself around in front of the latter, so as to render it practically useless. If the local Press would have the sincerity to conform its utterance to its thoughts we should hear less about the precious right of trial by jury, and a good deal more concerning the God-given privilege of being made to look like a Shanghai rooster backing up against the gusty north.

A well-known banker and capitalist of this city has died of disease, and the Coroner says if there is any more of this his office must hereafter seek the man, as no man will hereafter seek the office. Let him take what he has already wrung out of this community and light out to some other place, where the wealthy will throw more business in his way, if he can find such an earthly paradise. We shall not need him much anyhow if this stock market never breaks—and nobody is such an infatuated John-donkey as to believe it ever will.

Some of our city officials are exhibiting so extraordinary haste to get to the front and explain their business relations and private transactions that it is probable that they will fall and break their precious necks. One or two of them have made so singular a showing that it is charitable to think them thieves.

The successor in Congress of Mr. Eugene Hale, of Maine, is described as an illiterate agitator, who is by trade a stone-cutter. By some unhappy fatality all stone-cutters, we believe, are illiterate; certainly all are who pursue that cheerful branch of their business which consists in recording in marble the virtues of the dead. There was never a spelling-bee in all the world that could not be floored with a headstone taken at random from the nearest graveyard. We should like to see the experiment of sending stone-cutters to Congress thoroughly and systematically tried. As all men are good for something there is a chance that this class would truly represent the living, for they do most condemnably misrepresent the dead.

The public officer whose duty it is to “perch up aloft” and watch the fire-alarm bell, to see that it responds with the correct number of bangs when tickled by the electric fluid turned on at the engine houses, has sent a petition to the Board of Supervisors, praying for permission to retain his horse and buggy. He conclusively shows that the mistaken economy of compelling him to relinquish them is a conspicuous instance of saving a horse and buggy at the spigot, and wasting a cabstand, a livery stable, and a jackass pack-train at the bung.

We note a circumstance of considerable interest to scientists. Simultaneously with the eruptions of Mts. Vesuvius and Cotopaxi there was a noticeable relaxation in the mining stock market in San Francisco—a distinct diminution of pressure. The safety valve theory of volcanoes appears to receive some support from this incident, if we rightly interpret it.

Those who acted upon our advice of a few weeks since, and mortgaged their homesteads to invest in stocks, we now advise to realize. There will be a dreadful tumble in a short time. The discoveries in Sierra Nevada do not justify an advance in all the mines within three hundred miles of it. Realize and travel in Europe; there will be another deal by the time you return.

An Eastern journal is “delineating some of the peculiarities of the character of President Hayes.” It would require all the ciphers is its type-cases to delineate the entire lot.

If the devils can look over the battlements of hell, down upon California, Pine, and Montgomery Streets, how they must enjoy themselves at the spectacle. To see the fussy old mud-hens scratching the street for points! To see young women snickering, smiling, coaxing for points! Widows, maids, divorces, dodging in and out of brokers’ offices, edging their way through crowds, all intent upon points! To note the confidential whispering of the bedraggled, dusty-petticoated female, as she hunts through lane and alley for points! Of all the women that have dealt in mining stocks, that have risked their reputation, domestic peace, and self-respect, we ask the name of one that has been fortunate. For those that have been unfortunate we will consult the divorce calendar, the Morgue, and Queer Street.

Another beautiful and most brilliant girl stained, probably ruined, getting money to support a position in society. What a terrible harlot is this same fashionable society! What a vicious, damnable, beastly thing it is, this endeavor to keep up appearances! Better put the girls to making raisins in Fresno County than to set them to sparing for coin in this wicked town.

If we owed a note for $30,000 which we could not pay, and it were due to-morrow, we would not commit suicide. We would wait, let the note mature, and the person to whom it was owing might go and shoot himself.

William Tecumseh Sherman married Miss Ewing. He was a Protestant, and she a Catholic. In course of time they had a boy. Sherman became famous, the boy became of age. The boy took to his mother’s religion, took to the church, and finally took to the Jesuits at Rome; where, in process of time, he will become a priest, then a cardinal, and if he has the family luck, a pope. It does not seem that the entry of this boy to a monastery should be of sufficient importance to make much of a fuss about it, yet the Eastern papers represent the General as taking on dreadfully. The boy might have done worse. He might have married the hired girl, or run for Congress, or been “busted” in stocks. A monastery is a very good place indeed for any young fool who has no better sense than to go to it.

To those members of the Constitutional Convention who propose to mould our judicial system we offer the following suggestions: Let all the district, county, and municipal judges be chosen by lot; put the names of all the candidates into a hat and shake it well before drawing; let the lawyers on either side throw dice, best two in three, to decide all issues of fact; let the judge toss up a twenty-dollar piece to determine an issue of law; let persons convicted of crime have the choice to go to either the State prison or Legislature. This would make the administration of justice more expeditious, less expensive, would not draw business men from their vocations, and, on the whole, would be more satisfactory than the present system.

The following conversation occurred between a city official and a member of the Board of Supervisors who was reading a newspaper: City Official.—“Anything in the dispatches?” Supervisor.—“Not much; it is thought that the man Nobel, who attempted the assassination of the Emperor William, will not be decapitated like Hoedel.” City Official.—“Ah?” Supervisor.—“No; he will be sentenced to solitary confinement for life.” City Official.—“Yes?” Supervisor.—“He has petitioned to be permitted to retain his horse and buggy.”

The Republican party of Nevada is free from prejudice, and has set an example of tolerance which is as creditable to its heart as to its head: it has nominated two journalists for important offices—Lieutenant-Governor and member of Congress. Thus are the reasonless antipathies of centuries gradually disappearing like ugly vapors dispelled by the rising sun, and the time will come when the journalist, the Piute, and the Chinaman will assume among the powers of the earth the separate and equal station to which the laws of nature and of nature’s God entitle them. We hail with grateful satisfaction this marked recognition of a profession which would be as honorable as any but for the unhappy habit of its members of saying mean things of one another. We know that we are right in taking these nominations as a compliment to the press in general; the characters of the fellows nominated are sufficient proof that it wasn’t intended to be personal.

Mary Ann Trimble, a servant girl living—much against her will—in this city, has twice attempted suicide, and been twice prevented. This is a serious business. If Mary Ann is insane (as the headless will be quick to affirm), she would be better off dead than alive. If she is not, she knows a good deal better than any body whether life or death is the preferable condition for her. Nobody forcibly interferes to prevent a marriage; yet suicide is an infinitely more delicate and personal matter, more profoundly affecting the individual, and touching less nearly the interests of society.

God, they say, has forbidden suicide, though we do not recollect at this moment when the injunction was published, nor where it is recorded. Well, has he ever commanded us to enforce this prohibition as well as obey it? The life of no one person is necessary to this world, but it is of capital importance to the stability of the social system that we learn to mind each his own business. If it be urged that these remarks apply with equal cogency to the case of anybody attempting suicide, we confess they are open to that objection. Our object is to make the path from the stock market to the devil as smooth as possible.

Another investigation is being had over the whipping of a boy at the Industrial School. Every once in a while the Board of Education are called upon to make similar inquiries at the suggestion of some irate parent, who thinks his brat has been unwisely spanked. Solomon agrees with us in the opinion that a little more thrashing, and a little less display of popular sympathy over well-deserved and well-administered “cat” and shingle, would be good for the rising generation. We were thrashed at school, and the world sees the result.

A scientific person considerably explains to the ladies who love gold fish that their apparently reasonless and arbitrary changes of color (we refer, of course, to the fish) are not symptoms of disease, but perfectly natural processes. That is reassuring to the ladies, but it’s a hard nut for the clergy. What are we to think of the divine wisdom which adorns a fish with colors that won’t wash?

Bishop Simpson was dictating a sermon to his amanuensis: “Damascus was filled with the light of a divine emanation.” “Dam—” repeated the scribe, as his pen flew rapidly over the paper to the close of the sentence—“nation!” Then there was a holy hush, and again the work proceeded.

Mr. Richard Grant White argues, in the October Atlantic, that music is wholly without intellectual or moral significance, and the love and appreciation of it are no evidence of mental elevation, spiritual purity, or refinement of taste. He would modify his judgment and abate his warmth if he could have the advantage of living up about Virginia City, and watching a crowd of rough Comstockers growing great, and good, and tender, as their ears reach the melodious thunder of a jackass wood-train climbing the Geiger Grade.

Testifying last Tuesday before a committee of the Board of Supervisors an officer of the Industrial School explained that “during the past few months there has been a cessation of punishment, this being a season of rest.” Of course there is a point beyond which flogging can no longer be endured, and when that point is reached the teacher must spare the rod or suffer the fatal consequence of overwork. The annual “season of rest” is imperatively demanded by the flexors and extensors of the pedagogic arm.

An old and well known physician was in the Stock Exchange the other day, solicitously observing the turns of the market in which he had ventured his all, when a friend came in, all out of breath, and rushing up to him, gasped out: “For God’s sake, come with me at once; my wife is terribly burned with kerosene.” “Poor lady!” said the medico, sympathetically; “I wish I could go to her, but I feel that I should be entirely useless. I really cannot endure the sight of human suffering.”

It is reported that Shere Ali, the Ameer of Afghanistan, has addressed a petition to the Viceroy of India, asking to be permitted to retain his horse and buggy.

TOLD IN LETTERS.

Domestic Fact and Fashionable Fancy.

Well, my dear, I come to you again this week with a record of many pleasant things, bonnets, dresses, bric-a-brac, and other items in which the feminine soul is said most to delight. Since I last wrote I have seen some of the most charming bonnets of the season at Miss McCarrick's opening the early part of the week. The styles are very marked this fall without being pronounced, for which your friendly chronicler is duly thankful, and many are exceedingly quaint in shape and combination of materials used. See how you would like this one: A cream-colored felt bonnet, setting close to the face, as all genuine bonnets do this season, the only outside trimming a soft roll of garnet velvet and a long ostrich plume of the same color fastened by two rich crimson roses, full blown, and placed low down at the left side. Inside, simply shirring of the velvet and a cord of garnet satin and gold running around the edge; satin strings. Or this: A bonnet, consisting principally of an extremely large crown and correspondingly narrow brim, of black embossed velvet, with a broad insertion and fringe of jet beads all round both front and back. An ostrich feather, also black, curled over one side, and on the other two distinct clusters of pink and red rosebuds, held in place by full loops of ribbon. Black satin strings, and a perfectly plain inside, finished only with a bias band of velvet. This shape, I fancy, will be popular, for there were several there made up in different materials, as the bright colored embossed satins, ornamented with long streamers of the new "bouquet" ribbons; felts in the various shades known as mastic, French gray, Russian gray, and olive brown; and one for evening wear of pale blue embossed velvet, the design of the material being a somewhat unusual one—rose-leaves on a white ground. The edges of this were corded with a blue row of fine gold beads, and a blue feather, combined with ample bows and rolls of velvet, completed the garniture. A plaited band of velvet acted as face trimming. Very similar was a peach-colored silk. But something still prettier was a mastic-colored felt cottage bonnet, with a dark green velvet cape laid on in pleats, and shirring of the same for a face lining, which lapped over on to the outside to the depth of an inch; four mastic feathers laid directly on top, and in front of them a soft roll of the same ribbon as the strings—a golden shade of satin and gros grain, reversible—was held down by a golden lizard with ruby eyes. We have almost forsaken the floral kingdom for the animal for our ornaments, you see, and the more outré they are the better does fashion like them. Lizards are special favorites, and they come in all colors, styles, and positions, the green and bronze being particularly effective on dead-leaf colors. Gold lace, too, is being used, and wings and peacocks' eyes still hold their own; but flowers seemed doomed to a temporary disuse while the fancy for the grotesque reigns. The tendency seems to be toward bonnets just now, though there are some lovely hats shown. As you are wearied already, I will not now tell you of them. To match all this pretty head-gear there is, every week, something new in dress goods and in cloaks. I wish you could see the new importations in the latter articles just opened at the Ville de Paris. There are several the like of which I have seen nowhere. Brocaded velvets and gros-grain silk are the materials most used and make the richest combinations. The shapes are principally the loose cloak shape, retaining the Dolman sleeve in a modified form, and the trimmings used are beaded passementerie, lace, whalebone, and moonlight bead fringes. The opera shawls there have won my heart so completely that I can hardly do justice to the opera cloaks in white cashmere, plushes, and other rich goods, which are really so elegant that they deserve a whole chapter to themselves. There are some changes in the fall styles for dresses and suits, which, oddly and inconsistently enough, are to be made somewhat longer than of late, and that, too, just when the coming wet weather of winter will necessitate even shorter ones, if the wearers have any consideration for health and comfort. The second change is the coming back of the slightly bourruff overskirt that has been so long worn, and only for a time abandoned. The back breadth is made straight and full, and caught up here and there in soft puffs. It is even whispered that the small bustle will be restored to favor. Apron fronts are most favored, usually very short, but in others the drapery is looped back à la window curtains, showing a prettily-trimmed frontpiece. Large velvet and silk bows will hold the pouff in place. These are by far the prettiest and most useful overskirts we have ever had—at least so thinks "Yours Truly," and Mrs. Coleman, one of our most reliable modistes (you remember her rooms—on Kearny Street near Sutter), says that they were always the pets, especially for slender figures like yours and mine. By the way, Mrs. Coleman is as busy as so many bees, with trousseaux, ball dresses, and the like. She has just completed some charming toilettes, among them, a white silk Princess, cut short and trimmed with box and side plaittings, narrow velvet, and illusion sash, and garnished with a profusion of wild flowers; and another of black silk, the plaittings of which were all lined with cardinal red and finished with shell trimming, as were also the retours of Pompadour waist. The overskirt was long and draped in puffs, and the upper portions of the waist enriched with Point lace. Notwithstanding some of our leading stores still meet one's inquiry for novelties with the declaration that there is nothing new yet, there will be abundance of pleasant surprises two weeks or a month later—as the case may be. I manage to find something to admire in all of them, and spent a very profitable half hour one day this week in at Nathan's among his china, pottery, and glassware. It does seem as though the fanciful can find no limit. Perhaps I may have remarked this before, but that is the leading impression left on one's mind by a judicious collection like this, where articles are rarely if ever duplicated, and a cultivated taste is displayed in the selection of even the most trifling object. I noticed among the "plaques" two especially original ones, Arab scenes, in both the horse and rider and accompanying dogs being depicted with great fidelity to nature. A pretty device for a table-d'hôte breakfast set is in delicately shaded rose colored china, in shape like sea shells, the saucers being the flat mussel shells with scalloped edges, and the cups, milk pitcher and other upright vessels, modeled after the conch and nautilus. On the rosy groundwork are painted sea weeds, grasses, and submarine flowers. The odd and not unpleasing Gien faience is well represented, and the Celestial kingdom contributes many quaint forms in jars, cups, and so on, in the now familiar Chinese crackle ware, that roused the indignation of more than one housekeeper at our late Exposition as being "miserable, cracked and mended stuff to send to a fair," as I heard one lady irefully remark. But we have learned something since then, and now every one knows that every crack is laid in with mathematical precision, and we may have articles made to order containing any given number of fractures located according to taste. I was much pleased with the Venetian glassware, with its curious devices and its clear grass-green coloring, and mounted to the top floor purposely to see the really exquisite glass engraving done by Mr. Calfus, a native of Bohemia, and—if one may judge from the specimens of his work—an ample inheritor of the national artistic instinct. Have you ever seen engraving done on glass? It is even more surprising in detail than glass blowing, which used to be one of the "sensations" of my childhood. The engraver sits before an upright machine, and, holding the article to be graven in his right hand, traces with the point of the instrument—which is kept in motion by a revolving wheel—the complicated designs of birds, flowers, or arabesques you have so often seen on Bohemian glassware. It is not often though, I am told, that an artist works as Mr. Calfus does, without pattern of any sort to go by. Two weeks later I can promise you some very choice novelties at this establishment, which are now en route from Europe. I send you the embroidering materials you desire from Siering's. There are many new designs in worsted and silk work there this week, and some of the handsomest Afghans I have ever seen—particularly one in dark greens with white daisies sprinkled all over the face of it. In the clock department are two very charming statues in marble, one representing "Hygieia," the goddess of health, and "Confidence"—two girl figures, apparently exchanging some very important information. Being feminine, it is safe to assume that there is a man at the bottom of it. Both works are by Carrier-Belleuse. A pair of flower paintings, newly received, and by Dietrich, would make very suitable companions to the figures, if one could build one's rooms exactly to suit, with niches and "sidelights" arranged with a view to special things. Not particularly new, but very comfortable and convenient, are the bathing slippers displayed in the window on Montgomery Street. They are of the unbleached Turkish toweling, embroidered on the toes, and lined with bright-colored flannel or serge. They are made in the regular Turkish style—that is, without heel pieces—and finished off with quillings of alpaca braid. Among the new things at Ackerman's I noticed quite a pretty novelty in the way of salt cellars for the table. Some were upright, with the napkin ring fastened across the top of the stem, and the cellars on either side below, two handsome, gold-lined butter dishes occupying the base; others have only the salt and pepper cruets at the bottom and the ring at the top. There is a large variety of China pitchers, in different colors and ornamented with flowers, that are pretty for almost any edible use, beer, cream, or even chocolate; and some exquisite single cups and saucers, thin as a rose leaf, of a solid color, and touched only with a band of gilding. The outside of the cup will be white, but the inside of pale green, pink, blue, or lilac. Yes, your old friends, the California Company, are as busy as ever, at both their depots, manufacturing, every week, something new and tasteful in the way of furniture for some of our millionaires. I saw lately two chairs, just completed, for a full set that is being made for—well, I am pledged not to mention names, but it is not long since two brunette daughters forsook the same paternal hearth "for better or for worse." The set will be decidedly unique, as there was but the one piece of goods of which it is made; an exceedingly rich Persian pattern, in large tropic-looking flowers and leaves, in the dusky green shades, on a dead-gold ground, imported here. The substitution of a straight band of velvet instead of the usual puffings, and a similar band, only narrower, and each somewhat wider in the centre than at the ends of the strips, of the tapestry, just beneath it, as a finish for the front of the seat, makes a noticeable difference in this special style of make up, and one that seems to me an improvement. In chamber sets, some very handsome work is shown at this house in the Queen Anne style, just now all the rage. The combination of walnut and birdseye maple seems to be a great favorite, and is exceedingly effective. Several newsets were in process of completion when I was in there. Walnut will always be favored, it is so rich and susceptible of so exquisite a polish. Of course you have seen the two thousand dollar set that was sent to the Centennial Exhibition. I wonder who will be the lucky woman to get that for her Christmas gift this year. I have seldom seen any thing richer than the ebony ecritoires and parlor cabinets, of which there are several, both at the Market Street and the Bush Street houses. One in particular, at the former place, can hardly be surpassed for simplicity and elegance. It has a canopy top, which is lined with a frescoing of Japanese design on gold ground. Another is ornamented on the lower doors with clusters of wild flowers in the natural colors. Both are "Queen Anne" as to style. They are made in Boston, too, which is a guarantee for their solidity and excellent general "tone," for the "Hub," you know, never does any thing by halves. Dainty embroidered handkerchiefs, white and colored, hosiery to match, and some pretty fancies in neck wear, at Chester's, must close my letter for to-day. Theoretically, I have always fancied both the former in plain white; practically, I am a miserable backslider when I see the charming things that are brought out every month, and I go over to the majority, in favor of colors. You have doubtless read something of the new-fashioned belts to be worn with black silks or white muslins. They are made of alternate folds of two colors, in silks, and have bows with long ends to match, that fasten them at the side. Two-colored bows for the neck and hair complete the set. The first I have seen are those at Chester's, and they are so pretty I advise every one to have one.

Adieu, till we meet again. Yours faithfully,

ESTHER PENROSE.

P. S.—Isn't it too bad that Snow & May are going out of business on the first of January. Meanwhile, as there is no evil that has not its compensating good, pictures, frames, artists' materials, and any number of other et ceteras, will be sold off below cost, which will be very nice for buyers.

THE RETURN.

Once more down the lane I've wandered,
Unto my father's door;
Once more my footsteps wake the echoes
Along the oaken floor;
Through many years of changing fortunes
Mine eyes have never seen
The blushing of these summer roses,
These walls, now mossy green.

There lies some tender tale of childhood
In every waving tree,
Some story in each rustic arbor
Of what I used to be;
Up yonder towering tree I've clambered,
To reach the topmost bough;
I trained that rose tree's climbing branches
That hide the brown roof now.

Here, as I sit within the parlor,
Where oft we used to meet,
I seem to hear the ring of laughter
And trip of youthful feet,
And phantom faces come and vanish;
Within the doorway there
I see the flash of snowy fingers,
The gleam of golden hair.

Here mem'ry conjures up before me
Each form of early grace,
And every scene of youthful pleasure
That cheered this hallowed place;
And in and out among the shadows
Flit childhood's boys and girls,
The shimmer of their summer garments,
The waving of their curls.

I hear their footsteps on the threshold,
Upon the oaken floor;
Within the hall I catch their whisper,
They call me at the door;
But when I reach to grasp the vision
That smiles and beckons there,
It passes through my outstretched fingers—
A phantom of the air.

I hear my mother gently singing
Her little ones to rest—
Those little ones who, later, wandered
Far from her loving breast.
Mother, thy weary child hath journeyed
Through years of doubt and pain,
And now, all sad and lonely-hearted,
He greets his home again,
But not the loved, familiar faces—
O mother, can it be
That here, within the olden homestead,
I call in vain to thee?

Oh, once again to lean my forehead
Upon that gentle breast,
To feel thy brown hair float about me,
To sleep, and be at rest.
Hush! 'tis the wind among the pine trees
That singeth low and sweet,
While autumn leaves drift down the hallway,
Like faintly pattering feet;
And all the old time forms and faces
Are creatures of the brain,
No trick of memory can ever
Bring them to life again.

OAKLAND, September 20, 1878. MARY L. CLOUGH.

Italian Women.

Barry Cornwall has sung of the "Dark-eyed beauty of the South,

Mistress of the rosy mouth."

Wordsworth wrote of

"Yon Italian maid,
Our Lady's laggard votress,
Halting beneath the chestnut shade,
To accomplish there her loveliness;
Nice aid maternal fingers lend—
A sister serves with slacker hand.
Then, glittering like a star, she joins the festive band."

Byron thus wrote of them: "As for the women, from the fisherman's wife up to the noble dames, their system has its rules, and its fitness, and its decorums, so as to be reduced to a kind of discipline, or game at hearts, which admits few deviations unless you wish to lose it. They are extremely tenacious, and jealous as furies, not permitting their lovers to marry if they can help it. They marry for their parents, and love for themselves. They exact fidelity from a lover as a debt of honor, while they pay the husband as a tradesman—that is, not at all. You hear a person's character, male or female, canvassed, not as depending on their conduct to their husband or wife, but to their mistress or lover. If I wrote a quarto I don't know that I could do more than amplify what I have here quoted."

One of our latest writers on Italy, says: "The scenery presented as we drove through the Chiaja (a street in Naples) was most amusing. Nursing, sewing, talking, washing, knitting, and even the offices of the toilette were among the sights that we beheld. The women place their chairs in the street, and seem quite as much at home as we should be in our own snug parlor or drawing-room in England. They are exceedingly fond of dress, and are sometimes seen with two or three gold chains around their necks, and their fingers covered with gold rings. It is singularly interesting to observe that the quickness of the people often makes up in some degree for the deficiency in education. Thus the fisherwomen, melon-sellers, and other humble vendors in the streets, are as keen after their interests as if they had had mental arithmetic carefully instilled into their minds from their earliest youth." Charles Mackay, in his poem of "A Man's Heart," tells us how the father of his hero,

"Stepping from a gondola,
Stood in the market-place, an idle man,
And watched the peasant girls of Trieste
Bring flowers to flowerless Venice. Young and fair
He roamed for pastime—master of himself,
To study art and nature in the South.
Here, as he loitered to refresh his soul
With beauty, fashioned in immortal stone,
Painted on canvas, streaming from the sky,
Impermeate in all shapes of earth and heaven,
He saw a maiden lovelier than art
Had e'er imagined in its happiest dream;
With Italia on her glowing face,
Its beauty, passion, tenderness, and hope."

Time flies swiftly for people who are not waiting for frosts.

INTAGLIOS.

To a Firefly.

Against the boundless night
Thou, with stout heart, dost set thy tiny flame.
Brave little beacon, thy one drop of light
Dob put my life to shame.

Though small thy lamp,
No brightest star may vaunt itself o'er thee,
As home, belated, to thy grassy camp
Thou lightest the tired bee.

Thy mission no man knows
To judge of thee. The mites thy critics are;
To the small folk that populate yon rose
Perhaps thou art a star.

The world of mite is glad
To see in its low heaven thy small spark.
My useless life—a smoking torch—doth add
But darkness unto dark.

Outward or Homeward.

Still are the ships that in haven ride,
Waiting fair winds or turn of the tide;
Nothing they fret, though they do not get
Out on the glorious ocean wide.

Oh, wild hearts that yearn to be free,
Look, and learn from the ships on the sea.

Bravely the ships, in the tempest tossed,
Buffer the waves till the sea be crossed;
Not in despair of the haven fair,
Though winds blow backward, and leagues be lost.

Oh, weary hearts, that yearn for sleep,
Look, and learn from the ships on the deep.

The End.

The course of the wearied river
Ends in the great gray sea;
The acorn, for ever and ever,
Strives upward to the tree;

The rainbow the sky adorning
Shines promise through the storm;
The glimmer of coming morning
Through midnight gloom will form;

By time all knots are riven,
Complex although they be;
And peace will at last be given,
Dear, both to you and to me.

Jealousy.

Love me not a little; I will share with none
Love me, if you love me, as earth loves the sun,
Unto whom she ever turns a happy face,
Glad of his warm kisses, proud of his embrace.

As the dew-dank roses for the daybreak yearn,
So, when I am absent, long for my return.
As glad birds at sunrise sing unconsciously,
Let thy heart sing softly when I come to thee.

As flowers brighten dewdrops, and drooping sweet flowers,
Set our hours together, be our sweetest hours.
Love me not a little; give me all or none.
If you love me, love me as earth loves the sun.

Drought.

Our thirsty valley looks up to the sky
For clouds in rain.
Her sun-singed fields, brown, dead, and dusty lie,
Parching for rain.

Her throat is choked with dust; her drinking rills
Are dead of thirst.
No moisture trickles from the sweltering hills;
The land seems cursed.

The redbreast's wings are long unwashed, and gruff
Is his sweet note;
There's scarcely water in the brook enough
To wet his throat.

O God, who hast the oceans to command,
Hear us complain!
How little dripping from Thy hallowed hand
Would be a rain.

Sunrise.

Oh, draw me up, thou strong, aspiring sun!
I feel the tension of thy ropes of light,
O sun! There is a passion, fierce and strong,
Outblazing love as thou dost earth's cold fires;

It burns within my soul when I look up
And know thou art my father. Though the earth
Conceived me and brought forth, thou didst give life
To the void germ within her: I am thine;

Thy fire is in my breast. My high-born soul
Chafes at the mother's tether. It was hers
To suckle my blind infancy; 'twas thine
To teach my youth in things beyond her ken.

Yet have I loved thee, mother earth, and lain
Happy and dreaming in thy wide, green lap,
Lulled by the cradle songs of brooks and winds;
Thy breast hath fed me and thy love made glad.

I bless and love thee, mother, for thy love!
Yet it is fearful—hungry force it is—
For thou art jealous of the winking stars
That bring me thought-flowers from the world of space
And hide me from them with thy veil of clouds.

I may not dip the pinions of my soul
To yon blue ether; for the watchful eye
Divines my thought, and with swift embrace,
Dost fether me with kisses, crying, "Child,
Mine art thou—mine! Wander not far away;
Frolic and chase my butterflies awhile;
Then come to me for rest, and I will hide
Thee, slumbering, in my bosom, where no eyes—
Not thy strong father's—shall behold thee more."

A Memory.

A thousand lilies blossom, unaware,
Here where the earth seems chill with buried love,
And in the flow'ry arbutus the dove
Still calls her truant mate, who lingers yet,
As though the world were always sweet and fair,
And you and I had nothing to regret
And hope for against hope, and think upon
Till all things fade!

And so your lips may often wear a smile,
And so my heart may leap to music still;
Your soul may fire, and all your being thrill,
And all your manhood lift itself on high
In din of battle, or in sacred aisle;
Yet under all must lurk one memory,
The grieving for a good time that is gone,
Till all things fade! VIOLET FANE.

Why Do I Love You?

Why do I love you, my sunny-eyed darling?
Why do the flowers still look to the sun?
Why does the lily close up its sweet petals
When the earth sleeps, and daylight is done?

Why do the stars, on the brow of the evening,
Burn the more brightly the darker the night?
Why do we see the more beauty in heaven
When the day fades and gone is the light?

Ask me of all the secret things hidden;
I may not answer, my darling, my own!
Love cometh to us as free and unbidden,
Whither it cometh is just as unknown.

Only, I love thee, my heart telleth to me;
Wherefore I love thee I know not or care;
'Tis not the charm of thy blue eye of beauty,
'Tis not the sheen in the gold of thy hair.

Why do I love thee, O lips of red ripeness?
Why do I love thee, O heart of gold?
Ask me no longer, my darling, my treasure,
Love such as mine is may never be told.

Just as untold as why stars love the heaven;
Why thus the lily-cup just as unknown;
'Tis the love that I may whisper thee, dearest—
Only I love thee, my darling, my own!

THE STORY OF A TICKET AGENT.

"The western train's gone, ma'am," said farmer Brown, coming into the waiting-room of the little depot.

"The train I was to take?" I said, gasping.

"Yes, ma'am. Too bad, but can't be helped. Harness will give out sometimes, you know," sympathizingly.

"When is the next western bound train due?"

"Not till six o'clock. You've five hours to wait. Be dreadful tiresome, ma'am. There's a nice family that live in 't'other part of the house—s'pose I tote you in there. I know Mrs. Holly'll give you a bite to eat, and she'll be proud to let you rest on her spare bed. Fine woman, Mrs. Holly is; I know her. Won't you go in and see her, ma'am?"

"No, I thank you, sir. I dare say that I'll be quite comfortable here."

"Wall, jess as you please. But now I must be going. Hope you'll get to your journey's end safe, ma'am. Good-bye."

And farmer Brown left the room, mounted his wagon, and soon disappeared down the dusty road. I had been visiting a friend who lived in a country settlement, some five or six miles from the solitary building dignified by the name of depot, and when the time came for me to return home she had placed me in the care of a neighboring farmer, who was going to a distant village, and would pass the station. During our ride we met with an accident. Part of the harness gave way, and we were detained such a length of time that, as the reader knows, I was too late for the train.

After farmer Brown left me, I amused myself by reading a newspaper which some one had left lying in the seat.

Finishing this, I studied the design of the wall paper, counted the panes of glass in the little window, and wondered at the tidiness of the whole apartment.

"Country depots are generally such vile, dirty places! Wonder why this is an exception?" I said to myself. Then a thought struck me. "Oh, probably the place is kept clean by Mrs. Holly, over whose virtues farmer Brown was so enthusiastic. Wonder if this same worthy female would give me a glass of water?"

And I tapped on the door communicating with the other apartment.

"Come in," said a cheery voice; and entering, I found myself in one of the prettiest, coziest rooms I had ever seen.

The most delicate tint of buff was on the walls, cool matting covered the floor, muslin curtains, festooned with ivy, hung at the windows, and here and there were pictures, brackets, books and flowers, and all the dainty belongings that make a room look so "home" and pleasant.

And, most charming of all, there lay in a white-draped cradle a rosy baby, fast asleep, with rings of golden hair over his white brow, and a great, red, velvety rose clasped in his dimpled hand.

Over him bent a woman of twenty-two or three—a little mite of a woman, with a bright, dark face, vividly colored, big black eyes, and wondrous dark hair bound in heavy braids about her stately head.

She rose with a bright smile when I entered, "Excuse me; but may I trouble you for a glass of water?"

"No trouble at all, ma'am. Pray be seated. Excuse me," and she left the room.

Presently she returned, bearing a salver covered with a snowy-white napkin, and containing a glass of water, a glass of creamy milk, a saucer of luscious strawberries, and a plate of yellow sponge cake, light as yellow foam.

"Pardon me," she said, smiling, "if I take too great a liberty; but you see, farmer Brown told me of your being obliged to wait so long, and I thought you might be hungry."

"Why, how very kind you are," I exclaimed, in pleased surprise.

"Not at all. It is a pleasure to me. If you are hot and dusty, perhaps you'd like to bathe your face. If so, just step in here."

And she led the way into a little white bed-room—the very heart of cleanliness and purity.

To a little while I was a different being from the cross, dusty, hungry mortal who had sat in the hot waiting-room.

I found Mrs. Holly a perfect little gem of a woman; and, after the manner of our sex, we soon became as well acquainted as if we had known each other for years. And while I was lying languidly on her comfortable sofa, and she seated in her low rocking chair, she told me the romance of her life.

"I have lived in this depot all my days," she began. "My father was agent here; and he served the company so long and so well that, when he died, they kindly allowed me to remain in this place, with the same wages, too. For, you see, I was seventeen, and father had long before taught me telegraph and all the other work. About a year after father's death I became acquainted with Jack—Jack Holly—my husband," and Mrs. Holly looked up and smiled.

"Jack was one of the best engineers on the road (and is now, too), and every one considered him an honest, likely young fellow. He thought the world of me, and we became engaged. But you know how girls are. The weakest of them can make a strong man tremble."

"A weak white girl held all his heart strings in her small white hand," I said.

"Yes, and I dare say I often pulled Jack's heart-strings rather hard; but he was gentle and kind when I flirted with the country lads, and when I was wild and wayward he didn't remonstrate. But one day there came along a city chap, who engaged board for the summer at a farm house in the neighborhood."

"This Clarence Devarges, as he was called, was handsome, well-dressed, and had that polished, indescribable air that is so fascinating to most silly girls. Jack was kind and well-mannered, but he didn't have a bit of style about him, and style was what I doted on in those days; so I snubbed Jack, and smiled on Mr. Devarges whenever he offered me his attentions. I flirted most dreadfully with him, till even generous Jack was displeased."

"One morning, looking somewhat grave and sad, he came into the ticket office. The last passenger had gone and the train was moving out. Jack's train had stopped to take on freight."

"Well, how long is this thing going to last?" said Jack.

"What thing?" I snapped out.

"Why, this affair with Devarges. I see it is going beyond a mere flirtation."

"Pray, what of it?"

"Only that I do not want my future wife's name joined with that of a—" Jack paused; then added earnestly: "Well, I warn you against this fellow. Who knows what he is?"

"Mr. Devarges is a perfect gentleman, and that is more than I can say of some others," I said hotly. And then some demon prompted me to add: "And, Mr. Holly, in regard to your future wife, I believe I do not aspire to that honor—and here is your ring." I drew off the little golden band and handed it to him.

"Nell, do you mean this?" inquired Jack, with his white lips.

"Yes, I do. I'm tired of your carping and criticizing. This affair may as well be ended now and forever, pettishly."

"So be it, then. Good-bye," said Jack, and without another word he left the room.

"To tell the truth, I hadn't meant half I said, and every minute expected that Jack would kiss me and we'd make up. But now he was gone forever. A mist came over my eyes as I watched the fast-disappearing train, and I would have indulged in a good cry, but just then the 'special' came puffing up, and the president of the road came in. He was a kind old gentleman whom I had known since I was a wee girl."

"Good day, Miss Nellie. Everything prosperous, I hope. Will you do a favor for me?"

"Certainly, sir, if I can."

"Well, you see, when we were coming down I met a man who owed me some money. Paid me six hundred dollars, and I don't know what to do with it, as we are going up in the woods to see about laying out a new road. We shall be gone two days. Don't want to take the money with me—will you take charge of it while I am gone?"

"If you'll trust me."

"Bless my soul! yes, of course. Here's the money. Must hurry away. Good morning."

"Scarcely had portly Mr. Sayre trotted away before Mr. Devarges came sauntering in."

"Got quite a little sum there, haven't you, Miss Nellie?" eyeing the bills in his hand.

"Yes," I replied, laughing. "Mr. Sayre has made me his banker. Look! Six hundred dollars! How rich I should feel if it were mine."

"You deserve to have much more, and doubtless that pretty face'll win it."

"Somehow his bold compliment failed to please, and so it was with coldness that I said: 'Take a chair, Mr. Devarges.'

"No, I thank you, Miss Nellie. I have an appointment. But will you allow to call on you this evening?"

"Well, I scarcely think I shall be at home. You know mother and sister Lulu are away, and a little while ago I got word from grandma saying that perhaps I had better come and stay all night with her."

"It was true that I had received such word from grandma, but I had not thought of accepting it. I had hoped that Jack would come and make up, and of course I didn't care to have Mr. Devarges all at the same time."

"What will you do with your money, Miss Nell?'" carelessly inquired Mr. Devarges.

"Oh, I shall put it right here in this drawer. No one knows about it, and it will be perfectly secure."

"Dare say! Good-morning," and with a courtly bow my admirer then left.

"All that day I busied myself at my duties, and when night came I put on the dress that Jack liked best and very anxiously waited for his coming."

"Seven o'clock! Eight o'clock! The last train had come and gone, and my duties for the day were over. I put out the light in the ticket office, went into the sitting-room and sat and waited. Ten o'clock! Half past ten! No use waiting any longer—he would not come."

"I shivered with a nameless dread and closed the door. I went to bed and cried myself to sleep."

"I had slept an hour, perhaps, and then awoke with a sudden start, feeling a great difficulty in breathing. A part of the quilt lay across my mouth, I thought; but on reaching my hand to remove it, I found it was a handkerchief saturated with—what? chloroform!"

"A thrill of terror passed over me. Who had done this? Was there some one in the house?"

"I silently arose and just then almost screamed as a sudden sound smote upon my ear. It was only the clock striking the hour of midnight. I placed my hand upon my heart to soothe its fierce throbs."

"Stepping along, carefully avoiding all obstacles, I reached the door, opened it, and advanced into the sitting-room. No one was there, but some one was in the ticket office, for I saw a light and heard a noise. What did they want? The money, oh, the money left in my charge! Somebody was stealing it, and what should I say to Mr. Sayre? My God! I might be accused of taking it myself, and thus lose honor and position!"

"Rather lose life," I said to myself. 'I'll defend that money until death!' and I looked around for some weapon."

"Under the stove was a large iron poker. Seizing it carefully, I started toward the office door."

"God aid me!" I said, with white lips, and then, opening the door of the office, I stole softly in. A man with his back toward me was at the other end of the room. He had forced open the drawer, taken out the money, and was looking gloatingly at the crisp green bills when I stole behind him. I had just raised the poker to strike him when he glanced around."

"My God! it was Clarence Devarges."

"Hang it! now I suppose I'll have to kill this pretty—" He seized me by the throat, and uttering a faint cry I sank down. Just then Jack, my own dear Jack, rushed in. I heard oaths, blows, fierce struggling, then all was dark."

"For the first time in my life I fainted away."

"When I recovered Jack's face was bending tenderly over me, and Jack's voice uttered loving words. I put my arms about his neck and cried like a weak baby."

"Aren't you hurt, Jack?"

"Not a bit, dearest. Devarges is disabled, though, with a pistol wound in his leg. 'Tisn't very severe, but will prevent his escape."

"How did you come here?"

"Why, you see, when we parted this morning, Nell, I thought I'd never see you again; but to-night after I came home I made up my mind to come and try and 'make up.'"

"I rather thought he was a scamp because, when I was in the city yesterday, the chief of police told me that they had reason to think that a noted gambler and 'blackleg' had come up in these parts. He gave a description, and it suited Devarges perfectly, all excepting a moustache you so admired was false, and fell off in our scuffle."

"Well, as I said, I saw Devarges prowling about, and I thought I would see what he was up to. He looked in the window at you, and I heard him mutter: 'The deuce take it! She is at home after all. What the deuce made her say she was going to her grandmother's? Now I suppose I'll have to wait till my pretty bird's asleep."

"So he sat down under one tree and I sat down under another. We both saw you open the door and look out. After you had been in bed about an hour, Devarges forced open the sitting-room window and crawled in. While he was in the office lighting the lamp I also got in at the window and concealed myself in the closet, and—well, you know the rest."

"Jack," said I, tearfully, 'you'll forgive me for being naughty and wayward, and you'll believe me when I say that I loved you all the time, won't you?'"

"Well, ma'am, Jack said he would, and we've been happy ever since. And this is my story, ma'am—my only romance."

"There, the baby has woken up! See him stretch out his arms! I do believe he wants to go to you. Would you like to take him? He isn't a bit afraid of strangers."

NEW BOOKS

Oregon: There and Back in 1877. 12mo., London. $2.00
The Great German Composers. 16mo., paper. 30
The French Revolution. By H. A. Laune. In two vols. Vol. I. 12mo., paper. 25
Lectures on Mediæval Church History. By R. C. French. 8vo. 3.00
Sound: Experiments in the Phenomena of Sound. By A. M. Mayer. 12mo., paper. 1.00
History of the Growth of the Steam-Engine. By R. H. Thurston. 12mo., paper. 2.50
Tests from the Buddhist Canon, "Dhammapadam." From the Chinese. By S. Beal. 8vo., paper. 2.50
Essays on the Sacred Language, Writings, and Religion of the Parsees. By M. Hang. 8va., paper. 4.50
Resumption and the Silver Question. By H. V. Poor. 12mo., paper. 1.50
Villages and Village Life. By N. H. Eggleston. 12mo. 1.75

NEW NOVELS.

The Clifton Picture. 8vo., $1.25; paper. 75
Molly Bawn. By the author of Phyllis. 16mo., $1.25; paper. 60
Sonia. A Russian Story. By Henry Greville. 16mo., $1; paper. 50

BANCROFT'S
721 MARKET ST. S.F.

FALK'S

MILWAUKEE BEER

Is made from first class materials, and is especially recommended by the medical profession for ladies and others suffering from general debility. It is strengthening and delicious to the taste. Ask your grocer for it, and take none other.

CUTTING &amp; MURRAY,

Sole Agents, 206 Front Street, S. F.

EDUCATIONAL!

French, Spanish, and Italian taught by Prof. Barthelemy de Filippis, by his easy, new method, saving months of studies. Classes for beginners will be formed September 20th; also private lessons. PACIFIC BUSINESS COLLEGE, 320 Post Street.

BUTTERICK'S

PATTERNS—FALL STYLES.

Send stamp for catalogue. AGENCY, 124 POST ST., San Francisco.

AURORA

EXPORT
Bottled Lager Beer

Is decidedly the finest Beer in the market.

For Sale Everywhere. TRY IT.

R. D. HUME & CO., AGENTS.

221 FRONT STREET.

RETURNED.

HAVING RETURNED FROM THE

East, I respectfully announce to my friends and the public that I shall resume practice on WEDNESDAY, Sept. 5th, 1875.

S. W. DENNIS, M. D., DENTIST,

No. 33 KEARNY STREET.

R. C. MOWBRAY, M. D., DENTIST,
224 STOCKTON ST., corner Post, S. F.

It is, perhaps, not much against Bret Harte that he is not a general favorite here. The few people who give the subject any thought affect to consider him ungrateful, and unmindful of the care and kindness which fostered his struggling talent when it was but opening. This is a fault characteristic of several literary lights whose candles were first lit on the Pacific slope, and their unanimity is so wonderful as to be entirely in their favor. Though Mark Twain writes but little that is not colored by his experience of mining life on this coast, and though Bret Harte is incapable of anything uninspired by the rugged grandeur and equally rugged life of the Sierra, neither of them display any great anxiety to visit us again. In fact, through all their utterances there breathes an undercurrent of "Thank God for our deliverance." In all Harte's stories there is a tone conveying to the reader the impression that this is a kind of life he has once known, but which he never wishes to be connected with again. Through Twain's humor there is a sneer which seems to indicate a not altogether creditable opinion of the surroundings. Perhaps they are not much to be blamed. People who rise to independence and social position are not likely to seek an intimacy with those who knew them when they were down and left them to fight their own battles; and, laying aside private friendship, Bret Harte and Mark Twain may well ask what California has done for them. It has done nothing. Years wasted in discomfort, talent kept down by discouragement and somewhat contemptuous neglect, are not incentives to pleasant recollections, and if the men who to-day receive as much for a few lines from a New York publisher as they received for a column from an unappreciative San Francisco newspaper in days gone by stick most closely to their new and warm friends, they can not be very severely censured. Bret Harte has many admirers in San Francisco, but he has many adverse critics. It may be that in some cases the animus against the man tinges the opinion of his work, but there is little doubt that the estimate of his literary ability held here is much nearer the truth than that held abroad. It is a proof of the poverty of American literature that the reading public of other countries have given him such an important place in the list of American authors. No man ever earned so great a reputation on a few clever but unequal sketches, a verse or two of fugitive poetry without even a name to remember them by, and one or two ambitious attempts conspicuous in failure to fulfill the early promise of the author. Bret Harte has no talent. He is a genius, and, like most geniuses, unreliable. To borrow a simile from our mining dictionary, he is a "pocket mine." There is rich ore in him, but it is only found in little bunches, and the spaces between are filled with barren rock. He can write when the fit is on him, but when the fit is not on him, the "wild horses of Arabia" can not drag anything brilliant out of him; a man with perceptive faculties strongly developed in one direction, and distorted by overweening sentiment, he is not an observer; he can not seize all the little points of interest in the life that surrounds him, but what he does observe he looks at through lens of extravagant sentimentality. He has fixed ideas of California character, and he finds in the gambler, the rough, drunken miner, and the degraded women of the mining camp, heroes and heroines who fill up all the niches in his gallery in scarcely changing form or characteristic. To a sentimental man the material is rich in imaginative study. One can draw such pathetic pictures of the hard, cruel, remorseless villain who has still beneath the crust a touch of honor and affection; of the rude laborer with the pick and shovel, who has, deep in his heart, warm recollections of pure and innocent love; of the debased camp-follower, who still has enough of womanly shame left to blush and stammer before her virtuous sister; and the eminently effective nobility which shines in the protection given by all these to trembling innocence and purity. There is no field so rich as the mining camp for the pen of the novelist, or the poet. And Bret Harte in his "Idyl of Red Gulch," in "Outcasts of Poker Flat," and in his minor poems, has given us little bits of sketching which make us sorry that he is so incapable of dealing with the subject fully. The best things he has given us have been crude and unfinished, and even The Outcasts, which abroad has done more for his reputation than any of his other pieces, is a very rough story outline, with one or two of the characters fairly filled in. His books have only served to show that his genius is uncontrollable, and that it obeys momentary conditions. In every thing there are pages which startle one with their beauty, their freshness, their finished and brilliant elaboration of poetic details. We turn the leaf and all is rapid and sketchy. The best has gone out and left the embers smouldering. But of one thing we are perfectly assured: that Bret Harte can not write a play, and the Two Men of Sandy Bar stands as an indisputable proof of that fact. There is possibly no piece on the stage to-day so clearly demonstrative of the difference between the faculties of writing and dramatizing. But if Bret Harte can not write a play, it is open to question whether Mr. Robson can recognize one. The actor must have taken it for granted that if such a celebrated author wrote a piece it must be a success. His experience in the East proved to him how cruelly he was mistaken. And yet there are few plays with such strong material in them. As a piece of dramatic construction The Two Men of Sandy Bar is about as miserable an attempt as ever was put on the stage; but there only lies the fault, and, with considerable alteration, which it would be worth Mr. Robson's while to undertake the expense of, we are certain it would be one of the best pieces ever produced on the American stage. If we take the story, as presented, and look at it from the point of view a dramatist should always take, as an entire stranger to Bret Harte and his sketches, there is simply no coherence in it at all. The first act opens at "Don Jose's" rancho, with the dismissal of "Sandy Morton," who, having saved "Doña Jovita's" life, is rewarded with a position as vaquero. "Don Jose" imagines that his daughter is in love with the vaquero, and that he means to elope with her. We know, of course, that the lover she goes to meet is "John Oakhurst," who, at Sandy Bar, had taken away "Sandy's" wife; but that is only vaguely told us with a very prejudicial effect on the intelligibility of the story. "Sandy's" father, who has run away with his brother's wife, or something of the kind darkly hinted at, appears with "Colonel Starbottle," looking for the lost son, and overhearing the arrangement between "John Oakhurst" and "Doña Jovita," in the dark, mistakes "John" for his son, and the act closes with the departure of "Oakhurst," on the understanding that his newly-found father will make it all right with the Don. Why old "Morton" should make the mistake is not very evident in the play, and things are considerably mixed even in that act. The second act shows us "Colonel Starbottle" at Sandy Bar in quest of another injured relative of "Old Morton," who, having reformed, wishes to make his atonement complete. This injured cousin turns out to be the schoolmistress of Sandy Bar, "Mary Morris." She is invited to accept a home under the old man's roof on Nob Hill in San Francisco. Exactly in what way she has been injured is not quite intelligible. From her own statement it is impossible to say whether her mother ran away with her cousin, or her cousin ran away with her mother; or they talked about it, but did not run away, or ran away, but did not talk about it. At all events she is offered this reparation, and "Sandy"—between whom and herself there is a mutual love—strongly advises her to accept the offer; she concludes to do so, especially when Mrs. Sandy comes in and begs her to take care of a child of which "Sandy" is the father. "Sandy" admits the soft impeachment, without, however, much affecting "Mary's" love for him. A Chinaman is here brought in, who gives a clue to "Concho," "Don Jose's" spy, establishing "Sandy's" identity with "Diego," the drunken vaquero, to whom we are introduced in the first act. What use "Don Jose" makes of this clue we are never told, but we have no doubt the author knows all about it. The third act is in San Francisco, on Nob Hill, from the magnificent veranda of which we have an admirably painted view of the city. Here "Sandy Morton," the real, is found drunk on a lounge, where he is recognized by "John Oakhurst," who has for a year been personating him with the father. The occasion is the wedding-day of "John Oakhurst," as son of "Old Morton," and "Doña Jovita." The impostor is struck with remorse, and puts a stop to all excitement by declaring his intention of confessing. We have but a faint impression of what is done in the rest of the act; but somehow or other everything is arranged. "Don Jose" calls for his carriage for his daughter and her husband, the reformed gambler; "Sandy" is forgiven and marries "Mary Morris"; and the audience goes home wondering what it has all been about—knowing only that some strong character drawing has been disjointedly set in picturesque setting, and dissatisfied that more has not been made of it. We have given the plot somewhat confusedly, but it is clearly and coherently stated compared with its development in the play. Every situation in the piece presupposes an acquaintance with the story which the audience does not possess. The relations between "Sandy Morton" and "John Oakhurst," as partners, and the quarrel which parted them—essential, in a dramatic sense—are so indefinitely stated as to lose all effect, and make their meeting at the end quite uninteresting. Why "Alexander Morton, Sr.," should recognize his son in the dark, and without further inquiry or examination accept him, is unintelligible. Why "Sandy Morton," always known by that name at Sandy Bar, should have been overlooked, in favor of a man of an entirely different name, is a mystery not explained in the play. It is very unlikely that "Mary Morris" would not have some suspicion from the similarity in the names. Where "Sandy Morton" has been before the first act, or what has taken place between the first and second acts, it is impossible for the audience to tell. At the end nobody seems much astonished to find the real "Sandy Morton" in the vaquero, "Diego," and the drunkard of Sandy Bar. Nor is it to be wondered at. It is only a wonder that the actors can form any intelligent conception of the piece at all. Even allowing for the unsatisfactory arrangement of the play, it is not well acted in most cases at the California. Mr. Robson has a perfect knowledge of his unfitness for the part of "Sandy Morton" as the author intended him to be. But if he does not give us a real and natural character, he plays it with considerable effect. Knowing that the peculiarity of his enunciation is apt to give a ludicrous point to almost anything he says, he has been at great pains to suppress it, and the effort reduces to absolute quietness the whole impersonation. But his "Sandy Morton" has strong elements of attraction in it, we might almost say of future success, in the pathos and earnestness with which he endows it. It is not by any means the worst performance in the piece, and we doubt if Mr. Robson would not do well to cultivate a vein which he has, as it were, struck by accident. His scene with "Mary Morris" is the most quietly effective we have seen for a long time, and Bret Harte's play will not suffer if he studies that conception of "Sandy Morton" to its fullness, and gives us just a little rougher appearance and a little more pronounced drunkenness. If Mr. Robson were starring in this part, it would be open to severe censure. As it is, we are glad he has given us an opportunity of judging Bret Harte's play, and we are satisfied to make every allowance for him. "Sandy Morton" may be, with study, and in a new arrangement of the piece, one of Mr. Robson's best parts yet. It and "Mary Morris" are the only two that linger with us. Miss Prescott calls for some praise for her playing of the latter. She has a good deal to learn yet; but in her "Mary Morris" she has a part which suits her, and she does fair justice to the stronger scenes. She has a marked tendency to over-acting, which she will do well to guard against. Mr. Bock makes up well, and plays "Don Jose" admirably. It is a pity he has not more to do. Mr. Barton Hill, as "John Oakhurst," does nothing to impart character to the gambler. He is like nobody but—Mr. Barton Hill. We hesitate to believe him when he tells "Doña Jovita" what kind of a man he is. Miss De Forrest, in dress, is a very natural "Doña Jovita," but she has not a very clear idea of the characteristics of the hot-blooded Spanish girl. Her address of welcome to "Old Morton" and "Starbottle" is sheer burlesque; and, indeed, she shows no genuine appreciation of her part in any of its details. Miss Long plays the servant very prettily, and looks it exactly. Mrs. Saunders is scarcely like a woman who could have been "Sandy's" wife; and, though the exigencies of a miner's life and the eccentricities of a miner's taste are things not to be judged by ordinary standards, the probabilities need not be accepted in extremis on the stage. She did her little part well. Mr. Crane stands out by himself in this piece, not altogether favorably. "Colonel Starbottle" can be made to suit Crane, but it suffers somewhat by the enforcement. He is a character, and, as such, grateful to the actor; but he loses by being made into farce, and played with the special attributes of Mr. Crane. It is a funny performance, but that is all. It is not a clever or talented impersonation, and we doubt if Mr. Crane is capable of raising it above the level he plays it on. The Spanish language was murdered generally. Last night The Comedy of Errors was given for the special benefit of the two comedians. On Monday night Mr. Frank Mayo appears in the time-worn idyl of Davy Crockett. It is said he has Billiards with him. We hope he will not dose us with his old repertory.

The Bush Street Theatre has fallen on good times. The boom in stocks draws all sorts of people to the theatre, and the audiences at Girofle-Girofle during the week have established the fact that opera bouffe is the taste of the public. The bills announced the production of the opera on a scale unprecedented, and the managers have kept faith very fairly. New scenery (certainly superior to any this little theatre has ever seen) and gorgeous dresses have imparted a tone to the performance worthy of the good audiences. But the very circumstances which give us the benefit of the new dresses and general brilliancy of display act as a drawback to our enjoyment of the music. The people are as new as the dresses, though they are all skilled in music, and seem to have a fair idea of what the necessities of the piece are. Mrs. Oates is drilling her company in the repertory which is to astonish the continent, and she has selected San Francisco for her rehearsals. It is obvious in the little hitches that occur in the business, and occasionally in the music, as, for instance, in "Stolen Kisses," where the male voices limp behind the tenor in the chorus. Making allowances for these little things, which we have no right to do, the performance of Girofle-Girofle is a very good one. At all events, pains have been taken to fit it up thoroughly, and whatever defects it shows do not arise from carelessness, but from want of familiarity on the part of the company with the play, the music, and one another. It is a wonderfully popular opera, and deservedly so, for in the whole round of such productions it has no equal in graceful, pretty, effective, and enjoyable music. We have heard the solos sung better, and the male voices in chorus have been more effective in other companies; but we judge that, altogether, Mrs. Oates has a company likely to make an impression everywhere. The second tenor, who made his first appearance in "Pedro," has been the most favorably received of all. His voice is ready and wants volume, but he sings very effectively, and for his pretty ballad in the first act he has received an encore every night. He, like some of the others, is new to the stage, we judge, but he only wants experience. Mr. Connell plays "Mourzouk" with an appalling realism. Mr. Beverly appears to better advantage as "Marasquin," and, but for raising some of his finest airs with a vile falsetto, he would be quite successful. Miss Stevens has gained confidence rapidly, and begins to act. It is all she has to do as "Paquita." Mr. Taylor is amusing as the old father—we might even say very funny. Mrs. Oates has not yet recovered her voice, and though she gets a recall in the "Brindisi," the compliment is due more to the merits of the composition than to her somewhat spasmodic rendering of it. If she does not get over that cold people will be inclined to say she has lost her voice. It makes a great difference in Girofle-Girofle when the prima donna can not do her part. On Monday evening La Perichole will be given on the same scale. With the new operas yet to come, the Oates engagement bids fair to be the success of the season.

Mr. and Mrs. Williamson have had their share, and a very handsome one, of public patronage, and Struck Oil seems to be more popular than it was before. It is astonishing what a difference it makes to the "go" of a piece to have a good gallery, and the balcony of Baldwin's has stirred up the actors to new life. Struck Oil is likely to be withdrawn on Sunday night, and The Emerald Ring put on on Monday. The play is John Brougham's, and is one of Barney Williams' greatest successes. Freaks of Fortune produced so unfavorable an impression from its failure before that it has been withdrawn, and Mr. Williamson will bring it out in its reconstructed form before a new audience, who will be able to pass an impartial judgment upon it.

The Loring Club gave a public rehearsal at Platt's Hall on Monday evening, before a large audience. The performance showed a marked and rapid advance on the part of the members. The programme comprised, among other pieces, "Hie thee, Shallop" (Kucken), "Sailor's Song" (Hatton), and "The Wanderer's Return" (Mendelssohn). The success of the evening was the Schubert-Liszt chorus, "The Almighty."

There is a delightful haze about Manager Kennedy. He sits wrapped in mystery at his little office at the Standard Theatre, and burns the midnight oil over correspondence with his agents in the East. Exactly how many people are employed in his service, picking up attractions for him, has not been clearly stated, but it has been customary to announce, whenever anybody who has been a deadhead at any of the theatres here, goes to New York, Chicago, or anywhere else, that he goes "to secure attractions for the Standard." It would seem that they are so scarce that it requires a lot of people to pick up any. Mr. Kennedy proposes to open next month, he says. To-morrow, and to-morrow, and to-morrow!

Letter-writing is not a lost art. Read this: "SAN FRANCISCO, May 6, 1878. 'DEAR CLAY: Rankin (McKee) is putting on heaps of airs. I saw him for a moment in the theatre the other day, and my salutation was: 'Ah! How do? How do?' Oh, heavens, Clay, I thought I should scream right out. They say that he has made $30,000 this season, but I bet he can't show $5,000, the old blow-hard! I hate people with the big head. Just as if a little money should make one lose one's head. I am sorry Alice (Mrs. Green) is not well. Give her my love, and tell her to 'brace up.' Great news; still, my heart, sit still! I am getting fat—111 pounds. Hurrah! I've never weighed so much in my life. Sincerely yours, 'KATE MAYHEW.'

Replying to this. Mr. Clay Green addresses her as "Dear Fatty." In a letter of March 5, 1878, Miss Mayhew, in speaking of Mr. Thompson, Mr. Green's partner, writes:

"Thompson must have been like a wet hen, flying around and worrying himself, and you, too, without any necessity. My hands are tied now, and have been, but my day will come, you bet; I am determined it shall come. Of course I will be all right then. I will show a certain gentleman (John E. McDonough) what 'my vague and elastic' is like now, you bet your boots."

A charming blackguard, this Mayhew girl.

The statement of the benefit of the Fifth Avenue Theatre, New York, for the yellow fever sufferers, shows $1,524 taken in and $1,325.60 paid over to the Mayor. Added to that is an amount of $104 subscribed, making in all $1,428.60. The California Theatre benefit here showed $2,644 taken in and remitted, all services having been given free.

The piece to follow the Williamson's engagement at the Baldwin will be a translation of La Femme du Peuple, now being played very successfully in England and the East. Miss Rose Wood will have the leading part, and it should be a great chance for her. Already the chorus is being gathered together for the coming opera season in January, and preparations are being made for the performances on a scale beyond any previous attempts in California. There should be now in San Francisco a very fine chorus procurable, and the want of it has heretofore been the main drawback.

Miss Eilly Coghlan, a sister of Rose and Charles Coghlan, will make her first appearance in a grand spectacular performance of Henry VIII., at Booth's Theatre.

CANDY-PULLING.

In the Eastern States there is a revival (perhaps it is a survival—à l'importe) of the old-fashioned social amusement of candy-pulling. We believe it has never been transplanted to the Pacific Coast, or if so has never taken root and flourished. In the hope of encouraging this kind of domestic sacchariculture we reproduce from an Eastern journal the following remarks and instructions thereon:

As a specimen of domestic industry, candy-pulling is at once fashionable, delicious, and frolicsome. There is nothing about the operation uncommon to the well-equipped manufactory; but the associations of a pulling party divest the manipulation of the stock entirely of the business element. Unfortunately it is he or she who, amid the charming romances of the period of early youth, has not revelled in the patient delights of making molasses candy. Young loves grew apace as well-battered fingers rolled, and picked, and kneaded the warm and savory mass of molasses. The shelling of peanuts and the cracking of walnuts, innocent operations as they were, furnished fuel for childhood jealousy, and sowed the seeds of many a school-day envy.

The candy-pull of to-day is more bewitching still. It is a social pastime for those who have thrown aside their marbles and dolls, and yet preserved their coquetry, their love of conquest, and their smartings of unappreciated advances, while encouraging a deeper and more pronounced sentiment. It affords ample opportunity for creating striking effects with costumes; it relieves participants of the embarrassment of appearing in strange parlors; it is more generous and home-like for all than the usual gatherings of fashion. But, with all these peculiarities, it does not call for the sacrifice of the first element of sovereignty of young womanhood, nor limit the exercise of the wicker of the sex.

Ladies are requested invariably to appear in an attire of calico. The party giving the entertainment procures a quantity of candy stock, and the necessary posts and hooks, and secures the attendance of an expert puller. The dining-room, relieved of much of its furniture, or, better still, the kitchen, where there is no danger of injury to carpets, is chosen for the work. The candy is stretched into a long roll, then made into a loop, which is thrown over the hook, and then the puller gently hauls away, until the strand grows long and thin, when it is taken off the hook, doubled up again, thrown on the hook, and again pulled out. By the time the expert puller has brought the mass into a pliable condition, it is cut up and divided among the party, who set about pulling it, using hooks whenever found, legs of tables, backs of chairs, or other fixed objects. When batch after batch has been pulled sufficiently, the candy is cut into small pieces and laid away to cool for eating. Refreshments follow, and then dancing.

The interest may be greatly heightened by combining the features of an apron and necktie party. A quantity of aprons and neckties, made of calico of various colors, but with little regard for durability, are distributed among the guests. The gentlemen adjust their neckties, and each seeks for a partner the lady whose apron corresponds in color or pattern with his tie. All sorts of rewards and penalties are established for the candy-pulling exercise, and the incongruities of the dancing couples are themes for long remembrance.

At Your Gate.

Ah me, for a word that could move you
Like a whisper of magical art!
I love you! I love you! I love you!
There is no other word in my heart.
Will your eyes that were loving still love me?
Will your heart, once so tender, forgive?
Ah! darling, stoop down from above me
And tell me to live.

At the Jardin des Plantes, Paris, a young sculptor, who was studying animals, made the acquaintance of a pretty and piquant nurse-girl, who, however, threw him overboard and took up with a soldier. The desolate young artist thereupon took to writing upon all the walls the heart-cries: "I love Adele," hoping that it would meet her eye and touch her heart. The willful girl, determined to escape this perpetual reproach to her perfidy, at last made her habitual resort the iron bench in front of the rhinoceros. The seat could not be written on and there was no wall. Here she and her soldier would sit by the hour, watched from afar by the jealous and distracted lover. At last they came at the usual hour, and the faithful girl glanced at the huge and ferocious animal. On its horn was carved a heart, beneath which were the words, "I still love Adele and am waiting at the duck-pond." How could a woman's heart resist this? Tears came to her eyes; in a moment the soldier's arm was encircling the ambient atmosphere, and the nurse-maid said to her youthful charges: "Come, my dears, let us go and see the pretty ducks."

The "life" of the Sisters Brontë ought to be written in tears; and perhaps it is in accordance with the fitness of things that one of them should find a resting-place in a dismal plot of ground, by no means suggestive of God's Acre, overhanging the German Ocean, near Bradford, England. Still one hardly likes to discover, close by the dusty roadside, a neglected grave, marked by a worn and sinking stone, with an almost obliterated epitaph: "Here lie the remains of Anne Brontë, daughter of the Rev. P. Brontë, Incumbent of Haworth, Yorkshire. She died, aged 23, May 28, 1849." And this brief and melancholy record is all that tells of the tomb of "Acton Bell."

A Bergen County man pleasantly sat down at breakfast, and his loving wife said: "Darling, does your head ache?" He replied with sufficient dignity: "No; why should you ask?" And she said back: "Well, dear, you came home at three o'clock this morning; and, as you couldn't hang your hat on the rack, you put the rack down on the floor, and said you'd hang every hat in the house on it, and I thought your head might ache."

Bleeding at the nose can be stopped by telling a man his parents were born in the poorhouse. His nose will stop, and yours will begin.

It is pretty hard work for a hard money bare-back rider to get up on a greenback horse and ride his act, but he'll do it, for office.

How we civilize Indians: Send them some missionaries, rob them, starve them, kill them for getting mad about it.

BUY A HOME.

We agree with the Alta, that George Barstow gave the people good advice in his speech at Metropolitan Temple on Wednesday evening. He said: "One man should no more be content to live in another man's house—if he can build one of his own—than one bird should take the risk of hatching in another bird's nest; and, for my own part, I would rather be able to own a cottage than to hire a palace. I would say to every man, buy a home, if you can, and own it. If a windfall has come to you, buy a home with it. If you have laid up money enough by toil, buy a home. If you have made money in stocks, buy a home. Do not let anybody tempt you to put all your winnings back into the pool. Take out enough to buy a home, and buy it. Put the rest back, if you will. Gamble on it, if you must; but buy the home first. Buy it, and sell it not. Then the roses that bloom there are yours; the clematis and jasmine that climb upon the porch belong to you. You have planted them and see them grow. When you are at work upon them, you are working for yourselves, not for others. If there be children there, then there are flowers within the house and without. Buy a home."

We have heard some whisperings that lead us to guess that Governor Stanford has purchased from Henry Casebolt his railroad track and franchise on California Street west of Fillmore. If this is true, then the California Street Railroad will be extended to the ocean, and if it is not true Mr. Casebolt will deny it in a card in the Alta. We hope it is true, because the California Street Railroad is, in our opinion, the best constructed and best managed of all our city roads and the Sutter Street, with its sprawling extensions, the worst built and worst managed. It seems so nice to ride in clean cars, propelled by reliable and staunch machinery, directed by gentlemen, that we wonder that all our avenue roads do not copy the California Street in point of cleanliness, order, and gentlemanly conductors and drivers. The California Street road secures enough pleasure-riding by tourists and moonlight riding by lovers to pay for all it expends in the direction of superior comforts or superior attentions to its passengers.

SPARKLING WINE.—Just at this moment there is a great scarcity of the imported brands of this wine in our market—the supply being limited and the prices higher than ever, a state of affairs very severely felt at all fashionable and social gatherings. It seems that without its sparkling presence no party can be lively, perfect, or enjoyable—the men are less witty and the ladies less amiable. Fortunately, to connoisseurs, this dearth in foreign brands has but little influence, for they recognize in Landsberger & Co.'s champagnes qualities of the greatest excellence combined with the most moderate prices. There are no more elegant or purer champagnes made than the famous Extra Dry Eclipse, the Grand Prize, Private Cuvee, and the Sparkling Muscatel, and their cost is one-half that of the imported wines. Just try them once and you will never regret it.

The purest and most delicate of all possible perfumes is the Yosemite Cologne, made by Slaven. It seems to combine in some magic manner the balmy breath of one's sweetheart with a dash of the moonlight in which one made her an offer of marriage and the music of the tones in which she was graciously pleased so respectfully decline. This may be fancy, but the Yosemite Cologne is a charming fact.

Call and see the fine display of new style plain and colored photographs, at Dames & Hayes Gallery, 715 Market Street.

This paper is printed with ink furnished by Chas. Eneue Johnson & Co., 509 South Tenth Street, Philadelphia, and 39 Gold Street, New York.

For silverware, go to Anderson & Randolph's, Clock Tower Building, corner Montgomery and Sutter Streets.

Mrs. Parker, of the Ladies' Depository, has opened a new store at 126 Post Street. She will be happy to see her former patrons. New Style Lace Patterns.

LADIES—NUMEROUS GOOD GIRLS APPLY DAILY for positions at my office. Your orders are filled by my lady clerk, a competent housekeeper, who knows how to select your help. Zeelandlaar & Co., 627 Sacramento Street, above Montgomery.

BOSTON DRESS REFORM.

California "Worth" Princess Suits, Skirts, and attachable Flounces: Cashmere and Merino Union Suits for ladies and children; ladies' and misses' shoulder-brace Corsets; Abdominal Corsets. No. 430 Sutter Street. A. W. BAKER, the only Dress Reform Agent in the city.

OPENING DAY

NEW BOOK & STATIONERY STORE.

*New Store,
New Books,
New Stationery.*

BILLINGS, HARBOURNE & CO.,
(SUCCESSORS TO C. BEACH.)

Respectfully announce that they will open their New Store,
NO. 3 MONTGOMERY STREET,

This day, SATURDAY, SEPT. 28, 1878. All are invited to call.

DECKER BROS

WEDDING AND OTHER PRESENTS OF

SOLID STERLING SILVERWARE BRONZES, CLOCKS, AND FANCY GOODS

The largest stock of artistic novelties in the city, at much lower prices than similar goods have ever before been offered.

ANDERSON & RANDOLPH,

Clock Tower Building, corner Montgomery and Sutter Sts.

We beg to inform our friends and all connoisseurs that we have received a shipment of the celebrated

POMMERY & GRENO CHAMPAGNE,

The favorite of all gourmets in Europe and the Eastern States. We guarantee the quality of this Wine to meet the demands of the most fastidious.

L. LEBENBAUM & CO., 529 and 531 Kearny St. and 1303 Polk St.

BALDWIN'S THEATRE.

THOMAS MAGUIRE.....MANAGER.
F. LISTER.....ACTING MANAGER.
G. R. CHIPMAN.....TREASURER.

This (Saturday) Afternoon and Saturday and Sunday Evenings, last performance of

STRUCK OIL,

—AND—

THE CHINESE QUESTION.

Monday, Sept. 30, third week of the engagement of

MR. & MRS. J. C. WILLIAMSON
(MISS MAGGIE MOORE).

First production in California of the romantic Irish Drama,

THE EMERALD RING.

Mike Macarty.....Mr. J. C. Williamson.
Maggie Macarty.....Mrs. J. C. Williamson.
In which she will sing "Fifty Years Ago," "Larry Malone," and "The Land of St. Patrick."

To conclude with the Farce,

THE FOOL OF THE FAMILY.

BUSH STREET THEATRE.

CHARLES E. LOCKE.....PROPRIETOR.

Saturday and Sunday Evenings and Saturday Matinee,

OATES ENGLISH OPERA CO.

Supporting the recognized Queen of English Comic Opera,

ALICE OATES.

Production upon an elaborate scale, after thorough preparation, the popular Opera Bouffe, in 3 acts, by Lecoq,

GIROFLE-GIROFLA.

In active rehearsal, Offenbach's revised

LA PERICHOLE.

Reserved seats may be secured at the box office every day. Prices as usual.
Matinee Prices—Admission, 50 cents; Reserved Seats, 75 cents. Children, half price.

CALIFORNIA THEATRE.

BARTON & LAWLOR.....MANAGERS.
BARTON HILL.....ACTING MANAGER.

This (Saturday) Evening, September 28, last night of
STUART ROBSON & WM. H. CRANE.

AN IMMENSE BILL.

JENNY LIND, COMEDY OF ERRORS, AND THE SPITFIRE.

Monday Evening, September 30, brief engagement of the favorite California Actor, MR.

FRANK MAYO

Who will appear in his original creation of

DAVY CROCKETT

New scenery by Voegtlin, and a powerful cast of characters.
Seats at box office.

PIANOS ARE THE BEST

ARE YOU

INSURED?

THE TRAVELERS

LIFE AND ACCIDENT

INSURANCE CO.

OF HARTFORD, CONN.,

GRANTS

Life and Endowment Policies,

LOW RATES, ALL CASH.

ALSO,

GENERAL ACCIDENT POLICIES

Solid Cash Assets.....$4,460,000
Surplus to Policy Holders.....1,225,000

Parties contemplating Life Insurance are invited to call before insuring elsewhere.

ALEX. M. DEAN, Gen'l Ag't,

NO. 403 CALIFORNIA ST., S. F.

JOE POHEIM

The Tailor,

203 Montgomery St. and 103 Third St., has just received a large assortment of the latest style goods.
Suits to order from.....$20
Pants to order from.....5
Overcoats to order from.....15

The leading question is where the best goods can be found at the lowest prices. The answer is at

JOE POHEIM,

203 Montgomery St. and 103 Third St.

amples and Rules for Self-Measurement sent free to any address. Fit guaranteed.

PUBLIC ADMINISTRATOR,

WILLIAM DOOLAN,

Office No. 12 Nevada Block.

BEST KOHLER & CHASE SAN FRANCISCO & CO.

PORTIA'S SPEECH ON MERCY.

The quality of mercy is not strained,
 You old bald-headed goose-butcher,
 It droppeth as the gentle rain from heaven
 Upon the place beneath. It is twice blessed—
 It blesseth him that gives and him that takes,
 But that is not saying you will ever
 Be blest by it, you miserable sneak thief!
 'Tis mightiest in the mightiest; it becomes
 The throned monarch better than his crown,
 Or better than any suit of clothes he can wear,
 I don't care if he has the garments made
 To order and pays $75 in cash for them.
 His sceptre shows the force of temporal power,
 The attribute to awe and majesty,
 Wherein doth sit the dread and fear of kings,
 But mercy is above this sceptred sway.
 It is enthroned in the hearts of kings,
 As I could prove to you in a holy second
 Were you not drunker than a liled owl.
 Therefore, my an'cut, walleyed friend,
 Though justice be thy plea, consider this,
 That in the course of justice none of us
 Should see salvation; but as to that,
 I'll bet you five dollars against a rotten apple
 That you'll never get close enough to Salvation to see it with 'em.
 Ferry-horse power telegraph.—Old City Press

Herman Schuster, a respectable German of St. Louis, woke the other morning to find himself dead. He saw a statement in the morning papers to the effect that he was defunct, and all that was mortal of him reposed in the Morgue. He immediately, upon receipt of this information, repaired to that somber institution, and there, sure enough, lay his body on a marble slab with the water trickling over it. Every feature was life-like and natural—the nose, the hair, mustache, facial scars, clothing, all the exact counterparts of his own. He was about to accept the irrevocable decree of fate and retire, when a faint hope occurred to him. He had not seen the eyes. "Vot is de color of dose eyes?" excitedly demanded he of the attendant. The lids were raised. "Mine Gott!" shouted the poor fellow, "dot pesh not mine body. Dose eyes is blue und mine is black. Gott in himmel, vat a glose schlate dot vos."

A member of the colored church was the other evening conversing earnestly with an acquaintance, and seeking to have him change into better paths, but the friend said he was too often tempted to permit him to become a Christian. "Whar's yer backbone, dat ve can't rise up and stand temptation!" exclaimed the good man. "I was dat way myself once. Right in dis very town I had a chance to steal a pair of boots—mighty fine ones, too. Nobody was dar to see me, and I reached out my hand and de debil said take 'em. Den a good spirit whispered for me to let dem boots alone. 'An' you didn't take 'em?' "No, sah—not much. I took a pair o' cheap shoes off de shelf, an' I left dem boots alone!"

A HAND.

How often a hand may be won or lost
 By lucre, or lands, or love!
 How often a heart may be madly lost
 By "somebody's" stolen glove!
 And broken hearts lie in the bartered hands,
 As cold as a sculptured stone;
 And life has been given for loveless lands,
 Instead of for love alone!

In the far away past a hand was mine,
 And a heart was in the hand!
 And I felt the thrilling of joy divine,
 That lovers will understand,
 I never shall hold such a hand again!
 Yet a hand that I never kissed;
 And regrets are useless, and sorrow vain—
 For twas but a hand at whist!

Several years ago the reverend and venerable Dr. Jeter, of Virginia, was holding a Wednesday night service, and a very slim audience was present. After lecturing for a half hour, he gave out a hymn to close the exercises. No one belonging to his own denomination being present to raise the tune, he called on a Methodist brother present of the name of Moon. He said:

"Brother Moon,
 Will you raise the tune?"

But brother Moon had no hymn book, as was unacquainted with the spiritual songs of the Baptist Church; therefore he replied, extemporaneously:

"Brother Jeter,
 What's the meter?"

She was a Boston girl. She was visiting her Whitehall country cousins. While walking out, several butterflies passed her.

"O dear me, what charming little birds. They are perfectly exquisite."

"They are not birds, my dear," replied her country cousin; "they are butterflies."

"Oh, you don't say so! Then these are the dear little creatures that fly from flower to flower and gather the sweet yellow butter that we use? They are too lovely for anything."

One Thanksgiving day, a Celtic dame called at an apothecary's, and asked what was good for a man. "Why, what's the matter with your man?"

"Please, sir, is it castor-oil or salts that's good for him?"

"How can I tell unless you let me know what is the matter with him?"

"Is it the matter with him? Bless God, there's nothing the matter with him; but he has a leisure day, and thought he would take something!"

A countryman stepped up to Mr. Parnum, the other day, and shook hands with him. "Nawuw, look here, Barnum! You advertise a procession three miles long, and you know 'taint as long as that." "Yes, 'us," said P. T., without moving so much as an eyelid. "Did you see it to-day? There was full a mile of my show, and there were two miles of fools following it."

Young man, if you want to prohibit the mosquitoes from troubling you, get a fair partner. Get one so sweet that they'll do all their singing on her side of the bed. You can snore and enjoy yourself while she's knocking holes in the air with her dear little fists.

When a fourteen pound Bible falls from the pulpit desk on the toes of the preacher while he is praying—well, we can't tell what his mental reservations are.

Things are coming to a pretty pass. A man can't kill his wife now without being called an uxoriicide. Is this another scheme of the grinding capitalist?

"Black bury jam," said he, as he gazed at an overcrowded cemetery for colored people.

ARLINGTON HOTEL,

SANTA BARBARA, CAL.

NO HOTEL ON THE PACIFIC
 Coast can surpass the ARLINGTON in the airy cheerfulness and convenience of its arrangements. None can equal it in the natural and artistic beauty of its surroundings. The readers of the ARGONAUT will be pleased to know that the problem of combining solid comfort within doors, inexhaustible pleasure without, and calm contentment all the time, at a very economical rate of expenditure, has been solved at the ARLINGTON, and is respectfully submitted by GEO. T. BROWLEY, Manager.

BERKELEY GYMNASIUM

The Berkeley Gymnasium (a preparatory school to the University)—a first-class boarding-school establishment in the interests of higher education, and in opposition to the cramming system of the small colleges and military academies of the State. The next term will commence July 24th. Examination of candidates for admission July 22d and 23d. By request, instructions have been provided during the summer months for students preparing for the August examinations at the University. For catalogue or particulars, address

JOHN F. BURRIS, PRINCIPAL,
 BERKELEY, CALIFORNIA.

NOTE.—We desire to call special attention to the organization of our Grammar Department, separate from the Academic, and solicit the patronage of parents and guardians of small boys.

GOLDEN GATE ACADEMY

AND CADET SCHOOL.

Next quarter will commence October 7, 1878.

For circulars, address

D. P. SACKETT, A. M., Principal,
 Oakland, Cal.

REDINGTON'S FLAVORING EXTRACTS

ARE THE PERFECTLY PURE
 and highly concentrated Extracts of

FRESH FRUITS

Prepared with great care. They are put up in superior style, in a bottle holding TWICE as much as ordinary brands of Extracts.

Comparing quality and contents, none other are nearly so cheap.

Wherever tested on THEIR MERITS, they have been adopted in preference to all others, and now are the

STANDARD FLAVORING EXTRACTS

Of the Pacific coast. Dealers will find them to give better satisfaction to the consumer than any other kind, and are respectfully requested to give them a trial.

REDINGTON & CO.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District, of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

MARY E. HENRY, plaintiff, vs. JAMES J. HENRY, defendant.—An action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to JAMES J. HENRY, defendant:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days; otherwise within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony existing between plaintiff and defendant (as will appear more fully by reference to the complaint on file herein, to which your attention is hereby directed), and for general relief and costs of suit.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded. Given under my hand and seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this Third day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight.

THOS. H. RYANOLIS, Clerk.
 By W. STEVENSON, Deputy Clerk,
 T. J. CROWLEY, Attorney for Plaintiff,
 No. 529 Kearny Street.

GEO. W. PRESCOTT. IRVING M. SCOTT. H. T. SCOTT.

UNION IRON WORKS

(Founded 1849.) Post Office Box 2128.

COR. FIRST AND MISSION STREETS,
 SAN FRANCISCO

MANUFACTURERS OF

Compressed Engines,
 Air Compressors,
 Rock Drills,
 Portable Hoisting Engines,
 Marine Stationary and Portable Boilers
 Baby Hoists, complete.

CONSTANTLY ON HAND AND FOR SALE,

Direct-acting Pumping and Hoisting Engines,
 Upright and Stationary Engines,
 Quartz Crushing and Amalgamating Machinery,
 Blake's Rock Breakers,
 Smelting Furnaces,
 Quicksilver Pumps,
 Chlorodizing Furnaces,
 Cornish Pumps,
 Steam Pumps.

All manufactured by us of the best materials, design, and workmanship, and furnished at lower rates than by Eastern manufacturers.

PRESCOTT, SCOTT & CO.

O. F. WILLEY & CO.,

IMPORTERS AND MANUFACTURERS OF

FINE CARRIAGES AND WAGONS

No. 427 MONTGOMERY ST., SAN FRANCISCO.

Agents for the sale of Wagons manufactured by
 BREWSTER & CO., New York,
 W. D. ROGERS, Philadelphia,
 C. S. CAFFEY, Camden, N. J.,
 WOOD BROTHERS, New York,
 H. KILLAM & CO., New Haven,
 COOLING BROS., Wilmington

ALSO, AGENTS FOR

HARNESS MANUFACTURED BY WOOD GIBSON,
 TOMPKINS & MANDEVILLE, AND
 A. H. DUNSCOMB.

Also, a fine assortment of Robes, Blankets, Nets, Whips, etc.

MUSIC BOXES

OF ALL DESCRIPTIONS AND OF

Standard Reputation, playing from one to over one hundred airs. The largest and best assortment in this city. MUSICAL BOXES WITH CHANGEABLE CYLINDERS always on hand. New and interesting styles constantly received. Call and examine our stock.

REPAIRING OF MUSICAL BOXES thoroughly done in all their particularities.

M. J. PAILLARD & CO.,

MANUFACTURERS AND IMPORTERS,

120 Sutter Street, San Francisco.

Branch of House, 680 Broadway, New York.

MILLER & RICHARD, EXTRA-HARD METAL SCOTCH TYPE.

SPECIAL AGENTS FOR

THE CAMPBELL, HOE, AND PEERLESS PRESSES.

No. 529 COMMERCIAL STREET.

And 205 Leidesdorff Street, San Francisco.

MOODY'S

Drug and Prescription STORE,

Northwest corner Polk and Pine Streets.

Prescriptions prepared with care from the purest of Drugs and Chemicals.

S. B. WAKEFIELD,

Member S. F. Stock and Exchange Board.

A. W. FOSTER,

S. S. WAKEFIELD & CO.

STOCK & EXCHANGE BROKERS,

314 First Street, San Francisco.

CONSOLIDATED IMPERIAL MIN-

ing Company.—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Gold Hill, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Directors, held on the 12th day of September, 1878, an assessment (No. 7) of twenty (20) cents per share was levied on the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room No. 8, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the seventeenth (17th) day of October, 1878, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and, unless payment is made before, will be sold on TUESDAY, the seventh (7th) day of November, 1878, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

W. E. DEAN, Secretary,
 Office—Room No. 8, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

CALIFORNIA FARMERS' MUTUAL

Fire Insurance Company

[ESTABLISHED IN 1874.]

Paid up Capital ..... $200,000
 Assets exceed ..... 326,000

PRINCIPAL OFFICE, 209 SANSOME ST.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

THOS. FLINT, President. J. W. FOARD, Manager.

FRED. K. RULE ..... Secretary.

I. G. GARDNER ..... General Agent.

COMMERCIAL

INSURANCE COMPANY OF CALA,

FIRE AND MARINE.

Principal office, 405 California Street, San Francisco.

JOHN H. WISE, President.

CHAS. A. LATON, Secretary.

THE STATE INVESTMENT

—AND—

INSURANCE COMPANY, FIRE AND MARINE

CASH ASSETS.....$450,000

Principal Office, 218 and 220 Sansome Street, San Francisco

OFFICERS:

A. J. BRYANT, President,
 RICHARD IVERS, Vice-President,
 CHAS. H. CUSHING, Secretary,
 H. H. WATSON, Marine Surveyor

CROWN POINT GOLD AND SILVER

Mining Company.—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Gold Hill, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 13th day of September, 1878, an assessment (No. 35) of one dollar per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 10, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the twenty-third (23d) day of October, 1878, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and, unless payment is made before, will be sold on WEDNESDAY, the thirteenth day of November, 1878, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

JAMES NEWLANDS, Secretary,
 Office, Room 10, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

CHOLLAR-POTOSI MINING CO.

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia Mining District, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the fifth (5th) day of September, 1878, an assessment (No. 15) of five dollars per share, was levied on the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 8, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the eighth (8th) day of October, 1878, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction, and, unless payment is made before, will be sold on TUESDAY, the twenty-ninth day of October, 1878, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

W. E. DEAN, Secretary,
 Office, Room 8, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

OPHIR SILVER MINING COMPAny.—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 10th day of September, 1878, an assessment (No. 33) of one dollar per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, No. 203 Bush Street, Room 9, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the 15th day of October, 1878, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction, and, unless payment is made before, will be sold on MONDAY, the fourth day of November, 1878, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

C. L. MCCOY, Secretary,
 Office—No. 203 Bush Street, Room 9, San Francisco, California.

SAVAGE MINING COMPANY.

Location of works, Virginia, Storey County, Nevada. Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Directors, held on the sixth (6th) day of September, 1878, an assessment (No. 35) of one dollar ($1) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 15, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the eighth (8th) day of October, 1878, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and, unless payment is made before, will be sold on MONDAY, the twenty-eighth day of October, 1878, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

E. B. HOLMES, Secretary,
 Office—Room 15, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—OFFICE OF

the Eureka Consolidated Mining Company, Nevada Block, Room 37, San Francisco, Sept. 16th, 1878.—At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above named company, held this day, a dividend (No. 35) of three dollars per share was declared, payable on Friday, Sept. 20th, 1878. Transfer books closed until Saturday, the 21st inst.

W. W. TRAYLOR, Secretary.

CHAS. N. FOX.

M. B. KELLOGG.

FOX & KELLOGG,

ATTORNEYS AND COUNSELORS

AT LAW, San Francisco, Cal.

Office, No. 530 California Street, Rooms 1, 2, and 3.

COMMENCING SUNDAY, JULY 14, 1878.
Passenger trains will leave San Francisco, from Passenger Depot on Townsend Street, between Third and Fourth, as follows:

8.30 A. M. DAILY for San Jose, Gilroy, Hollister, Tres Pinos, Pajaro, Salinas, Soledad, and all Way Stations. At Pajaro, the Santa Cruz R. R. connects with this train for Aptos and Santa Cruz. At Salinas the M. & S. V. R. R. connects with this train for Monterey. STAGE connections made with this train. PARLOR CAR attached to this train.

10.40 A. M. DAILY for San Jose and Way Stations.

3.30 P. M. DAILY (Sundays excepted) for Gilroy, Pajaro, Hollister, Tres Pinos, and Way Stations. STAGE connection made with this train at SANTA CLARA for Pacific Congress Springs.

4.40 P. M. DAILY for San Jose and Way Stations.

6.30 P. M. DAILY for Menlo Park and Way Stations.

SUNDAYS AN EXTRA TRAIN will leave for San Jose and Way Stations at 9.30 A. M. Returning, will leave San Jose at 6.00 P. M.

EXCURSION TICKETS to San Jose and other points and return sold on Saturdays and Sunday mornings. Good for return until following Monday, inclusive.

Also, Excursion Tickets to Monterey—good from Saturday until following Monday, inclusive.

A. C. BASSETT, H. R. JUDAH, Superintendent, Asst. Pass. & Tkt. Agt.

SOUTHERN DIVISIONS.

Passengers for points on the Southern Divisions of the road will take the cars of the Central Pacific Railroad via OAKLAND, leaving SAN FRANCISCO via Ferry Landing, Market Street, at 4.00 P. M. daily, and making close connection at GOSHEN for Summer, Mohave, LOS ANGELES, Wilmington, Anaheim, Colton, Colorado River, and YUMA.

NORTH PACIFIC COAST RAILROAD.

CHANGE OF TIME.

On and after Monday, August 5th, 1878, the two new, fast, and elegant steamers SAN RAFAEL and SAULITO will run between San Francisco and San Rafael as follows:

WEEK DAYS.

Leave San Francisco	Leave San Rafael
7.15 A. M. for San Rafael.	6.30 A. M. for San Francisco.
8.15 " " " " " "	8.00 " " " " " "
9.40 " " " " " "	9.00 " " " " " "
1.45 P. M. " " " " " "	12.00 " " " " " "
4.10 " " " " " "	3.20 P. M. " " " "
5.10 " " " " " "	4.45 " " " " " "
6.10 " " " " " "	5.45 " " " " " "

(From Saucelito Ferry, Market Street.)

5.30 P. M. for all points between Saucelito and San Rafael.

1.45 P. M. Through train for Duncan Mills and way stations. Stage connections made daily, except Monday, for all points on North Coast.

SUNDAYS. (Via San Quentin Ferry.)

Leave San Francisco	Leave San Rafael
10.00 A. M. for San Rafael.	8.35 A. M. for San Francisco.
12.30 P. M. " " " "	11.15 " " " " " "
3.15 " " " " " "	1.45 P. M. " " " "
5.45 " " " " " "	4.30 " " " " " "

(Via Saucelito Ferry.)

8.00 A. M. Excursion train, connecting at Junction with train for San Rafael.

6.45 P. M. for San Francisco.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

Road Trip Tickets between San Francisco and San Rafael have been reduced as follows: Week days, 75 cents; Sundays, 50 cents.

W. R. PRICE, General Ticket Agent.

JNO. W. DOHERTY, General Manager.

SAN FRANCISCO AND NORTH PACIFIC R. R.

Commencing Monday, July 29th, 1878, and until further notice, Boats and Trains will leave San Francisco (Washington Street Wharf), as follows:

3.30 P. M. DAILY, Sundays excepted, Steamer "James M. Donahue" (Washington Street Wharf), connecting with Mail and Express Train at Donahue for Petaluma, Santa Rosa, Healdsburg, Cloverdale, and way stations. Making stage connection at Lakeville for Sonoma; at Geyserville for Skaggs Springs, at Cloverdale for Ukiah, Lakeport, Mendocino City, Highland Springs, Bartlett Springs, Soda Bay, and the GEYSERS.

STAGE connections made at Fulton on the following morning for Korbels, Guerneville, and the Redwoods.

(Arrive at San Francisco 10.15 A. M.)

SUNDAY EXCURSIONS AT REDUCED RATES.

8.00 A. M., Sundays only, via Donahue, for Cloverdale and way stations. Fares for the round trip: Donahue, $1; Petaluma, $1.50; Santa Rosa, $2; Healdsburg, $3; Cloverdale, $4.

Connection made at Fulton for Laguna, Forestville, Korbels, Guerneville, the Russian River, and Big Trees. Fares for round trip: Fulton and Laguna, $5.50; Forestville, Korbels, Guerneville, $3.

(Arrive at San Francisco 6.55 P. M.)

Freight received from 7 A. M. to 3.00 P. M. daily (except Sunday).

TICKET OFFICE, WASHINGTON STREET WHARF.

ARTHUR HUGHES, Gen. Manager. A. A. BEAN, Sup't.

P. E. DOUGHERTY, Gen. Pass. and Tkt. Agent.

R. P. & H. N. CLEMENT,

ATTORNEYS-AT-LAW,

Nos. 2, 3, and 4 SNERMAN BUILDING,

Montgomery Street, N. E. corner of Clay, San Francisco

(P. O. Box 707.)

NEWTON BOOTH, C. T. WHEELER, Sacramento,

J. T. GLOVER, W. W. DODGE, San Francisco

W. W. DODGE & CO.,

WHOLESALE GROCERS,

Northwest corner Clay and Front Streets, San Francisco.

C. P. R. R.

COMMENCING TUESDAY, SEPT.

24, 1878, and until further notice, TRAINS AND BOATS WILL LEAVE SAN FRANCISCO:

OVERLAND TICKET OFFICE at FERRY LANDING, MARKET STREET.

7.00 A. M. DAILY, VALLEJO Steamer (from Market Street Landing), connecting with the trains for Napa (Stages for Sonoma), Calistoga (The Geysers), and Sacramento. Connecting at Davis (Sundays excepted) for Woodland and Knight's Landing, and at Woodland for Williams.

(Arrive San Francisco 8.10 P. M.)

7.00 A. M. DAILY, LOCAL PASSENGER Train (via Oakland Ferry), arriving at San Jose at 9.45 A. M. Connecting at Niles with train via Livermore, arriving at Tracy at 11.30 A. M., and connecting with Atlantic Express. (Arrive San Francisco 6.05 P. M.)

8.00 A. M. DAILY, ATLANTIC Express Train (via Oakland Ferry, Northern Ry., and S. P. & T. R. R.) for Sacramento, Marysville, Redding (Reynold, Or.), Colfax, Reno (Virginia City), Palisade (Eureka), Ogden, and Omaha. Connects at Galt with train arriving at Ione at 3.40 P. M.

(Arrive San Francisco 5.15 P. M.)

SUNDAY EXCURSION TICKETS TO SAN PABLO AND MARTINEZ AT REDUCED RATES.

10.00 A. M. DAILY, (VIA OAKLAND FERRY), Local Passenger Train to Hayward and Niles. (Arrive San Francisco 6.05 P. M.)

3.00 P. M. DAILY, SAN JOSE Passenger Train (via Oakland Ferry and Niles), stopping at all way stations. Arrive at San Jose at 5.20 P. M. (Arrive San Francisco at 9.35 A. M.)

3.00 P. M. DAILY, NORTHERN Railway Passenger Train (via Oakland Ferry) to San Pablo, Martinez, and Antioch. (Arrive San Francisco 9.35 A. M.)

4.00 P. M. DAILY, SOUTHERN Express Train (via Oakland Ferry, Northern Ry., and S. P. & T. R. R.) for Lathrop (Ferry, Stockton), Merced, Madera, Visalia, Summer, Mojave, Newhall (San Buenaventura and Santa Barbara), LOS ANGELES, Santa Monica, Wilmington, Santa Ana (San Diego), Colton, and Yuma (Arizona Stages and Colorado River Steamers). Sleeping cars between Oakland, Los Angeles, and Yuma. (Arrive San Francisco at 12.35 P. M.)

4.00 P. M., SUNDAYS EXCEPTED, Vallejo Steamer (from Market Street Landing), connecting with trains for Calistoga (The Geysers), Woodland, Knight's Landing, and Sacramento, and at Sacramento with passenger train, leaving at 9.35 P. M., on Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays only, for Truckee, Reno, Carson, and Virginia. Sleeping cars between Vallejo and Carson. (Arrive San Francisco 11.10 A. M.)

4.00 P. M., SUNDAYS EXCEPTED, Sacramento Steamer (from Washington Street Wharf) for Benicia and Landings on the Sacramento River. (Arrive San Francisco 8.00 P. M.)

4.30 P. M. DAILY, THROUGH Third Class and Accommodation Train, via Oakland Ferry, Northern Ry., and S. P. & T. R. R.) connecting at Lathrop with train arriving at Los Angeles on second day at 11.55 A. M. (Arrive San Francisco 7.30 P. M.)

4.30 P. M. DAILY, LOCAL PASSENGER (via Oakland Ferry) to Hayward, Niles, and Livermore. (Arrive San Francisco 8.35 P. M.)

5.00 P. M. DAILY, OVERLAND Emigrant Train (via Oakland Ferry and Northern Railway) to Ogden, Omaha, and East.

Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains at "Melrose."

FERRIES AND LOCAL TRAINS.

FROM SAN FRANCISCO, DAILY.

To	To	To	To	To	To	To	To
Oakland.	Alameda.	Ferrisville.	Oakland.	Niles.	Berkeley.	Street.	Daly.
A. M. 7.10	A. M. 7.00	A. M. 7.00	A. M. 7.10	A. M. 7.10	A. M. 7.10	A. M. 7.10	A. M. 7.10
P. M. 12.30	P. M. 12.20	P. M. 12.20	P. M. 12.30	P. M. 12.30	P. M. 12.30	P. M. 12.30	P. M. 12.30
7.30	7.20	7.20	7.30	7.30	7.30	7.30	7.30
8.00	7.50	7.50	8.00	8.00	8.00	8.00	8.00
8.30	8.20	8.20	8.30	8.30	8.30	8.30	8.30
9.00	8.50	8.50	9.00	9.00	9.00	9.00	9.00
9.30	9.20	9.20	9.30	9.30	9.30	9.30	9.30
10.00	9.50	9.50	10.00	10.00	10.00	10.00	10.00
10.30	10.20	10.20	10.30	10.30	10.30	10.30	10.30
11.00	10.50	10.50	11.00	11.00	11.00	11.00	11.00
11.30	11.20	11.20	11.30	11.30	11.30	11.30	11.30
12.00	11.50	11.50	12.00	12.00	12.00	12.00	12.00
12.30	12.20	12.20	12.30	12.30	12.30	12.30	12.30
1.00	1.00	1.00	1.00	1.00	1.00	1.00	1.00
1.30	1.30	1.30	1.30	1.30	1.30	1.30	1.30
2.00	2.00	2.00	2.00	2.00	2.00	2.00	2.00
2.30	2.30	2.30	2.30	2.30	2.30	2.30	2.30
3.00	3.00	3.00	3.00	3.00	3.00	3.00	3.00
3.30	3.30	3.30	3.30	3.30	3.30	3.30	3.30
4.00	4.00	4.00	4.00	4.00	4.00	4.00	4.00
4.30	4.30	4.30	4.30	4.30	4.30	4.30	4.30
5.00	5.00	5.00	5.00	5.00	5.00	5.00	5.00
5.30	5.30	5.30	5.30	5.30	5.30	5.30	5.30
6.00	6.00	6.00	6.00	6.00	6.00	6.00	6.00
6.30	6.30	6.30	6.30	6.30	6.30	6.30	6.30
7.00	7.00	7.00	7.00	7.00	7.00	7.00	7.00
7.30	7.30	7.30	7.30	7.30	7.30	7.30	7.30
8.00	8.00	8.00	8.00	8.00	8.00	8.00	8.00
8.30	8.30	8.30	8.30	8.30	8.30	8.30	8.30
9.00	9.00	9.00	9.00	9.00	9.00	9.00	9.00
9.30	9.30	9.30	9.30	9.30	9.30	9.30	9.30
10.00	10.00	10.00	10.00	10.00	10.00	10.00	10.00
10.30	10.30	10.30	10.30	10.30	10.30	10.30	10.30
11.00	11.00	11.00	11.00	11.00	11.00	11.00	11.00
11.30	11.30	11.30	11.30	11.30	11.30	11.30	11.30
12.00	12.00	12.00	12.00	12.00	12.00	12.00	12.00
12.30	12.30	12.30	12.30	12.30	12.30	12.30	12.30
1.00	1.00	1.00	1.00	1.00	1.00	1.00	1.00
1.30	1.30	1.30	1.30	1.30	1.30	1.30	1.30
2.00	2.00	2.00	2.00	2.00	2.00	2.00	2.00
2.30	2.30	2.30	2.30	2.30	2.30	2.30	2.30
3.00	3.00	3.00	3.00	3.00	3.00	3.00	3.00
3.30	3.30	3.30	3.30	3.30	3.30	3.30	3.30
4.00	4.00	4.00	4.00	4.00	4.00	4.00	4.00
4.30	4.30	4.30	4.30	4.30	4.30	4.30	4.30
5.00	5.00	5.00	5.00	5.00	5.00	5.00	5.00
5.30	5.30	5.30	5.30	5.30	5.30	5.30	5.30
6.00	6.00	6.00	6.00	6.00	6.00	6.00	6.00
6.30	6.30	6.30	6.30	6.30	6.30	6.30	6.30
7.00	7.00	7.00	7.00	7.00	7.00	7.00	7.00
7.30	7.30	7.30	7.30	7.30	7.30	7.30	7.30
8.00	8.00	8.00	8.00	8.00	8.00	8.00	8.00
8.30	8.30	8.30	8.30	8.30	8.30	8.30	8.30
9.00	9.00	9.00	9.00	9.00	9.00	9.00	9.00
9.30	9.30	9.30	9.30	9.30	9.30	9.30	9.30
10.00	10.00	10.00	10.00	10.00	10.00	10.00	10.00
10.30	10.30	10.30	10.30	10.30	10.30	10.30	10.30
11.00	11.00	11.00	11.00	11.00	11.00	11.00	11.00
11.30	11.30	11.30	11.30	11.30	11.30	11.30	11.30
12.00	12.00	12.00	12.00	12.00	12.00	12.00	12.00
12.30	12.30	12.30	12.30	12.30	12.30	12.30	12.30
1.00	1.00	1.00	1.00	1.00	1.00	1.00	1.00
1.30	1.30	1.30	1.30	1.30	1.30	1.30	1.30
2.00	2.00	2.00	2.00	2.00	2.00	2.00	2.00
2.30	2.30	2.30	2.30	2.30	2.30	2.30	2.30
3.00	3.00	3.00	3.00	3.00	3.00	3.00	3.00
3.30	3.30	3.30	3.30	3.30	3.30	3.30	3.30
4.00	4.00	4.00	4.00	4.00	4.00	4.00	4.00
4.30	4.30	4.30	4.30	4.30	4.30	4.30	4.30
5.00	5.00	5.00	5.00	5.00	5.00	5.00	5.00
5.30	5.30	5.30	5.30	5.30	5.30	5.30	5.30
6.00	6.00	6.00	6.00	6.00	6.00	6.00	6.00
6.30	6.30	6.30	6.30	6.30	6.30	6.30	6.30
7.00	7.00	7.00	7.00	7.00	7.00	7.00	7.00
7.30	7.30	7.30	7.30

CHICKERING
PIANO WAREROOMS,
31 POST ST., Mechanics' Institute Building.
ELEGANT PIANOS.
L. K. HAMMER,
Sole Agent for Pacific Coast.
28 Owners of Chickering Pianos are specially requested to leave orders for tuning at warerooms, 31 Post Street.

MUSIC
KNABE PIANOS,
IRVING PIANOS, ROGERS' UPRIGHT PIANOS,
Prince Organs, Waters' Organs, Sheet Music.
BANCROFT, KNIGHT & Co.,
733 MARKET STREET.

PIANOS
SCHOMACKER AND HENRY F. MILLER CELEBRATED PIANOS.
Pianos Tuned, Rented, and for Sale on the Installment Plan.
WOODWORTH, SCHELL & Co.
12 Post Street San Francisco.

HOME INDUSTRY
UPRIGHT PIANOS
THE HEMME & LONG
FIRST CLASS PRICES LOW
COR. SUTTER & MONTGOMERY STS. S.F.

GROVER & BAKER
ELASTIC STITCH
SEWING MACHINES.
THE HIGH REPUTATION OF THE
Grover & Baker Machine is the result of true worth and long years of honorable service.
J. W. EVANS, 29 Post Street.

THOMAS BOYSON, M. D.
(University of Copenhagen, Denmark),
PHYSICIAN AND SURGEON. Office and Residence, 112 Kearny Street. Office hours, 11 A. M. to 2 P. M., 6 to 8 P. M. Sunday 11 to 1 only. Telephone in the office.

RARE ENGRAVINGS AND ETCHINGS.
W. K. VICKERY NOTIFIES HIS
customers and the public that he has removed to a larger and more convenient office at No. 23 Kearny Street (next door to Snow & May's), where he has a large collection of these beautiful and rare Works of Art. To those who can not visit his collection, he will be glad, on receipt of a postal card, to take a portfolio of Engravings for inspection at their residence any forenoon or evening. 23 Kearny Street. Hours, 1 to 5 P. M.

THE PACIFIC LAND AND TRUST CO.
RENT HOUSES,
COLLECT RENTS, MANAGE ESTATES
HOUSES AND LOTS FOR SALE
in this city, Oakland, and Alameda. Lands and Ranches for sale in all parts of the country. Agents in the principal cities. Collections made throughout the coast.
No. 534 CALIFORNIA STREET.

RUPTURE.
BUY NO TRUSS
Until you see what has been accomplished by DR. PIERCE'S late invention.
Call or send for New Illustrated Book. Prices reduced.
MAGNETIC ELASTIC TRUSS CO., 609 Sacramento Street, San Francisco.

PACIFIC BUSINESS COLLEGE,
230 Post St., San Francisco.

THE CAL. FURNITURE M'FG CO.
HAVE FIVE TIMES AS MUCH
FURNITURE
As any other house on this Coast, which has been purchased so low that we CAN and WILL sell at such prices that the poor can gratify their WISHES and the rich their TASTE. At the old stand,
NOS. 224 AND 226 BUSH STREET, S. F.

HERRMANN'S

FALL STYLES
ARE NOW OUT AT
336 KEARNY STREET, BETWEEN BUSH AND PINE, & 910 MARKET STREET, ABOVE STOCKTON.
SEND FOR ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE.

TERRACE SWIMMING BATHS
FOOT OF WEBSTER STREET, ON CENTRAL AVENUE, ALAMEDA BEACH, now open to the public, and pronounced by the "elite" of San Francisco and Oakland as the only place for a good bath on the Pacific Coast. Perfect security against monsters of the deep. High water at all times of day and night.
SPECIAL ACCOMMODATIONS FOR LADIES UNATTENDED.
Reached in thirty-five minutes from San Francisco by steamer NEWARK—depot on the premises; or C. P. R. R. to Mastic Station, or from Oakland by horse-cars at Broadway Station, running within two blocks of the Baths.
BATHS, 25 CENTS, including Private Room, Bathing Suits, Towels, Shower Baths, etc.
R. HALEY & C. A. EDSON, Proprietors.

MISS K. McCARRICK,
MILLINERY PARLORS
135 KEARNY STREET, NEAR SUTTER, UP STAIRS.
The finest assortment of French Millinery Goods in the city always on hand.

MRS. M. M. COLEMAN,
DRESS MAKING PARLORS
NO. 115 KEARNY STREET,
Rooms 13, 14, and 15, over Keane, O'Connor & Co., San Francisco.

JOHN E. QUINN,
1400 Polk Street, corner Pine.
THE LARGEST AND BEST SELECTED STOCK OF
FANCY GOODS, LADIES' AND GENTS' FURNISHING GOODS, DRESS TRIMMINGS, KID AND LISLE THREAD GLOVES,
And all the popular novelties in the Fancy Goods line, outside of Kearny Street.

FINE GOODS.
H. A. CALLENDER,
650 MARKET ST.
Below Kearny.
JEWELER.
LOWEST PRICES

BUY YOUR SHIRTS AT

MORRIS, SCHWAB & CO.
FINE-ART DEALERS.
FREE ART GALLERY.
A complete assortment of ARTISTS' MATERIAL, GOLD FRAMES, etc.
19 AND 21 POST STREET.

WEBER
PIANOS ARE THE BEST
WAREHOUSES, N. W. CORNER KEARNY AND SUTTER STREETS.
SHERMAN, HYDE & CO.
SHEET MUSIC, MUSIC BOOKS, MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

ALASKA COMMERCIAL CO.
No. 310 SANSOME STREET,
WHOLESALE DEALER IN FURS.

H. P. WAKELEE & CO.,
Wholesale and Retail
Druggists, Importers of Foreign and Domestic Drugs, Chemicals, and Perfumery,
No. 140 Montgomery Street, under the Occidental Hotel, San Francisco.

PARTICULAR ATTENTION PAID
to compounding Physician's Prescriptions, the dispensing of which is entrusted only to the most competent hands, while every care is taken to ensure the purity of all preparations.

HOME IN THE COUNTRY.
NOOK FARM.
FAMILIES WISHING TO SPEND
the Summer in the country will find this a cheerful home, and beautiful scenery of such endless variety as tempt to healthful exercise and recreation. We furnish good accommodations and an excellent table. Good fishing and hunting on the premises. Four trains from San Francisco pass the station daily. Address
E. B. SMITH,
Rutherford, Napa County, Cal.

T. J. PETTIT & CO.'S
LABEL, SHOW CARD, ENGRAVING AND PRINTING ESTABLISHMENT,
528 CALIFORNIA STREET, SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

J. C. MERRILL & CO.
SHIPPING
—AND—
COMMISSION MERCHANTS,
Agents for the
SANDWICH ISLANDS AND OREGON PACKET LINES.
204 AND 206 CALIFORNIA ST. - - San Francisco.

PALACE HOTEL RESTAURANT,
FIRST CLASS IN ALL RESPECTS.
QUIET AND DESIRABLE PLACE
for Ladies, Gentlemen, and Families. 227 Entrance south side of Court. A. D. SHARON.

RE-OPENED.
HAYWARD WAREHOUSES
Are now receiving
GRAIN ON STORAGE.

THE PATRONAGE OF FARMERS
and others is respectfully solicited. Storage, one dollar per ton for the season. Advances and Insurance effected at the lowest rates.
Refer by permission to Chas. Webb Howard, President Spring Water Valley Company, Bray Bros., M. Waterman & Co., San Francisco; John Zeile, Hayward's; J. West Martin, President Union Savings Bank, Oakland.
R. H. BENNETT, Proprietor.

BEAMISH'S

The Argonaut.

VOL. III. NO. 13.

SAN FRANCISCO, OCTOBER 5, 1878.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

THE DIARY OF A WOMAN.

Translated for the Argonaut from the French of Octave Feuillet.

[He who signs these pages is, properly speaking, only their editor. How they were confided to him, how he became authorized to publish them, what modification of their details has been imposed upon him, are questions about which the reader will care nothing if this autobiography interests him, and still less if it does not.]

May, 1872.—While I was at the convent my trimestrial reports ended almost invariably with this statement as to character: "Cheerful disposition, sober minded, grave beyond her years, even tempered, but of somewhat unquiet conscience."

The "unquiet conscience" I do not deny, but as for the rest, I beg those ladies' pardon, it was just the contrary. As my dear mistresses were mistaken, it is not surprising that the world should be also. I imagine that my personal appearance is the cause of these erroneous judgments. I am very brown and pale, and my face from tedious discipline is as stern as a young effeminate face well can be. A certain near-sightedness lends an expression of indifference to my black eyes (whose lustre, without this unfortunate circumstance, would certainly have proved unbearable). Moreover, I have naturally a quiet way of speaking, walking, sitting down, and of not making a noise, which gives to the observer the false impression of impassible serenity. I have no desire, nor have I the means, of correcting public opinion in this respect, and until further orders my locked book will alone know that the grave, prudent, and well balanced Charlotte is, at bottom, an excessively passionate and romantic young person.

And that is precisely the reason why I have delayed inaugurating this magnificent locked book, bought with enthusiasm three days after leaving the convent, and which waited three years for my first confidences. Twenty times have I sat down before these pure white pages, burning like King Midas' barber to intrust them with my secrets; twenty times has my "unquiet conscience" caused me to lay down my pen. That conscience told me that I was about undertaking an unprecedented and a dangerous thing; that the habit of enregistering my impressions, of refining my sentiments, of hugging my dreams and giving them a body, would have its inevitable consequence, that of raising in me a store of romance and passion—a dangerous tendency in a woman, which might be fatal to the repose and dignity of my life, and which I ought to stifle and destroy.

A few words spoken by my grandmother this evening have, thank God, relieved me of these scruples. We had some people to dine with us, and afterward they played the game of Secretary. Questions were written on slips of paper, which were folded, put into a basket and mixed together. Then each person took out a question haphazard, and answered it as well as they were able. But one of our guests, a young member of the Chamber of Deputies, who prides himself upon his intuition, managed always to receive his own question so as to answer it with more effect. Thus he asked: "What is a dutiful woman?" I was charged with opening the slips, and read his question and his answer, which was thus conceived: "A dutiful woman is a woman who looks not for romance in life, for there is none that is good; who seeks not in it for poetry, for duty is not poetic; who looks not there for passion, for passion is only a polite name for vice."

A concert of flattering murmurs, in which I had the baseness to join, hailed these few sentences, while the author betrayed his incoherence by a modest smile. He was, however, disturbed in the midst of his triumph by my grandmother, who suddenly stopped her netting work and exclaimed: "Oh, oh, excuse me! but I can not let such heresies pass unanswered before these young ladies. Under pretense of making woman dutiful, would you make them fools? First, I do not understand this mania that people have of always opposing passion to duty—passion here, duty there—as if the one was antagonistic to the other. One may put passion into duty, and not only one may, but one should do it. And I would even assure you, my dear sir, that therein lies the secret of the lives of honest women, for duty alone is very dry work. You say it is not poetic! That is precisely my opinion; but it must become so if one is to have any pleasure in practicing it. It is precisely in thus poetizing vulgar duty that those very romantic dispositions against which you launch your anathemas serve us. If you ever marry, try the effect of marrying a woman devoid of romance, and you will see what will happen!"

"What will happen?" said the young Deputy.

"Well, everything in life will appear flat and insipid to her. Her husband!—pardon me—then her home, her children, even her religion! Ah, mon Dieu! I assure you, dear sir, that it is not against romantic ideas that one should warn the present generation; the danger for the moment does not lie there. We are not perishing from over much enthusiasm, but rather from inanity. But to return to our humble sex, which alone is in question. Look at the women who are talked about in Paris—I mean those who are too much talked about. Is it their poetic imaginations which ruin them? Is it the search for the ideal which leads them astray? Eh, seigneur! three-quarters of them at least are made up of the emptiest skulls and most barren imaginations in creation. Believe me, ladies, give yourselves no uneasiness; continue to be enthusiasts and romantic without fear of consequences. Try hard to keep a grain of poetry in your hearts, for by it you will more easily be honest, and more assuredly be happy. Poetic sentiment in the home of woman is like incense and music in the house of God—like that delight which comes of well doing."

Thus spoke my dear grandmother—may God bless her!—and that is why I, at the hour of midnight, and with peaceful conscience, at last open my precious locked book, that I, face to face with myself, dare say: Good night, romantic, passionate Charlotte!

May 30.—I was in my boudoir yesterday, rattling over my piano and exercising the notes of my voice, when Cécile de Stèle burst in like a whirlwind, as she always does, took my two hands in hers, offered me her two rosy dimples to kiss, and said, in her short, vehement tones: "Charlotte, are you still my cherished sister—my guide, my help, my little spirit mother, my gold heart, my tower of ivory?"

"Why this litany, ma mignonne?"

"Because it is in your power to render me an immense service. Only think, my father is going away!"

"Is the General going to leave Paris?"

"For some weeks only. He is about to make a tour of inspection in the provinces; and in the meanwhile he sends me to the country at l'Eure—to my Aunt de Louvercy's, in the midst of the woods. My Aunt de Louvercy is the best of women; but she lives alone there, in her old château, with her son—my cousin Roger, you know—who is half crazy since he was so frightfully wounded during the war. He has no arms, no legs, not even a human face, poor boy! It is most pitiable! You may judge what a home it is. So I said to my father: 'Father, I will go—though it is exile, despair, death—if you will only let me take Charlotte d'Erra with me.' 'Take her,' said he; and so I am going to take you with me."

"But, my dear child—"

"Oh, now, don't say no, I pray, or I shall expire at your feet! Make me this sacrifice—and, who knows, perhaps we may not be bored to death there after all. We two will get out of it somehow. We will ride on horseback; we will play four-handed pieces; and then, besides, there must be neighbors in the environs. Well, my dear, we will turn their heads—you with your imperious beauty, I with my little wits, with that, I don't know what, which belongs to me, and which is commonly called du chien."

My black eyebrows came together, and, in my deepest contralto, I exclaimed:

"What do you call that, Cécile?"

She drew herself up with an air of bravado, and, showing one of her sharp little teeth, repeated: "Du chien."

"Who taught you such slang?"

"My father," said she.

"Ah! your mother would scold your father were she alive."

She looked at me fixedly with her large, bright eyes, which filled with tears—kissed my hands and replied, in a low, supplicating tone: "But you will come?"

"But, ma chérie, I can not leave my grandmother!"

"Your grandmother! I take her, too. I have thought of everything. I have written my aunt, and here, in her own handwriting, is a most pressing invitation for her. Take me to her."

Two minutes afterward Cécile precipitated herself into the parlor, pushing the door open roughly. My grandmother, who is frightened at the slightest noise, started inside her three screens.

"Ah, mon Dieu! An accident has happened! I will bet that an accident has happened! Come, tell me immediately. What is it, what is it?"

"A letter from my Aunt de Louvercy, madame."

"Oh! Poor Madame de Louvercy! Poor woman! How does she do? How she is tried; and her poor son! Ah, mon Dieu! the poor people! Well, what does she want of me?"

"If you will have the goodness to read, madame!"

My dear grandmother read the letter and looked serious. When she raised her eyes she saw Cécile kneeling on the carpet at her feet with joined hands, and reaching out toward her her pretty face with its two dimples.

"Really, do you see that?" said my grandmother. "Do look at the pretty mouth!"

"You will, madame?" said Cécile.

"Mon Dieu! my dear child," replied my grandmother, while kissing her brow: "I will say, as a general thing, that I am not passionately fond of removals. I even hold them in profound horror. But on the one hand, I find that this is a little holiday arranged between you and Charlotte; and on the other hand, Madame de Louvercy has sent me so tender, so warm an appeal; besides, she inspires me with so much compassion, poor woman! But let it be well understood, pretty one, that when I do move I like to be located for some time. To travel some where, just to go in and go out again; to unpack my trunks and pack them again without taking breath—no, that will never do. I would not wish to impose myself upon your aunt; but this invitation—for how long is it?"

"Just as long as you please, madame; six weeks, two months."

"Ah, well! but that is too long," said my grandmother.

In short, it was agreed that the Countess d'Erra and I should go in ten days to meet my friend Cécile at Louvercy. She left yesterday. Ten days will hardly suffice for our preparations, which are considerable, as one may judge from the simple fact that my grandmother takes with her the three screens to exercise those currents of air which she says must rage through the old château. With my deceitful placidity I oversee those stupendous packings, while dreaming of belfry, of north tower, of galleries, of ancestors, and of ghosts; and also of that poor, mutilated, and half-crazed young man, whose groans doubtless mingle with the wind as it whistles through the long corridors. Ah! how enchanting it all is.

May 28.—This morning I received a letter from Cécile which presents the visit at Louvercy under new colors—less sombre, but perhaps less attractive to me. Here it is:

"CHATEAU DE LOUVERCY, May 27.

"MY DARLING:—You will tremble. It was a trap! In whom can one trust after this? My father, my aunt—both so generally esteemed, whose lives up to this day have been irreproachable—to think of their joining together in a dark plot against a feeble child."

"It was on Monday, at five o'clock in the evening, I arrived at the station (where there is, by the bye, a blind man who plays the 'Marseillaise' on his flageolet. I tell you this so that you may stop at that station, and not at another). I reach the station, and rush into the arms of my aunt. 'How do you do, my dear aunt?' 'How do you do, niece?' We get into the carriage, and had not exchanged four words when I perceived that there was something in the wind. My aunt embarrassed, her language mistified, her words obscure: 'There are visitors at the château.' They feared that I should be lonely while waiting for my friend Charlotte. 'Oh, my aunt, how could you think so?' They have got together a little circle of friends of my own age. Two young ladies, relations of the late Monsieur de Louvercy, Mesdames de Sauves and de Chagres. 'Thank you, aunt,' 'Then their two husbands.' 'Bravo, aunt.' 'Then the two brothers of these ladies; two well bred young men, remarkably well bred.' (Aside, disturbed)—'Hem! hem!' (Aloud, with indifference)—'Really, aunt.' 'Tell me, have you brought some handsome dresses with you, niece?' 'Quite the contrary, aunt; I was so far from expecting to meet visitors at your house.' 'At your age you should be prepared for every thing, my child.'

"Do you take, ma belle? Do you see the plot peeping out? Do you see the plan they are preparing?"

"Finally, we enter the courtyard of the château; there is a fountain in the middle of it with swans, and around it are Mesdames de Sauves and de Chagres, with their husbands, and those remarkable brothers, forming an interesting family circle. I bow, I blush, I jump out, I kiss Mesdames de Sauves and de Chagres, and I run off quickly to change my dress, while the echo repeats behind me: 'She is charming, charming, charming!'

"My suspicions thoroughly aroused in the first hour were only confirmed during the evening, the next day, and the day after that. My aunt's gloomy château is suddenly transformed; it has become a pleasure ground, an enchanted castle, the théâtre of gallant fêtes and chivalrous tournaments, with a vague odor of orange blossoms behind the scenes. There are walks for the morning, horseback rides during the day, and dances and charades at night. Personally, I am caressed, spoiled, idolized; my tastes, my slightest desires are divined, considered, and more than fulfilled, before I can express them. This emulation is really touching. I quietly wish for a bouquet of camellias, and there it is! One of the Boisier's bags—behold it! A fire-colored parrot—there is the fire-colored parrot! A gilt cage to put it in—and the cage is before me. The moon—there is the moon!"

"You see, darling, how very serious all this is. There is not a shadow of a doubt but that my perfidious aunt and my guilty father have resolved to marry me alive. There are two pretenders for my hand between whom I am allowed to choose. Permit me to introduce them. Mesdames de Sauves and de Chagres have each a brother, and these young men, who are cousins, bear the family name, Messieurs René and Henri de Valnesse. Just here I am reminded of those historical parallels in which you excelled at the convent (between Charles the Fifth and Francis the First, for example. Do you remember? If one was the more skillful politician, the other was the more valiant warrior, etc.) To apply to the Messieurs Valnesse this rhetorical process, I would say if one is dark, the other is fair; if one uses an eye-glass, the other uses a pince-nez; that the one sings sentimental romances which make me weep, while the other sings comic songs which make me laugh. Both look well on horseback and on foot, both are good waltzers, agreeable talkers, well brought up, of fortune about equal. And both, if I can trust to appearances, are equally disposed to lay these fortunes at the feet of the innocent who writes these lines.

"You will ask, is your choice made? No, ma divine, my choice is not made. They please me to about the same degree. As I can't marry both, I await my wise Charlotte, to receive her counsel and develop a preference. Thy choice will be my choice, thy God my God! Come, then, O my darling, without delay, for all this is terrible, and you know there will be but little humanity in leaving long in such a predicament the most loving of friends,

CÉCILE DE STÈLE.

"P. S.—In the meantime, my poor cousin Roger, gloomy and morose, keeps to his tower, leaving it only to dash through the fields in his basket dog-cart and behind the most vicious beasts. My aunt insists that he chooses them on purpose, and that they want to kill himself. Very sad, is it not? Good-bye, darling. Come soon."

This letter troubled me considerably. Cécile is almost a sister to me. Though of about the same age, there has always been in the affection I bear her a shade of maternal feeling. The great event which is preparing for her fills me with emotion—with joy, but yet with anxiety. I want so much that she should be happy. She deserves to be so, the dear girl! So winning, so tender, so sincere! A crazy-pate to be sure, but with heart so true and pure—always self-sacrificing, and always ready to acknowledge her faults.

She has in her, as she is never tired of repeating, a little of both devil and angel—but, above all, of angel. This light, lively, tender creature has need, more than any other woman it seems to me, to be well married, well loved, and well guided. So I am much alarmed at the responsibility her loving confidence is putting upon me. I am very young and very inexperienced to direct the choice on which her destiny will hang. But I will, at least, aid her with all the zeal and conscience of which I am possessed. And it seems to me that in doing so I shall be even more exacting for her than I should be for myself. Messieurs de Valnesse must look out for themselves, for here comes the archangel with flaming sword who guards the gates of paradise!

Château de Louvercy, June 6.—My dream is realized; there is a North Tower, and I am living in it. How delightful!

But let us proceed in due order. Grandmother and I arrived this afternoon. In getting out of the car, the first object we saw was the blind man and the flageolet; then Madame de Louvercy and Cécile in an open landau; then two young horsemen who pranced about the little yard of the station, calming with hands and voices their horses when the locomotive whistle had somewhat frightened. From a stolen look of Cécile's I recognized the two admirers, and immediately their persons passed under a rigid inspection, while they, it seemed to me, paid me the same compliment. My first impressions were favorable. I found happy, open countenances, such as inspire confidence—the faces of honest men—and my heart melted.

We rolled along over the white road through a cloud of dust, with our cavaliers as escorts at each door. The sky was a delicate opal blue. The Normand apple trees, with their bouquets of pink blossoms, defied to the right and to the left of us. Cécile, radiant in a light, sky blue dress, pressed my hands and threw out her smiles right and left to keep the balance true. We were so happy! My God! how good it is to live sometimes.

I had not seen Madame de Louvercy for several years. She has aged astonishingly, and her hair has whitened, but frames gracefully her fine, suffering face. Under her eyes are two bluish creases, made certainly by her tears. She speaks little of her troubles, and only by allusion. I heard her, as we traveled along, tell my grandmother that, for a while, the unfortunate condition of her son entirely absorbed her thoughts; but, at last, she was forced to remember that Cécile had no longer a mother, and that she had a duty to perform to her also. All this was said reservedly, unhesitatingly, and with a smile of welcome very touching, coming as it did from such a well of inconsolable sadness. The poor woman is all the more to be pitied in that her son was charming, so they say, before he became mutilated, lamed, and half-disfigured by these horrible wounds.

The noise of the wheels was all at once deadened on the grass and moss, and we enter the avenue under bowers of green, through which I perceive beyond the façade of the château, elegant and severe, and of the renaissance style, I think. Here is the court yard, which is at the same time a flower garden. There are the swans, who flap their wings as we pass; Mesdames de Sauves and de Chagres, who wave handkerchiefs from the veranda; and their husbands, who throw away their cigars and wave their hats. It is a triumphal entry. The young couples are very agreeable to look at, and seem so good.

The instant after, Cécile installs grandmother and I in our rooms. While I shake off the dust of the journey, she questions me with warmth: "Well, tell me quick; at bird's eye view how do you find them?"

"At bird's eye view I find them tres distingués."

"Truly? Let me kiss you? But which do you prefer? say quick, the blonde or the brun? Monsieur René or Monsieur Henri?"

"So far I prefer neither the one nor the other. And you, ma mignonne?"

"Did I not write that I awaited your coming to develop a preference?"

You will tell me which one pleases you the most, and I will take him."

"I assure you, Cécile, that your confidence crushes me."

"Listen. I will place you at table between these two gentlemen. You must study them; study them profoundly, you understand. I am going to tell you what I desire to know, and on what you must examine them most particularly, and after dinner you will render me an account of the result. Well, I desire to know first, which of the two has the truest and warmest affection for me; then—and this is very important—which of them has the best disposition; then, which is the most intelligent and learned, for I wish a husband who will do me honor; then, the one who is the most generous and charitable. I hold much to this point. Then, which one likes to travel the best—I count much on that also. Then, which—don't laugh now, Charlotte, for this is a serious matter."

"I laugh, Cécile, because you really ask too much for one sitting; but I will attend to it, and do my best."

Cécile then left me with my maid, and I prepared for dinner. I put on a simple dress—a confidant's dress—dark colored, with half waist; a bit of lace in the hair, Spanish fashion, and a red rose stuck in above it. I am not a fright, and that suffices.

[CONTINUED IN NEXT NUMBER.]

Ninety-five piano manufacturers are awaiting with breathless suspense the day when the French exhibition awards will be made, and each will get the first prize.

"SALTED."

A Bodie Speculator Relates the History of a Mine.

"Gimme a whisky toddy, barkeep; an' there's the las' button off o' Gabe's coat. Come up, boys—ev'rybody—taiot of'en you fellers'll hev a show to nail down yer coffin lids 'ith gol' spikes out o' salted diggins. It's a fac', boys—ye needn't star. That tar yaller piece represents a pile so high—the las' color of a clean up of a thousan' solid rocks clear money. What racket did I play? Well, it's too good to lose, so I'll tell ye. Here's fun—drink hearty, boys. Eh! Change? Oh, you needn't be pertickler about a bit or two; an' I hev seen the time—not two weeks back nuther—w'en ye might a gathered in the hull piece an' I wouldn't a squealed; but I mus' make that little balance las' me 'til I play it on some more 'Frisco suckers. Did I play 'em? Well, now, I reckon I did, an' ye hear my gentle whisper. Ye see I located my reglar fifteen hundred an' stuck up my paper in the fust rush to the Bodie Distric'—got my pinters in Pioche just afore Pete Eslington an' Louie Lochbar sold the Standard, an'—Hullo! Steve, is that you? Why, you ol' pilgrim, derned ef I knowed ye. Git out from behin' that noospaper an' shake. Readin' the Stock reports! Don't talk stocks to me—I've played the smoothest sharps on Californy Street, I hev, played 'em fine, ye hear me. What on? Why Broadaxe, o' course. Wasn't I sinkin' on Broadaxe w'en you was in Bodie? What're ye laughin' at? I s'pose ye think I'm lyin'. Well, mebbe it is a purty tough yarn considerin' the crowd I raked down the scads from. Don't keef ef I do. Gimme the same, barkeep. Well, Stevey, ol' man, what d'ye know? Aint been speculatin' agin, I hope. Sho! No! Is that so? Busted clean agin, eh? Well, well, well. Up to-day, down to-morrow—that's the game we're tryin' to beat now. What buy? Singlederry! Well, you are a fool an' no mistake. Why I could a give ye pints and a better buy than that. I'd a give ye the deadwood on a Comstock—straight ez a string from the diamond drills. They could a throwed mud at ye 'til hell froze over an' never a fazed ye; an' ez fur margins—why ye could a come up smilin' ev'ry time yer broker let out 'ith his better—ye'd a thought it better 'youn to pugle'n to go on a tear 'ith the ol' boys, cause ye see ye'd hev 'em in the door on the las' turn. But you will fall onto a hoggin deal, an' I s'pose ye'll never learn that ef ye straddle a blind in a short card game 'ith up an' up sports, keen to sweep the board, that ye're bound to be cinched, savey? How'd I make the rifle? Well, I'll tell ye.

"As I was sayin' I located in the fust rush—alone, mind ye—no dummies—no partners, not much. I wasn't playin' to be give away, ye understand. I sunk on my ledge an' drifted at about forty feet, but the indications wasn't good an' I concluded I'd wait 'til Californy Street heerd o' the excitement. Bodie was just a boom'n—tender feet an' pilgrims a humpin' 'emselves to git to the bluff. Fust we had a raft o' Cornishmen down from the Comstock; then Tuscorora sent us a small bilin'. After that a Custer City cuss or two dropped down, an' bimeby a gang o' Pioche fighters come in to look aroun'. I wasn't watchin' the little games o' these roosters very close, an' one mornin' w'en I went out to my claim I was warned off. Henry rifles an' Webby whislers wasn't my gait, so I laid low fur developments. I knowed that Pioche didn't hev no bank o' Californy to back 'em an' pay fur the dead loads o' giant powder they'd need to open another drift, an' I wasn't afeared they'd tumble too quick to the racket I was puttin' up—the job was too smooth. It turned out jist ez I'd calkerlated, an' one fine mornin' the ledge was abandoned.

"I heard of it in Bridgeport an' humped over to put up some more paper, but I was too late. A gang from Eureka hed relocated, an' a crowd o' Austin roughs was layin' round waitin' to be paid fur puttin' 'em off. The game was too interestin' fur me, an' so I didn't take a hand. Bill Stevens was chief o' the Eureka crowd, an' Irish Tom headed the Austin gang. One night in Bodie Tom declared himself, an' Stevens stood Tom off. Bill dropped at the third fire, an' Tom jist hed strength enough left to thank the boys fur pullin' off his boots, w'en he climbed into clar daylight, too. Then it was lively. Fur three days the peaceables was kep' dodgin' aroun' corners an' bustin' through bar-room winders, gettin' out o' range o' flyin' bullets. The nex' one that passed in his checks was Curley Sam—died ez game ez a man ken die, darin' Joe Carter to come into the road an' settle it 'ith the knife—standin' full breasted in front o' the door where Joe was crouchin'. Joe laughed a shiverin' sort o' a laugh, an' sent his las' shot home from behin' the bar-room screen—like a low down, sneakin' coyote. But he didn't too! His horn more'n twelve hours arter—Joe didn't. They foun' a bloody eighteen-inch bowie in his hand, showin' that he hed a fair deal fur his life, an' played it fur all it was wuth. Three or four more shootin' an' cuttin' his kep' up the excitement fur a day or two, but nobody was killed, an' my chances fur gettin' the Broadaxe location again looked ez slim ez ever.

"One night they hed a game o' draw down at Strobbridge's, an' Charlie Rogers, who'd bought out his pardners, put up the Broadaxe fur a hundred dollars. Si Silverbrace won it, an' Rogers dropped out o' the game dead broke. Si played along fur an hour or two, but didn't seem to hev no luck arter he fell heir to Broadaxe, an' about midnight he shoved her up upon three jacks afore the draw. Jim Murphy was dealin', an' I seed him lift a hand from his lap ez cold ez Chris'mas. Si filled, and he grinned triumphant like under his big slouch hat, 'cause, ye see, Broadaxe stood him in nearly five hundred dollars, an' enough on the board to make him even ef he hauled it down.

"Bet yer a hundred more," says Si, chuckin' up a note. "See it, an' raise ye two hundred," says Murphy, pretendin' to be doubtful an' lookin' at the corners o' the kerds he lifted.

"Two hundred goes," says Si, slowly draggin' out his buckskin an' fishin' fur more cale seed.

"Then, kind o' sorrowful like, ez ef chuck full o' grief at losin' sich a good chance to git away 'ith a bigger stake, he calls fur a sight.

"What'ev ye got?" says Murphy. An' fur the life o' him he couldn't help grinnin'. Si seed the color o' Jim's teeth an' knowed he was gone.

"As full on eights," he whispered so faint ye could hear him.

"Tain't good agin a king full on bullets," says Murphy, an' he showed 'em down ez easy an' natcherall ez he'd played it fair an' square from the jump.

"Si looked mighty sick, but he didn't say nothin' an' left the table. The game went on purty slow arter that, an' Murphy got up nineteen hundred ahead, 'ith the Broadaxe paper in his pocket, an' me standin' there wonderin' ef I'd hev a better show to corral it ef I blowed the true bizness to Si, an' then skinned out 'til the shootin' was over. I was jist on the pint o' givin' Murphy away, w'en the risk I'd be runnin' ef Si didn't get the drop on Murphy staggered me, an' I kep' my pints to myself. Murphy soon arter fell against a fero bank, an' asked the dealer what he'd take Broadaxe fur between the king an' jack. The dealer hummed an' hawed a minute, an' fin'ly says: 'Secin' it's you, Murphy, we'll let you bet her fur fifty, but you can't buy a quarter check 'ith it.' So Murphy plays Broadaxe between the king an' jack, an' in about three turns my location is chucked into the bank's safe. I waited long enough to see Murphy lose about a thousan', an' then I lights out fur a pool game down town. Steve, you know I ain't no slouch knockin' pins over, an' you'll b'lieve me w'en I tell you that the solitary five I carried out o' that fero bank was seventy-five afore nine o'clock nex' mornin'. At ten o'clock I hed the transfer paper in my pocket, an' makin' tall tracks over the trail to my location, thinkin' what a big pile o' coin the little scrap o' paper, kivered 'ith indorsements, represented, to say nothin' o' the fun'ral expenses it'd been the cause of. I foun' ev'rythin' kerrect, an' nobody to keep me off. I went in the shaft an' found two new drifts, an' a pile o' new tools an' blazin' powder. I didn't hev no time to lose, 'cause there was plenty o' toughs roun' to jump the claim ef they thought there was anythin' in it.

"While I was settin' on the dump pile, a thinkin' over matters an' things, along comes Big Tim Conner, an' arter givin' him a game o' wind, I let him into a part o' my plans an' took him in ez a silent pardner. I hed to do it to perfect my rights. That night we borrowed a burro 'ithout lettin' the owner know nothin' about it, an' made six trips to three or four payin' leads. The nex' day we worked in the lower drift; an' w'en we'd got things fixed we took a snooze, an' went into town 'ith some o' the richest rock we could find in our drifts arter we'd got through stoppin' an' crosscuttin'. O' course Tim an' me give the camp the gran' gaff; an' in about an hour one o' them Californy Street experts asks us, careless like, ef we was on the sell, an' what we'd take fur the mine ez she stood. We didn't want to sell; we hed too good a thing. That made the agent more anxious, an' he stuck to us like a barnacle to a scow's keel. Bimeby, arter the agent had lickered us about ten dollars worth, we pertended to give in a little, an' fin'ly we made him a proposition: Ef he'd let us put in one more blast, he could go into the drift alone, an' whatever he offered, w'en he see what the powder hed opened up, we'd take; but he hed to go down alone, an' only stay down long enough to take one observation; then we was to trust to his honor fur a fair valuation. Then we drewed up the papers, reglar, an' nex' day about noon we put in the blast. Lord, how she did scatter things; I don't b'lieve ye could a told Standard rock from Bechtel ore to a saved yer life, they was so mixed. Anyhow me an' Tim didn't go back in the drift to look; but ez soon 's the smoke hed puffed out a little the agent slides down an' stays thar about twenty minits, lookin' at the 'indications' we'd freighted out from Bodie two nights afore by jackass express. Lord! ef jackasses could only talk, an' wasn't too high priced 'ith ther pints! W'en the expert come up he looked at us sorter queer, an' I thought, fur a minit, he'd dropped on our little game. But he hedn't, fur he says, 'What d'ye think o' two thousan'?' 'Two thousan' good, ain't it?' says I, winkin' at Tim. 'A bargain's a contrac', says Tim, an' that settled the bizness. We filled out the blanks in the dockyments, an' got our paper on the bank. Then Tim an' me lit out too, quick, you bet; we didn't think it was healthy to stay an' see the big works the agent said he was goin' to put up. You know, Steve, how they talk about us fellers there, an' the chances a 'wild cat speculator,' as they calls us, runs, w'en they tumbles to the low-grade ore in our foot-walls. But I reckon they won't cross the desert to haul us back to Bodie—two hundred miles o' alkali is a derned mean stretch o' kentry out here in Nevada, an' don't ye furgit it. What become o' Tim Conner? Oh, he loafed aroun' Carson, sprecin' an' gamblin'—lost most o' his share o' the spec at poker. Yes, he did play a game or two 'ith me; I didn't win all his money, though; he hed to live, ye know, an' gin costs money. The last I heerd o' Tim he was shovelin' sand out at Cheyenne. Yes, I reckon I ken stan' another drink; stan' in, boys. Gimme a cocktail, barkeep, stiff; this derned alkali hangs to a man's throat like grim death to a dead nigger."

Silence reigned in that desert hostelry for a moment, broken presently by a clattering of spoons against glassware, followed by a soft gurgling sound. "What did ye say was the name o' thet claim you sold?" asked Steve. "The Broadaxe. Why?" "Oh, nothin'." "What's the matter with ye? What're ye all grinnin' at?" And the speculator placed his glass on the counter and looked around upon the crowd of miners and teamsters as if he "meant business." "D'ye ever read the papers?" asked Steve. "Sometimes." "Read 'em lately?" "No." "What'd you say was the name o' that wild cat o' yourn?" "Broadaxe, d—n it, Broadaxe. D'ye want me to write it down fur ye? Ask that Californy Street sharp; I reckon he knows."

"Broadaxe, eh. Well, ol' boy, you did play it fine, an' no mistake—on yerself," answered Steve.

"What d'ye mean?" fiercely inquired the speculator.

"Read the papers."

"Gimme a paper. Where is it? Where'll I look?"

"Look at the stock list."

Another interval of silence, and then a murmur from the speculator:

"Broadaxe—Bid, seventeen 'n three quarters; asked, eighteen 'n a half. It's a lie! I don't b'lieve—"

"Look at thet," said Steve, indicating a paragraph in the introductory summary.

"The fust—blast—put in by the—new comp'ny—opened up—a rich—body—of ore—wich hez gradgerly widened—an' the indications promise—the—richest returns of—any—mine—now being worked—in this district. Broadaxe—bids—fair—to—to rival—the—richest—gold—mine—in—the—world."

The words fell from his lips slowly, as if some unseen power was dragging them out by main force.

"The richest gold mine in the world."

The speculator dashed the paper to the floor, and arose in the majesty of despair, exclaiming:

"Salted, by the eternal! Salted, by God!"

He rushed from the saloon, and his last words, as caught by the crowd of desert nomads, were wafted back upon the wings of the soft summer breeze—

"Salted! salted! salted!"

SAN FRANCISCO, Sept. 28, 1878. E. H. CLOUGH.

Pony Glasses of French Brandy.

La société qui fait tant de mal ressemble à ce serpent des Indes dont la demeure est la feuille d'une plante qui guérit sa morsure; elle présente presque toujours le remède à côté de la souffrance qu'elle a causée.—Alfred de Musset.

La raison humaine peut guérir les illusions, mais non pas guérir les souffrances.

L'amour est une chose frivole, et cependant c'est la seule arme avec laquelle on puisse frapper les âmes fortes.—Stendhal.

La saveur des pensées détachées dépend d'une expression concise; ce sont des grains de sucre ou de sel qu'il faut savoir fondre dans une goutte d'eau.—J. Petit-Senn.

On peut dire des femmes et du mariage tout ce qu'on voudra, on ne renoncera pas plus aux unes qu'à l'autre.

Les femmes trompent quelquefois l'amant, jamais l'ami.—Mercier.

L'amour a plus de miel que de fiel.—Ovide.

On meurt deux fois, je le vois bien, Cesser d'aimer et d'être aimable, C'est une mort insupportable; Cesser de vivre, ce n'est rien.—Voltaire.

Ce qui fait que la plupart des femmes sont peu sensibles à l'amitié, c'est qu'elle est fade quand on a senti l'amour.—La Rochefoucauld.

Aimer, c'est être deux et n'être qu'un: un homme et une femme qui se fondent en un ange, c'est le ciel.—V. Hugo.

L'amour a des dédommagements que l'amitié n'a pas.—Montaigne.

"Donne-moi mille baisers, Lesbie, ensuite cent, mille autres ensuite, et puis cent autres encore. Lorsque tu m'en auras accordé plusieurs milliers, nous les mèlerons ensemble, de peur d'en connaître le nombre, ou qu'un jaloux ne nous porte envie, en apprenant que nous nous sommes baisés tant de fois."—Catulle.

En envoyant à Mademoiselle de B... un exemplaire de sa traduction de l'Art d'Aimer, d'Ovide, le marquis de M... meures écrivit sur le volume:

Cette lecture est sans égale, Ce livre est un petit dédale Où l'esprit prend plaisir d'errer, Julie, suivez les pas d'Ovide, C'est le plus agréable guide Qu'on peut choisir pour s'égayer.

Le duc d'Orléans, régent de France, voulait aller au bal de l'Opéra et n'y être pas reconnu. —J'en sais un moyen, dit l'abbé Dubois, et dans le bal il lui donna des coups de pied dans le derrière. Le régent qui les trouva trop forts et trnp nombreux lui dit: —L'abbé, tu me déguises trop.

Lafontaine entendait plaindre le sort des damnés au milieu du feu d'enfer dit: —J'espère qu'ils s'y accoutument et qu'à la fin, ils sont là comme le poisson dans l'eau.

On demandait à Diderot son opinion sur un homme très-riche qui venait de mourir: —C'est un homme qui a mangé deux millions sans dire un bon mot et sans faire une bonne action, répondit-il.

Un médecin de campagne allait visiter un malade au village prochain. Il prit avec lui un fusil pour chasser en chemin et se désennuyer. Un paysan le rencontra et lui demanda où il allait. —Voir un malade, répondit le médecin. —Avez vous peur de le manger?

Une dame causant avec Monsieur de F. lui dit: Vous ne savez que dire des sottises. —Madame, répondit-il, j'en entends quelquefois, et vous me prenez sur le fait.

—Vous baillez, disait un homme fort ennuyeux à Monsieur X. —Oui, répondit-il, quand je suis seul, je m'ennuie.

Sans les femmes, les deux extrémités de la vie seraient sans secours, et le milieu sans plaisir.

Vénus, d'après la mythologie, était fille des ondes; elle accoucha de l'amour: On ne pouvait attendre que des tempêtes d'une fille de la mer.

Léandre traversa l'Hellespont à la nage, au milieu de la tempête pour se réunir à son amante Héro, prêtresse de Vénus:

Léandre, conduit par l'amour, En nageant, disait aux orages: "Laissez-moi gagner les rivages, Ne me noyez qu'à mon retour."

Il n'y a point de mariages dans le Paradis. Dieu merci.

Il est trop tôt pour se marier quand on est jeune, et trop tard quand on est vieux.—Thales.

L'amour fait maigrir. Si une merluche devenait veuve, elle serait grasse.—Proverbe Provençal.

Un médecin, accompagné d'un ami, rencontre une dame qu'il salue. Celle-ci ne lui rend pas sa politesse. —Qu'y a-t-il donc? demande l'ami. —J'ai soigné son mari d'engagement malade. —Ah! ah! et vous l'avez tué? —Au contraire, je l'ai guéri. —Oh! très-bien, je comprends.

La plus perdue de toutes les journées est celle où l'on n'a pas ri.—Chamfort.

SAN FRANCISCO, Sept. 29, 1878. L. G. J. DE FINOD.

EXTRACTS FROM MY DIARY.—IX.

By an Early Californian.—San Francisco, 1848.

Each year a vessel comes from New Archangel for its cargo. This year (and last year also; I hear) it was commanded by an officer of the Russian navy, named Rudakoff (who became governor of Alaska in 1851, or thereabouts). Although he spoke but little Spanish or English, he could make himself understood in those languages, but depended mostly on his French, which all educated Russians speak so fluently. He was a handsome man of the true Russian type, of medium height, with good figure, surmounted by a round, well-shaped head. His hair and small military moustache were just tinged with red. His complexion was fair and florid, and his eyes blue. He had a beaming, if not jovial expression, and was in every way an agreeable companion, and very popular with us all. He dined frequently on shore, and we often with him on board his vessel. His stories and anecdotes were so Russian, and his description of St. Petersburg (as he called it), and Moscow and Sitka so unlike any thing we had heard, that we were never tired of listening to him. Next year he returns to St. Petersburg, and wants me to go with him. He said if I would agree to that, he would send for a government permit; that I would not suffer from cold, being well wrapped in furs, and the houses of huts where we would stop being perfectly heated; that the country we would pass through would in parts be wilder and colder than any I could conceive of, and that we should travel in sleds, sometimes drawn by dogs, and sometimes by reindeer. How I should enjoy it! In the sketch of the town which I sent you on my arrival you will notice an island over toward the Contra Costa side of the bay. It goes by the name of Yerba Buena Island, though some call it Goat Island, because Don Nathan Spear and Juan Fuller had a lot of goats grazing and increasing there. As the animals are sometimes interfered with, they have put notices in the papers warning people against meddling with them. Don Nathan lays claim to the island, which may in time become valuable for fortifications or other government purposes. (This was afterwards sold by him to Captain Ed. King for "one hundred cents," I believe.) Don Nathan is highly esteemed, having lived long at the Sandwich Islands and on this coast, and is the oldest merchant in California. While carrying on business in Monterey, Alvarado was a clerk of his, and when the latter became Governor he lost none of his attachment for his old employer, offering him, it is said, a large grant of land provided he would become a Mexican citizen. Don Nathan could not bring his mind to it however, still continuing American, and perfectly satisfied with a lot here and there, and his island. A friend of his, of great ability, and greater prosperity, is Mr. Eliab Grimes, for a long time in business in the Sandwich Islands, but now associated here with Mr. William H. Davis. Even before gold was discovered their profits on cargoes from the Islands were very large. I have understood that they cleared on the merchandise in the brig Euphemia, sold after my arrival, the sum of $60,000. Old Grimes, as he is called, is a dry old gentleman of strong common sense, and a very strong way of expressing it. I have heard him swear. Our mining enterprise was anything but a success. Its whole history is a sad one. Owing to the deserted condition of the town and the consequent small amount of practice here, Dr. Fourgeaud made up his mind that he must look for it somewhere nearer the mines. The prospect of interesting himself in gold washing there was also an important consideration. While he was away for a fortnight in May exploring the country in the neighborhood of Sutter's Fort, he concluded to purchase a ranch on Bear River, owned by a German, and which he offered to sell for a reasonable price. It had a pretty good house on it for the accommodation of Mrs. Fourgeaud and their little boy, and was not very far from Yuba, where the mining prospects were good. Chartering a launch in the month of June, he and his family, with their household goods, were on their way to Sinclair's ranch (owned by Eliab Grimes, and situated on the American River. It happened when they arrived in the country that they came down the Sacramento River in a launch belonging to a man named Kriesberg, one of the unfortunate party who were snowed up and starved in coming over the mountains. Many of them died, but this man with a few others sustained themselves by eating human flesh. The horrible story you have already heard, as well as the rescue of the survivors by a party lead by Lieut. Selim Woodward, U. S. N. This same launch, as it was of good size and safely navigated, making good time always, was the one chartered by the Doctor. Although it had a cabin, they preferred to have their beds spread upon the deck. There was an awning over them, and at night they were inclosed partially with canvas walls which afforded them all the privacy of a tent. Sometimes of an evening, when Kriesberg was in the cabin, they could overhear him relate his awful story. He would speak of his horrible repasts, and describe the delicacy of what he considered the choicest bits. The hands seemed to be a favorite portion, but other parts were scarcely less so. I will not dwell upon so disgusting a subject, and only allude to it now to show you that a human being can not only continue to live among people who have a certain horror of him, but to live in a seemingly happy and longing remembrance of his dreadful experience. There was always something to enjoy in their little voyage. Its varieties of wind and calm, its constant change of scene, the occasional quiet, and their loneliness in so wide an expanse of territory, gave them much to think of. When they reached the river, the crew would occasionally when the wind died away tie the boat to the bank or warp it along for a while. At these times no human beings met their sight; not even an Indian could be seen along those wide plains. In seven days their voyage ended, and the morning after they arrived at Sinclair's they set out on horseback for the German's. On one horse were Mrs. Fourgeaud and the little pet dog which came over the plains with them, and on the other the Doctor and little Nonie. Packed behind each were various little articles and some food required on the road and on arrival at their place of destination. A quarter of lamb which Mr. Sinclair had given them was tied on somewhere and formed part of the precious cargo.

JAMES C. WARD.

Life is like a city full of crooked streets.

"FIFTEEN AND A HALF."

Hair bright as a golden dollar,
Tight coiled, save one wandering tress;
Two white linen cuffs and a collar
Believing a black moré dress;
Two eyes, soft and blue as the heavens,
Caught nigh and compelled me to stop;
My wits were at stakes and seven
When passing her shop.

When passing! Ah, had I met passed it!
But I am mere mortal, you see.
The spirit who through Lent time has fasted
At Easter regards himself free.
And I, who so long had been blameless,
Felt arrows through all my veins dart,
And a sentiment, hitherto nameless,
Awoke in my heart.

I entered, nerved for the encounter;
My senses came back by degrees;
As she, leaning over the counter,
Said, "What can I do for you, please?"
I gazed round the store's narrow radius—
Imagine my case if you can—
'Twas obviously meant but for ladies,
And I was a man.

I know more of Sanscrit or Latin
Than naming of feminine gear.
"Two yards and a half, please, of satin."
"We only keep underwear here."
Only underwear! That word suggested
One name that I didn't forget;
Most diffidently I requested
A frilled chemisette.

"What size?" The remark, you'll acknowledge,
Can not be regarded as fair;
I never had studied at college
What size the dear creatures do wear.
I thought that the best way was lightly
To turn the thing off with a laugh;
I answered, as gravely as might be,
"Fifteen and a half."

Fifteen and a half! She looked puzzled.
"Fifteen and a half what, sir, pray?"
My eloquence fairly was muzzled,
Because I had nothing to say.
"One moment—I'll show you a sample!"
She pulled a box down from the shelf.
"Don't mind," I said; "that size is ample
That you wear yourself."

Then she colored up quick, like a blush rose;
Said, "Sir, you insult me," and more;
While I, like a fool, with a rush rose
And made my best time for the door.
Her face, as I looked back, was changing—
Still angry, yet ready to laugh.
Now, what in the world is so strange in Fifteen and a half?

LONDON, August, 1878.

G. H. JESSOP.

From Arcadia.

Idle and careless, with my book,
I linger where wild roses cling,
And cool ferns droop and sparrows sing,
Beside the brook.

Who has not dreamt some dainty dream,
Half sad, half merry, with scant tears
Wrung from the foolish, formless fears
Which seemed to seem?

And if there came a tangled thrill—
Half joy, half pain—a vision sweet
Of blue-black eyes, of bare white feet,
Or something, good or ill—

Was one to chide, as tradesmen may,
Who buy their goods in bale or crate,
And measure men and deeds and fate
Like ricks of hay?

No! For one may not wisely say
If it be good or ill for him
Who sees 'mid vistas thronged and dim
A gleam of day.

Yet who shall stand 'twixt me and fate,
If from the burden of some dream
I whisper to the babbling stream,
'I love you, Kate?"

SAN FRANCISCO, September, 1878.

R. S. SMITH.

Too Late.

When the trial began, Spring could promise no more
For the Summer's pomp and the Autumn's store.
But the Spring went by and the Summer time came,
And its clouds were tinted with purple flame.
Too gay and too full of a perilous pride
For her sober mate was the new-made bride.
Whose was the fault when the wrangling screech
At last took the place of the loving speech?
Pride awoke pride, and scorn repaid scorn.
And the storm-clouds burst on the tender corn
All trampled and spoiled in the fields of home—
The harvest and fruitage failed ever to come.
For a woman lay down on the bed of death,
And a pardon implored with her latest breath;
And a man knelt there who bore his part
With that worse than a broken, a hardened heart.

SAN FRANCISCO, September, 1878.

C. H.

Patience.

The swift years bring but slow development
Of the world's majesty; for Freedom is Born grandly, as a solid continent,
Layer upon layer, from chaos and the abyss,
Shoulders its awful granite to the light,
Building the eternal mountains, on whose crests
The brooding calmness of the infinite,
Pinnacled in the intense sapphire, rests.
But we, whirled round and round in fevered gusts
Of eager indignation, think to weigh Against God's patience our gross griefs and lusts,
Like foolish Jonah before Nineveh
(O world-wide symbol of his famished gourd!)
Expostulating hotly with the Lord.

SAN FRANCISCO, September, 1878.

RICHARD REALF.

The best communion comes when the rich spend and the poor save.

FABLES AND ANECDOTES.

By Little Johnny.

The Elephant with a Nose for Flowers.—The Shadow on the Wall, and the Effect of Climate on the Human Profile.—The Reticent Barber and his Garrulous Customer; an instructive Tale.—An Apologue interesting to Giraffes and Hippopotamuses.—Concerning the Tree that Bore a Camel.—The Author declares his Tenderness for Sirup of Squills.—A Shepherd Dog's expression of Want of Confidence in His Flock.

One time my mother she was to the show, and my mother she had sum nice posies out of the hot house, 4 bits a posy, and there was a ephalant. Wen my mother she see the ephalant she sed: "Wot a long noze!"

Then the show man he sed: "Yes, mam, and if you was to let him smel yure bookak with it you wude make him reel happy, cos Providence don't make sech nozes jest for ornament."

So my mother she let the ephalant smel the posys and he et em up in a minnit. But that was wen my mother she was a little girl like Mary, thats the house maid, fore she had met me, cos I cude told her the ephlents trunk wasent a nose but a proboscus.

Ole Gaffer Peters he has got a mity long noze too, I can jest tel you, an one night he was to our house, and his shadder was on the wall, and Uncle Ned he sed: "Gaffer, you set reel stil an let me dro yure profe."

And Gaffer he done it. And Uncle Ned he drod it, but he made Gaffers nose bout a foot long, you never see sech a nose, more like a plov. Then my mother she sed; "Wot a sprizn likenis!" an my father he sed: "I wude hav knode that pictier if I had saw it with my eyes shet," but Gaffer he loked and diddnt say nothing. But purty sune Gaffer he thot a wile, and then he puld his hankchef out and blode it. And then he sed, Gaffer did: "I got a mity bad cold."

And after a wile he blode it a other time and sed: "This cole of mine is a goin for to cary me to the grave."

An pretty sune he blode it sum more and sed: "Wot a dredfel swel snoot a bad cole wil giv a man in this gum dasted climet!"

And now I wil tel you a little story wich was tole to me. One time a man wich was a wisky drinker an had a red nose, jest like fire, only no smoke, he went in to a barber shop for to git shafe, and he sed to the barber man, the wisky drinker did: "Now I want you to shafe me reel nice an Ile pay you, but no conversation, cos I wont hav it, dont you tock to me."

So the barber man he sharpened his razor, and put a towel under the man's chin, and then he went to the wotter cooler an drod a bole of ice wotter. Then the man he set up strate and sed: "Are you a goin to shafe me with sech wotter as that?"

But the barber man he diddnt say any thing, but went to latherin with warm woter. But bime by he stoped and went and got some wite rags and laid em down by side the ice woter. Then the man sed a other time: "Wots them for, I thot barbers always whiped their razors onto the Bulletin?"

But the barber man he diddnt say any thing agin, but went to shafin the man and whipin his razer onto the Bulletin. But purty sune he stopt agin an went an fetched a bottle of linniment, and set it down by the rags and the ice wotter, and put some sweet oil long side the linniment. Then the wisky drinker wich had the nose he sed: "If you put that linniment onto my face, and sech oil on to my hair, I wil lick you til you cant rest."

And then the barber man spoke up and sed: "Ime so horse that it most kils me to speak, but you force me to explain that them dockter fixins is for my fingers, cos pretty soon I cant shafe yure upper lip less I take you by the nose."

But the nosest feller wich ever I see was a saw fish.

A hippopotamus and a giraf was a feedin, and thay come together and loked at one a other a wile a stonish. Wen the hippo had loked enoug it puld a root from tween its feet and et it down. Then the giraf licked in sun leafs from the top of a tree and sed: "I never see a poor feller so short cuppled like you, wich has got to stand on his own dinner."

But the hippo it smiled bout like a coal seller an sed: "The diffrence tween me and you is I do my dining to home, like gentlemen, but you got to put yurn out."

A feller he was a huntin in Africy, and there was a other feller, and one of em he went onto a hil bout as highly as a steeple, but no whether cock, and he cude see ahuv the trees and he seen a giraf hed a stickin up out of the woods, hi like a libetty pole, only no flag on it, jest ears. Then the feller whic was on the hil he come down to the other and sed: "Hav you got a ax?"

And the other feller sed yes he had, wot of it?

Then the feller wich had ben on the hil he sed: "You take yure ax and go in them woods and look up, and you wil find a tre wich has got a cammel a groin on it, and you jest cnt the tre down and pick the cammel."

Then the other feller he sed: "O non cents, how can cammels gro on trees?"

But the hil man he was offfe mad, and he sed a other time: "You mite jest as wel say: 'O non cents, how can snakes grow in the ground, same as willers?' But spose I was to tel you I have et snake root with my own mowth, wot then?"

But wen Billy, thats my brother, had the belly ake las time, he was giv cat nip tea, but giv me serp squils an you may have of the cat nip, and the belly ake too, but wen Bildad, thats the new dog, is sick to his stunk he chews gras like oxes.

One time a sheprd dog he felt a little sick and et gras for to make him thro it up. And a ole sheep sed to the dog: "Seems to me that if mutten aint good enugh for you you better quit this bizness, and let us run it our own selfs."

SAN RAFAEL, October 4, 1878.

It has just ben discovered that Colonel Ingersoll writes poetry. Gentlemen, that shelves another Presidential aspirant.

Brignoli says: "I lofe ze Engleesh song. I see him better zan before. I could seeng him a'll ze time."

A BOHEMIAN REVEL.

Rusticating in the Ancient Capital of California.

ADOBE PALACE, Alvarado Ave., Monterey, Oct. 1st.

There were four of us who came down here to this dream city by the sea, on the little steamer a week ago, to rusticate and rest. Charles Warren Stoddard, a writer, dreamer, and brevet monk; Jos. D. Strong, an artist with the future all in front of him; L. G. J. de Finod, a wild French academician and a mighty hunter, and your humble servant, a person of no particular consequence; a most curious mixture of dispositions. The first as sad and sorrowful as a silken sigh; the second sleepy—buoyant only under the most favorable circumstances; the third as demonstrative and restless as the wayward waves; the fourth sullen and morose, subdued by a sudden spleen. On the way down we sat cross-legged on the coils of rope forward and smoked, and talked, and gazed each other. At Santa Cruz we had a little French dinner at a very large price, and then went aboard the little tug again and twisted along through the night gazing at the stars, drinking in the fog, and reclining in the lee scuppers at every relentless roll. Ten o'clock found us cruising about somewhere in the vicinity of Monterey, peering about in the gray mist for a wharf light, and blowing the whistle for some answering sound. It came in the shape of a pistol shot, and a hundred yells from as many small boys, with a yellow dog accompaniment; then a light broke through the blinding bank, the nose of the boat jumped responsive to the quickly turned helm, figures became outlined against the deepened background, the lines were cast, and Jules Tavernier, a resident Bohemian, from the planks high above fairly howled out a welcome. De Finod responded in French, something was hurled back in Spanish, the mate gave the deck-hands the devil in Portuguese, a plank was slipped over the rail, and we climbed out of the little craft to be embraced and introduced in the dark, and fall over grain sacks, and run against unyielding freight cars; then we got straightened out and went jabbering along the wharf, escorted by the small boys, preceded by the dogs, and followed at a respectful distance by a man with a lantern. Monsieur de Finod was the guide. He had visited the place once before and knew all about it—more so than the oldest inhabitant. He was going to take us to his splendid tavern where "a fair señorita keeps ze place so neat as ze vax," when every arrangement was suddenly shattered by the information that the presiding genius of the place had been married within the week. There is a general howl. The bridegroom is on hand to apologize, and swift to suggest another destination. We counseled in French, and German, and Spanish, and English, and then filed through the sand, filling our low-necked shoes flush with the gunwales, but keeping close on the heels of Dr. Heintz, the young bridegroom, who conducted us along under the shadow of huge adobe walls, across a shaky little bridge, and smack into the face of a barn-like building beyond. Not a glimmer of light anywhere. The Doctor rattles the rusty bell, a dog barks, a head appears, a candle is lit, the situation explained in French and Spanish, and we mount the crazy stairs and lean against the board partitions, till the house is ransacked for keys admitting us to rooms that smell as musty as a tomb. But we make the best of it, say good-bye to the guides and escort, kick out the dogs, and go to bed to smell the fragrant smoke of the candle-wick, which we in the general disgust had forgotten to choke to death—and listen to the strange noises ringing through the old rattle-trap of a place. We are a mile and a half apart. Stoddard and Strong in the third twist of the corridor, de Finod at the head of the stairs, and I down a little passage way with a step that broke the small of my back. No chance of a rescue if bounced by a ghost: the creaking bed suggests them. I dose away in the arms of shadowy shapes. In the middle of the night a restless Diego in the next room slams up against the board partition, and I wake with a start that stops the heart beat. Morning comes slowly; and as early as possible we are up comparing dreams; they are all bad, and, being superstitious, we conclude not to sleep in the place again. Then we sail out to take a look at the town. Charles Warren, with his Scotch cap and long ulster, just floats over the little bridge, Strong skips after him, de Finod and I take the middle of the road, and, behold, we are in the very centre of "the ancient capital of California." A queer old place. Streets twisting like trails accommodately up the hillside; adobe buildings, with tiled roofs, arranged curiously on either side; gardens walled in from vulgar intrusion—not a soul in sight. Beyond we can see the old fort, with the flagstaff of the whaling station on a bit of a hill. To the left, on a high ridge, a forest of pines, in which a heavy fog is hanging. To the right a lagoon, a stretch of desolate looking sand dunes, a sweeping, beautiful reach of beach on which the white horses charge with a roar. In the immediate foreground, two wharves, between which float a fleet of fishing boats; beyond, the bay, as blue and beautiful as that of Naples; and above, an atmosphere that shimmers out the glory blaze of the morning sun, and tempers to a nicey the breath of indolence. "Ah," says Stoddard, in a high aspirate, "it makes me wild." Now, Jules Tavernier comes swinging around the corner with both hands in his pockets, and presents again Herr Carl Von Perbandt, a fellow artist, whom the darkness had covered the night before. We are reminded of breakfast. Across the way from where we are standing a figure, bald and grotesque, suddenly appears in a door. That is old Simoneau, well known to Bohemians as the keeper of an alleged French restaurant and ale house. He crams us into his solitary "private room," looking out upon the old jail yard, and surprises us with a spread of raw sardines, cantaleup, and shuddering wine. Vociferously we howl for coffee, and get it, as the ransom of the dishes on the table which we threatened to break. We don't like the breakfast any better than we did the lodging, and hold a consultation. The result is, that we take rooms at the St. Charles, and accept an invitation to dine with Dr. Heintz, the town physician. This finishes up Sunday. Monday a brilliant idea strikes us. The sisters of Mr. Strong have a whole house on Alvarado Avenue, in which they have been living in quiet retirement for three or four months—the eldest one painting most industriously, the younger, who is not an artist, sighing for the city and its attractions of social life. We will make ourselves as boarders. We call and make the proposition, and are met with a hundred objections. "We are too particular; there are but three plates in the house; no extra knives and forks, no silver spoons; the stove isn't much larger than a dipper, and nothing in the town to cook." But, obstinate as tramps usually are, we refused to take "no" for an answer, and made all sorts of impossible promises. In the first place we agreed not to grumble; second, we promised to "pool our issues," and buy a larger stove if necessary; and all the required crockery; third, we gave bonds to pay the first week's board in advance; and fourth, last but not least, we solemnly swore not to flirt with the cook nor call the housekeeper landlady. This settled, and we all registered with a piece of charcoal on the kitchen wall. Things moved along swimmingly. We bought the necessary dishes, helped get in the provisions, and when the old lady who lived next door, in the fullness of her heart, loaned us her large kitchen stove, we mashed our fingers and humped our aristocratic backs with genuine Christian fortitude in getting it in through the narrow doors. Miss Nolie Strong was installed as housekeeper and engineer-in-chief of the kitchen; Miss Lizzie kept order and dignity, and a plump, auburn-haired little partidge of a girl, a native of the town, was induced to do the dish-washing for the magnificent and munificent sum of $1 per week. She afterward struck for $1.50, and we had to pay it. You are assured our first dinner was a success. I did part of the marketing. Jewed down the Italian fisherman at the wharf, and cleaned the smelts for the frying-pan. Strong spread the table, de Finod interfered with the cooking, and Stoddard was continually in the way, being run over, and asking that heart-rendering question of his, "Are you mad with me?" Such times as we have had. Plenty of fish, and bread, and beef, and fruit, and vin ordinaire, and café noir, and cigarettes between each course, and a chance to put both elbows on the table. Then to sleep, to dream, to wake and eat again; to feel a forgetfulness of the city, to snooze in the middle of the day like an old resident, or an over-fed pelican on a sunny rock; to sleep at night and never miss a train, and get up late in the morning; to mock at care and responsibility, to simply exist, not live. Monday afternoon we had a bit of excitement. Two miles below the town a fishing boat went ashore in the surf, drowning one poor fellow, and badly smashing another. We saw the search for the body, the return of the boat along the beach, drawn by six horses, the Italian flag hanging at half-mast on the end of the fisherman's wharf. That same night, in the same place, a schooner, through the carelessness of the crew, was beached, four men in the rigging for several hours before they could get off. This wreck was a thing of interest to visit; a plaything of the waves. Tuesday and Wednesday we lounged along the rocky coast, and smoked, and bathed, and cat-napped in the sun. Thursday we camped at Cypress Point, and pried off abalone shells, and peered into the wonderful natural aquariums among the rocks, and shot sand snipe, and made it interesting with rifle-bullets for the pelicans perched on the rocks at sea. The rest of the week we made a rendezvous of Tavernier's commodious studio, and talked art, drank beer, and bored the town's people with our conversation and opinions. Sunday afternoon we gave a big dinner—a banquet I might say—to our friends. So thoroughly infatuated had we become with housekeeping and domestic economy that this was the only way in which the enthusiasm could be worked off. Dish-washing failed to do it. So with all the ardor and the inexperience and clumsiness of fledglings in this unaccustomed business, we went, in the language of chivalry, for that dinner. Our reputation as entertainers was at stake, so we must give a big one. The first programme made out would have taxed the capacity of the Palace Hotel. The second was a trifle more sensible; the third somewhat feasible; and the fourth attempt accepted as a fact. Invitations were issued as follows, each one having at its head a sketch, in black and white, of some dish calculated to tickle to death the palate of the individual guest:

THE INVITATION.

You are most cordially invited to meet the San Francisco Embassy at the summer residence of the Misses Strong, on Sunday afternoon, to participate in "a Bohemian blow out," given after the most approved and distingue fashion. Hereof fail not. R. S. V. P.

ADOBE PALACE, Alvarado Avenue, September 28.

The documents, in the absence of a footman, were delivered by us in person, the invited being requested to open the billet at once, and say that it was all right, and that they would come, which they all did. Then for the details of the dinner. We took a look at the banquet hall—being the drawing-room of the adobe—and concluded that it must be decorated. From Cypress Point we brought long, straggling branches of that curious evergreen with long, lonesome streamers of Spanish moss, and tacked them on wall and window top, and pronounced it very good. Then we made a raid on Tavernier's studio, pulled down his tapestries, made lambrequins out of the gorgeous Chinese and Indian robes that covered the walls, and carted off his unfinished pictures and sketches, to give color, tone, and effect to the other things we had appropriated. Then we set the artists at work on special features. On one of the windows Tavernier put in a full-length figure of Literature, and on the other Strong painted Art—both of them rich in color when the sunlight streamed through like the filtered light of some grand old cathedral. Then we took the girls' bureau, wrenched off the looking-glass on top, covered it with a Japanese figured cloth, piled on our little stock of wines, pushed it up under the stained glass window, and we had a buffet that made us shriek with delight. Tavernier, in the meantime, had painted an immense owl, with outstretched wings, and a look the very counterfeit of life. This was put above the buffet. A carte de menu was then painted on a huge strip of thick pasteboard, used for covering roofs. Each guest had a dish named in honor of him, and an individual cartoon in Tavernier's best style. This carte was something wonderful, and tacked on the ceiling, reached the floor. The festive board was made up of our own table and a borrowed one, covered with two borrowed table cloths. The wine glasses, and the cups and saucers, and the knives and forks, and spoons, and two-thirds of all the table furniture, were borrowed from neighbors and the hotel. We could find but three small butter dishes in the town, and used sauce plates instead. When set the table was a gorgeous affair; the white cloth was almost entirely hidden with beautiful ferns, interspersed with the highest-colored flowers that could be procured. For fruit bowls, we had two immense Chinese dragons—with apples tucked artistically behind their ears, shaggy manes of grapes, and peaches stuck on their pointed nostrils. A card with the name of the guest was on each plate; also a boutonnière; also napkins—which were mighty hard to get; also a trimming about each little pat of butter. And the bill of fare? Twelve courses, with seven different kinds of wines and cordials. How is that for Monterey? Soup and fish (mullet and salmon carp), snipe for game, entrees innumerable, roasts, relishes ad lib., champagne, and Madeira, and anisette, and French brandy, and café noir. At two o'clock the guests arrived. Miss Lizzie Strong, and Charles Warren Stoddard—dressed like a monk, in robe and fez—received. Strong, in cap and apron, held the kitchen. The younger Miss Strong, daintily dressed in a Swiss costume, saw that the table was properly served. Herr von Perbandt, faultlessly gotten up as a French head waiter, in white kids and gold decorations, assisted her; while your correspondent, in full oriental costume, presided and manipulated the big knife and fork. After the preliminary course of relish and white wine, the music of a guitar and violin came floating from a corner of the room, where two native musicians behind a screen were concealed; and when the tinkle of the instruments palled on the ear, the two sung, in tenor and falsetto, their Spanish and Mexican serenades. And so the viands were discussed, and toasts given, and responded to—even the ladies making speeches. At seven o'clock we were still at table, but soon adjourned to a neighboring adobe that had more room on the ground floor. Then came fireworks in the garden and on the street—a dance in which the señoritas of the town joined; a serenade from the Monterey brass band, and seemingly the whole population of the place gathered to wonder what was going on. This is the general outline of the affair, the details of which can not be satisfactorily described or appreciated except by those who participated, or who understand the nature and surroundings of the sleepy old town. For it is a sleepy place. A spot to drone existence away, and you can not shake the feeling off. Except for an incident or two like the one narrated the breath of life almost needs to be breathed into one; you are too lazy to do it yourself. But enough of this communication. At another time I want to make you better acquainted, by sketches and description, with a spot so quaint and curious, so memorable in the history of the State; discovered before a 49er was ever thought of; rich in history of the doings of the old Padres, and relics of the days of sandaled foot and shaven crown; beautiful in its natural features of crescent beach, rugged shore line, snowy sand and sweep of sea; blessed as a place of refuge and rest for the weary brain, full of something the accursed city has not—perfect tranquillity.

FRED. M. SOMERS.

The Serenade.

(FROM THE GERMAN OF UHLAND.)

Who wakes me from my slumbers
With these strains from heaven drawn?
Sweet mother! see who it may be
That comes ere early dawn!

I hear not—I behold not—
Oh, sleep thou, soft and mild!
They sing for thee no serenade—
Thou little suffering child.

It is not earthly music
That fills me with delight;
The Angel calls me with his song!
Sweet mother, dear, good night!

SAN FRANCISCO, October 3, 1878. JULIA C. JONES.

Not many years ago an English traveler on the Continent happened to meet with the last surviving member of the famous scientific commission to which Napoleon, in 1805, submitted Fulton's project of steam navigation, which the pre-occupation of the Austrelitz campaign prevented him from examining himself. The scientist, although near the close of his eighty-third year, was still in the full possession of his faculties, and the Englishman lost no time in bringing up the subject of the memorable decision, remarking that Monsieur D. was doubtless of a very different opinion now. "Well," said the Frenchman, "I'll tell you exactly how the thing happened. When Monsieur Fulton came among us with his idea we were so eager to find some means of crossing the channel in spite of the English cruisers that if he had been content to offer us that one project, and nothing more, I really believe we should have accepted it, wild though it seemed. But, instead of that, he brought forward half a dozen other mad notions, each more extravagant than the other, till at last we finished by setting him down as a mere visionary, and reporting to the Emperor that his whole scheme was a gross delusion. And, upon my word, if the thing were to happen over again, I think we should do just the same as before." One of these "mad notions," it may be observed, was the torpedo, and another was the submarine cable.

A Herald man has been interviewing Marie Roze's husband, Mr. Henry Mapleson. "And in what," said the Herald reporter, in an off-hand way, as he lingered vis-à-vis over a cup of café noir at the Everett House, "has your success consisted?" "In tact, diplomacy, education, sans froid, a knowledge of the public, and, what is the most important knowledge of all in my business, that of managing a prima donna. You take a member of a foreign legation, the manager of a zoological garden, take even Superintendent Walling at the head of the Metropolitan police force, boil them all down, and you will not find more incongruous elements in the potage than those which make an operatic company and must be adroitly served." Commenting on this interview Puck says: "We are rejoiced to find that this modest, retiring, refined, and cultured young gentleman is such a perfect man of business and of the world. We couldn't have a better authority than himself. It had been noised abroad that he rather lacked these important qualifications, and was what the English call 'a duffer'—but how this world is given to lying."

In reflecting on that little episode between Lydia Thompson and the editor of the Chicago Times, it struck us that nobody ever thought to ask in regard to Lydia: "Did Storey dem her animated bust?"

THE DOCTRINE OF EVOLUTION.

[The following extract from an address delivered by Professor Haeckel, on the occasion of a banquet recently given him in Paris by the "French Association for the Advancement of Science," is translated from the Revue Scientifique, and will undoubtedly interest believers in the doctrine of the descent of man so well known in connection with the distinguished professor's name.]

There can be no doubt that man and the apes of the old and new world have descended from a common ancestor. That which, sooner or later, will lead all good minds to transformist doctrines is the feeling—every day more profound among us—of universal causality, of development, of continuity in nature. The number increases every day of those who seek the truth, the whole truth, and who rest only in the clear vision of the universal connection of effects and causes. Reason, causality, mechanism on one side; superstition, mysticism, teleology on the other. The theory of evolution, which considers and embraces entire nature as one whole, has replaced final causes by efficient causes. This has already been accepted, at least by philosophical minds, the only ones of which we need take count, for the old doctrines of the final causes of the universe, the immutability of species, sterility of hybrids, geological catastrophes and successive creations, the impossibility of spontaneous generation, and of the youth of man on the earth. We can not say at what moment of time nor under what conditions the first living beings appeared at the bottom of the sea, but there can be no doubt that they have been formed chemically from inorganic carbon compounds. The primitive monads were born by spontaneous generation in the sea, as saline crystals are born of their mother waters. There does not exist, in fact, any other alternative to explain the origin of life. He who does not believe in spontaneous generation, or rather in the secular evolution of inorganic matter into organic matter, admits miracle. It is a necessary hypothesis, which can not be ruined either by a priori arguments or by laboratory experiments. The time has arrived to replace the antique dualistic and theological conception of life and spirit by the monistic or mechanical conception of the universe. We have arrived at the boundaries of the old and new faith. Mystery exists, perhaps impenetrable; in any case, scholastic arguments will not pierce it. The doctrine of final causes has all the naïveté of the explanations which prevail among savages and children; the theories of Lamarck and Darwin have given the last stroke to that decrepit doctrine. Modern morphology is irreconcilable, not only, I say, with the dogma of creation, but with that of a Providence, or of a vague idealistic Pantheism of the kind associated with the names of Hegel, Schopenhauer, and Hartmann. If there certainly exists in reality, as I have striven to show, an etiological connection between individual development and the development of ancestry, between ontogenesis and phylogenesis, the phenomena of human embryology are only mechanical and necessary effects of the evolution of our remote ancestors, conformably to the laws of heredity and adaptation. Seventy years ago, permit me to remind you, the great Lamarck created the theory of descent, which Darwin, half a century after, was to develop by fecundating it with his doctrine of selection, founded on the physiological properties of heredity and adaptation. Goethe had also conceived that doctrine very philosophically. For it is the honor of our conception of things to have seduced philosophers, poets, and critics, such as Kant, Goethe, and Strauss. These great and noble geniuses saw perfectly, gentlemen, that which we see better to-day; I mean to say that the theory of evolution is only a particular case of the most vast of cosmical hypotheses, that of the transformation and conservation of the physical forces. This is what the best minds, the most judicious and wisest, such as the eminent naturalist of Montpellier, of whom France ought to be proud, Professor Charles Martins, now admit with entire good faith. According to Professor Martins, in fact, "the theory of evolution binds together all questions of natural history, as the laws of Newton have bound together the movements of the celestial bodies. That theory has all the characteristics of the Newtonian laws." Certainly, the laws of life, morphological laws, the laws of transformation of living beings, under the influence of adaptation and heredity, of selection and vital concurrence, are not susceptible of the mathematical rigor of the laws of astronomy. We cannot, however, doubt that they exist, as we do those of psychology, ethnology, or science of character, and moral science. It is, I think, somewhat naïve to insist, as is often done, on the numerous anomalies which are observed among living human beings. These anomalies are only apparent as are perturbations in astronomy. If we possessed all the elements of these morphological laws, the solution, at least in part, of which I have at heart, we should see that these apparent anomalies are explained by the general laws of mechanics. No one denies that the extreme instability of the elements constituting the woof of organized beings renders biological problems of an infinite complexity. Our mission—to which we have succeeded after the great heroic generation of savants of the eighteenth century; for they were heroes, gentlemen, and the greatest of all, perhaps, the Laplaces, Lavoisiers, Kants, Lamarcks, Frederick Wolffs—our mission to all, naturalists, physiologists, physicians, philosophers, linguists, historians, is to continue those traditions of powerful thought and manly love of liberty which made our grandfathers almost the equals of those Greeks of Ionia and Attica, whom we venerated in our infancy as the fathers of all human science.

The weather prophet has begun his nefarious business. The old woman, the old man, the wild geese, the muskrats, the earliest Spaniard, the oldest inhabitant, the moon, the early showers, the Indians, gophers, ground squirrels, and a thousand other signs, are significant either of a dry or wet season, over which the weatherwise will prophesy. The newspapers will be full of it, and the preachers will soon begin to pray about it. This has been going on in the same way ever since the deluge.

Another hoodlum killed! That's nice. There is, after all, some compensation in having the Chinese among us. It would be better, however, if they would shoot their own hoodlums, and not subject gentlemen to the trouble of killing and the after expense of trial.

JOHNNY SKAE'S RIDE.

By an Enthusiastic and Fortunate Speculator.

From Davidson's shadows and sage-brush gray,
On to the Eastward went Johnny Skae,
Leaving behind him gloom-stricken men
Who, musing sadly, wondered when
The good old times should return again.
On toward the ocean sped Johnny Skae,
With the Comstock many a mile away.

Faster and faster the swift train flew,
Longer and longer the shadows grew.
Virginia City, the Mecca of old,
Whose wealth of silver has oft been told
In song and story, now hung her head,
Her spirit frozen, her glory fled;
Duller and sadder she grew each day,
And Johnny three thousand miles away.

Gloom and depression everywhere
Hung like a pall o'er the country's bier,
When, hush! Did you hear it? A whisper came From the West to the East, like a flash of flame:
"Change in incline looks important!" Huza!
Shout for the dawn of a better day,
With Johnny two thousand miles away.

From Canadian valleys Johnny sped
A thousand hopes in that level head.
"Let not pick or shovel touch the incline!"
He sent answer back to that glorious mine,
Where they waited in patience for Johnny Skae
Now but five hundred miles away.

"They have struck it rich—God send it so!"—
Men said to each other, but none might know
How true or false were the rumors until
The man of genius, and sense, and skill
Sent word from Reno, "Arrive to-day,
I am now only twenty miles away!"

"Now at her, boys," and the picks struck fast
Through the deep rich vein, then all doubt was past;
A glorious bonanza; a treasure which
Was all for the poor, and not for the rich.
And among the thousands there's none to-day
That have aught but praises for Johnny Skae.

The sunlight fell in a glittering stream
On Davidson's crest, and its glowing beam
Stretched over the desert, and far away
To this city fast by her tranquil bay;
But who was it charmed the clouds away?
Sierra Nevada and Johnny Skae!

There were some who viewed this auspicious hour
With grim forebodings of waning power,
Who had ruled the market closely and long
And against little good piled mountains of wrong,
Who saw their crown moulder and fall to dust,
Their gilded sceptre grow dim with rust,
Their proud throne crumble like sun-dried clay—
These loved not the name of Johnny Skae.

Then hurra! hurra! for Johnny Skae!
And many a heart that is blest to-day
With comfort and plenty still looks back
To the flying train and the sounding track,
When on to the strike in the dim incline,
To the grand old Sierra Nevada mine,
Like a meteor flashing, came Johnny Skae
From a city three thousand miles away.

The Fight at Lookout.

Here, sit ye down 'longside of me, I'm getting old and gray,
But something in the paper, boy, has riled my blood to-day.
To steal a purse is mean enough, the most of men agree;
But stealing reputation seems a meaner thing to me.

A letter in the Herald says some generals allow
That there wa'n't no fight where Lookout rears aloft its shaggy brow;
But this coat-sleeve swinging empty here beside me, boy, to-day,
Tells a mighty different story in a mighty different way.

When sunbeams flashed o'er Mission Ridge that bright November morn,
The misty cap of Lookout's crest gave tokens of the storm,
For grim King Death had draped the mount in grayish, smoky shrouds—
Its craggy peaks were lost to sight above the fleecy clouds.

Just at the mountain's rocky base we formed in serried lines,
While lightning with its jagged edge played on us from the pines;
The mission ours to storm the pits 'neath Lookout's crest that lay;
We stormed the very "gates of hell" with Fighting Joe that day.

The mountain seemed to vomit flames, the boom of heavy guns
Played base to Dixie's music, while a treble played the drums;
The eagles waking from their sleep looked down upon the stars
Slow climbing up the mountain's side with morning's broken bars.

We kept our eyes upon the Flag that upward led the way,
Until we lost it in the smoke on Lookout's side that day,
And then like demons loosed from hell we clambered up the crag,
"Excelsior" our motto, and our mission "Save the Flag."

In answer to the rebel yell we gave a ringing cheer,
We left the rifle-pits behind, the crest loomed upward near;
A light wind playing 'long the peaks just lifted Death's gray shroud,
We caught a gleam of silver stars just breaking through the clouds.

A shattered arm hung at my side that day on Lookout's crag,
And yet I'd give the other now to save the dear Old Flag;
The regimental roll, when called on Lookout's crest that night,
Was more than doubled by the roll Death called in realms of light.

Just as the sun sank slowly down behind the mountain's crest,
When mountain peaks gave back the fire that flamed along the west,
Swift riding down along the ridge, upon a charger white,
Came "Fighting Joe," the hero now of Lookout's famous fight.

He swung his cap, as tears of joy slow trickled down his cheek,
And, as our cheering died away, the General tried to speak.
He said, "Boys, I'll court-martial you—yes, every man that's here;
I said to take the rifle-pits—we stopped him with a cheer—
"I said to take the rifle-pits upon the mountain's edge,
And I'll court-martial you because—because you took the ridge!"

Then such a laugh as shook the ridge where late King Death had strode,
And such a cheer as rent the skies as down our lines he rode;
I'm getting old and feeble; I've not long to live I know,
But there was a fight at Lookout—I was there with "Fighting Joe."

So them generals in the Herald, they may reckon and allow That there wa'n't no fight at Lookout on the mountain's shaggy brow,
But this empty coat-sleeve swinging here beside me, boy, to-day
Tells a mighty different story in a mighty different way.

R. L. CARV, JR.

BONBONS.—FRENCH AND OTHERWISE.

An important state secret was confided to a young attache.
"Take care that it doesn't get out," said the chief.
"No one will see it. I will have it printed in the volume of speeches of the eloquent X."

Never tell a blonde young lady that you wish she blonde to you.

Brevity is the soul of wit. A man who was recently hung in Indiana proves it. He made no remarks about heaven, but nodded to the preacher and said: "I'll see you later,"
and then the trap fell.

A beautiful girl is dying. Calling to a friend, she hoarsely whispers: "Plant tobacco on my grave, so that the weed nourished by my dust may be chewed by my bereaved lovers." There is poetry in the idea.

The following incident is told as having occurred at the battle of Alexander (fought in 1801): An aide-de-camp (Major Brierly), in carrying orders, had his horse killed, and begged permission of Sir Sydney Smith to mount a horse belonging to his orderly dragoon. As Sir Sydney was turning round to give the order to dismount, a cannon shot took off the poor fellow's head. "This," said the General, "settles the question. Major, the horse is at your service."

In Toledo a gay Lothario of the press fraternity takes what he calls his "cousin from the East" out to see the town by gaslight. They perform at various places, until about ten o'clock in the evening the people in the orchestra, at the Adelphi, see the "cousin from the East" display a curiously small foot at the bottom of the trousers. Then two detectives discover a rather full style of architecture in the upper story of the cousin's vest. They skip.

Husband—"Why not take that dress, dear, and have done with it?"

Wife (with cutting irony)—"Certainly, darling, if you don't mind the expense of having the drawing-room refurnished?"

Husband—"Drawing-room refurnished?"

Wife—"Well, yes; you can hardly expect me to sit on a red sofa in a magenta dress; and I should have thought that it was more economical to have a dress to suit the room than to have the room altered to suit the dress. But you know best, of course."

At dinner, in the boarding-school.

Usher—Master Edward, stop that chattering, or I shall have to report you.

Master Edward—I ain't chattering; I'm eating.

Usher—Hold your tongue, sir; I know you of old; you eat with one ear and talk with the other. I know you.

They were expressing surprise at the success of a politician who had been everything—Bonapartist, Orleanist, Republican.

"Oh, no wonder he gets rich," said a wise observer; "he has sold every one that bought him and saved the money."

"How is the corpse?" asked an Ann Arbor medical student of the pickler. "The corpse?" was the reply; "the corpse? Oh, it's in the best of spirits." For the proof of which he showed the liquor that it was put up in.

The Bible does not lie.—Ex. It doesn't, eh? Have you never seen a Bible lying—upon a table? And the page devoted to a record of births—does that always tell the plain, unvarnished truth?

The person who originated the contemptuous expression,
"It is not worth a button," had no correct idea of the import of that remark. He never knew what it was to depend upon a single button for the support of his pantaloons and have that button give out when he was waltzing.

Recently discovered inscriptions on burned bricks bring to light the astonishing revelation that King Ahasuerus hanged Haman because he invented the accordion and put the price down to one dollar and seventy-five cents, so that every young man might have one.

Henri Mounier was the only man that ever discomfited a
Paris concierge during Exposition time.

It was that mad wag's custom to go round and examine all the high-priced suites of rooms he could find.

"This will do better than nothing—not quite so stylish as I should like, but still it will do," he would say. "The price is—"

"Five thousand francs a month, your excellency."

"I will take them. But, my friend, where is your ribbon?"

"My ribbon!" says the janitor, with a vacant stare.

"What ribbon?"

"Why, your ribbon of the Legion of Honor, of course.

Haven't you been decorated? No. Oh, that settles it; when I pay 5,000 francs a month for my rooms I always insist that the porter shall be decorated. Good morning!"

There are some pious people with whom penitence takes the place of restitution, even as there are some people whose gratitude ceases when they repay a loan. Everywhere but in France words are the servants of ideas; in France mots control ideas. Equality is no vain formula. There is only one class in France—the first class in Rhetoric. The masses are like children; they would sooner have their way than a good time. One writes illegibly to hide his bad spelling, as one contents one's self with a half smile to conceal poor teeth.
"I love men," said Queen Christine of Sweden, "not because they are men, but because they are not women."

Nothing can exceed the intense affection which a girl ladies out to her father for a day or two before she goes when she's going to ask for a new dress.

THE WHITE SHARK.

"This is very mid-summer madness."—SHAKESPEARE.

Once upon a time I had a dream, and in my dream I seemed to be drifting in a frail boat on a troubled waste of waters. The journey was not great, but as I left the shore the sun was shining brightly and hope was at the helm. But clouds obscured the light of day and the leaden waters began to rush and roar, and the waves broke against my boat from every side, curling into foam. The lightning flashed, and darkness yet more frightful came, and the heavy roar of thunder terrified my already sinking soul. Higher and higher rose the fury of the storm. Terror-stricken I looked around for help; but help was far away and distant, and death was near. Other vessels floated on the sea becalmed, I alone was compassed round with danger. Each wave seemed to be an enemy which I dared not face, yet dared not take my eyes from—for I was bound by the terrible fascination of conscious eyes, glittering in the foam with gleams of lurid light. Higher yet and higher was I borne. The thick darkness which pressed me down was rifted by the fiery darts; the iron chariot wheels of the gods grated on their brazen axles; the metal hoofs of their chargers struck thunder from the clouds as they madly galloped through the thick commotion. My screams of fear came back to me. The storm raged fiercer—the swell of the waves still bore me onward through the dark expanse. Suddenly, by the light of a more dazzling flash, I beheld a frowning cliff spring up before me and with a fearful crash of thunder I was thrown upon the rocks.

Bleeding, gasping, choking, I groped about for foothold—all now was still. A dense black cloud was over me—but all was still. Beyond, the sunshine played in shifting golden bars between the masses of broken shadow. The rainbow was spread in heaven—but for other souls than mine. The serpents wriggled their slimy way back into the sea, and I was left alone. Tormented by doubt and fear, benumbed with cold, half dead and losing consciousness, I made my weary way up the rocks and came to the black opening of a cave. "What have I to fear?" thought I. "Death waits without—what worse than death can be within?" I entered, still in darkness; which way to turn I knew not, but finally halted before a wall of masonry and sank down to die. Hours seemed to pass; a fever raged in my veins; my temples throbbed; a delirium prompted self-destruction. Thirst burned and parched me. Oh, for the pleasant water of a spring! The mocking babble of arcadian rills sounded in my ears, when lo! my hand outstretched was dipped in water. How I shrieked for joy! How eagerly I plunged my burning head into the spring.

I drank my fill; I threw the grateful water about and over me, and then I madly laughed again; the echo came back from the hollow cave. I was oppressed with my loneliness, and despair seized upon me. Down into the well I looked, and looked so intensely that I felt and sounded its very depths, though all was yet dark. For ages I seemed intent in that penetrating look; when far down, faintly shining, was a phosphorescent light. With greater power I bent down again, and the light seemed slowly coming toward me. I exerted my will and drew it slowly on. Now shrinking back I saw a horrid monster, but whose eyes, withal, were more sad and soulful than any human eyes could be; so sad, and as yet they seemed so full of hope; nay, half hope, half fear, as if there was something long watched for and hoped for, and yet with this, the sad, sober consciousness of experience. The eyes went to my heart, their mellow beauty shone in through mine and lighted up my soul. I loved the eyes, but oh, the body was the terrible White Shark. What could this alliance mean? The soul of purity and intelligence was chained to the foulness and ferocity of the terror of the seas! My will had brought the monster half way to view and now I feared.

"Back—back—down—go back—back!" I cried in frenzied agony. And the silent halls of the vaulted cave sent my words ringing in a thousand demons' laughter: "Go back—back." Too late, alas! The fates now held me; would the furies scourge? The well was before me, and look I must. Nearer came the monster and the shining light; I could not stop it, for the eyes enchained me with their fascination. Quicker now it came, else I had gone to meet it—for my fear and loathing had vanished: I wished no other death than looking into those fearful eyes—to feel the pearly teeth crushing through me. O Love! What is love? I loved a shark—the terror of the sea. How long I looked into the eyes I do not know; but sleep overcame me, and my dream was over.

II.

That day I wandered aimlessly with but one thought surging through my brain: "The White Shark!" I whispered to myself, and looked around stealthily to see if any one heard me. "Alone—I must be alone;" and solitude I sought, and whispered to myself again, "the White Shark—my love—the terror of the seas! Did any one hear me? Could any one suspect me? Why do all my friends watch me so? Why must I be followed about? Ah," I whisper, "it is the White Shark. Don't look at me so; if you know the secret, keep it; it's the Shark's secret—beware of the pearly teeth!" And when I shut my eyes in sleep again, the mellow eyes were watching with their sad look—half hope, half fear. I was in the cave again, and treasures were around me: heaps of yellow gold in bands and bars; caskets of gems, most precious—diamonds, rubies, emeralds, and opals. Oh, the opals, with the look of the mellow eyes—half hope, half fear—shining and lighting up the cave. And now my work began; toil came, and in my toil I remembered the giver of the gold and jewels. For days and weeks I seemed to hammer and work the precious metal. The diamonds blazed, and told of pride and ambition; the rubies glowed their warm, red love; the emeralds gave, with their green sparkle, the springtime promise of better things to come—all bound together by the untarnished band of gold; the opals, with their half-inviting gleam, repelled and then again attracted me. Finally, my work was done; and a mountain of precious beauty—a crown worthy of an Indian empress—waited for a wearer. Down into the deep I looked again, joyfully anticipating the silvery light and the mellow eyes—the opalescent gleam—half hope, half fear.

The White Shark has come; but lo! the Shark is now all a woman—a glorious woman—half kin to me. Can I describe her beauty? Can the zealot imagine the houri of Paradise? Glory seemed to shine from her white skin; the light of her lips illumined the darkness; and straight I placed the crown upon her head. "Stop!" said she, in a low, sweet voice; "not yet can I be crowned. Love has made me but half thine; wait." Into the water she threw the crown; slowly it sank, shedding light in its descent; she clasped round me her alabaster arms, and into the well we went—I willing, too—guided by the mellow light of the opal—half hope, half love, now, for love succeeded fear; and gleaming myriads of sparkling eyes shone on our descent; but fear there was not, for I had saved my love. In a soft, dreamy, undulating movement we passed down, down, down; and ever I would close my eyes to feel the tender pressure of her arms, and ever I would open them again to see the beautiful countenance bending over me; and when her lips were pressed to mine, a burning spot remained and thrilled me; when my eyes were shut, shafts of sweet love would pry them open; when my lids were raised, her ardent glances made them droop again. What delicious languor, what passion, what love! My very soul was gone out—to my White Shark; and the snake eyes of the well were winking and shining through the water, and love had succeeded fear. As we came nearer to the bottom we approached the roof of an immense dome; and at the apex we stopped. "Here," thought I, "is the world again, and I am free;" but at the thought, which she divined, my lovely companion was bathed in tears. "Not yet, unfortunate one, is the trial over for me. I must divorce myself from all my past to love you, and fear seizes on me again." Down into the dome we went; and I stood on my feet in the midst of a scene of beauty. Immense sea ferns rose up on either side and interlaced their feathery foliage overhead; the floor was of clean, white sand, which reflected the rosy light that filtered from above; soft murmurs of the sea were floating in the air; æolian harps caught the sad refrain, and, far and near, the caves of ocean resounded to the melody. All the beauty of the water was present here; trees of coral, brilliant polyps, and other curiosities of animal and vegetable life surrounded us; shells, whose rosy variegations were caught from the glory of the tropic dawn—glowing and shimmering in the calm light. All was fair; and I, an unwelcome guest, was the first to survey its loveliness. Before me rose a throne of amber and coral, inlaid with pearls and mother-of-pearl; and, on the throne, lay the crown which I had worked—love's labor; a silver chain hung near at hand, holding a tiny conch shell—a cunning miniature of Neptune's trumpet; with my lips I blew a little blast. And through the ferns and sea plants the opal eyes were shining with the mellow light—half hope, half love. Toward the White Shark I threaded my way through wriggling beds of serpent polyps, rooted to the ground, who shrank away from my touch.

"My mortal saviour," said the Shark, "my destiny hangs on thee. To thee is given the blessed privilege of saving a soul to join the bright band of immortals. Whenever thou canst separate selfish desire from godlike love and become worthy of a worthier being, I am thine. To this add wealth and fame, a worldly store of knowledge, and the pomp of forms, and nothing profits. But be ever faithful, and love me truly, and thou'lt become my saviour, and in my love thou wilt ever prosper. Go into the world, seek that which most thou cravest, and in possession find nought but disappointment. But seek to know thyself—all other men thou wilt then bend to thy will. Probe all complaints against the distribution of Fortune's favors, and know that lust and idleness are man's greatest enemies. Fear nothing but dishonor; ever let thy heart and mind be pure. If thou lookest for evil thou wilt ever find it; therefore, look for good, thou'lt find no evil. To thee to love is pastime; to me to be loved is existence. Think of a soul trembling in the balance; think of a glorious day, and then of that oppressive darkness late endured by thee, and multiply into eternity; think how anxiously I'll view thine every action while my fate depends on thee; know, then, unlucky object of my love, that till I saw thee, life was all in-all for me, but now I know a higher life. Existence in the future would be death without thee. Death is but marriage, so we are together." And the mellow eyes wept precious tears, the human spoke; a soul was born, and I—was sent back into the world to battle for two souls.

I seemed transported to a beautiful city. The houses were marble palaces rising from the sea. Into all the pleasures of life I plunged, and soon forgot my love beneath the waters. Beauty smiled on me, and smiles were bright with gold. Wine, women, and song—how glad the hours sped; but even when the gayest thronged about me, and the jest went circling round, my heart-strings tugged away, and an indescribable something was present to turn me back. The light gondolas and the stately barges floated over the glinting waves, light laughter came caroling down the ways, music, softly stealing, seduced my senses with forgetfulness, and patient love went unrewarded still. And when in the dance I thought I loved, the shrill piping of the tiny conch shell came back to me; my Shark for a moment partly came to mind with the mute appeal of the mellow opal eyes. Half hoping? No, all gone, but sorrow and love; the love was there, but hope had gone.

The gold and jewels brought from ocean were nigh exhausted now, and my gay companions came no more. Alone I was, neglected. The revelry went on, beauty smiled no more for me, and, homeless, I walked the streets. "Out upon the world! All is vanity, hard-hearted are my gay companions. Selfishness and pride rule all the daughters and sons of men; where truth and virtue are I, too, will be." I leaned on the marble quay and meditated death, and as I looked down on the water I was weary. Deep in the depths again I saw the tearful, mellow eyes, half anger and half love. "The White Shark!" I cried. Lashing the sea into foam, the monster whom I had wronged came surely and terribly toward me. Overcome with fear, I swooned away. Sleep came, and my dream was over; and when I awoke my enemies all surrounded me. Why did they look at me so curiously? Why should they part right and left, and, wondering, follow me at a distance? Ah! fiends, you want the White Shark's jewels, the opal crown, but I alone can find it. "Ocean, tell thou no tales, fold the crown together, sink it in thy deepest ooze."

Now they look suspiciously on me. Their eyes are shining with greed of gold. "Do they know about the White Shark?" I whisper. Muttering, protesting, I curse family, relatives, and, oh, how I curse false friends! They hold me.

"Back—I can not join thee, O my love; but wait; retribution comes."

I struggle with them: "Hold, a man has fallen! True, he was a dear companion, but he withheld me from my love. He'll no more torment me. Let them come. Blood on my hands! Oh, horror, horror! No, not horror; 'tis but the warm, ruby tint of love, my Shark. They can not hold me; I am free again."

Sleep comes again, but as I close my eyes the opals are bursting with fire; the mellow eyes are gleaming with a murderous light. Away, ye phantoms of disease! I must sleep! And when the eyes of the Shark were taken away I fell asleep.

III.

In that sleep I dreamed again. I seemed to be at peace with all the world. All mankind had my best wishes, and calmness soothed me. Calmness came not nor yet did joy; but weary of my wanderings, apathy held me half unconscious. It was a mid-summer night, and the harvest moon hung in the sky as large, and round, and bright as a silver shield. I was in the pleasant valley now, and slowly wandered by the side of the little mountain stream. The experience of the past months seemed far away and past. I had no sympathy with my former life—nor could I hate myself, nor yet approve. Trees sprung from the hills on either side of me, and the undergrowth harbored the tuneful nightingale and the peaceful, homely owl. It was a loneliness that pleased me. I was tired, and wanted rest. Up the vale I still kept my solitary way. A little strip of land ran out to the water. The leaves on the trees rustled lightly in the breeze; the timorous hare barely let me pass; the serpent sleeping in my path silently unfolded his deadly coil, and glided off into the shade. "So," thought I, "strife is over; peace has come at last." And I stood on a large boulder, moss-covered and soft with low, fine grass. Beneath me was a pool of water, dark and deep, formed in winter by the brawling little stream; but now it, too, was at peace, and showed in quiet sorrow the ravages which passion made. "Death must be near for the little mountain stream," thought I, "for the summer's heat will scorch its life, and leave only the dry bed of pebbles and rattling leaves." Again the thought came to me, and yet again, and—"O my God! if I am like the stream at peace, I also like the stream must die; I, too, must die."

The White Shark comes to my mind. I go hurriedly to the edge of the great black rock that hangs over the deep, shadowed pool, and, in moonshine, call upon my love. For now I am content to make the sacrifice. "If we die together 'tis but a marriage!" "Save my soul, I'll love forever." These are the words that come ringing to me from memory. It shall be done; again I am at peace. I sit still in the beautiful, shimmering moonlight, and call to my love again. And the pool begins to boil and bubble; it turns inky black, and then is white with foam. Now looking deep down into it—"O joy!—away down deep, I see a silvery light appear, the mellow, opal light, half hope, half love, soft, as from a distance. And the water grows clear, and my darling, pure, innocent love is floating up toward me. Her eyes look languor into mine, those dusky, opalescent eyes, as she comes nearer, nearer—oh, how lovely!—in her snow-white virgin robes, which float behind, pulsing with the throb of the crystal waters; her brow bound with the crown I labored for; the diamonds shining with happiness, the rubies glowing with warm love, the emeralds glittering and evergreen promise of eternal love, and above all the combined light of all the gems, the mellow gleam of the opal lighting her perilous way. Her hair spreads around her like a cloud, and still upward through the water comes my love. And her snow-white arms break the water, the waves ripple in golden circles and yellow, and fly away from her. Diana hides her face behind a silver cloud; my hand reaches down, and she slowly draws me to her. "The crown is mine," she cries, "my soul is saved; but thine, alas, is gone! 'tis come to mine."

The mellow eyes look long and sadly into mine. "Farewell"—so slowly and so sorrowfully spoken. A hasty kiss, and she sinks beneath the waves; the eyes so mellow with their opal light, half hope, half love, burn into my soul, and never will pale their long sought for light. The water—now black as hate—closes over her, and I am left standing, shrieking, blaspheming, on the slippery boulder of a little mountain stream. I am awake now, hard pressed by my devilish pursuers. Quick! one plunge, and all this life of pent-up misery, these galling chains, their taunts, and gibes, and sneers, will be forever over. One plunge. O my God! can you look on? They say I'm mad—mad!—mad!

SH. W., JR.

"This country," remarked a traveler in northwestern Iowa, "settles up very rapidly." "Ya-as," replied the native, nervously watching the movements of a constable dodging along the other side of the field, "settles up a darn sight faster than the people do." And before the traveler could ask him to explain he was making a mile a minute across the trackless prairie, with the constable a bad second.

Thou art scriptures and laws, planets and suns, the formed and the formless. Those who possess knowledge, and whose minds are pure, see the whole world as the form of thy wisdom.—Hindu Parana.

Although ministers are supposed to be truthful men, they seldom fail to give the remains a good notice.

Bill of Fare for Six Persons.—Sunday, October 6, 1898.

Beef Noodle Soup.
Cantaloup.
Soft-shell Crabs.
Lamb Chops. Lyonnaise Potatoes.
Asparagus. Spinach.
Roast Mallard Ducks, Spice Currants.
Okra Salad.
Raspberries and Whipped Cream.
Lady Fingers.

Fruit-bowl of Apples, Peaches, Figs, Grapes, Plums, Pears, and Grapes.
To MAKE BEEF NOODLE SOUP.—To one egg (slightly beaten), one dessert-spoonful of water, and a little salt, add enough flour to make a stiff dough. Work it well for ten minutes, adding flour when necessary. When pliable, cut off a portion at a time, roll it thin as a wafer, sprinkle with salt, and, beginning at one side, roll it into rather a tight roll. With a sharp knife cut it from the end into very thin slices, forming little wheels or curls. Let them dry for an hour. Drop them into one quart of boiling hot beef stock, and cook twenty minutes.

TAXATION IN CALIFORNIA.—II.

TO THE ARGONAUT:—Bearing in mind the well-known facts concerning the present system and results of taxation in this State, and applying to them the principles summarized in my previous communication, the condition of affairs stands practically as follows: The revenues of the State are derived from the imposition of various taxes upon its citizens, the principal one being an annual tax upon the ownership of real estate. This tax is levied upon the supposed market value of the property, or that portion of it—for example, one-half, two-thirds, or three-fourths—which custom has sanctioned. Under this system some men, doubtless, pay less, while others pay more than a fair share of taxation. But this is unavoidable under any system; and the present one has been so long in operation that whatever unfairness it worked at the outset has been remedied by the subsequent adjustment of rents, prices, wages, and interest.

According to the principles advanced, this system is only susceptible of practical improvement by eliminating from it whatever element of uncertainty it embraces. For example: The taxes on personal property are of doubtful efficacy. Whether I pay the State two per cent. per annum on $500 worth of real and $500 of personal property, or pay four per cent. on my real property alone, comes, so far as I am concerned, to the same thing. In either case I must pay $20. But it is not the same to the State. In the first instance it is not sure of the $20; in the second it is. My personal property is subject to destruction or removal beyond the State, or surreptitious transfer; my real property is not. But (inquires the inexperienced legislator) suppose you own no real estate, and yet are rich in personal effects, shall you not be taxed? Read the principles, which assure us that in a country so free as this, no matter in what form, or upon what incidence of social life, taxes are levied, provided they are specific, uniform, and non-evadable, every man, in the end, will be forced to pay his fair share. Study the experience of the past century, and the same lesson will assert itself from every portion of this country. Consult the most astute minds which have been devoted to this subject, and the answer will be the same. There are myriads of persons in every community who own neither real nor personal property. Is it supposed that these persons escape taxation? Of course not. They pay it in the enhanced prices of rent, of the commodities they consume, the money they borrow, the services they employ. And so would the owner of personal effects who paid no tax direct because he possessed no real estate.

License taxes are similarly objectionable. They are evadable, uncertain, and not uniform. For example, the assessment and collection of the taxes upon stock-brokers encourage an amount of rascality and false swearing that does more harm to the community than would be balanced by ten times the sum collected. As to equity, why should a stock-broker pay for a license to trade, and a grocer and a baker not? Why must a theatre or a bar-room purchase a license, and a church or an undertaker not? Is stock-dealing, play-acting, or refreshment-selling objectionable? Then why permit these vocations at all? Why vainly endeavor to suppress them by compelling stock-speculators, play-goers, and refreshment-seekers to pay the tax, and to charge it upon the general community in their demands for rent, professional services, wages, or the price of commodities or money? It is the community, generally, that pays it after all. Why then levy it arbitrarily and unfairly at the outset? Nevertheless the present system, as before stated, has been so long in operation as to have equalized its bearing upon each member of the community, and probably very few persons are aggrieved by its practical working. Therefore, unless I could improve it in respect of executing the law with greater strictness and impartiality, I should let it alone. It is not perfect. No tax system is or can be. But it rests largely upon the solid foundation of property, it has been long in operation, and no body complains of its unfairness.

Now comes forward Mr. Laine with the proposition of an entirely new system; a system which, if enforced, would not only disarrange and upset all the existing relations of rents, prices, wages, interest, and so forth, but would also, in my humble judgment, produce grave discontent and disorder. It is not Mr. Laine's general idea of a new Constitution that is objected to. Upon this I have nothing to say. My criticism relates exclusively to the subject of taxation. To this subject Mr. Laine devotes eight sections. First, he taxes all property, including "moneys, credits, bonds, stocks, dues, franchises, and all other matters and things capable of private ownership, real, personal and mixed." Second, he taxes every elector $20 every time he neglects to vote at an election, and every male inhabitant between twenty-one and sixty years of age $3 a year. Third, he abolishes all licenses, except upon liquors, theatres, exhibitions, and the like, leaving the like to be designated by the Legislature. Fourth, he requires uncultivated land "to be assessed and taxed at the same price as cultivated land of the same quality similarly located." Fifth, he taxes all new corporations, except benevolent, religious, scientific, or educational, one-fifth of one per cent. on their capital stock, the tax to be paid once and for all. Sixth, he makes the principal State officers ex-officio a State Board of Equalization. Seventh, he renders void any stipulation by a borrower to pay taxes on the thing borrowed. Eighth, he taxes legacies and distributive shares one per cent., exempting immediate relatives, for all estates under $5,000; and doubling the tax upon non-resident aliens, and foreign corporations and associations.

Let us consider these sections separately. By including personal estates, money, stocks, credits, dues, etc., in property subject to taxation, he establishes a system so objectionable and pernicious that, were it enforced, it would depopulate the State. What man would submit to have his bank account, his cash-book, his pockets overhauled, with the view of determining how much money he possessed? Who would care to have it known what stocks he owned? Who would expose his credits, dues, franchises, etc., to the public gaze that he might satisfy the tax assessor or the State Board of Equalization? Nobody. Is it not obvious that such a system of taxation would be defeated by evasion, and that a people forced, by higher considerations than their duty to pay taxes, into so general a habit of evasion as this unwise provision would promote, would lose all respect for tax laws and perhaps for all others? To suppose such a tax collectable is so suppose an impossibility. Mr. Laine may have some occult object in view, and it may be a good one; but in this stabbing at evil in the dark he is certain to injure the good. He may be aiming at the railroads, or the mining companies, or the moneyed classes; but his plan would end either by thoroughly debauching the community, or driving every dollar of capital out of the State. Mr. Laine has evidently not learned that taxation is intended to provide revenues for a State. His notion of a tax law is that it should be employed for other purposes as well; and herein he is mistaken. The knife that is made both to shave beards and carve roast beef will perform neither of these services properly. Societies in an advanced stage of civilization are distinguished by their highly differentiated functions, and it savors of the country store and barbarism to attempt to accomplish two things with one instrument.

The provision for taxing negligent voters is open to a similar objection. Either the State is so constructed that every man has an equal interest in its elections and an equal motive to vote, or it is not and he has not. If he has, we know well enough that no further monitor than self-interest would be needed to make him vote. If he has not, why fine him for resisting or evading an inequality which amounts to injustice? Why punish me for not voting in an election in which both tickets may have been fixed up in an obscure primary by shoulder-hitters and ruffians? The only consequence of such a law would be evasion; this is the result that attended the trial of a similar law in Greece more than two thousand years ago. The citizens became unwilling to be enrolled among the electors; but few fines were collected, and the expectations of revenue to the State from this source were never realized. Mr. Laine's proposed poll tax of $3 a year upon all adult male inhabitants is objectionable upon the same grounds—liability to evasion. It will probably be paid by every man who has a fixed residence or place of business, and by none who have not, and these last form a very considerable portion of a mining and agricultural community like ours.

The proposal to abolish all license taxes would be a good one if it went far enough, which it does not. It does not remove this tax from certain specific classes of industries, and so discriminates unjustly against them. The discretionary power conferred upon the Legislature with reference to imposing this tax is also objectionable.

Mr. Laine's fourth proposition is one of the worst. It is evidently aimed at the land monopolists, but, like all attempts to reform a community by means of tax laws, will fail of its mark. He would tax land, not as now by its value, but by its potentiality, its "quality," presumably its agricultural quality, or capacity, or productiveness. Suppose such a law fairly executed—and this involves a violent stretch of the imagination—it would result in compelling the large holders of uncultivated lands to sell. But who would buy? Nobody except those who were prepared to cultivate. Is anybody or any set of men thus prepared? Is it likely that the premature cultivation of hitherto unbroken land can be stimulated to any considerable extent by this or any other process of compulsion? Assuredly not. With tens of millions of acres of productive land yet within reach of would-be cultivators, and at extremely low prices, it is folly to suppose that agriculture can be forced by tax laws. Under Mr. Laine's law the monopolists would indeed be obliged to sell; but the Sheriff would prove to be the only purchaser and the State would fail to obtain the necessary revenues.

And in respect of land taxes what system can be fairer, even at the outset, than the present one? The lands are taxed according to value. Now, value includes every relation which the land has or is reasonably expected to have toward any or all other commodities. Value embraces its potentiality, so far as known and so far as such potentiality can, at present, be rendered available. One piece of land may be potentially of very fine quality, but so far removed from roads, rivers, or markets as to be for all practical purposes worthless. Another piece of land may be potentially of poor quality, but so near to the advantages mentioned as to be practically of great worth. The potential fact can not be determined with precision in either case; the practical fact is determined in both cases with the greatest nicety. This determination is to be found in their respective values, and it is upon this basis and justly so, that the tax is now laid.

If it be complained that the present law is administered unjustly or corruptly, I admit it. But this no fault of the law; it is due to the dishonesty of assessors and the connivance of collectors. Mr. Laine's new Constitution will not remedy this, can not remedy it; no more can any Constitution. Under his system the administration will be as corrupt as it is now; nay, more corrupt, for the assessors can now only cheat as to the value of lands—a fraud not difficult to discover and punish; while under Mr. Laine's Constitution they will be clothed with power to miscalculate and misdetermine the productive capacity as well as the value of the land. Should these dishonest assessors continue, as undoubtedly they will, to exercise the same partiality toward the land monopolists which they are accused of now, I pity the poor farmer whose land they may have to assess.

The proposed tax on new corporations—really a license tax—is a bad one. It does not tax corporations already in existence and exempts certain classes of corporations. The effect of this measure will be to stimulate fraudulent incorporations, pretending to be religious, benevolent, scientific, and the like, but actually commercial or speculative ones. This has proved to be the case in Pennsylvania, where the same plan was tried and the result has brought great disgrace upon the State. Fraudulent medical universities and fraudulent colleges with fraudulent degrees and diplomas are among the many bad consequences of this bad tax law.

Mr. Laine's sixth proposition concerns the administration of the law, and upon this head it is not proposed to say anything in this place.

His seventh is an interference with the freedom of contracts, and subject to evasion. It stands in the same category as a usury law, and whether defensible or not, upon precisely the same grounds.

His eighth and last proposition is to tax legacies and distributive shares. Taken by itself there is no objection to this measure. Such taxes are not easily evaded, and, in the long run bear impartially upon the members of a community. But there should be no exemptions, and no invidious discriminations against "non-resident aliens and foreign corporations and associations." Such discriminations are certain to prove injurious in practice. In this case they would either tend to drive away investments of foreign capital or encourage evasion by inducing aliens and foreign corporations to make their investments in a roundabout way.

I have devoted this much of consideration to Mr. Laine's proposition for two reasons: First, the subject of taxation is bound, in my judgment, to occupy an important, perhaps the principal, part of the attention of the coming Constitutional Convention; second, Mr. Laine, of the several delegates who have hitherto promulgated their views upon the new Constitution, is the only one who proposes to radically change our present system of taxation.

Let me repeat that, in a country so free as this, the important matter of taxation is not an attempt to equitably adjust burdens at the outset, for this is impossible and leads to evasions and abuses, but to render the system as simple, as little subject to evasion, and as unalterable as possible.

Prices, wages, rents, and interest, in their silent and continuous working, will be sure to bring about a nicer equity, a fairer adjustment, than any which the cunning of man can devise. They have always done so; they do so now; they always will do so. A free community is like a fluid body; a free pressure on one part is a pressure upon all parts. We have only to make the pressure certain and non-evadable. Nature will do the rest.

With regard to the abuses now practiced in our tax system—abuses which, it is alleged, bear onerously upon our agricultural classes—experience assures us that they can not be remedied by means of new tax laws, or, indeed, by laws of any kind. Laws have to be executed by somebody; they can not execute themselves; and if the administration is corrupt under one set of laws, it is folly to expect that the mere enactment of another set will effect the desired purification. There appears to be a sort of fetishism about law-making which it is time that our people abandoned. Nearly every member of the community is ready with some new law which, like a poor-man's-plaster, is warranted to cure everything. They bow down and worship these fetiches so long as they remain in the embryonic stage, but so soon as they are matured into laws and put to the test of practice, they lose respect for them. The laws do not work as expected; the abuses which they were designed to remedy continue, or become worse. The reason for this lies in the execution, not in the law, but this reason is never perceived. It is supposed that the law is defective, and forthwith it is made to give way to some other statute, which, in the end, passes through another career of fetish-worship, trial, disappointment, disgust, and repeal.

Why do we not try to improve our officials rather than our laws? Simply because of the consciousness of the average voter that the average elected official is no more dishonest than he is himself. That is the whole thing in a nutshell. Place the average voter in an office of trust and he would prove equally corrupt, and he knows it; nay, he openly avows it. He does not even pretend to be honest, for he knows that such pretension would be treated with derision. That's what's the matter. The moral status of our voting population is too low. As to whether this evil can be remedied or not, it is not for me to say, but I believe it can be modified or lessened. Clothe the State, which means the officials, with as few powers as possible, trust them as little as possible, create as few as possible. Let the Constitution be brief, let the laws be simple, and let the administrators and executors of the law be few. Let the citizens remain free to execute such public works as each community may deem necessary for itself. Then you will have fewer public contracts, and fewer corrupt jobs, less expenditure, less taxation, less waste, and less official robbery. Such a system, of course, has disadvantages. The general credit and co-operation of the community will remain unemployed, and many enterprises, which, if accomplished, would prove of lasting benefit to the State—a general system of irrigation, for example—will become impossible. But if, as a community, we can not desist from robbing one another, it seems to me far better to diminish the plunder than to multiply the thieves.

ATLANTICUS.

"Up in a Balloon."

A Paris correspondent of the New York Graphic gives a condensed description of the captive balloon, from which we extract the following:

"Carries fifty persons. Cable, a big ship's hawser. Length, 1,800 feet. Diameter of rope, smaller near the earth than where fastened to balloon. Eight big hawsers, with great iron hooks attached, hold balloon in its place. Passengers walk into balloon on a gangway plank on two wheels. Balloon partly moored in a pit about twelve feet in depth. Cordage worked by a crew of sixteen men in semi-nautical uniform, largely red sash and straw hat. Managed by an officer, who pipes a boatswain's whistle. No sense of motion. Didn't know when balloon stopped going up; or when it commenced to come down. Very still and calm above. Air pure. No dust. Pleasant to breathe. Proportions of palaces and churches toy-like, and not an angle corner or turret lost. People below in most thickly crowded streets do not seem so close together. Each person carries some space about him or her. Singular to observe how so many crawl about without touching each other. Little sense of danger felt by passengers. Not at all like standing on "giddy heights." Balloon gives one an impression of being strong enough for its work. No jolting, pitching, tossing or laboring as at sea. Our three tons' weight of fifty passengers float as lightly as so many feathers. Room enough in car for passengers to walk about and pass each other. Little talking on the trip, although passengers were mostly French, and six were women. No noise from the world below. As seen from a balloon, human beings really take up but little room. They and their houses are simply plastered thinly over the earth. Plenty of room left over their heads. Great pity that we can't fly and utilize it. Especially during hot weather. Great blunder in man's construction not to have had wings given him. Up in a balloon twenty minutes. Not long enough. Wanted to stay up an hour, at least. Hauled down by two engines. Each passenger, on stepping out of the car, presented with a green box containing gilt medal. Inscription, 'Souvenir of my ascent in M. Giffard's Captive Balloon.'

Jim Anderson has got a job for next summer writing circus advertisements.

NOTICE.

The Argonaut is published every Saturday, at No. 522 California Street, by the Argonaut Publishing Company.
 Rates of Subscription, $4 per year; six months, $2.25; three months, $1.50—payable in advance. Postage prepaid. City subscribers served for 35 cents per 4 weeks. Single copies, 10 cents.
 Address all communications to "The Argonaut, 522 California Street, San Francisco."
 Branch Office, Cooper's Bookstore, 746 Market Street
 News Dealers and Agents in the interior supplied by the San Francisco News Company, No. 413 Washington Street, to whom all orders should be addressed.
 A. P. STANTON, Business Manager.

THE ARGONAUT.

FRANK M. PIXLEY, }
 FRED. M. SOMERS, }

Editors.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 5, 1878.

EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

From the Tule Islands.

We are sorry that we promised in our last issue to write concerning our tule lands. The subject is not sufficiently within our knowledge to enable us to discuss it as intelligently as we would wish to do. Everything that contributes to the development of the agricultural lands of our State profoundly interests us. We recognize this fact, that in all lands and all parts of lands, where the soil is owned by the men and women who cultivate it, there is wealth, prosperity, and contentment. An agricultural community, tilling its own small farms, is necessarily a good one. It becomes superior in point of intelligence and patriotism to that engaged in any other pursuit. France, Holland, and Switzerland are notable examples of the thrift, economy, and superior virtues of their people. In those lands where the soil is monopolized by the great landed lords, as in Great Britain, and in Ireland, in Italy, Spain, and Austria, there are political and social discontents that can only be suppressed by force of the military arm. In a republican form of government like ours, where the very underlying principle is the right of the majority to rule, where all are entitled to exercise elective privileges, and where the right to bear arms is an organic one, the monopoly of lands, and, indeed, the accumulation of great estates, carry with them an element of danger. Whenever, in the history of this republic, the idle, the vicious, and the agitating class—those who have nothing to lose and everything to gain by disturbing the rights of property and overturning the law that guarantees its possession—shall rule, then the days of the republic will be ended; then the experiment of American liberty will have been tried and found a failure. Anything that will put to a more distant future the realization of such a condition of things should challenge the attention of all thinking men. We note, with increasing alarm, the tendency to idleness, profligacy, and crime in our great commercial cities. We observe the fact that in the rural districts of our country we have a staid, industrious, and patriotic population. We contrast the municipal government of New York—its Tweed and Tammany rings spending stolen millions in debauching the ballot-box. We observe the vicious tendencies of all our great cities of the North—noticeably Philadelphia and Baltimore. We have seen the labor insurrection of the coal regions; the disastrous railroad strike at Pittsburg, that culminated in conflagrations and destruction of property. We hear of the communistic clamors in Chicago and Cincinnati. We witness the sand-lot conspiracy in our own city; and we observe with alarm the squint-eyed man of destiny endeavoring, through blasphemy and demagoguery, to seize the executive chair of the first commonwealth of America. We ask ourselves, and very soberly, the question, How shall these possible dangers be averted? We look to our farming population everywhere throughout the nation, and see that it is conservative, staid, honest, economical, industrious, and thrifty; we note the fact that in Congress and in the State Legislature the farmers are the honest men; when civil war overtook us we observed that from the rural population of the Northern, Middle, and Western States came the soldiers that fought the battles of the republic and preserved the Union. It was not from the young gentlemen of cities, nor from the Irish, nor the German population, that volunteers stepped forward to risk their lives in defense of the land they lived in. The foreigner may not, and indeed can not, feel for his adopted country that sentiment that belongs to the native born: his children will inherit the love of their native land that will give them the courage to die for it. Hence it is, that because we think the people of the country better than the people of the town, would we desire to do that which will encourage the settlement of our rural districts by industrious families. Hence it is, that we regard the monopoly of land as a crime against republican government, and one of the first steps to an overthrow of this republic of the United States.

Theories upon questions of political economy are of very little importance unless carried into practical effect. We presume that every one who reads this article agrees with us that it would be well to diminish the idlers of our cities and increase the farmers in the country. Everybody will assent to the proposition as we have laid it down. In a small way (and we realize how feeble are our efforts) the ARGONAUT would do something to practically bring our rich mountain and valley lands to the notice of the industrious poor. If we had the wealth in lands or money of many of our acquaintance, we would select upon fruitful hill side or fat valley land some splendid domain, and upon it we would rear a monument more lasting than brass or marble, a monument as enduring as time, the base of which should be laid deep in the hearts of a population blessed by our wealth and profited by our brain. And when tourist or traveler should in some distant future inquire for this monument, a grateful people, industrious, independent men, virtuous, cultured women, intelligent, ambitious children, should answer: His monument is our homes, our families, ourselves. There is no State in the nation where a rural population can be made so independent and happy as California. The thermal belt, twenty-five miles in width and four hundred miles in length, has immense possibilities of wine and fruit. Messrs. Chapman and Marks have demonstrated that twenty acres of irrigated land upon the plains of the San Joaquin will maintain a family. We reserve to ourselves the privilege of a visit to the mussel slough country, where we understand that cooperative labor, without capital, has taken the waters of King's River to the dry land, and of it made a paradise of plenty. We shall visit the experiment made by Haggin, Tevis, and Carr in the Kern County region, which, we are informed, is upon a grander scale than any of the others, and the practical effect of which will be to provide farms for thousands of families upon such terms as will enable an industrious man to acquire an ownership in fee under a preliminary and conditional tenancy.

Our observation of these various agricultural experiments have dissipated any fear which we may have had of land monopoly. We are convinced that no amount of wealth can monopolize farming lands that are under cultivation; no scheme can be carried into practical effect that will enable any wealthy man to hold land in large quantities unless in unused or in grazing tracts. Messrs. Lux and Miller, General Beale, McLaughlin, and others may for a time keep their hundreds of thousands of acres for cattle and sheep, and even this land may be wrested from them by taxation. We use the term wrested in all its Saxon strength; we would change the whole system of taxation. Discriminating against the cultivator and in favor of the speculator is wrong: we would by light taxation offer a premium to cultivation; we would by double taxation confiscate every inch of the speculator's land. Land to be cultivated profitably must be owned in small farms, and because it can not be profitably cultivated either in large bodies or by tenants it will in time be distributed. When it is, California will become a prosperous State, property will be secure, laws will be enforced, and our wealthy men will feel that they are no longer sitting upon a powder magazine with a mob of communistic and agrarian Guy Fawkes ready to apply the match beneath them.

Our visit to the tule lands was interesting and instructive. We do not know whether the tule islands can be redeemed from overflow of the rivers, but we do know that if they can they are an empire in themselves. If we have not exhausted all the superior adjectives in describing other marvelous soils of our State, we desire to say that the alluvium of this once great inland sea has a productive capacity that is inexhaustible. Our visit was to Union and Roberts' Islands, the largest two in the State, each of them within the water flow of the San Joaquin, through its sloughs and channels, and containing something more than one hundred thousand acres, and owned by three or four persons. The largest owner upon Union Island is General Thomas H. Williams; the next is General Henry M. Naglee. The largest owners of Roberts' Island are Mr. Fischer and Mr. McLaughlin. Roberts' Island is so thoroughly reclaimed that last year it withstood the floods, while most other levees gave way. Kidd's Ranch, owned by General Williams, 2,800 acres, was also dry. Union Island was overflowed. General Williams is engaged in a wonderful work of reclamation. At one point we saw a hundred and fifty scrapers, with the same number of men, and three hundred horses, at work. Gangs of men, all white, are at work on every side, building or repairing dykes, plowing and farming. His work is of the most substantial character, and would not be unworthy the Government of Holland in reclaiming lands from the sea. His whole work of reclaiming sixty thousand acres—which we understand is the extent of his property—will demand the expenditure of some millions of dollars. This splendid work is a gift to California from the Comstock Mine. General Naglee is confining his farming operations to the main land upon the western bank of the San Joaquin River, using his island land for pasturage, guarding it with an ordinary levee, sufficient for dry seasons, but not for those of floods. In the lower portion of Union Island, and as you approach the junction of the San Joaquin and Sacramento rivers, the land is more difficult of reclamation, much of it being float land, but when reclaimed even better garden soil than that which is more substantial. The reclamation of these lands is still in the domain of experiment. A vast amount of money, skill, and inventive faculty is now being expended in the effort. The time will come when, by storing the water in the mountains, by irrigating the plains, by exhausting the lakes—Tulare, Kern, and Buena Vista—the waters of the San Joaquin will be so controlled and regulated within its channels that all the islands and margins will be left for safe cultivation. When this time comes our State will have added to its wealth untold millions in value. These valley lands will support a population as great as the most fertile spots of India, the most productive shores of the Nile, or the choicest places under the Alps in Lombardy. Here, upon a soil of inexhaustible richness, in a climate almost free from frost, crops may be produced in rotation during the entire year. Ten acres of land cultivated to its highest capacity would be equal in production to a hundred acres of the richest bottom lands in the valley of the Genesee. Given, the area of this swamp and overflowed land of the valleys of Sacramento and San Joaquin; place a family of five persons upon each ten acres of land; dot the broad plain with cottage homes, with school houses, contented, happy people, faces of smiling children; let ten or twenty years pass away, and then we commend Kearney, Wellock, Beerstecher, O'Donnell, Vacquerel, and the balance of this party of reform, to visit the colony. Let them, as at the sand lots, invoke in ribald blasphemy the Divine vengeance upon the heads of those who have the prudence and the foresight to gain country homes. Let them endeavor to teach the children of such a people the lessons they are now giving out against republican institutions, and a free government that has made such happy homes possible to all who are willing to work. Then will their cheap and nasty talk be appreciated at its full value.

The Hon. Stephen J. Field, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, has just returned from a trip through Oregon, Washington Territory, and the North country. He gives to us a glowing account of the land as one of marvelous fertility of soil, adaptation for commerce, and one destined to a magnificent future. He represents the trip to the North as one that every person should take to appreciate the capacities of this most desirable portion of our domain. The scenery of the Columbia is represented to exceed in picturesque beauty the Hudson, the Rhine, or the more romantic parts of Europe. The land abounds in magnificent forests, in streams filled with fish; the soil is of unexampled fertility, the climate unsurpassed for excellence. The Puget Sound is a splendid inland sea fringed with primeval forests and rich lands, out of which may be carved desirable farms and homes. The whole land is adapted for agricultural and grazing pursuits and abounding in coal. It is a land in which there are no loungers, no tramps, no grumbling, no poverty, and no idleness; a land of boundless opportunity for remunerative labor, where industry, perseverance, economy, and toil may carve out homes of plenty and abundance. This accords with all we have ever heard of Oregon and Washington Territory, and justifies us in withholding all sympathy from the broad-shouldered, full-necked, brawny idlers that throng our sand-lots, blaspheming God and cursing free institutions, because they can not, by simply lifting their grimy hands in applause of ranting demagoguery, earn their beer and bread. For these cowardly foreign miscreants and their flannel-mouthed oratory we have only the contempt due to crime and idle discontent. The industrious toiling man and woman we honor; the noisome clamor that comes of ignorance and idleness we despise. One of the questionable privileges of a free government is the unlimited license of demagoguery. One of the privileges of brave men in organized society is to dare these talking miscreants to some overt act that they may be crushed by the strong arm of the law.

The Republican party seems to be strengthening, while the Democratic seems to be going to pieces. In this State the workingmen's movement draws largely from the Democracy. In Maine and Ohio two Democrats have joined the Greenback party to one Republican. Wherever an independent movement shows itself, it is to the prejudice of the Democracy. Except in the probable fact of a solid South Democracy would cut but a small figure in the coming Presidential election.

The squint-eyed man of destiny in Massachusetts, aided by the blasphemous cart-driver of the sand-lots, is in danger of being distanced in the scrub race he is making for Governor. In boiling sap, scalding hogs, and making soap, the scum rises to the top and is skimmed off. This simmering and boiling of the pot political will enable the country to get rid of the scum before the Presidential election.

AFTERMATH.

Riding through the oak groves that skirt the San Joaquin, not far away from where the railroad bridge crosses the stream, we came upon a camp-meeting of Dunkers—a sort of Seventh-day Baptists, who baptize by plunging, and who in former times wore a peculiar dress, do not cut the hair nor shave the beard. Males and females live in separate houses; celibacy is regarded as a virtue. They salute each other by kissing. Washing one another's feet is a religious ceremony. This kissing business might do among the younger and fairer pullets of the flock, but when it comes to washing the feet of an aged rooster we should beg to be excused. The tule mud on the San Joaquin is so very nasty.

Mr. Clitus Barbour will put a provision in the organic law against puts and calls. The colored troops fought bravely.

There is no lobby around the Constitutional Convention. This is very hard on some of its members, especially that class to whom the opportunity for legislation is presented for the first time, and to whom it will never occur again. We refer to that class who delight in resisting a bribe.

When Clitus goes into court he violates that fundamental rule of equity which demands that the suitor must come into court with clean hands. We look to Clitus to become the most active opponent of the Spring Valley Water Company. A monopoly more abominable does not exist than one which adulterates our whisky and gives us no apology for being unclean.

We commend the following statement of facts to those beer-drinking Dutchmen, who, having emigrated from the swamps, polders, and canals of Holland, can find no better employment on the Pacific Coast than cursing God and grumbling at their luck. Mr. Eckstein, Consul at Amsterdam, states in his report to our State department that farm laborers, when hired by the year, are paid from $50 to $60, with board. It is also customary to give each laborer two suits of common clothing each year. Farm laborers, when hired by the day, command fifty cents in harvest and other busy times. In the nurseries in the vicinity of Haarlem, more or less skilled workmen receive $2.90 a week for nine months in the year, and $2.60 a week for three months. Female servants receive from $20 to $60 a year. The lower rate of servants are those who live in their own houses, whose duties are considered to end about four P. M. Diamond-cutters command high wages—from $40 to $80 per week. Carpenters, masons, painters, and other mechanics earn from seventeen to twenty-five cents per day. Shoemakers doing fine work sometimes earn $6 a week; those doing the more common work earn from $2.40 to $3.60. The number of hours in a day's work is never less than twelve, and sometimes more. Workingmen contrive to live on these low wages, and it is said that there is no sign of general discontent.

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue has perfected a system of frequent examinations of Collectors' books and accounts by Agents. The Collector may not be honest, you know, whereas the Agent is very sure to be if he is fit for his position. From one kind of clay God makes a Collector, from another kind an Agent.

The wheelbarrow-man is expected at Sacramento to-day or to-morrow. He has urged his monocycle all the way from Chicago. Perhaps we do him injustice; may be it is only from Omaha. We would not willfully misstate the folly of a fool; it is bad enough for the poor fellow to arrive at Sacramento during the session of the Constitutional Convention and have his wheelbarrow stolen by the reform delegates.

Condon and Melody, the murderers recently released by the British Government after eleven years' confinement, had an "ovation" in New York. Condon is an American citizen, and was released at the already frequently refused request of this Government. Had he been confined in one of our own penitentiaries he would have forfeited some of the privileges of citizenship, but a conviction of felony in another country will not, we believe, effect his political status in his own, and Mr. Condon will vote "ferriest the Government." Mr. Melody is not an American citizen, but will be made one in time to vote against resumption, and put a spoke in the wheel of the lecherous bondholders.

Speaking of these great Fenian statesmen and possible Presidents, the London Spectator points out that although they committed the same offense their punishment is not equal, for their release from prison is accompanied with the proviso that they shall live out of Her Majesty's dominions—that is, says the Spectator, Condon is pardoned and sent home to his friends, while Melody is pardoned and sentenced to banishment for life. That Mr. Melody is not an American citizen, with all his friends and relatives holding office in this country, is his own fault; America was as ready and willing to provide for him then as now, although he is, of course, more agreeable to the simple Republican nose now that he smells of an "English bastille."

The defensive and extremely offensive alliance hitherto existing between Mr. George M. Pinney and the Chronicle is hereby dissolved, and each tub will henceforth stand on its own bottom. This, therefore, is to notify all persons knowing themselves indebted to the late firm of Pinney & DeYoung that they will be sued by each for what they owe to both.

The superintendent of a third-rate restaurant has committed suicide. This vulgarizes the business, and respectable "unfortunates" will no longer go to Glory but to Mexico. A considerable patronage will be thus diverted from the undertakers to the steamships, and down at Mazatlan the United States Detective Resident will sit upon the sand, projecting an expectant regard seaward, and executing a tranquil smile that shall extend all the way from Guaymas to Acapulco.

At some recent competitive examinations in oratorical pyrotechnics, the various speakers and readers were introduced by Mr. Edward Curtiss, of whom the Call's Jenkins says he "has a happy faculty of saying bright things at the proper time." For the second time a list of the bright things said is appended to this praise. Here are a few average samples: "I now introduce to you one of California's most efficient legislators, the Hon. Wm. B. May." Of another speaker: "A gentleman whose learning, originality of ideas, and brilliant eloquence have carved for him a place in the very fore-front of American clergymen." Of a singer: "A young lady whose musical genius and versatility is (sic) the wonder of strangers and the pride of her friends." If the author of the dazzling "bright things" has a proper regard for his well merited reputation as a speaker and scholar, he will cast about for some way to tether the pen-hand of his superserviceable sycophant. Or (as he who praises without judgment will defame without provocation) perhaps it would be even better for Mr. Curtiss to perpetrate some faultless idiocy, and so, by stimulating the creature's envy, secure the advantage of his abuse.

Mr. Joaquin Miller has chosen the subject "What is Poetry?" for his lecture when he arrives from abroad.

What's poetry? The bard is hot
To tell us with his tongue; and so
We'll know then all there is to know—
He's shown us with his pen what's not.

The dispatches inform us that England has offered the ruler of Afghanistan an opportunity to make amends for the affront to the British Envoy. We are somehow reminded of an altercation that occurred the other evening at the Palace Hotel, in this city. "Sir!" thundered an irate gentleman to a gentleman who held himself well in hand, "you have grossly insulted me; I will give you just one minute to apologize." "Thanks, I do not wish to apologize," said the other quietly. "But you have got to." "But I won't." "Very well, sir, then I won't." "But you must." And he did.

We are told that the warm welcome everywhere extended to Señor Zamacona in the Western States has made a favorable impression on Mexican merchants, who are enthusiastically favorable to closer commercial relations with the United States. Thus, as we approach the realization of Mr. Watterson's dream of a soft-soap currency, and European nations begin to wash their hands of us, we prepare to leech the ashes of the late lamented Sister Republic for lye in which to boil our own bones.

The artists of our illustrated papers have not come out very strong in their pictorial appeals to the sentiments anent the yellow fever. This penury of invention is almost as marked as that of the head-line editors of the dailies, who have relied for effect almost entirely on alliteration, and have produced nothing more moving than "The Desolating Demon Dismally Doubles 'em Up," and "Slaughter Still Swinging the Saffron Scourge"—which are feeble. The artists' imaginations have been unable to soar beyond the conception of the usual bat-winged skeleton flying through a pease-soup atmosphere above a coal black city, or a buxom woman labeled "North" emptying a cornucopiaful of silver dollars as big as wagon wheels on the head of a ribby fever patient supported by a skinny old maid labeled "South"—in the background a Federal army licking a Confederate army on some new and unexplained issue. Poor as these conceptions are they are not without their power upon the heart; they fill one with a melancholy regret that he ever gave a cent.

It would seem that some one of these artists might have drawn a noble and adequate inspiration from those graphic lines of Fitz-Greene Halleck:

"The blessed seals
That close the pestilence are broke,
And crowded cities wait its stroke."

Give it a pencil and a block of boxwood and this spirited conception will almost draw itself. Who will paint it in oils that the next generation may have a souvenir of the great epidemic?

A revolver purse is advertised in London as good for highwaymen. We would like to have one. There would be no end of casualties among our creditors.

PRATTLE.

On Tuesday morning last a man named Widmer, the leader, I learn, of the Baldwin's Theatre orchestra, entered the ARGONAUT office, asking if my name was Bierce, and if I wrote a certain line in last week's issue. On being promptly assured that such was the case he as promptly struck at me with his fist or open hand—as the blow failed of its intent I can not say which. I do not enter into contests of that kind, and drew my pistol, when Mr. Widmer's friend, who had entered unperceived by me, and whose name I have not taken the trouble to ascertain, sprang upon me and seized the cocked weapon, Mr. Widmer closing with me at the same time. At this stage of a struggle rather dangerous for all concerned and all within pistol shot, Mr. Pixley, knowing nothing of the cause of the contest nor who was the aggressor, emerged from his private office, seized Mr. Widmer and forced him into a corner. The "subsequent proceedings" consisted in a struggle between Mr. Widmer's friend and myself for the weapon, which eventually remained in possession of its owner. This necessarily terminated the contest, for it then appeared that the two gentlemen had had the singular indiscretion to come upon such an errand unarmed. Mr. Pixley and others now interceded for Mr. Widmer's life; to that gentleman's credit be it stated he did not ask for it himself, nor appear to expect that it would be spared. Both gentlemen now left the building; the bravest men in the world could have done no more nor less.

It was a pretty enough quarrel, no cursing, nobody down, no blood; so far as I know not a blow received by any one—a struggle for a weapon the possession of which was decisive without merit in the victor or dishonor to the vanquished. A disinterested and impartial bookcase suffered the loss of a square of glass for which I think Mr. Widmer ought to pay.

These are "the short and simple annals" of this affair—this is the whole truth. In relating it I have this advantage over the reporters: no one who knows me can disbelieve me, whereas they, even though they write anonymously, are nevertheless not believed, owing to the bad reputation of their editors. They have lied so much that they can no longer deceive except by telling the truth, and conscientious scruples do not permit them. Such occasions as this are their harvest; it is then they gather their tar-weed sheaves of revenge, for it must be confessed that neither Mr. Pixley nor myself have been uniformly good to them. They can not meet us on the ground of truth; they have not wit—pray what would you have them do? I would not shoot an unarmed and defenseless man; it is to be supposed that I would carry on intellectual hostilities with the journalists of this town without giving them the odds of lying? It is a condition of the combat, and I am astonished at their moderation. What was to prevent them saying I had my hand in Mr. Widmer's pocket?

But the press reports have this serious aspect—they seem to have been inspired by Mr. Widmer. If they were, that altogether alters their significance; they no longer amuse, they insult. The most picturesque and imaginative narrative is given in what purports to be Mr. Widmer's language; but that is of course in the Chronicle. It is impossible to believe that a man who in this matter bore himself like a man of courage with a grievance, when unsuccessful through an indiscretion accepted his life with dignity, and went away with the respect of his antagonist, is capable of the immatchable baseness of going about to newspaper and telegraph offices to retrieve his fortunes by a kind of victory for which even in excitement he could hardly be unaware that when cool he would despise himself. As a mere matter of common sense he could hardly desire that I should have the advantage of knowing that he suffered from self-contempt. Yet there are the reports, ostensibly his own version, certainly not mine, certainly emanating from no one in this office. They have not, to my knowledge, been disavowed. This, as I said, and beg Mr. Widmer to observe, is a serious matter. He must expect it to be so treated.

Mr. Widmer, under circumstances of grave provocation and supreme advantage I made to you a gift of your life, which morally you had forfeited, and in a sense legally, for had I taken it no jury in this country would have convicted me. Not one man in a hundred would have spared you; you did not expect to be spared. Because of this generosity I am described in the journals as a coward, and you are asserted to be their authority for the description. I do not ask you to confirm my version; I am satisfied to let that rest on my simple word, and the word of those who witnessed without taking a part in the quarrel. But, sir, if you are a gentleman you will disavow the version attributed to you. And this you will do not as a condition precedent to anything else, and wholly irrespective of any considerations other than those of truth and manliness. Reparation goes backward; it is the rule. He must not expect it who offends in his demand. Having disavowed the authorship of the falsehoods attributed to you, and not till then, it will be in order for you to demand a retraction of, or satisfaction for, the original offense—neither of which, I hardly need to repeat, you have yet obtained.

TOLD IN LETTERS.

Domestic Fact and Fashionable Fancy.

DEAR EM:—What a bright, charming corner is that of Slaven's, under the equally delightful "Baldwin," and what a world of sweet and pretty things you can always find there! I have been trying some of his pet perfumes lately and am particularly pleased with the Ixora de Bréonie, which, as its compound name indicates, is a duplex fragrance combining that of the Ixora, a delicate East Indian shrub, and Bréonie, the make-up of which is jealously guarded by perfumers. But what can rival his great specialty, the Yosemite cologne? I am sure you will agree with me, when you have used it, that it is unapproachable. Here is a little description of it I came across in my reading lately, which struck me as summing it up completely: "Would you learn the secrets of the wind that sweeps over fields of flowers, cooling here, and bending with the weight of his boisterous kiss the fragile blossoms there; carrying the spell that bewitches the senses—the breath of Venus it has been called—wherever he goes? Would you hear the story of the dew, that has kissed the lily lip and the rose cheek, and rested, like a diamond set by the hand of the goldsmith Nature on the purple blossoms of the violet and pansy, till every pulsation of the blossom's heart gives it a new fragrance? Would you share the powers of the golden sun that watches and warms, vivifies and brings to full perfection the treasures of field and garden? Would you gather, in one sensation, the warmth of the rose, the fragrance of the lily, the fire, the fragrance, and the grace of the heliotrope, geranium, verbena, and orange blossom?" Of course, you know the answer. It can be none other than the one word Yosemite. Neat, isn't it. Couldn't have done better myself. Ahem! But there are many other things for which ye female mind (and male too, for that matter) has a weakness. There is a case full of those lovely Baccarat toilet ornaments that would satisfy the most exacting, and powder boxes, ring receivers, and the various other odds and ends that make a well-appointed toilet table look like the shrine of some favored saint filled with votive offerings, all of crystal, silver, and whatever the cunning of the artist's brain can conceive of daintiness. I don't venture into the realms of medical lore, but Mr. Slaven, I know has every remedy for every disease under the sun, and competent and experienced hands to make it up, while who in San Francisco has not tried his infallible remedy for that form of thirst that afflicts at least one-third of a theatre audience by the end of the third act. I have been wanting to tell you for some time of my delight at the success of my new sewing machine, but there has been so much else to talk of that I have basely neglected it, knowing that it and its merits would lose nothing by the keeping. Well, this marvel of modern mechanical skill can do everything that other machines can do, and more too. It can fell, braid, embroider, tuck, put on dress braid, make that troublesome trimming, "milliner's folds," now so much used; yea, even unto the double fold and setting it on at the same time; can gather a ruffle, set it on and set on the facing, all at once; almost intelligently it can cord, do hemstitching, quilting, fringing, bind scollops or points, and make side platings; in short, do almost everything except furnish the materials. There is nothing to learn about the tension, which is always right; no bother about threading the needle, for it is so simple a child could do it after being once shown, and there is no "feed" in the world like it. I have increased the thickness of the work from a single fold of fine linen to sixteen thicknesses of cloth just as an experiment, and that wonderful but simple "presser foot" just skipped along over all as lively as though there was nothing under it, for you must know that this paragon is expressly named the "Vertical Feed," in order to distinguish it from any other. It is made by the Davis Machine Company up in that pretty little spot in New York State, Watertown, where so many other notable industries thrive. The success of the machine has been so great of late that extensive additions have recently been made to their interesting factory, which is one of the places that sight-seers are sure to visit when they go there. I think we women owe a world of gratitude to not only the inventor, but the improvers of this blessed contrivance. I would not sell my Davis for a thousand dollars unless I was sure I could get another exactly like it right away. Landers & Gilmore have some pretty things in the way of cashmere wrappers, in scarlet, gray, and black, with the regular cashmere pattern borders, and a good line of serges, bourettes, and mixed woolen goods generally. Their front window shows what they can do in the way of sleep-enticing articles like blankets and comfortables, as well as those indispensable adjuncts of the toilet, handsome toweling. I saw some small shoulder shawls on the counter that looked as though they might be very becoming to middle-aged aunts and grandmothers. They were of cashmere, in the dead-leaf colors, and embroidered in chain stitching of the same color as the shawl itself, only shaded. Dress goods naturally suggested trimmings, so I sauntered into line's, next door, to see if his supplies within verified the pleasant display seen from the street. I was not disappointed, for I found several very choice things in the way of fringes, laces, and buttons. The latter, you know, are being used much smaller again, which is an improvement, I think, and the graceful drop buttons so fashionable a few years ago are also returning to favor. I saw some very handsome ones, single acorns, and also the same design in clusters, and two or three on a string. Those attached to a circular bit of passementerie are sometimes used, though not so much as the others. The whalebone and seaweed fringes have evidently come to stay, for they are staunch favorites, and are being improved on every new lot. A whalebone fringe with a handsome and solid passementerie heading, the whole over a finger in depth, may be had now for $2.50 a yard, while plainer patterns are only $1.50. A very beautiful piece of the double, mixed with chenille, costs $7 a yard. "Seaweed" is a pretty name, but "Mermaid's hair" would have been better. It is not a bit like seaweed, not so much even as the so-called "whalebone" fringe, which resembles the whalebone only in the matter of gloss. But "what's in a name" after all? A very handsome imitation chenille fringe comes which is very deep, and the ends of chenille, which are made of silk twisted to resemble it, are alternated with bits of fine, flossy silk threads strung in little bunches; a roll beading completes it. The piece I saw was in pale, silvery blue. Torchon lace, white, with the point of the scollops only touched with a color—pink, blue, or green—seems to be much sought after, and was well represented, as, indeed, were any number of other laces, including the guipure, in both white and black. How rapidly Wurfheim has gained favor since he first entered his present store on Kearny Street, only a few months ago. He has now one of the fullest and handsomest stocks of cloaks and suits in the city. A lovely blue suit, lately in the window, has attracted a great deal of admiring notice from passers by. It is of the deep shade—between a violet and a navy blue—and is trimmed with pipings of ciclé, binding the pointed tabs that finish the overskirt and hang low down on the kilt plaitings of the underdress; pockets and sleeves are similarly finished; and reversible bows here and there complete an exceedingly piquant dinner or reception dress. In cloaks, the prevailing style at this house is the full-sized loose or half-fitting sacque, of matelasse—or the soft, shaggy cloth—trimmed with velvet, fringe, or lace. Their shapes are noticeable for the graceful slope of the seams, on which so much depends in outdoor garments—particularly in heavy goods. The multitudinous seams of the Princesse pattern are at last doomed; and I am heartily glad of it, for they made the most erect figure look round-shouldered, and were only a multiplication of stitches for no good end. The only sensible and pretty back ever worn, the genuine French one—with or without a seam down the middle, and the sloping arm seams—will take their place. Well, blessed be variety, I say; for it is sure to either bring back old favorites, after a certain time, or to introduce new ones. One goes to the Ville de Paris as a matter of course. (I am always impressed anew with a sense of profound gratitude to that pleasant firm for having selected so easy and comprehensive a title for their store, whenever I catch sight of its collective name on the Sutter-Street side of the building. It's a match for the well-known publishing house of Claxton, Remsen & Hefelfinger that has so long tried the "brotherly love" of Philadelphians! Messieurs Kandler, Lelievre & Scellier, I salute you!) Handkerchiefs, fine as gossamer, and embroidered in delicate designs, in mixed colors and with deep pointed edges—new devices in collars and collarettes—novelties in fans, neckties, and jabots attracted me to the fancy goods side of the store. Particularly pretty are turn-over collars, made of muslin and Mirecourt lace, with a cascade bow of the same material, having plaited ends—the whole attached to the collar; they are new, too, and exclusive—I have seen them no where else. My young friends, Billings, Harbourn & Co., are going in a way that indicates that they mean to win. They have opened in fine style at their new premises, No. 3 Montgomery, and everything is as fresh and neat as paint and good taste can make it. You would not recognize the place, it is so changed. There is a handsomely finished off gallery at the back, running across the whole width, and enclosed by a white and gold railing, behind which extend the well-filled book cases that fill that end and one whole side of the room, from floor to ceiling. These include the poets and other standard works, all elegantly bound, and a large number of holiday books. I tried to get off a feeble joke, on the gallery being for the quiere, but it was nipped in the bud by my discovering that the stationery was destined to occupy a very different place. Alas! so do our best efforts sometimes fail. I strongly suspect that beautiful boxes of all kinds are to be one of the numerous specialties here, for there was a most perplexing variety of them to any one who would want to make a choice. Very handsomely mounted graphoscopes, too, for Christmas gifts, are among the novelties, a list of which would include more articles than I have space to name. For the fair religieuse, for example, there are elegantly ornamented prayer-books and Bibles, bound in ivory, carved or painted, and in Russia leather, in neat little cases of the same, to which are attached handles, that they may be carried like satchels. For the more worldly minded, all that is new in albums, work-boxes, writing desks, pocketbooks, and so on. Just here let me advise you of a delightful little accessory to your writing case. It is a sachet made of perfumed leather, technically called peau d'espagne, and is made by steeping a bit of chamois skin in civet and musk, which must be rubbed in a mortar with liquid gum. It is made somewhat more elaborately by perfumers abroad, by the addition of attar, odoriferous gum, resins, etc., and is sold by them by the square inch. These sachets were first made, it is said, by that Italian chemist, Frangipanni, who originated the perfume named after him. The odor is almost imperishable. Cassiolette, too, used for scenting hand-bags or work-boxes, may be filled with a paste of gum tragacanth, or acacia gum, and equal parts of musk, ambergris, vanilla, attar of rose, and orris root powder. But, dear me! here I am wandering back into Slaven's special domain; let us return to No. 3 Montgomery at once, that I may chronicle an example of thoughtfulness this enterprising young firm have already set, which it would be well to have generally followed. That is, in providing drinking water for the refreshment of warm and weary shoppers. It is often said that women are more keenly appreciative of small acts of courtesy than of the yielding of great rights. However that may be, I fancy very few who may avail themselves of this one fountain in the wilderness of San Francisco stores, will be disposed to underrate the attention. The latest hints as to what will be the styles for children during the coming winter are as yet slender. The princesse still rules, and the finest of side plaitings are the reigning trimming for the bottoms of skirts, jackets, and sacques, while plastrons, when used, are largely shirred. Mrs. Dannenberg, on Montgomery Street, has some very pretty suits, and will have very much more of novelty in the course of the coming week. I have numerous other items for your private ear next time I write. Commend me to your good man, and tell Adele I have something to tell her too. Always yours,

LILIAS DUBOIS.

The Shah of Persia is in a quandary: for he doesn't know whether the splendid promises of civilization and development offered him by Europe mean friendship or conquest.

Whatever you would not wish your neighbor to do to you, do it not unto him. This is the whole law; the rest is a mere exposition of it.—Talmud.

Evil ministers of good things are as torches—a light to others, a waste to none but themselves.

THE DOG THAT I SHOT.

It was somewhere about the spring of the year 1852, as nearly as I can remember, when I used to get up early and take a ride before breakfast of fifteen or twenty miles in the neighborhood of San Francisco.

Among my other routes of return to the city from these rides was one through a small valley, which opened to the southwest like the lower end of a trumpet, but gradually diminished in breadth as it narrowed in a regular curve, like a cow's horn—similar to that of the famous valley of Cuernavaca in Mexico. Entering this valley at its broadest width, I passed, at my left hand, a rude cabin, whose frame-work was evidently constructed of branches roughly hewn from the neighboring oaks; over these were nailed, and most impartially distributed, dried hides of cattle, rusted sheets of iron, fragments of the tin lining of dry-goods cases, coal sacks, and gunny bags. At the lower corner of the cabin, at my left hand as I entered the valley, always sat the lord of the castle. He was evidently one of those trappers from the Rocky Mountains, who abounded here in those early times. He was clad in a suit of buckskin; a tunic of yellowish, dirty, greasy, mountain-dressed, untanned deer hide, whose borders were fringed with rude, twisted twigs, suggesting an imitation of tassels; foul breeches or pantaloons to match; and leathern boots—undoubtedly Yankee in pattern, make, and material. His matted, carrotty locks had no covering of hat or cap. A crisp, yellow-whitish beard curled over his face like a drought-smitten stubble. He was smoking a corn-cob pipe.

I had passed him thus many times in my customary rides through the valley, and it finally occurred to me that his dog—an immense yellow one, half and half of the bull-dog and blood-hound cross—had always done me the unnecessary honor to accompany me from the point at the cabin, where I entered the valley, to the other point, some three hundred feet distant, where I turned out of it and left the hovel out of sight, but always trying to seize my horse by the throat. I remembered, also, that just at this point, where he would get out of sight of his master, the dog gave up his assault upon my horse. I tried often to get that dog beyond that point, but to no purpose. I coaxed him in perfect English; I wheedled him in Parisian French; I cajoled him in Saxon German; I adjured him in a mixture of Italian, Spanish, and Portuguese, which would have passed muster as good lingua Franca in any port on the Mediterranean. All in vain. That dog could not be persuaded to go beyond that point where the gradual turn of the valley brought the slope of the hill between himself and his master's lodge. He was a sensible dog.

But one morning I rode back to my friend, the obvious trapper, and the following colloquy took place:

"My friend, you must have noticed me riding through this valley some three or four times a week?"

"Yus."

"You must have observed that your dog has always accompanied me, and tried to take my horse by the throat?"

"Yus."

"This is very annoying to me."

"Yus."

"Well, I propose to ride through here, as usual, and when you see that your dog is annoying me in this way I hope that you will call him off."

"No."

"You won't?"

"No."

"Well, my friend, if you won't call him off, I will take him off. Now, understand, I shall come here, as usual, on my morning ride, to-morrow morning; and if your dog assails my horse, I will shoot him. Do you understand?"

"Yus."

I rode home. I borrowed a pistol. If I remember aright it was one of those machines called a six-shooter. I had it loaded. I took lessons on it, so that I might fire it without shooting myself. I put it in my pocket. I rode out with it on the morning, on my customary route. We passed the cabin. There sat the trapper, in his usual costume, smoking his confounded old corn-cob pipe. There, also, was the dog, who, as we passed, rose gracefully from his repose at the feet of his master. Bounding up with a rising sweep, in a perfectly graceful curve—Hogarth's line of beauty—he tried to seize the throat of my horse. I drew the pistol. I accommodated my aim to the rise and fall of my horse upon the gallop.

I adjusted my aim. It is a curious fact, that as two clocks hung on the opposite sides of a thick brick or stone wall will affect each other, and come to run together in the same time, or as two sleeping snorers will gradually reach the same beautiful snore, so a horse and a dog running together will practice the same gallop or lope. So I easily made myself sure that that dog was bounding to the same regular movement as the gallop of my horse, and that I had fixed him with an aim which would certainly send my first shot through both his carotid artery and jugular vein. This was all in the cause of humanity, or rather of canininity, for bleeding from both sources would, of course, shorten the agonies of the dying dog. But I wanted one thing more. I wanted my friend, the trapper, to be in at the death. I had promised him that I would kill his dog. I wanted him to see me shoot the animal. Well, when I had got an assured aim, I cast one look back at the trapper, to be sure that he was there, and would see the killing. And there he was. He had dropped his corn-cob pipe. He stood erect. His left foot was advanced a foot or two beyond the other. In his right hand, with its breech resting on the ground, ready to be brought forward and dropped into bearing in the palm of his left hand, was a rifle nineteen feet in length. He himself was twenty-two feet in height. I am sure of these dimensions, because I was there. I saw him distinctly, and made my estimate on the spot.

Well, we turned out of the valley—that is, the horse and I did, for the dog could not be persuaded to come around the sandy slope of the hill, which would have concealed him from his master.

I did not kill that dog. I did not even fire at him. I do not know what became of him. According to the best of my recollection I never rode into that valley any more, or any where in that neighborhood. JOHN W. DWINELLE.

SAN FRANCISCO, September, 1878.

INTAGLIOS.

Summer's Done.

Thinner the leaves of the larches show,
Motionless held in the languid air;
Fainter by waysides the sweetbriars grow,
Wide bloom laying their gold hearts bare.
Languishing one by one;
Summer is almost done.

Deeper-hued roses have long since died;
Silent the birds through the white mists fly;
Down of the thistles, by hot suns dried,
Covers with pale fleece vines growing nigh;
Little brooklets calmer run;
Summer is almost done.

Later the flush of sunrise sweeps,
Shortening the reign of the slow-coming day;
Earlier shade of the twilight creeps
Over the swallows skimming away;
Crickets their notes have begun;
Summer is almost done.

The Woods in Autumn.

Flashes of gold that fleck the sober grey,
Dark ruddy tints that crimson in the light;
Soft streaks of silver glimmering pearly white,
Amid the russet browns half hid away;
Pure green of spring that lingers while it may;
Patches of ivy-foliage dark as night;
Rich purple shades that peep out from the height:

Such crown with glory the September day.
Oh, autumn woods! I lie beside the stream
That winds you round about so lovingly,
And, rapt in sense of wondrous beauty, see
How vain must be ambition's lofty dream
To rival tints like yours, or dare to trace
Your perfect harmony, your perfect grace.

A Song of Modern Love.

Give me that branch of lilac, dear
(Full of what sweet, crushed fragrances!),
Out of your breast, as if so near
It lay to where your breathing is
That it is perfumed with your breath!
I would be caught but what I am,
Your lover just—no less, no more.
I would not have the right to claim
One flower, and lose the right to implore:
With joys possessed, such sorrow entereth.

I take the flower I pleaded for,
And it becomes my very own.
Where is its charm? Upon the floor
I strew the poor bruised blossoms down,
And he may gather them who will!
I touch your hand—to let it go;
I kiss your lips—and turn aside;
And know that if it were not so,
Long, long ago our love had died;
God save your lord that I may love you still!
W. M. H.

To-day and To-morrow.

Old Time is the drollest of wags,
And puzzles the world with his rules;
He gave all to-day to the wise,
To-morrow he promised the fools.

At first he made naught but to-day,
With its joys, its successes, and sorrow,
Then to keep on good terms with the world,
He promised he'd make a to-morrow.

The idle rejoiced at the news,
Put their hands in their pockets and slept,
Believing the promise of Time
Would be most religiously kept.

At last they woke up but to find
To-morrow was really a myth,
And thought what they'd do when too late,
If they had the time to do with.

They prayed to old Time to return,
"Twas merely the wasting of breath,
For they found, as he laughed and flew on,
That to-morrow was nothing but death."

Rencontre.

Toiling across the Mer de Glace,
I thought of, longed for thee;
What miles between us stretched, alas!
What miles of land and sea!
My foe, undreamed of, at my side
Stood suddenly, like Fate,
For those who love, the world is wide,
But not for those who hate.

T. B. ALDRICH.

The Luxury of Song.

The sweetest tones are not the tones of gladness;
Woe best calls forth the luxury of song,
When men pierced to the heart with secret sadness
Would fain avoid the busy, curious throng,
And while they soothe their own deep-seated pain,
Pour from their hearts a sad yet pleasing strain.

The nightingale, with dark remembrance singing,
Pours forth a rippling melody of song;
From her rich store of tragedy old-bringing
Such notes as to none other bird belong,
And while she "stays her breast against a thorn"
Teaches the woods and sullen caves to mourn.

"Through Rose of Dawn."

Through rose of dawn, and sunset's radiant dyes,
Through golden harvest dewy joy of spring,
Through all the beautiful that poets sing,
She walked with heavy feet and downcast eyes.
To Nature's smiles she rendered naught but sighs,
While age made drearier yet each earthly thing,
Till Death bent o'er her with his shadowy wing,
And in his cold arms bore her to the skies.
And thus she left the world; but looking back,
She asked, as through the stars they took their way,
"What star, O Angel, with silvery track Shines yonder, loveliest of the whole array?"
"What! I know ye not the place you thought so dread?
That shining planet is the Earth!" Death said.

The Doppelgänger.

Still is the night and the streets are lone;
My darling dwelt in this house of yore;
'Tis years since she from the city has flown,
Yet the house stands there as it did before.

There, too, stands a man, and aloft stares he,
And for stress of anguish he wrings his hands,
My blood runs cold when his face I see,
'Tis my own very self in the moonlight stands.

Thou double! Thou fetch, with livid face,
Why dost thou mimic my lovelorn mould,
That was racked and rent in this very place
So many a night in the time of old?

HEINE.

Plays.

Alas, how soon the hours are over
Counted us out to play the lover!
And how much narrower is the stage
Allotted us to play the sage!
But when we play the fool, how wide
The theatre expands! beside,
How long the audience sit before us;
How many prompters, what a chorus!

WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR.

BLACK JAKE'S "INTENDED."

An Idyl of Deadwood.

"Say, gran'pa, suppose we stay here."
"Very well, deary, just as you say—just as you say."
Heart alive, what a cute little maid it is!

The last rays of sunset had left all but the tops of the taller pines and the highest crags of the surrounding rocks. The place the little girl had chosen as a resting place was a sort of alcove formed by the rocks, with a grassy sward and a little spring bubbling up, and open only to the highway—the stage road that led to Deadwood City, more than twenty miles away.

A strange pair they seemed to be, traveling alone on that solitary road. The old man was very old indeed, his figure bent and bowed, with long, white hair, and trembling hands that seemed to be always groping for something in a nervous sort of way, while the little girl, a child of ten or twelve, with a most engaging face, surrounded by curls the tint of sunshine, set at once busily to work gathering some sticks with which to make a fire.

In a very little while it was burning briskly, and then, seating herself beside the old man, she opened a basket nearly as large as herself which the two had carried between them, and taking from it some bread and cheese, divided it between her companion and herself.

"Now, gran'pa," she said, when they had finished their frugal meal and washed it down with some clear, cold water from the little spring, "you must be awful tired. You just go to sleep while I put some more sticks on the fire to keep away the bogies. Ain't it splendid. Just like a picnic."

"Yes, yes, deary," answered the old man, in his imbecile way; "but they'll be terrible mad when they come home and find it out. Dear heart alive, what a cute little maid it is."

"Now you just had better be asleep, gran'pa, when I come back, or I'll—I'll never kiss you any more."

And, kissing him again as she spoke, with one little finger held up in a comical, warning way, she set about replenishing the fire.

The old man obeyed her implicitly, and laying back on the soft sward, by the time she returned was fast asleep; and kissing him, she buttoned his coat close about his throat. Then she knelt down, and saying her prayers, looked around her in a fearful sort of way, for it had grown quite dark and weirdly still, and then nestling her head on his breast, in a few moments also fast asleep.

She woke up with a sudden start to see herself and her grandfather surrounded by a dozen or more dark, rough-looking men, with broad-brimmed, slouched felt hats and heavy knee-boots, while each had one or more revolvers and a bowie knife stuck in his belt.

"Wall, I am durned, done up and busted!" said one who seemed to be their leader, "if this ain't a racket. Here's an old biled clam and a kid all alone in the wilderness without so much as a shootin' iron. What hev they got in thet thar basket, Bill, anyhow?"

One of the gang reached over to look, but the little girl, in spite of her terror, rose to stop him.

"No," she said, "you can't have any of it, if you please. It is all we have to take us all the way to Deadwood."

"Wall, now," said the leader, admiringly, "you hev got grit, too. Put it down, Bill; and so yer air bound for Deadwood, eh?"

"Yes, sir, because father's gone there, and mother she died, and I had to go and live with Aunt Maria, and she and Uncle Abe was very cruel to me and gran'pa, and so we ran away while they were up to camp-meeting, and we are going up to Deadwood because father's there. We lived up in Illinois, which is ever so far away, but a splendid looking gentleman, dressed better than even our new preacher at the camp-meeting, that was throwing three cards between his fingers, bought us a ticket right on to Cheyenne, and then we started to walk; so you see you mustn't take the basket or we won't be able to get there after all."

"Wall, now, boys," said the leader, once more turning to his gang, "if yer don't call thet grit, whar are yer goin' ter find it? And so yer father's out at Deadwood? What's his name?"

"His name is Joe Terry. Do you know him, sir?"

"Wall, I guess I kin find him if I want to. He knows me anyhow, you bet. I'm the road agent they call Black Jake."

"You wouldn't hurt us, sir, I'm sure," the old man struck in. "We have no money nor any—"

"Yes I have," the little girl interrupted. "I have a whole silver dollar a gentleman gave me when we left the train."

"Wall, you jest hold on to it, my little girl," said Black Jake, "and jest look a here, I'm goin' up ter Deadwood, as they'll know round thar to-morrow mornin', and yer seem such a peart little heifer I'm goin' to take yer along. What do yer say, pards?"

A hearty assent from all around.

"But, sir, gran'pa—"

"We'll take him along, too. Say, pards, trot out the ankle of that feller we left down thar in the cañon, and get the old cuss a-straddle! I'm goin' ter take the gal myself. Burn me wholesale if I ain't goin' ter marry her when she grows up. She's jest the sort I want."

The arrangement was made, and the whole party started at a sharp trot in the direction of Deadwood, the little girl seated before Black Jake on the saddle, till after three or four hours' ride, with occasional halts and sups from the whisky flasks, they stopped before a clearing with a log cabin, and Black Jake dismounted, lifting the child to the ground.

"Thar," he said, "you jest go in thar and knock at the door and tell them yer want Joe Terry, and that Black Jake said so, and ef they don't mind yer they'll har from me agin. Now yer jest open that basket, and in with yer mites, pards."

He set the example himself by putting in a ten-dollar bill, and each added something, ranging from a half-empty flask of whisky to a gold pencil case. Then they wheeled their horses about and rode off in the direction they had come, Black Jake turning in his saddle as he did so to say:

"Remember, sis, I'm yer friend every time, and I'll be comin' back ter marry yer one of these days."

Whether he does or not the future must decide, but the same morning, by the time the child and her grandfather had found Joe Terry, the main subject of conversation in the saloons was that the mail had been robbed again, and the driver and one passenger shot dead.

HUBERT H. DWAR.

It is said that a recent convert in Deadwood yelled "Keno!" in prayer meeting instead of "Amen."

The portrait of a beautiful young lady is a canvas back duck.

VIOLETS.

"I never wear any other flower," I heard her say, because my favorites unite beauty, elegance, simplicity, and modest grace with a delightful fragrance, thus combining all the most esteemed characteristics of a lovely flower." And I said softly to myself, "that young lady is a grammivorous crammer—she has been reading up." Some time after I again heard her discuss the violet at length. And at such length! I might easily fill a volume with the odorous distillations of her violet volubility—and she had been to Homer, "dear, delicious, blind old thing," as she called him. "Homer places the violet in the garden of Calypso, and from his time downward there has scarcely been a poet, great or small, who has not had something to say in praise of my favorite flower." And then she ran and rattled on, and on, and on, while I reposed in a sea-sand ear of silence, and the waves of her speech hummed in my ear till I fell asleep.

"As long as there are violets
They will have a place in story."

The Greeks called the violet "ion"—a word which scholars believe signified pale, pleasant, fine, true, la, the daughter of Atlas, fleeing into the woods from the pursuit of Apollo, was changed into a violet. Prosperine was gathering violets when she was seized by Pluto. Virgil tells us how

"The daughters of the flood explored the meads
For violets pale."

Shakespeare, in the Winter's Tale, speaks of

"Violets dim,
But sweeter than the lids of Juno's eyes,
Or Cytherea's breath."

And in Twelfth Night he makes the Duke of Illyria beg the musicians to give him "excess of music," "the food of love," saying of the "dying fall" of the strain he would have them repeat:

"Oh, it came o'er my ear like the sweet south,
That breathes upon a bank of violets,
Stealing and giving odor."

Milton makes Echo dwell

"By slow Meander's margin green
And in the violet-broidered vale."

Sir Walter Scott says:

"The violet in her greenwood bower,
Where birchen boughs and hazels mingle,
May boast herself the fairest flower
In glen, or copse, or forest dingle."

Miss Landon, the gifted but unfortunate "L. E. L.," refers to the violet as a flower

"Whose leaves,
Thick in their azure beauty, fill the air
With most voluptuous breathings."

In that matchless flowery poem, "The Sensitive Plant," Shelley alludes to

"The violet,
"Sprung from the earth with warm rains wet."

Keats tells us that the nymphs who waited on Endymion

"Rained violets upon his sleeping eyes."

Innocence, faithfulness, modesty, humble merit, hidden virtue, have all been severally compared to the violet. And it is the lovers' flower, too, for, as Barry Cornwall sings,

"It has a scent, as though Love, for its dower,
Had on it all his odorous arrows tost;
For though the rose has more perfuming power,
The violet (happy cause 'tis almost lost
And takes so much trouble to discover)
Stands first with most, but always with a lover."

The flower is one of the master keys to the treasure-house of memory, according to the inspired basket-maker, Thomas Miller, who sings thus of "a simple violet that graced a ruined wall":

"How small a key unlocks the human heart!
That little flower did many a scene recall,
And bade the veil of bygone years depart."

The Athenians, twenty-two centuries ago, were as proud of their violet as the English are of their rose, the Scotch of their thistle, the Irish of their shamrock, or the French of their lily. In all seasons violets were to be seen in the market-place at Athens, very much as they are to be seen in the windows of New York florists to-day. The rose gardens of Paestum were also celebrated for their violets, and it is said they still grow wild there, and fill the air with fragrance. In modern times, we learn that the first Napoleon chose the violet as his heraldic emblem; and, on his enforced departure in 1814 to his petty kingdom of Elba, he promised his friends that he would "return with the violets." His partisans accordingly adopted this flower as a symbol of their faithfulness. They designated the Emperor "La Pêre de la Violette," and hung violets up in their houses, or wore them in their button-holes, in token of unchangeable attachment to him. When he returned in the following March, Napoleon was saluted with violets by the overjoyed Parisians. After Waterloo, and the restoration of Louis XVIII., the wearing of the violet was branded as seditious. But Byron expressed the secret hope of millions of enthusiastic Frenchmen, writhing under the inglorious, leaden tyranny of the jolter-headed Bourbons, when he wrote:

"Farewell to thee, France; but when liberty rallies
Once more in thy regions, remember me then.
The violet still grows in the depths of thy valleys;
Though withered, thy tears will unfold it again."

As we know, the Second Empire revived as much as possible the traditions of the First Empire. Among them the emblematic violet was resurrected. Whether it is destined to be again the national emblem of changeable France it is useless to vaticinate. The Eastern poets have lived with those of the West in celebrating the violet's praises. The Persian lover presents the flower to his lady love to tell in mute yet eloquent language

"What words can ne'er speak half so well."

And one of the Celtic bards gives his fair country women the following unique advice:

"Anoint thy face with goat's milk in which violets have been steeped,
And there is not a young prince upon earth who will not be charmed with thy beauty."

When summer passes away and the flowers lie withered and sere, when the forest puts on its annual robes of scarlet and gold, when the breeze becomes fresher and more bracing, when the crack of the gun reverberates through the silent aisles of the woodland, when everything has a tendency to make man pause and meditate upon the uncertainties and vicissitudes of life, what is sweeter than to sit on a rail fence and peacefully devour a raw turnip.

NEW

BOOKS

- Literary Essays. By William G. T. Shedd, D. D. 8vo. $2 50
A History of Roman Literature, from the Earliest Period to the Death of Marcus Aurelius. By C. T. Cruttwell, M. A. 8vo. 2 50
Railroads: Their Origin and Problems. By C. F. Adams, Jr. 12mo. 1 25 Texts from the Buddhist Canon, commonly known as the Dhammapada, with accompanying narratives. Translated from the Chinese by Samuel Beal. Small 8vo. 2 50
The French Revolution. By H. A. Taine, D. C. L., Oxon. Translated by John Durand. Small 8vo. 2 50
Researches into the Early History of Mankind and the Development of Civilization. By Edw. B. Taylor. 8vo. 3 50
A Concise History of Music from the Commencement of the Christian Era to the Present Time. For the Use of Students. By H. G. B. Hunt, B. Mus. 12mo. 1 00
A Trip up the Volga to the Fair of Nijni-Novgorod. By H. A. M. B. Johnstone. 12mo. 1 25
How to Hunt and Trap. By J. H. Batty. 12mo. 1 50

BANCROFT'S
721 MARKET ST. S.F.

FALK'S

MILWAUKEE BEER

Is especially recommended to those desiring a pleasant, palatable table beverage. Made from pure malt and hops, and prepared especially for this climate. Try it. For sale by all grocers and liquor dealers.

CUTTING & MURRAY,
Sole Agents, 206 Front Street, S. F.

EDUCATIONAL!

French, Spanish, and Italian taught by Prof. Barthelemy de Filippis, by his easy, new method, saving months of studies. Classes for beginners will be formed September 20th; also private lessons. PACIFIC BUSINESS COLLEGE, 320 Post Street.

BUTTERICK'S

PATTERNS-FALL STYLES.

Send stamp for catalogue. AGENCY, 124 POST ST., San Francisco.

AURORA

EXPORT

Bottled Lager Beer

Is decidedly the finest Beer in the market.

For Sale Everywhere. TRY IT.

R. D. HUME & CO., AGENTS.

221 FRONT STREET.

RETURNED.

HAVING RETURNED FROM THE

East, I respectfully announce to my friends and the public that I shall resume practice on WEDNESDAY, Sept. 5th, 1898.

S. W. DENNIS, M. D., DENTIST,

No. 33 KEARNY STREET.

R. C. MOWBRAY, M. D., DENTIST

224 STOCKTON ST., corner Post, S. F.

RARE ENGRAVINGS
AND ETCHINGS.

W. K. VICKERY NOTIFIES HIS

customers and the public that he has removed to a larger and more convenient office at No. 23 Kearny Street (next door to Snow & May's), where he has a large collection of these beautiful and rare Works of art. To those who can not visit his collection, he will be glad, on receipt of a postal card, to take a portfolio of Engravings for inspection at their residence any forenoon or evening. 23 Kearny Street. Hours, 1 to 5 P. M.

The people who have been suddenly elevated to wealth by the rise in stocks have become somewhat accustomed to their new position, and are beginning to acquire that repose which belongs to riches and aristocracy. To an observer the late social change in San Francisco is an interesting study; more especially is it to him whose duty calls him regularly to the theatre. The first movement was most clearly seen there in the sudden appearance of gorgeous toilets, and the general recognition of new clothes. The dress circle was filled with old and young, male and female, all showing by their self-satisfied air that though this was a luxury long strange to them they could afford it now. Their features and attitudes, the fluttering of fans, and constant arrangement of dress, gave evidence that they had got themselves up at some cost, and did not mean to be hidden from their neighbors' gaze. Everything betokened a glad relief from some terrible pressure—so glad it could not be concealed. Any performance seemed to attract them. They did not stop, evidently, to consider what entertainments were offering, but went in for a round of the theatres right and left. The novelty is over; they are satiated with enjoyment, and are developing an inclination to consider what is the performance most attractive to them. It is not Davy Crockett; most people have seen the play. The story is familiar in various forms in dime novels, and we fear that even the boys begin to doubt the truth of it. We who are up in years remember what intense interest we studied the life of the backwoods with all its alluring adventures, but the boys of to-day are beyond us, and have much more advanced ideas of probability and possibility. Frank Mayo has been "Davy Crockett's" other name so long that many people doubt which of them really belongs to him; and it may be admitted that the backwoodsman could scarcely find a better impersonator. It is a character always popular, always in accord with the finer side of human nature, and it is astonishing how mean, how unchristian, how dishonest a man will be in business all day long, and yet feel good and virtuous when he applauds the sterling honor and nobility of "Davy Crockett." If about Mr. Mayo's impersonation there are crystallized faults—faults that long association with the past and with the play have ingrained into the man—it is, on the whole, a very finished performance. The rehearsal of the business in each place he has gone to, the drilling of new people into the supporting parts of the play, have induced not a natural case, but an angular precision in all his movements, and one feels that he is locking at a representation closely studied, and too apparently dependent upon the actions and words of others. But the chief drawback to the attractive powers of Davy Crockett is that Frank Mayo plays almost nothing else. He is an old Californian, and everybody who remembers San Francisco in years past remembers him associated with its rise to theatrical importance. But the city has seen a great change since he first made himself known as an actor, and indeed within the last two years his position is considerably altered. The difficulty of transportation across the continent and its heavy expense have been obviated by organization; we have now within our own circle all the necessities for first-class stage representations; and these have led to a competition so active and important that popularity has much less advantage than it had in the earlier history of the place. While California was isolated and had but a vague idea of the progress made in the arts abroad, the local pride in our prodigies made reputations and money for poor talent. The better and more talented, who stood the test of Eastern audiences, came back to find a welcome and a reward in later years; but we are beginning to grow critical, and while we are pleased to see Frank Mayo and his kindred still maintaining star positions on the stage, we are dissatisfied that they persist in sticking to the old and hackneyed characters. We want our prodigies to keep up with the advancing art; and show that the talent that first brought them into favor is not wasted on one character and one play. So many people reason about Davy Crockett, and to that reasoning the empty benches may impute their emptiness in a great measure. On this point we may repeat what was said about Struck Oil. Davy Crockett, like Mr. Williamson's play, is one that may be laid on the shelf, and at some future day taken down and used with a probability of success. There is much that is extravagant and improbable about it. We can scarcely reconcile many of its incidents to reason; and yet it has a strong attractive human interest, which, being unlike that element in modern pieces, has a peculiar charm. It is late to say that the fell motive of "Crampton's" revenge, the satisfaction he is to derive from this marriage between his nephew and Eleanor, is not very well defined, seeing he is wealthy himself; that even Lochinvar could not have escaped as easily with his bride, especially if he gave his enemies so much time and warning; that stage license has been freely used throughout the play. The fact remains that Davy Crockett is one of the best plays of its kind, of that healthful, enjoyable, and exciting kind, which does us good in this unhealthy state of society. Miss de Forrest plays "Eleanor" with a freedom from extravagance and a womanly strength which tell in her favor as an actress, and undo some of the impressions of weakness formed from her previous performances. It is not an easy part to play well, because it is made so much to subserve the necessities of the hero. That she rises beyond the situation and imparts to it an interest, which, while throwing "Davy" into stronger relief, adds to its own importance, is something in Miss de Forrest's favor. Mrs. Judah as "Davy's" mother did a very charming piece of acting. Otherwise the cast calls for no special notice. The play is admirably put on. On Monday night, Mr. Mayo ventures again The Streets of New York, a play that, in our opinion, neutralizes his reputation in an artistic sense.

Mr. Williamson has made his annual mistake. He has undertaken to follow his capital impersonation of "John Stofel" with his colorless and uninteresting Irishman. For two successful stars, Mr. and Mrs. Williamson have the poorest repertory we know. When he was at the California Mr. Williamson had a kind of a reputation for impersonating Irish character. He developed Struck Oil; and it was then seen, by contrast, what a poor Irish character he could be. He has never had any reputation in the line since. There are few men in the world who can not be made up to look like an Irishman; there are not many who can put on characteristics so integrally a part of the man as the Irish. Consequently, while there are many who can sing a song and dance a jig, there are few who can carry through a drama a character whose very nature is the element of interest. Mr. Williamson can not do either. Mrs. Williamson, on the other hand, seems to have the qualities in her nature, and even long experience with "Lizzie Stofel," does not deprive her of her capabilities for Irish. As she is the best Dutch girl on the stage, so she is one of the best Hibernians; and though her performances are all tinged with variety peculiarities, her appearance, behavior, and brogue make up for the lack of artistic sense. The Emerald Ring was an attractive play to the same taste that appreciated highly tinted penny pictures in the days gone by. It belongs to a class in which effect is everything, and art and arrangement nothing. It is an unreasoning elaboration of an old-fashioned story; a story of an age of the extravagant in sentiment, when nothing was put into a novel that was probable, and nothing was done on the stage that was possible. It does not deserve criticism. It was made up principally of Barney Williams' songs and Irish absurdities, and Mr. Williamson is not Mr. Williams. He does not attempt to intuse any lively fun into "Mike McCarty," and, indeed, lively fun is not a forte of his. Mrs. Williamson does all the singing, and she sings well. Of all pieces which a first class stock company has been called upon to support, it is the weakest; that is evidenced in the fact that Mr. Brown actually plays the father better than the star plays the son; that Mr. Bishop's "Fawney," the least important part in the piece, shines out beyond all the rest; that Mr. Lewis Morrison, as "Ralph Deadlight," plays the last act as if he would like to make fun of it, but it is too serious; that Mr. Bradley does not seem to realize that the piece is not Olivia; and that nothing remains with the spectator to recall the performance to his mind. The Fool of the Family closes the bill with a good deal of life, for which Mrs. Williamson deserves the credit. Clouds and Sunshine will be played next week. Following the Williamses, comes an adaptation of Denney's L'Enfant Trouvee. It is a play said to be re-written, but familiar to the stage in many forms, and under many names, for years. Rose Lytinge has been playing it in the East, and Madam Beatrice in London, under the title of The Woman of the People; but the success has not attracted the world. Mr. Maguire does not seem to be in any great hurry to begin the career of brilliant success which he predicted for himself.

The performance of Girofle-Girofla, at the Bush Street Theatre, has developed into the best ever given on the coast, without a doubt, and Mrs. Oates' company have begun to show their real mettle. The prima donna is recovering her voice, and she now sings the part fairly well. We note an earnestness of purpose in the general demeanor of the company which points to an appreciation of the importance of their first engagement and success here; and our opinion is confirmed that they possess great strength. The audiences have been large throughout. La Perichole was produced on Thursday night.

We do not see that the new season has brought out anything brilliantly successful in the East. Clarissa Harlowe is a flat failure, as Boucicault's pieces always are now. We have the usual stars in the old pieces. Miss Ward's attraction seems to be as much dry goods as anything else. Native authors do not score much.

MOUREZOUK.

"THE LOST PLEIAD."

"Meropie mortali nupsit."

Such is the melancholy inscription which Mr. Rogers has selected to convey in a few words the sad story of the lost Pleiad which he has so powerfully rendered into marble for us, and which, thanks to the courtesy of Mr. Shillaber, we are enabled to feast our eyes on for a season. "A thing of beauty is a joy forever," and the fortunate owner of this fine piece of modern American sculpture sets an example of refined taste and judicious expenditure which we shall hope to see copied frequently in the near future. Mr. Randolph Rogers justly occupies a front rank among modern sculptors. He has been a resident of Rome for many years, where his studio, No. 53 Via Margutta, is the favorite resort of those of his wandering countrymen who are at all artistically inclined. Of his numerous meritorious pieces "Nydia" is the one on which his reputation most securely rests, and no one who has seen this touching, hearing figure of the "Blind Girl of Pompeii" will soon forget the appeal made to his feelings by the expression of despair on her sightless face. Both "Nydia" and "Ruth"—a very graceful, half-kneeling representation of Naomi's daughter-in-law—have been purchased by Californians, so that this last work from Mr. Rogers' chisel is his third production which has found its way to our far away shores. Three years ago Mr. Rogers was at work on the clay model, which so much pleased the present owner that he gave him an order for it; the venerable artist exercised an artist's privilege, took his time to deliver this creation of his genius, and it arrived here only last month. Mythological lore is rather confused in its legendary accounts of the careers of the seven daughters of Atlas and Pleione. It is generally admitted that they were nymphs in the train of the "chaste Diana," who we may suppose executed very circumspect conduct in her attendant maidens. Orion, a mighty hunter, became so enamored of their charms, however, that he forsook the chase for nobler game, and so annoyed the haughty sisters that they appealed to Jupiter for protection, who changed them into doves and placed them as a constellation amongst the stars. One version of the story tells us that Electra, one of them, left her heavenly place from grief over the approaching destruction of Troy, that city having been founded by her son Dardanus. Mr. Rogers, however, has accepted the tradition most pathetic in its associations, and possibly susceptible of more expressive artistic treatment. "Meropie wedded a mortal!" She listened to the pleadings of a human lover, yielded to the force of earthly passion, and the only one of the sisters who mated with a mortal fell from her high estate, and was supposed to have become the wife of Sisyphus, King of Corinth, the instructor of the Isthmian games. Mr. Rogers has evidently endeavored to portray for us in marble, by face, and form, and gesture, the remorseful realization of the consequences of her act.

"Which way shall I fly, Infinite wrath and infinite despair?"

A cloud forms the support of the figure, which, only partially draped to the waist, is represented as in the act of falling through the air. The head is partially turned, as though fearfully and inquiringly looking whither she is being carried, and the sad, wistful brow is shaded by the left hand. The right arm falls by her side, and the deprecatory, regretful expression thrown into the hand is very fine. The lower limbs are completely draped, only the feet showing from amidst the folds of the skirt, which is tossed aside by the light wind, which wafts her powerless to her fate. The modeling of this lower portion of the figure is of superb, worthy of an old Greek. The general poise the figure is well managed, and the all-pervading expression of floating down, down "upon the wings of silence, through the empty vaulted night," is admirably rendered. The treatment of the hair is weak, the line of drapery, as it falls away from the bust, is hard, and I do not think that the expression of the face is quite worthy of the evident conception of the artist; but we can afford to be critical when an alabaster form of such nobility and grace is exhibited for our admiration, for the flaws are but few, and the merits such as instruct and gratify the highest capacities and instincts of the human heart and brain. Modern plastic art has made huge strides within the past half century, and we may cheerfully hope some day to see an ideal reached, in workmanship worthy to be compared to the Greek, and in purity and grandeur of conception as much superior to the schools which have left us the Apollo and Laocoon, as a loving, human, spiritual, Christian ideal must be to the realization of any Pagan imagination. But as the essential aim of sculpture is the perfect representation of the human form divine, and as a very important element in all artistic education is the unconscious, continual training of the eye from daily contact with daily life, it is a consideration worthy of reflection, as to how great a degree of absolutely false education any artist must rid himself of before getting to work, if he ever permits his visions to be invaded by thoughts of the apparent conformation of the human nymphs of his every day life. Were a young sculptor, fresh from the art school, susceptible of strong personal impressions, to indulge his feelings, give form to his fancies, model for his maiden effort the fair Sophonisba of his waking dreams—the modern woman—and place her before us, as Vischer expresses it, an object of "tangible sight," what quality in us do you think would be most strongly appealed to, the sublime or the ludicrous? K. B.

TABER'S PHOTOGRAPH PARLORS.

The opening of the elegant photograph parlors of the well known artist, I. W. Taber, at his new place of business, corner of Montgomery and Market Streets, during the past week, was made the occasion of a very delightful reception by Mr. Taber and his accomplished wife. The event was one of the pleasantest episodes of the present season of "openings." The premises being entirely new some slight description of the building itself may not be uninteresting to our readers, particularly those portions occupied by Mr. Taber's rapidly increasing business. The lower part, it is well known, is occupied by the Hibernia Savings Bank, while certain rooms above have recently been taken by Messrs. Burr & Finck, popular tailors. The major portions of the third and fourth floors, however, are devoted to the reception and operating rooms of the studio. The arrangement of the first-named is somewhat unique, and as it was planned by the lessee himself, the result is that it is au fait in every particular, and is unapproached by any similar establishment in the city. The front parlor, in particular, is a model in itself. It occupies the corner of the building, and commands an extensive view, from its four large windows, of both Montgomery and Market streets, Lotta's fountain, the Palace and Grand Hotels, and other points of interest. Just within the doorway leading from the hall a broad, handsomely carpeted staircase ascends to the upper floor, where are the additional operating rooms, in which the "dark mysteries" of the art are practiced by experienced assistants. In the principal parlor, as in the others, the harmony of outline has been greatly increased by placing the mantel-pieces and fire-places across one corner of the room, instead of, as according to the common fashion, in the centre of the square. The walls are of a delicate neutral tint, paneled off by broad bands of red velvet paper, edged with a band of gilding, while the ceilings are very handsomely frescoed. This portion of the decorative work was done by Mr. Joseph Gumpertz, of 341 Bush street. Continuous with the front room are two others similarly finished, and furnished as reception and waiting rooms, the second containing a fine piano, elegant dressing bureau, and other articles of use. Still further back, and occupying a large space in the centre of the building, is the principal operating room. In form a parallelogram, it is lighted by an extensive skylight, and made otherwise bright and charming by a long bank of growing flowers, from the middle of which rises an urn filled with dahlias and other regal blossoms. Numerous canaries in gilded cages keep the air musical with their rival songs. The furnishing, superintended entirely by Mrs. Taber, during her husband's absence at the East, is elegant in the extreme. Rich crimson and black carpets, the design a large, graceful drooping leaf, and full-blown blossoms, cover the whole stretch of floor. From the windows depend handsome lace curtains, with elegant lambrequins of broadened damask, of the prevailing color of the room. This drapery, as well as that above the mantel-pieces, which are of fine Italian marble, is exceedingly unique in pattern, and finished by a heavy fringe, interspersed with balls of gold-colored silk. It was designed and made by Chaddbourne & Co., whose taste and originality are too well known to need comment. Fredericks, of Market Street, who has lately incorporated his business with that of the California Furniture Company, supplied the carpets, and Messrs. McNally & Hawkins the gas fixtures, which last are of an exceedingly tasteful pattern and elegant workmanship. Large easy chairs, of various designs, in crimson velvet, as well as richly embroidered ones that bear the unmistakable mark of elegant home manufacture, are scattered about the room; and the walls are decorated with several fine specimens of Mr. Taber's art; among others are one of Mrs. Charles Crocker, a full length portrait in oils; and another, of Mrs. Havens, nee Hochstetler, in wedding dress; a charming picture of Mrs. Taber and babe occupies the place of honor over the mantel. The spherical photographs, a specialty of this establishment, are shown in several different styles, and these, as well as the various other fashions in photographs, oil paintings, and porcelain pictures, called forth the most unqualified admiration from the crowd that steadily filled the rooms from early morning until after ten in the evening. A pleasant feature of the entertainment, for such it might truly be called—despite the fact that a large number of the callers were strangers to their host—was the music, both vocal and instrumental, that was contributed by several of the guests. Among the semi-professionals of the occasion was our promising young artist, Mr. Sam Fabian, who presided at the piano the greater portion of the day. If we may judge of future success by the past, it will be safe to predict that Mr. Taber will very soon be known as the leading photographer of San Francisco. He has the prestige of several years experience in the business at his old stand on Market Street, which, by the way, will continue as heretofore to cater to the wants of shoppers on that route. He has availed himself of one of the best of the new locations in the city, and the most desirable building in that immediate neighborhood; and his "new departure" has brought him hosts of new friends in addition to hundreds of already staunch adherents. He enters his extended sphere of usefulness with the best wishes of every one who has hitherto had the good fortune to become acquainted with him, either personally or professionally.

IN THE FALL.

In the fall a silent sadness to the drooping flowers cleaves,
In the fall the woodland's dreamy with the fron-fon of leaves—
And the whir of the partridge, etc.

In the fall the hazy gloaming with a purple glory burns,
In the fall Miss Georgiana in the Bible places ferns—
If she has a young man to help her gather them.

In the fall above the valley snowy cloudlets stretch for miles,
In the fall the dry good windows are profuse with Paris styles—
Much to the joy of the ladies, it is said.

In the fall the merry songster leaves his pretty summer leas,
In the fall the politician is divorced from rolls of V's—
For reasons which require no explanation.

In the fall all breasts with reverie are buoyant and elate,
In the fall a man will fondly kiss his pretty cousin Kate—
Or Mary Ann, as the case may be.

In the fall the soul of beauty dwells within the gardens serene,
In the fall we all are positive that winter's drawing near—
The other fall happenings are too humorous to mention.

—Graphic.

At the Theatre des Bouffes du Nord, in Paris, a play has been performed which deeply interested the Americans. "Washington" and "Lafayette" are among the characters; the principal ones being "Ellen Warren," a lovely American rebel, and "Major Mackenzie," a British officer, with whom she is in love; "Moreno," a Cuban, who had taken service under the command of "Washington." The conflict of love and patriotism in the heart of the heroine (for she loves "Major Mackenzie," who is, moreover, a very fine fellow), and the adventures of a certain dispatch from "Washington" to "Lafayette," bring about a number of very dramatic complications. The situation in the third act is particularly well arranged. "Major Mackenzie" ventures within the rebel lines to gain a parting interview with "Ellen," whose obdurate heart he tries to soften, and at last he wins from her a confession of her love. At that moment the generals of the Federal army arrive to hold a council of war, with the co-operation of Ellen's father, and the young lady has barely time to conceal her British lover in her own room. The council proceeds; "Washington" writes a dispatch to "Lafayette," which he confides to "General Warren," who will carry it himself, as it is of the highest importance. The officers retire, and "Ellen" returns to the room to lead forth her concealed lover, and to point out to him the way to escape. Meanwhile "Moreno," who has spied out "Ellen's" secret, steals the dispatch, and contrives that the young girl shall imagine that it was taken by the Major. Of course all complications are unraveled at last, and the close of the war permits the union of the lovers. The piece was fully successful, and the name of the author was received with plaudits. It is carefully brought out, but several mistakes are to be signalled in the costuming and make-up of the characters. The American officers ought not to appear in scarlet uniforms; and as to "Michigan," the Indian attendant of "Miss Ellen," with his paste-colored robe and curly hair, he looks much more like a South Sea Islander than like an American Indian.

The following is a literal copy of a play-bill issued in the year 1793, by the manager of the Theatre Royal, Kilkenny: "Kilkenny Theatre Royal, by his majesty's company of comedians. On Saturday May 14, 1793, will be performed, by command of several respectable people in this learned metropolis, for the benefit of Mr. Kearns, the tragedy of 'Hamlet,' originally written and composed by the celebrated Dan Hays, of Limerick, and inserted in Shakespeare's works. 'Hamlet' by Mr. Kearns, (being his first appearance in that character,) who, between the acts, will perform several solos on the patent bag-pipes, which plays two tunes at the same time. 'Ophelia' by Mrs. Prior, who will introduce several favorite airs in character, particularly 'The Lass of Richmond Hill,' and 'We'll all be Unhappy Together,' from the Reverend Mr. Dibdin's 'Oddities.' The parts of the 'King' and 'Queen,' by direction of the Reverend Father O'Callahan, will be omitted, as too immoral for any stage. 'Polonius,' the comical politician, by a young gentleman, being his first appearance in public. The ghost of the gravedigger and Laertes, by Mr. Sampson, the great London comedian. The characters to be dressed in Roman shapes. To which will be added an interlude, in which will be introduced several slight-of-hand tricks by the celebrated surveyor, Hunt. The whole to conclude with the farce of 'Mahomet, the impostor!' Mahomet by Mr. Kearns. Tickets to be had of Mr. Kearns, and the signs of the Goat's Beard, in Castle street. The value of the tickets, as usual, will be taken (if required) in candles, bacon, butter, cheese, soap, etc., as Mr. Kearns wishes, in every particular, to accommodate the public. 2d No person who soever shall be admitted into the boxes without shoes or stockings."

One day, discoursing to a rustic congregation on the folly of using profane language, he told them that he himself was once guilty of the same folly, and addicted to the same vice, but that he had completely conquered the habit.

A flying insect, hearing the boast, winked his eye at the congregation, and thought: "I'll put him to the test." So, making a circuit round the gentleman's head, he lit upon his nose.

"See!" said the reverend gentleman; "here is an illustration. At one time I should have sworn awfully at this fly—but, look now." Raising his hand, he said, gently: "Go away, fly, go away." But the fly only tickled his nose the more.

The reverend gentleman, raising his hand with some vehemence, made a grab at the offender; and, being successful, opened it to throw the insect from him, when, in extreme disgust, he exclaimed: "Why, d—n it, it's a wasp!"

Some of the Chinese Embassy wear outside garments of white silk so closely resembling night-shirts as to make an old maid dodge around the corner.

"What are Russia's terms?" asked a visitor, referring to the San Stefano Treaty. "Two dollars a year, in advance," replied the abstracted editor.

The "improved lamp post" is padded at about the height that a fellow wants to rest his aching brow, and is becoming very popular.

IMPROVEMENT IN PHOTOGRAPHY.

The artists engaged in this beautiful and scientific art have made such rapid strides in the last few years and brought pictures to such perfection that further improvement seemed to be out of the question. However, we were astonished last evening, in passing up Market Street, to find at the door of one of our leading firms many new and original ideas, differing very much from those seen at the various galleries throughout the city. The composition, tone, lighting, and mounting are very peculiar, beautiful, and finished. The accessories are well chosen, the subjects well posed and lighted, the exterior and interior decorations perfect. While looking at them we seemed to forget they were pictures, so lost were we in studying the beautiful effects. We were informed that Messrs. DAMES & HAYES have been devoting several months to getting up new designs, which they are about to have patented, and have also discovered some important chemical combinations which will be of great value to future photography. We must say they deserve great credit, and such a display of artistic taste places their names foremost on the role.

The propensity for applying titles is so strong in Kentucky that the Courier-Journal can hardly refrain from speaking of our first progenitor as Colonel Adam.

We have now three cable roads from the business centre to the Western Addition: Over Sutter, California, and Clay Streets. Another is contemplated, from the corner of Montgomery Street and Montgomery Avenue, along Union Street, to the Presidio. This last road is much needed, and if the charter is granted, will add largely to the value of the property of that part of the city. The branch roads belonging to the Sutter Street main line are badly managed, and ought in our judgment to be discontinued, allowing the main line to be extended through Sutter Street to the cemetery. This would allow the California Street road, which is by all odds the very best street railroad on the peninsula, to be extended to the ocean. This event it would become a fashionable thing to jump upon the California Street dummy and take a morning or moonlight ride to the ocean beach. The proposed Union Street road would connect the military headquarters with the city.

White neckties have been called in. This is a matter of regret, for it only took ten cents to make one resemble a banker.

At Mrs. Koerner's embroidery parlors, Baldwin Block, is to be found the largest assortment in the city of silks, wools, gold and silver bullion, filling silks, patterns for cloaks, dresses, lambrequins, flags, altar cloths, etc. Also, work designed and prepared for ladies in the most artistic styles. Monograms and initials a specialty. A large importation of Berlin canvas work lately received.

N. B.—Embroidery chenilles in all colors and shades reduced to sixty cents a dozen.

A Columbus man says he started thirty years ago to make $1,400,000. He has got the fourteen, but the ciphers bother him.

In view of the fact that Snow & May retire from business on the first of January next, art collectors are afforded a rare opportunity to decorate their walls or replenish their portfolios from the immense stock of paintings, engravings, etc., to be found in their galleries, 21 Kearny Street. For the convenience of purchasers, pictures are arranged in folios, with prices attached. Open till nine o'clock each evening.

BOSTON DRESS REFORM.

California "Worth" Princess Suits, Skirts, and detachable Flounces: Cashmere and Merino Union Suits for ladies and children; ladies' and misses' shoulder-brace Corsets; Abdominal Corsets. No. 430 Sutter Street. A. W. BAKER, the only Dress Reform Agent in the city.

The Yosemite Cologne, made by Mr. Slaven, is to the nose what music is to the ear, love to the heart, religion to the soul. It ravishes like words of wisdom sugar-coated with poetry. Its bouquet is like a benediction translated from the one sense to another. When the poet said:

"With dreadful eyes
My spirit lies
Under the walls of Paradise," he had been sniffing Yosemite Cologne.

This paper is printed with ink furnished by Chas. Eneu Johnson & Co., 509 South Tenth Street, Philadelphia, and 59 Gold Street, New York.

Mrs. Parker, of the Ladies' Depository, has opened a new store at 126 Post Street. Dolls dressed in all styles. New Lace Patterns.

NEW BOOKS AT ROMAN'S.

Heir of Charlton. By May Agnes Fleming. $1 50
The New Paul and Virginia. By Mallock. 1 00
Molly Bawn. By author of Phyllis. 12mo, cloth. 1 25
Hamlet. Edited by Rolfe. 12mo, cloth. 90
The Little Good-for-Nothing. By Daudel. 12mo, cloth. 1 50
Scientific Memoirs. By J. W. Draper. 8vo, cloth. 3 00
Roxey. By Eggleston. 12mo, cloth. 1 50
Marrying of a Daughter. By Henry Greville. 50c.
Ancient Literature, Oriental and Classical. By Quackenbush. 12mo, cloth. 1 25
What is the Bible? By Sumner. 12mo, cloth. 1 50
Catholicity, Protestantism, and Romanism. By Ewer. 1 50
Like unto Like. By Sherwood Bonner. Paper. 75
The Great German Composers. Paper. 30
Antoinette. By Theriot. Paper. 20
Early Rome. By Ihne. 16mo, cloth. 1 00
History of Roman Literature. By Crutwell. 8vo, cloth. 2 50
Growth of the Steam Engine. By Thurston. Cloth. 2 50
French Revolution. By Taine. Vol. I. 12mo, clo. 2 50
Just received, a large assortment of Stationery, in all the latest tints and sizes.
Special attention given to Card, Wedding, and Party Invitations. All kinds of Printing done at the lowest rates.

A. ROMAN & CO.,
11 Montgomery Street,
Lick House Block, San Francisco.

DECKER BROS

BUSH STREET THEATRE.

CHARLES E. LOCKE.....PROPRIETOR.

SATURDAY AND SUNDAY EVENINGS, Oct. 5 and 6,
SATURDAY MATINEE AT 3 P. M.,

Jacques Offenbach's Comic Opera, in four acts, revised by by the author,

LA PERICHOLE,

"La Perichole," the Street Singer, being sustained by

ALICE OATES,

Supported by her incomparable

ENGLISH COMIC OPERA COMPANY.

Reserved seats may be secured at the box office every day.

In preparation—

LA FILLE DE MME. ANGOT.

BALDWIN'S THEATRE.

THOMAS MAGUIRE.....MANAGER.
F. LYSTER.....ACTING MANAGER.
G. R. CHIPMAN.....TREASURER.

Last Week but one of the Engagement of

MR. & MRS. J. C. WILLIAMSON
(MISS MAGGIE MOORE).

This (Saturday) Afternoon and Saturday and Sunday Evenings, last performances of

THE EMERALD RING.

To be followed by the merry Farce,

THE FOOL OF THE FAMILY.

Monday, Oct. 7, and Wednesday, Oct. 9, the operatic drama

CHILD OF THE REGIMENT,

—AND—

THE CHINESE QUESTION.

Tuesday, Oct. 8, and Thursday, Oct. 10,

STRUCK OIL,

—AND—

THE FOOL OF THE FAMILY.

Friday Evening, Oct. 11, Joint Benefit of Mr. and Mrs.
J. C. WILLIAMSON.

CALIFORNIA THEATRE.

BARTON & LAWSON.....MANAGERS.
BARTON HILL.....ACTING MANAGER.

This (Saturday) Evening, October 5, last night of

DAVY CROCKETT.

Second week of the popular actor, Mr.

FRANK MAY
FRANK MAY

Monday Evening, October 7, for one week only, Boucicault's great drama, entitled tac

STREETS OF NEW YORK.

Mr. Mayo in his great character of Radger. New scenery by Voegtlin, and an immense cast of characters.

Prologue—Panic of 1857.

Act 1—Twenty years after. Panic of 1877.

Act 2—The Vagrant Clerk.

Act 3—The Poor under the Snow.

Act 4—Suicide.

Act 5—The Fire.

Act 6—Caught at Last.

Only "Streets of New York" Matinee, Saturday.
Seats at box office six days in advance.

HEALD'S BUSINESS COLLEGE.

No. 24 Post Street,
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

Opposite Mechanics' Institute.

IMPARTS A THOROUGH PRACTIcal education in all Commercial and English Branches—French, German, Spanish, Italian, and Telegraphy. This school having greater facilities, and enjoying a more extensive patronage than any similar institution on the Pacific coast, continues to base its claim for recognition and patronage upon the good sense and enlightened judgment of the public.

LIST OF FACULTY:
E. P. Heald, F. C. Woodbury,
H. M. Stearns, A. K. Capp,
Mrs. C. Woodbury, T. K. Southern,
J. A. Chesnutwood, Mrs. W. J. Hamilton,
A. P. Dubief, F. Seragni,
R. Sorcini, Geo. Jensen,
Lloyd Baldwin, A. Vander Naillen.
For full particulars, call at the College, 24 Post Street, or address E. P. HEALD,
President Business College, San Francisco.

MME. B. ZEITSKA'S

FRENCH, GERMAN, AND ENGLISH

INSTITUTE

FOR YOUNG LADIES,

922 POST ST., BETWEEN HYDE

and Larkin.

KINDERGARTEN connected with the Institute.

The next term will commence October 2d.

A limited number of Boarding Pupils received.

MME. A. ZEITSKA, Principal.

PUBLIC ADMINISTRATOR,

WILLIAM DOOLAN.

Office No. 12 Nevada Block.

PIANOS ARE THE

COMPLICATED WATCHES

CHRONOGRAPH,

REPEATING,

SPLIT SECONDS, ETC.

AND A LARGE STOCK OF GOLD
and Silver Watches, Chains, Diamonds, Jewelry,
Silver Ware, and Fancy Goods at

ANDERSON & RANDOLPH'S

CORNER OF

MONTGOMERY AND SUTTER STS.,

SAN FRANCISCO.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

Scientific Memoirs. By John W. Draper. 8vo, cloth. $3 00
Literary Essays. By W. G. T. Shedd. 8vo, cloth. 2 50
History of Roman Literature. By C. T. Crutwell. 8vo, cloth. 2 50
The Waverly Dictionary. By May Rogers. 12mo, cloth. 2 00
Lessons in Cookery. By E. A. Youmans. 12mo, cloth. 1 50
Early History of Mankind. By E. B. Tylor. 8vo, cloth. 3 50
The Heir of Charlton. By M. Agnes Fleming. 12mo, cloth. 1 50
Vesta Vane. A Novel. By L. King. 12mo, cloth. 1 50
The House by the Works. By Edward Garrett. 12mo, cloth. 1 50
Mildred Keith. By Martha Finley. 12mo, cloth. 1 50
Fortune of the Republic. By R. W. Emerson. 16mo, cloth. 50
Early Rome. (Epoch Series.) By W. Ihne. 16mo, cloth. 1 00
Like unto Like. A Novel. By Sherwood Bonner. 8vo, paper. 75
Classical Literature. By Lawrence. Paper. 75
Romance of a Back Street. By F. W. Robinson. Paper. 15

NEW STATIONERY

RECEIVED DAILY.

BILLINGS, HARBOURNE & CO.,
BOOKSELLERS AND STATIONERS,
NO. 3 MONTGOMERY STREET.

KEANE BROS.

WOULD RESPECTFULLY ASK A
visit of inspection to their new departments.

CLOAKS, SUITS, COSTUMES,

Etc., etc. Ladies will find only the latest novelties of this season's production from London, Paris, Berlin, and New York. Our cutters and fitters are thoroughly reliable, and combined with moderate charges we can confidently ask a share of public patronage.

All the newest materials and latest designs are to be found in our silk and French Dress Goods Departments.

KEANE BROS.

107, 109, 111, AND 113

KEARNY STREET, SAN FRANCISCO.

THE VERTICAL FEED.

THE ONLY POSITIVE SUCCESS IN all departments of sewing. Lightest running shuttle machine in the market. The NEW DAVIS VERTICAL FEED SEWING MACHINE, 130 Post Street.

MARK SHELTON.
P. S.—Howe, Florence, Wheeler & Wilson, Grover &
Baker, Domestic, Weed, Willcox & Gibbs, for sale at $10 each.

JOE POHEIM

The Tailor,

223 Montgomery St. and 103
Third St., has just received a large assortment of the latest style goods.
Suits to order from $20
Pants to order from 15
Overcoats to order from 15

The leading question is where the best goods can be found at the lowest prices. The answer is at

JOE POHEIM,

103 Montgomery St. and 103
Third St.

amples and Rules for Self-measurement sent free to any address. Fit guaranteed.

BEST KOHLER & CHASE
SAN FRANCISCO
& OAKLAND

A STORY FOR GREENBACKERS.

"I know a sure way to make a government rich." The man who uttered these words on a July morning in 1715, in a villa near the Holstein city of Kiel, was Baron Goetz, who was destined in the next few years to play a conspicuous part in the history of Northern Europe. At this time he was about thirty-five years old. He was a tall, portly man, with a singularly attractive face. The only disagreeable feature about his countenance was his decidedly voluptuous mouth.

Goetz had written a number of pamphlets, one of which, entitled "The True Money of a Civilized Country," had created a profound sensation throughout Europe. In this remarkable pamphlet the author advocated the principles which are now those of our American greenbackers. He declared that every government could make its own currency, and enforce its circulation. It is a credit to the hard common sense of King Frederick William I., of Prussia, that when he had read this pamphlet, he exclaimed:

"The man who wrote this is a dangerous lunatic." But King Charles XII., of Sweden, thought otherwise. He had always been pinched for money. A dare-devil soldier, he was as ignorant as he was brave. In 1715 he was so hard pressed by his innumerable creditors that he wrote an autograph letter to Baron Goetz, asking him to become his prime minister. Goetz accepted, and, in November, 1715, he arrived in Stockholm. Baron Goetz perfectly revolutionized the Swedish system of government. He abolished the parliament, deprived the nobility of its privileges and prerogatives, and leaned upon the peasantry. This made him for a time extremely popular; and, on the strength of this popularity, he began to carry his financial theories into execution. He caused ten millions of dollars to be struck off on blue and green paper. These notes, which are now extremely rare, contained the following significant inscription:

"He Who Refuses to Take This Bill at Its Full Value Will Suffer Death."

The prime minister sent at once notice to the rich men of Stockholm, that they would have to surrender their gold and silver in exchange for the paper currency. This order was received with a great deal of grumbling. In two or three instances violent resistance was offered to its enforcement. The culprits, however, were summarily punished. Two of them were beheaded, and the third was banished from the country. Government emissaries scoured the whole country for gold and silver. In three months there were eight million dollars in coin in the royal treasury. Charles XII. was delighted. He had never had so much money in his life. He immediately organized three new regiments of infantry, and began to talk about declaring war against Germany and England.

Meanwhile the Swedish aristocracy became more and more restless. Goetz's financial policy was not long in producing its natural effects. The necessities of life became excessively dear in Sweden. Trade and industry were prostrate.

In Norway the people refused to give up their gold and silver, and they threatened to sever their connection with Sweden entirely.

This exasperated King Charles XII. so terribly, that he organized an expedition against the Norwegians for the avowed purpose of laying waste their country. This was in 1718. Charles XII., in the first place, besieged the Norwegian fortress of Fredenksall, where he was killed.

Goetz, who had remained in Stockholm, was thrown into prison by Charles' successor, tried for high treason, and, early in 1719, beheaded, because, as his sentence read, "he had dishonored the national faith, and fatally injured the financial credit of Sweden."

An Invocation.

The queen of night, with pale, cold eye,
Looks down upon the river's shore,
Oh, coldly pure, thou starry sky,
Light, light this shadowy forest more!
In the blue river's heaving breast
I barked, and now my bliss is gone;
My trousers—coat—my white, white vest—
Where in the bush I hung them on?

His hair having been cut, and various offers of fancy soap, hair restorer, and so forth, having been declined with and without thanks, the barber says unto him: "Will your hair do that way, sir?" The customer contemplates himself with care in the mirror; then, returning to the sacrificial chair and enveloping himself in the calico wrapper, replies solemnly: "Just a little longer."

An Iowa temperance lecturer, while crossing a pasture the other day, was chased by a cow with one horn, with which she gave him a most vicious jab just as he was climbing over the fence. "Great and all-destroying specter!" he shrieked, rolling on the grass and rubbing his back. "I shall never like milk punch again."

"And so you've returned from Europe?"
Now tell us how much did you see?"
"Oh, we took in a lot of old castles."
And trotted about in France.

"We saw all the things in the guide-books;
And the classical dodge when in Rome;
But, between you and me and the bed-post,
We are thundering glad to get home."

The other day a stranger came to him to be treated for rheumatism. He said he had had it, "off and on," for twelve years. He hadn't any money, he said, but expected some next week and would call and pay. "Well," returned the doctor, "if you've had the rheumatism twelve years, I reckon another week won't hurt you much. Come next week when you have the money."

A room will hold nearly twice as many people when the light is dim as when it is bright; at least we have noticed that when the gas is low in the parlor a young man and a young woman can both sit in the same space which either one of them took up when the full head was on.

A fat woman of Corinth, Mississippi, drank ash-bark tea to make her lean; and she skipped for the better land just two hours ahead of a lean woman who was eating gum arabic to make her fat.

Perhaps you loathe the spider, but when he gets a mosquito in the meshes of his web, don't you feel like putting him on the back.

A Troy man has lost a canal-boat, and a local paper reports that some Syracuse girl took it for a slipper.

ARLINGTON HOTEL,
SANTA BARBARA, CAL.

NO HOTEL ON THE PACIFIC
Coast can surpass the ARLINGTON in the airy cheerfulness and convenience of its arrangements. None can equal it in the natural and artistic beauty of its surroundings. The readers of the ARGONAUT will be pleased to know that the problem of combining solid comfort within doors, inexhaustible pleasure without, and calm contentment all the time, at a very economical rate of expenditure, has been solved at the ARLINGTON, and is respectfully submitted by
GEO. T. BROMLEY, Manager.

BERKELEY
GYMNASIUM

The Berkeley Gymnasium (a preparatory school to the University)—a first-class boarding-school establishment in the interests of higher education, and in opposition to the cramming system of the small colleges and military academies of the State. The next term will commence July 24th. Examination of candidates for admission July 22d and 23d. By request, instructions have been provided during the summer months for students preparing for the August examinations at the University. For catalogue or particulars, address
JOHN F. BURRIS, PRINCIPAL,
BERKELEY, CALIFORNIA.

NOTE.—We desire to call special attention to the organization of our Grammar Department, separate from the Academic, and solicit the patronage of parents and guardians of small boys.

GOLDEN GATE ACADEMY

AND CADET SCHOOL.

Next quarter will commence October 7, 1878.
For circulars, address
D. P. SACKETT, A. M., Principal,
Oakland, Cal.

REDINGTON'S
FLAVORING EXTRACTS

ARE THE PERFECTLY PURE
and highly concentrated Extracts of
FRESH FRUITS

Prepared with great care. They are put up in superior style, in a bottle holding twice as much as ordinary brands of Extracts.

Comparing quality and contents, none other are nearly so cheap.

Wherever tested on THEIR MERITS, they have been adopted in preference to all others, and now are the

STANDARD FLAVORING EXTRACTS

Of the Pacific coast. Dealers will find them to give better satisfaction to the consumers than any other kind and are respectfully requested to give them a trial.

REDINGTON & CO.
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District, of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

MARY E. HENRY, plaintiff, vs. JAMES J. HENRY, defendant.—An action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to JAMES J. HENRY, defendant, in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District, of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein within ten days (ten business days) of the day of service after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days; otherwise within forty days—on judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this court dissolving the bonds of matrimony existing between plaintiff and defendant (as will appear more fully by reference to the complaint on file herein, to which your attention is hereby directed), and for general relief and costs of suit.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this Third day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight.

THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.

By W. STEVENSON, Deputy Clerk.

T. J. CROWLEY, Attorney for Plaintiff,

No. 275 Kearny Street.

GEO. W. PRESCOTT. IRVING M. SCOTT. H. T. SCOTT.

UNION IRON WORKS

(Founded 1849.) Post Office Box 2128.

COR. FIRST AND MISSION STREETS,
SAN FRANCISCO

MANUFACTURERS OF
Compressed Engines,
Air Compressors,
Rock Drills,
Portable Hoisting Engines,
Marine Stationary and Portable Boilers
Baby Hoist, complete.

CONSTANTLY ON HAND AND FOR SALE,

Direct-acting Pumping and Hoisting Engines,
Upright and Stationary Engines,
Quartz Crushing and Amalgamating Machinery,
Blake's Rock Breakers,
Smelting Furnaces,
Quicksilver Pumps,
Chloridizing Furnaces,
Cornish Pumps,
Steam Pumps.

All manufactured by us of the best materials, design, and workmanship, and furnished at lower rates than by Eastern manufacturers.

PRESCOTT, SCOTT & CO.

O. F. WILLEY &amp; CO.,

IMPORTERS AND MANUFACTURERS OF

FINE CARRIAGES AND WAGONS

No. 427 MONTGOMERY ST., SAN FRANCISCO.

Agents for the sale of Wagons manufactured by
BREWSTER & CO., New York,
W. D. ROGERS, Philadelphia,
C. S. CAFFEY, Camden, N. J.,
WOOD BROTHERS, New York,
H. KILLAM & CO., New Haven,
COOLING BROS., Wilmington

ALSO, AGENTS FOR
HARNESS MANUFACTURED BY WOOD GIBSON,
TOMPKINS & MANDEVILLE, AND
A. H. DUNSMITH.

Also, a fine assortment of Robes, Blankets, Nets, Whips, etc.

MUSIC BOXES

OF ALL DESCRIPTIONS AND OF

Standard Reputation, playing from one to over one hundred airs. The largest and best assortment in this city.

MUSICAL BOXES WITH CHANGEABLE CYLINDERS always on hand. New and interesting styles constantly received. Call and examine our stock.

REPAIRING OF MUSICAL BOXES thoroughly done in all their particularities.

M. J. PAILLARD &amp; CO.,

MANUFACTURERS AND IMPORTERS,

120 Sutter Street, San Francisco.

Branch of House, 630 Broadway, New York.

MILLER & RICHARD,
SOLE MAKERS OF
EXTRA-HARD METAL
SCOTCH TYPE.

SPECIAL AGENTS FOR
THE CAMPBELL, HOE, AND PEERLESS
PRESSES.

No. 529 COMMERCIAL STREET,
And 205 Leidesdorff Street, San Francisco.

MOODY'S
Drug and Prescription
STORE,

Northwest corner Polk and Pine Streets.

Prescriptions prepared with care from the purest of Drugs and Chemicals.

S. B. WAKEFIELD, Member S. F. Stock and Exchange Board.

S. B. WAKEFIELD &amp; CO.

STOCK &amp; EXCHANGE BROKERS,

314 Pine Street, San Francisco.

CONSOLIDATED IMPERIAL MIN.

ing Company.—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Gold Hill, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Directors, held on the 12th day of September, 1878, an assessment (No. 7) of twenty (20) cents per share was levied on the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room No. 6, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the seventeenth (17th) day of October, 1878, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and, unless payment is made before, will be sold on MONDAY, the seventh (7th) day of November, 1878, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

W. E. DEAN, Secretary.

Office—Room No. 8, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

CALIFORNIA FARMERS' MUTUAL

Fire Insurance Company

[ESTABLISHED IN 1874.]

Paid up Capital ..... $200,000
Assets exceed..... 320,000

PRINCIPAL OFFICE, 209 SANSOME ST.
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

THOS. FLINT, President. J. W. FOARD, Manager.

FRED. K. RILEY, Secretary.

I. G. GARDNER, General Agent.

COMMERCIAL
INSURANCE COMPANY OF CALA,

FIRE AND MARINE.

Principal office, 495 California Street, San Francisco.

JOHN H. WISE, President.

CHAS. A. LATON, Secretary.

THE STATE INVESTMENT
—AND—
INSURANCE COMPANY, FIRE AND MARINE

CASH ASSETS..... $450,000

Principal Office, 218 and 220 Sansome Street, San Francisco

OFFICERS:
A. J. BRVANT, President,
RICHARD J. WISE, Vice-President,
CHAS. H. CUSHING, Secretary,
H. H. WATSON, Marine Surveyor

CROWN POINT GOLD AND SILVER

Mining Company.—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Gold Hill, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 13th day of September, 1878, an assessment (No. 35) of one dollar per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 10, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the twenty-third (23d) day of October, 1878, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and, unless payment is made before, will be sold on WEDNESDAY, the thirteenth day of November, 1878, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

JAMES NEWLANDS, Secretary.

Office, Room 10, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

CHOLLAR-POTOSI MINING CO.

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia Mining District, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the fifth (5th) day of September, 1878, an assessment (No. 12) of five dollars per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 8, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the eighth (8th) day of October, 1878, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and, unless payment is made before, will be sold on TUESDAY, the twenty-ninth day of October, 1878, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

W. E. DEAN, Secretary.

Office, Room 8, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

OPHIR SILVER MINING COMP.

ny.—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 10th day of September, 1878, an assessment (No. 33) of one dollar per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 9, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the 15th day of October, 1878, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and, unless payment is made before, will be sold on MONDAY, the fourth day of November, 1878, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

C. L. MCCOY, Secretary.

Office—No. 203 Bush Street, Room 9, San Francisco, California.

SAVAGE MINING COMPANY.

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Directors, held on the 10th day of September, 1878, an assessment (No. 33) of one dollar per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 15, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the eighth (8th) day of October, 1878, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and, unless payment is made before, will be sold on MONDAY, the twenty-eighth day of October, 1878, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

E. B. HOLMES, Secretary.

Office—Room 15, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

J. H. JONES &amp; CO.,

Member S. F. Stock and Exchange Board,

STOCK AND EXCHANGE BROKERS

Office, 320 Pine Street, San Francisco.

FOX & KELLOGG,
ATTORNEYS AND COUNSELLORS

AT LAW, San Francisco, Cal.

Office, No. 530 California Street, Rooms 1, 2, and 3.

CHICKERING

PIANO WAREROOMS,

31 POST ST., Mechanics' Institute Building.

ELEGANT PIANOS.

L. K. HAMMER,

Sole Agent for Pacific Coast.

Owners of Chickering Pianos are specially requested to leave orders for tuning at warerooms, 31 Post Street.

MUSIC

KNABE PIANOS,
IRVING PIANOS, ROGERS' UPRIGHT PIANOS,
Prince Organs, Waters' Organs, Sheet Music.

BANCROFT, KNIGHT & Co.,
733 MARKET STREET.

A WORLD'S TRIUMPH.

THE CURRENT OF

TRADE REVERSED.

TO EUROPE.

STEINWAY & SONS

ORDERS FROM EUROPE

have increased to an extent, necessitating the establishment of Warerooms in London, England, and connected with it is a Concert Hall, the whole combined making the most elegant Piano Warerooms in Europe, and stands there as a monument of American genius and industry.

It is impossible to mention in the limited space of an advertisement the innumerable triumphs of this energetic firm. They stand foremost as inventors in Piano building in America, and in that respect, no small compliment to their inventions is the undeniable endorsement of all their competitors, as shown in their imitative efforts. Certain principles of the Steinways are however so completely protected, that no imitation or substitute is attempted at all, and the shallow method of crying such inventions down are resorted to and relied upon.

The Steinways designed and perfected the Overstrung and Iron Frame systems. The application of the Agraffe Arrangements to Square and Upright Pianos. The Patent Duplex Scale creating the most beautiful treble tones, (the Duplex Scale is of recent invention and only to be found in Pianos sold recently). The improved Double Dampers. The later idea extending the Agraffe to every string in the Piano. The highest finish to all parts of the instrument, including first qualities of ivory, ebony, felt, cloth, etc. The wood work and varnish of such first class character, that the employment of large capital and experience alone permits.

The name of Steinway has become a "household word" in American homes, and the satisfactory record of 13 years trial on the Pacific Coast, in itself assures the purchaser that the investment is not speculation, but one of perfect security.

The oft-repeated story of rival makers claiming to have been Steinways' foreman, etc., should have no weight with purchasers. An immense manufacturing business like the Steinways is divided into departments for the various grades of work, and a foreman of one department superintends that alone, and cannot be perfected in other details.

The Steinways (a domestic family) are the inventors and designers of the principles of their Pianos, and are alone responsible for the thorough execution of their own instruments.

In the Machinery Department at the late Centennial Exhibition Steinways were awarded a special medal for an invention for testing their iron frames under a pressure of 5,000 lbs. to the square centimetre. (This award was distinct from their medal for the best Piano exhibited.) The iron frame of a Steinway Piano are the only ones so tested, and while other makers rely on castings from an ordinary foundry, and manufacture a frame of composite metal, which adds greatly to the resonant qualities of the instrument in general.

It frequently occurs that the attempt is made to raise the character of Pianos constructed on less costly principles to the rank that the Steinway maintains, by naming a price, the same or nearly so. This method is frequently exposed by the perfect willingness of the dealer to make astonishing discounts for cash or extremely long credits; systems not entertained in any first-class business. In all log a Steinway Piano, a guarantee of worth is given, protecting the purchaser for 5 years, and catalogues issued by the Pacific Coast Agencies have an elaborate rate of prices in gold, and where desired a liberal installment plan is offered to responsible buyers, with an additional charge of simple interest or deferred payments. Catalogues mailed on application to

M. GRAY, General Agent,
105 Kearny Street, S. F.

WILL REMOVE ABOUT OCT. 1-10 TO

117 POST STREET.

PACIFIC BUSINESS COLLEGE,
231 Post St., San Francisco.

THE CAL. FURNITURE M'FG CO.

HAVE FIVE TIMES AS MUCH

FURNITURE

As any other house on this Coast, which has been purchased so low that we CAN and WILL sell at such prices that the poor can gratify their WISHES and the rich their TASTE. At the old stand,

NOS. 224 AND 226 BUSH STREET, S. F.

HERRMANN'S

FALL

STYLES

ARE NOW OUT AT

336 KEARNY STREET, BETWEEN BUSH AND PINE,
& 910 MARKET STREET, ABOVE STOCKTON.

SEND FOR ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE.

We beg to inform our friends and all connoisseurs that we have received a shipment of the celebrated favorite of all gourmets in Europe and the Eastern States. We guarantee the quality of this Wine to meet the demands of the most fastidious.

POMMERY & GREN O CHAMPAGNE,

L. LEBENBAUM & CO., 529 and 531 Kearny St. and 1303 Polk St.

MISS K. McCARRICK, MILLINERY PARLORS

135 KEARNY STREET, NEAR SUTTER, UP STAIRS.

The finest assortment of French Millinery Goods in the city always on hand.

MRS. M. M. COLEMAN, DRESS MAKING PARLORS

NO. 115 KEARNY STREET,

Rooms 13, 14, and 15, over Keane, O'Connor & Co., San Francisco.

PIANOS

SCHOMACKER AND HENRY F. MILLER CELEBRATED PIANOS.

Pianos Tuned, Rented, and for Sale on the Installment Plan.

WOODWORTH, SCHELL & Co.

12 Post Street San Francisco.

THOMAS BOYSON, M. D.

(University of Copenhagen, Denmark),

PHYSICIAN AND SURGEON. Office and Residence, 112 Kearny St. Office hours, 11 A. M. to 1 P. M. to 1 P. M. Sunday 11 to 1 only. Telephone in the office.

PALACE HOTEL RESTAURANT,

FIRST CLASS IN ALL RESPECTS.

QUIET AND DESIRABLE PLACE

for Ladies, Gentlemen, and Families. Entrance south side of Court. A. D. SHARON.

MULLER'S OPTOMETER!

The only reliable instrument for Testing Defective Vision.

135 MONTGOMERY ST.,

Near Bush, opposite the Occidental Hotel.

RUPTURE. BUY NO TRUSS

Until you see what has been accomplished by DR. PIERCE'S late invention. Call, or send for New Illustrated Book. Prices reduced.

MAGNETIC ELASTIC TRUSS CO., 609 Sacramento Street, San Francisco.

MORRIS, SOHWAB & CO.

FINE-ART DEALERS.

FREE ART GALLERY.

A complete assortment of ARTISTS' MATERIAL, GOLD FRAMES, etc.

19 AND 21 POST STREET.

WAREHOUSES, N. W. CORNER KEARNY AND SUTTER STREETS.

SHERMAN, HYDE & CO.

SHEET MUSIC, MUSIC BOOKS, MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

SEWING MACHINE,

The only really light-running lock-stitch Sewing Machine in the market.

"DOMESTIC" PAPER FASHIONS

Elegant, stylish, and reliable.

J. W. EVANS, 20 Post Street, San Francisco.

H. P. WAKELEE & CO.,

Wholesale and Retail

Druggists, Importers of Foreign and Domestic Drugs, Chemicals, and Perfumery,

No. 140 Montgomery Street, under the Occidental Hotel, San Francisco.

PARTICULAR ATTENTION PAID

to compounding Physician's Prescriptions, the dispensing of which is entrusted only to the most competent hands, while every care is taken to ensure the purity of all preparations.

HOME IN THE COUNTRY.

NOOK FARM.

FAMILIES WISHING TO SPEND

the Summer in the country will find this a cheerful home, and beautiful scenery of such endless variety as tempt to healthful exercise and recreation. We furnish good accommodations, and an excellent table. Good fishing and hunting on the premises. Four trains from San Francisco pass the station daily. Address

E. B. SMITH, Rutherford, Napa County, Cal.

THE PACIFIC LAND AND TRUST CO.

RENT HOUSES,

COLLECT RENTS, MANAGE ESTATES

HOUSES AND LOTS FOR SALE

in this city, Oakland, and Alameda. Lands and Ranches for sale in all parts of the country. Agents in the principal cities. Collections made throughout the coast.

No. 534 CALIFORNIA STREET.

OFFICE OF THE SIERRA NEVADA

Silver Mining Company San Francisco, October 2d, 1878. In accordance with a resolution adopted at a meeting of the Trustees of the Sierra Nevada Silver Mining Company, held this day, a special meeting of the stockholders of said Company is hereby called, the same to be held at the office of the Company, Room 47, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California, on Monday, the fourth (4th) day of November, 1878, at two (2) o'clock P. M., to take into consideration and decide upon the proposition to increase the capital stock of said Company from ten million ($10,000,000) dollars, divided into one hundred thousand (100,000) shares of the par value of one hundred ($100) dollars each, the present capital stock, to fifty million ($50,000,000) dollars, divided into five hundred thousand (500,000) shares of the par value of one hundred ($100) dollars each.

JOHN SKAF, CHAS. H. FISH, JOS. CLARK, A. E. HEAD, R. N. GRAVES, Trustees

W. W. STETSON, Secretary.

SILVER HILL MINING COMPANY.

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Gold Hill, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the thirtieth (30th) day of September, 1878, an assessment (No. 4) of fifty (50) cents per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the company, Room 8, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California. Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the first day of November, 1878, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction; and unless payment is made before will be sold on Monday, the twenty-fifth day of November, 1878, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising, and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

W. E. DEAN, Secretary. Office—Room 8, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

BUY YOUR SHIRTS AT

BEAMISH'S

The Argonaut.

VOL. III. NO. 14.

SAN FRANCISCO, OCTOBER 12, 1878.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

THE DIARY OF A WOMAN.

Translated for the Argonaut from the French of Octave Feuillet.

[CONTINUED FROM LAST NUMBER.]

I have time after the second bell to examine my surroundings. They surpass my expectations. The room is that of a captive princess. The walls, hung with old tapestries of forest scenes, high, sombre, mysterious; the recesses of the windows deep as chapels. I am, as I said, in the middle of the North Tower. This tower is a very high, square building, of feudal appearance, and of date more ancient than that of the rest of the chateau, of which it forms the right wing. It is especially consecrated as the dwelling place of Monsieur de Louvercy, who can there satisfy more easily his taste for retirement and isolation. They have lately even put up a transversal gate, hidden by a fence, which serves, so to say, as a boundary line between the tower and the chateau, and which enables the unfortunate young man to live completely apart when it suits him; and it suits him to do so whenever there are visitors at his mother's, for he has the sad fancy that he is an object of horror to every one but his mother. Buildings recently put up form a special yard, where he has his stables and kennels, and from which he has egress to the surrounding country. He can in this way go and come without crossing the main courtyard. Monsieur Roger occupies the apartments of the ground floor, and my grandmother and I are lodged in the first story. Cécile says we have been admitted to this sacred place because we are the quietest people of the party. We are, moreover, in communication with the chateau through corridors leading from each story, and can move about freely without being exposed to meeting Monsieur de Louvercy. Cécile, however, has warned us that he does sometimes mount to the second story to work in the library; "but," added she, "nothing is easier than to avoid him, poor boy! You will hear his crutch upon the stairs."

Notwithstanding this recommendation, I confess that I secretly promised myself some day or other to seize an opportunity to look upon this morose and deformed young man. My curiosity was satisfied—punished even—within the hour, and my compassion for him is with difficulty kept alive after what I have seen, and, above all, heard. The window of my dressing-room opens upon the little yard where are the stables particularly reserved for the use of Monsieur de Louvercy. I had just finished planting my red rose in the lace, when the yard resounded with a confused uproar, made up of the stamping of horses' feet, barking, calling, impatient cries, and, it must be said, of frightful oaths. I slightly raised the window, when I beheld two enormous Newfoundland dogs jumping up to the nose of a horse that was white with sweat and foam, then a species of basket dogcart, and in this cart Monsieur de Louvercy, too easily recognizable by his mutilated arm and leg. As for his face, I could scarcely make out anything but the long blonde moustaches hanging down à la Tartare. Monsieur de Louvercy called out in the tone of a veritable fury to two servants, who, without doubt, were not expecting him so soon, and who ran forward dismayed. He hailed them with another volley of fierce words while they assisted him to get out of his cart. I quickly closed my curtain and saw nothing more. I was heart-sick. This revolting scene lessened his misfortune in my eyes. My neighbor! We shall not be neighborly, I fear.

We are at table. Cécile, carrying out her programme, placed me between the two young rivals. At my right is the dark-complexioned Monsieur de Valnesse; at my left is Monsieur de Valnesse the fair—an arrangement, by the way, which seemed somewhat to surprise Madame de Louvercy. Cécile placed herself in front, the better to overlook my operations. She is beside the Caré de Louvercy, whom she strives to make laugh while drinking. She laughs herself with all her heart while inciting me by a side glance to do my duty. She evidently thinks that I am rather lax in my efforts. The truth is that I encounter unforeseen difficulties. Messieurs de Valnesse are both very polite, but they do not aid me in my inquest—they scarcely answer me. There is something, I do not know what, which seems to paralyze them. They look at me in a kind of uneasy stupor. They seem much interested in the red rose which is in my hair. But it is not that which is in question, my good gentlemen.

Scarcely am I out of the room when Cécile takes me apart:

"Well, what have you discovered?"
"I have discovered that they are timid, which is already something."
"Timid," cried she, "because you do not encourage them. You must encourage them if you want them to be sociable and open themselves to you."

That seemed to be reasonable. I encouraged them gently, and, in fact, with the aid of the coffee I found that they became sociable by degrees. Both sang for me; both asked me to waltz several times, and after each waltz I kept them by me for a moment to enjoy their conversation. Meanwhile Cécile was rushing about in the parlor in the strangest way, sometimes bursting into laughter without reason, sometimes turning the music on the piano up side down. All at once she disappeared, and after a few moments, fearing that she was suffering, I went to look for her.

Through the half shades of twilight I discovered her in the courtyard of the chateau. She was walking up and down with a quick step, like one who wishes to start the circulation after a bath. I went toward her; she made believe that she did not see me, and turning her back upon me continued to walk. I called her:

"Cécile!"
"What?"
"Are you in pain?"
"No."
"Well, what has happened?"
"Nothing!"

I looked straight in her face, when she continued: "No, nothing. Nothing more than what I ought to have foreseen if I had had less sincerity. Since your arrival, with your divine form, it was clear that I was lost. Ah, mon Dieu! it is not your fault that you are made so. I do not reproach you; that is—pardon me, my dear—you might get along without being a coquette. When a woman is as beautiful as you are, and coquettes besides, then good-bye! nothing is possible!"

"Really, Cécile, I do not know whether I ought to laugh or get angry. What does this mean? You beg me, you supplicate me, to study these two young men."

"Yes, but you study them too much—and they study you too much, also."

"Well, what now? Do you want me to stop?"

She seized my hand. "Oh, no;" and after a pause, softening, she said: "I am foolish, am I not?" and hiding her face in my bosom she burst into tears.

I comforted her as I would comfort a child, and she soon recovered her vivacity and her habitual tenderness: "Listen. I have a superb idea. You shall choose the one who pleases you best, and I will take the other. We will be cousins, almost sisters; it will be delicious. Besides, it is right that you should choose before me; you are superior in all respects. It is just, very just."

"Darling, you are the best little creature in all the world, but I can not enter into your arrangement. And be persuaded of this thing: the Messieurs de Valnesse can only be for me pretenders to your hand."

That title gives them in my eyes an absolutely sacred character, and prevents, even to the shadow of a thought, any personal pretension on my part, which would appear to me to be a gross offense against delicacy and friendship. Do you believe me? Are you reassured?"

"I do believe you, and I adore you! Come, continue your observations."

We entered the parlor, where I continued my studies, but in moderation, for zeal, too, has its dangers.

The old bell strikes. How charming at night, and in the woods!
Grand Dieu! two o'clock in the morning! Are you not ashamed, miss?

June 12th.—Is movement the synonym of pleasure, and is the mere act of moving about sufficient to amuse one? If so, I amuse myself too much. "What shall we do this morning? What shall we do this afternoon? What shall we do to-night?" is the burden of the song in this household; and behold us starting off on foot, on horseback, in carriages, looking at nothing, rushing by everything, with laughter, with racket, which accompany us on our return, go to table with us, dance with us, sing with us, and do not leave us even in the corridors.

Early this morning I wished to be refreshed with a solitary walk in the park, and, as it were, have a meeting with myself. I was going down noiselessly from my tower, and was about half way, when suddenly a dull hammering sound on the steps below warned me of the approach of Monsieur de Louvercy, who was apparently on his way to the library. I stopped quite short, and was on the point of bravely turning my back and escaping to my room. There was no time, however. Monsieur Roger and I met face to face. Seeing me suddenly before him, he turned as pale as though he saw a ghost, made an awkward gesture, as if attempting to bow, and in his confusion let go his crutch, which rolled to the bottom of the stairs. I can not find words to describe the expression of profound distress which showed itself in his face. It was pain, humiliation, and anger combined. He held to the railing with his right hand, while his broken arm and his shortened leg hung unsupported in the air. I hastily descended the steps, picked up his crutch, ran up quickly, and replaced it under his arm. He fixed his dark blue eyes upon me, and simply said, in a deep, grave tone of voice: "I thank you," and continued on his way, as I did on mine.

This little scene somewhat reconciled me with him. In the first place, I was infinitely grateful to him for having spared me those soldierly broadsides of which he was so prodigal; and secondly, in spite of the involuntary antipathy with which deformed people generally inspire me, I was far from finding him as repulsive as Cécile had described him. One arm is gone, and one leg shortened and perhaps paralyzed; but his face is handsome and refined, and the slight scar on his forehead does not disfigure him. He has, to be sure, a wild, restless look, which comes, doubtless, from the untrimmed condition of his hair, and his long—too long—moustache.

I was entering the park when Cécile saw me from the window. Three minutes afterward she was trampling the grass by my side, and hopping about like a little bird. I told her of my meeting with her cousin.

"Ah, mon Dieu! How he must have sworn."

"Not at all."

"You astonish me. But yet he must be in good humor to-day; he expects his friend this evening."

"What friend?"

"Captain d'Eblis, you know."

"No, I do not know. Who is he?"

"I thought I had told you he was the one who saved Roger at Coulmiers. They have been very intimate ever since they were at Saint Cyr together. At the moment when poor Roger was torn to pieces by that shell, Monsieur d'Eblis picked him up from the midst of the fire and from under the horses' feet, and carried him off in his arms as one would a child. It was very fine! And since then he has behaved admirably to him; he has even found means to attach him to life again by persuading him to write the history of this terrible war. They work together at this. Monsieur d'Eblis comes to see him often, and brings him all the documents which may be useful in the work. He is himself well educated—quite learned, in fact. Commander of a squadron of the staff at thirty years—think of that!"

"But tell me, ma chérie, may not this gentleman be admirer number three?"

"Monsieur d'Eblis!" cried Cécile. "Ah, grand Dieu! My dear, one might about as well marry Croquemitaine—he is so stern, so terrible. I like him pretty well, however, on account of his behavior to Roger. But we have scarcely seen each other more than two or three times. He seems to look upon me as a baby, and I look up to him as I would to a father. Come, now, let us talk seriously, Charlotte. Don't it seem to you that there is time enough for me to think about deciding between the Messieurs de Valnesse?"

"It does seem to me that there is no hurry about it."

"I beg your pardon!"

"There is nothing disagreeable in your relations with those gentlemen."

"Really—you believe it? And my heart, my poor heart, what would you do with that?"

"Has it spoken?"

"No, but it is impatient to speak—it burns to speak. Give it but the words."

I saw, however, that she did not care a great deal about it, and, answering her in a joking way we entered the chateau as the bell rang for breakfast.

The truth is, that a choice between the two candidates seems to me very difficult. The result of my observation, and of the information I have obtained about them, continues to be both satisfactory and embarrassing: satisfactory, because both of them are endowed with valuable qualities; embarrassing, because these qualities seem about equal in each. Even in their intelligence, in their type of character, and in their physique, there are resemblances which are easily explained by their near relationship. To sum up all, I find them to be two of the best kind of young men which can be found. They are excellent fellows, of refined tastes, respectable talents, and somewhat ordinary intelligence, but of elevated sentiments, and possessing a high sense of honor. They sustain their rivalry and mutual pretensions with a chivalrous politeness which gives one pleasure to observe.

Mon Dieu! I love Cécile so dearly that I should have wanted an absolutely perfect husband for her—a thing so rarely found. But would it be wise to pursue an ideal which perhaps does not exist when one has at hand something approaching it, and which may never be found again? Has not a really superior man almost always, as far as one can discover, faults of character equaling his good traits, and, as it were, in inverse ratio to his merits? Is there not in reality more guarantee for the happiness of a woman in this honest medium offered so agreeably in the persons of the Messieurs de Valnesse?

"My uneasy conscience" is in torture while resolving these grave questions which may influence a destiny so very dear to me;—and I am really astonished at the tranquillity of mind with which Cécile—let her say what she will—awaits my decree before pronouncing her own. I was never on my own account placed in a similar position, but I imagine that if I were I should be less calm, but much more decided. Well, we shall see.

Some day, midnight.—This evening was passed with less noise and not so tamely as the preceding ones. Captain d'Eblis's presence threw cold water on it, Cécile says; but I think that it simply raised the diapason of our little circle. I have often noticed the peculiar influence which a really distinguished man will exercise in society by his presence alone. He gives, without wishing to, or without knowing that he does it, a new spirit to things about him. Whether he speaks or whether he is silent does not much matter; that he is there is sufficient. Each one rises more or less to his standpoint—has a sense of a larger life in consequence of it; a more active current of thought on a higher plane is established; unimportant incidents become interesting; the amusements are of a more refined and useful kind. One feels uneasy, but very happy, because he is there, and sometimes relieved when he goes away; but he is missed, and one feels lessened by his absence. Less importance is attached to what is said because he does not hear it, and to what is done because he knows not of it.

This afternoon Monsieur de Louvercy went to the station with his dogcart to meet Captain d'Eblis. Partly from accident, partly from curiosity, I found myself in my dressing-room when they entered the little stable-yard. Hearing the noise of wheels I raised my curtain. Monsieur d'Eblis had just jumped out of the dogcart, and while laughing extended his arms to Monsieur de Louvercy, who, laughing also, slid down on the breast of his friend. It seemed to me that there was in this affectionate act a touching reminder of the terrible scenes at Coulmiers, and I took pleasure in picturing to myself the violent emotions and the fever of heroism stirred up by the battle and expressed on those two faces, at present so tranquil and smiling.

Monsieur d'Eblis dined with us. He is of medium height and somewhat unbending, but possessing that elegance of appearance which characterizes officers in civilian dress. It must be allowed that at first sight there was something extremely severe, and even hard, in his looks. Fine, clear-cut features, dark complexion, heavy, bristling moustache, and very black, calm-looking eyes, were what one first saw, and they were not very reassuring. But the slightest smile which appeared spread over all that an expression of kindness which gave one confidence. After a few words from him one takes courage, for his voice is singularly sweet and musical. It is indeed surprising and charming to hear such music come from under those frightful moustaches.

Several times during dinner I had that pleasure, having been placed beside him at table. We both began by holding our tongues. I was frightened, and may be he was not much braver than myself, for if he has his severe expression I have mine also, and have often remarked that I produce a sense of fear in people approaching me for the first time. All at once he broke the ice by saying, "Madoiselle, I have heard a good deal about you to-day."

"How happened that, sir?"

"I already know that you sympathize with the unfortunate."

"Sir!"

"I know that you were very kind this morning to my friend Roger."

"Mon Dieu! Any one in my place would have acted as I did."

"Very true. Many people give alms, but then there is the way of giving them."

I told him that I felt flattered by the compliment, for he knew what good works were, having done more for Monsieur Roger than I had done or should ever have the opportunity of doing.

He bowed, and replied, in a sad tone, "I don't know that I rendered him a great service—in taking him from there."

We were well started, and there was no reason why we should stop. So we continued, saying pleasant things to each other while giving information as to our likings and dislikings of things in general, and the music of Wagner in particular, which pleases him and does not please me.

We were unfortunately interrupted by some of Cécile's nonsense. Busy in trying to make the Caré laugh while he was drinking, she all at once took it into her head to pick up two cherries whose stems were joined together and place them astride of her nose, turning up her pretty face the while to keep them balanced. Every one laughed, and the Messieurs de Valnesse applauded enthusiastically. She then pulled the cherries apart, put each one in a plate, and, calling a servant, told him to carry one plate to Monsieur Henri de Valnesse and the other to Monsieur René. While these gentlemen were proudly drawing the stems through their buttonholes, Captain d'Eblis looked on with eyes wide open. Cécile noticed it, and remarked in her saucy way: "You seem surprised, Captain!"

"Not at all, Madoiselle."

"Excuse me, but you look very much surprised. Come, be frank; my joke seems to you in very bad taste, doesn't it?"

"Madoiselle, everything you do is charming."

"No. You are right. It was in bad taste; but I must explain to you the peculiarities of my character, Captain. It is somewhat complicate, in some sort mixed; and you will understand why when I tell you that there is in me both an angel and a devil."

Mon Dieu! Madoiselle, you have lots of companions in that respect. We have all of us an angel to whom we try to listen more or less, and a devil whom we try more or less to keep silent. At any rate, the devil who led you to place cherries on your nose could not have been a very naughty one."

"Thank you, Captain," replied Cécile. "The reproach is apparent, but it is a gentle one. I told your pretty neighbor this morning that you were a father to me."

Monsieur d'Eblis smiled and bowed, and we continued the course of our conversation. From certain indications this valiant soldier must be, as the epitaphs have it, as good a son as he is a friend. He has a grave and gentle way of saying "my mother," which is a revelation to me. This word comes repeatedly to his lips: "It is on account of my mother," "My mother wished it," "It pleases my mother." In a moment of abstraction he even let fall the word "Mamma," but blushed faintly under his tan and went on with what he was saying. This infantile appellation, coming from that gentle voice and that masculine face, was not without its charm.

After dinner Cécile came, with her incomparable grace, to shake hands and make peace with the Captain. They talked together in a corner for some time, looking at me at intervals, so that I knew they must be talking about me; and then, as she passed me, she said in a low tone: "My dear, you are making sad havoc in the staff."

I do not wish to make havoc; but if that should signify that he is in sympathy with me, I acknowledge frankly and candidly that I am glad of it.

[CONTINUED IN NEXT NUMBER.]

M. Jules Noriac gives some curious statistics to show the value of wit regarded in a commercial light. He takes Nestor Roqueplan, so famed for his bons mots, for his wonderful attachment to Paris, and his curious collection of warming-pans, and remarks that during his life he said thousands of good things, each one of which represents ten lines. These mots, he adds, are either repeated in their original or in a disguised form every year by a thousand newspapers, thus producing a sum of 2,500,000 francs to those who make use of them; and if paper, cost of composition, etc., be taken into account, they set in movement 5,000,000 francs. It therefore results that the wit of Nestor Roqueplan in the space of fifty years, "paid into the company of general" is no less a sum than 250,000,000 francs.

AFTER MORENGO.

Early one morning, in the month of June, I started from camp, mounted on one of the toughest California mustangs that ever climbed a mountain trail. I was the leader of a party engaged by the stage agent to ferret out and bring within the grasp of justice, if possible, a notorious gang of road agents. We all entered into the spirit of the enterprise with a will, for we had been longing for some kind of adventure, as fully a month had passed since the "dry season" had set in, and, on account of the scarcity of water, we were obliged to abandon our claims until the winter rains. So it was with joy we embraced the opportunity that now presented itself for consuming at least a portion of the long, tedious interval. We had been engaged in this most agreeable work for some weeks without many favorable results; and, on the morning referred to, I decided to try my luck unaccompanied by the other members of the party. So I started out a day in advance; and in the afternoon, at the time mentioned, was winding my way along a narrow trail—having left the stage road far behind—and from the fresh imprints in the trail I was convinced it had been traversed but a short time before. I had never, at any previous time, penetrated so far into this forest of chaparral and incipient oaks; it was the densest I had ever seen, and the trail that led into it was the most tortuous and serpentine I had ever traveled. But, as I had never before struck a trail that did not lead some place, I concluded that this one led somewhere also. This conclusion was soon verified, when a sudden turn brought me into a natural clearing, of some five or six hundred yards in circumference, in the centre of which stood a house and a barn. Now, thought I, my efforts have been rewarded with success: here is the rendezvous of the notorious Morengo gang. At that moment my mustang, whose best feelings were evidently aroused by the sight of the barn, gave vent to a very spirited and prolonged whinny. I had not sufficient time to turn and get under cover of the chaparral before a dog—a most savage and ferocious looking brute—made his appearance, and, taking in the situation, was making a very straight line in my direction, when, to my great relief, and not less to my surprise, the door of the house flew open and a lady appeared, whose quick order:

"Tiger, Tiger! come back here, sir," accompanied at the same time with an emphatic stamp of her foot, brought the enraged animal cowering back.

"Won't you come in, sir?" she said, addressing me: "you must be very much fatigued." And, in almost the same breath, cried: "Ah Toy, Ah Toy! come and put the gentleman's horse away."

I immediately dismounted, and handed my horse over to the guileless and inoffensive-looking Mongolian who responded to the lady's call.

"Walk right in, sir," she said. I entered and thanked her for her kindness.

"You will please excuse me a moment, sir," she said, gazing down at her soiled apron; "I hardly expected any one to-day," she continued, displaying just the least confusion while contemplating what she doubtless thought her unrepresentable appearance.

She withdrew into an adjoining room, and I took advantage of her absence by surveying the one in which I was sitting. It was furnished in a manner uncommon to that section of the country. Everywhere there were evidences of the delicate taste possessed by its fair mistress. The floor was carpeted; the walls were covered with white muslin; there were upholstered chairs and a sofa; on a small table in the centre of the room was a pile of books; and in one corner was an open secretary.

How remarkable, thought I, to find such a house and so lovely a creature—for such she was—presiding over it in this isolated spot. But my thoughts were soon disturbed by the reappearance of the principal object of my wonder.

"Pardon me, please, for leaving you so long alone," she said, as she settled into a chair and smoothed down the waves of the rich dress which she had donned in her absence, and added: "You must have traveled a long distance to-day."

"Yes," said I, "I have come all the way from C—ville."

"Why, you must be quite exhausted," said she, and at the same time rising and going to a door: "Ah Toy, Ah Toy!" she cried: "get some dinner for the gentleman."

All my protestations were of no avail.

While awaiting the preparation of dinner we conversed freely, and I discovered that she possessed, besides her personal charms, rare attractions of the mind, for she was well read and intelligent. I learned from her that her father was a miner, whose claim lay in the immediate vicinity, and that he would be home in the evening.

Dinner was soon in readiness, and I partook heartily, while my fair hostess presided over the table; and, under the influence of the wine that she set before me, I grew more and more communicative.

"What could have brought you into such an out-of-the-way place as this?" she asked after the table had been cleared. I had evaded similar questions to this but none so directly put. Yet, thought I, why should I not tell her the object of my trip? What harm could her knowing it do? And it might be the means of my gaining valuable information; and the subtle influence which those dark, sparkling eyes exercised over me inspired me with confidence in their possessor, and lowering my voice, I began:

"Have you ever heard of Morengo's band?"

The dark eyes flashed with excitement as she answered: "What, the stage robbers?"

"Yes," said I, "then you have heard of them?"

"Yes, indeed," she replied: "I have heard a great deal of them; then, added, archly: 'I hope you are not one of their number.'"

"On the other hand," said I, "I am after them."

"Indeed!" she exclaimed, with increasing interest, and then looking around in a frightened manner, asked: "But you don't think they live anywhere around here, do you?"

"I am convinced," I replied, lowering my voice still more, "that they do live in this neighborhood." Her alarm increased.

"Why," she exclaimed, "I have been living here for several years with no other protection during the day than Tiger."

I assured that I really thought it must be an abandoned wretches who would harm a lady—and especially her.

She appeared to take no notice of this little compliment, and I continued: "On the other hand, I understand, they are a very gallant band of rascals, and scarcely ever require ladies to surrender their valuables when they attack a stage." This seemed to reassure her. "But," I went on, "you can doubtless better understand this when I inform you that it is a question which is the leader of the band, Morengo or his daughter Juanita."

"Oh!" she exclaimed, "now you have aroused my curiosity. How romantic! Tell me all about her, please; it is such a rare thing that we hear of romance in this isolated region."

Her graceful form inclined in her eagerness to catch every word I uttered, and her cheek flushed with pleasure and excitement as I told her all I knew and had heard about the remarkable woman, whose daring deeds exceeded those of any of her father's followers, and that it was affirmed that the most successful raids of the band were planned by her, and she always assisted in their execution.

Thus employed in pleasant conversation the moments slipped away into hours, and every moment that passed I felt myself becoming more hopelessly entangled in the meshes that the lovely woman before me was all unconsciously weaving and throwing around me.

As each successive hour passed I made up my mind to leave before another had, but as often failed in my resolution. The sun was now low and I essayed to depart, but was met with the words: "Why, you surely won't go until papa comes home: I am sure he would be glad to meet you."

"You really must excuse me," said I; "it is not in justice to the rest of the party—"

"What party?" she broke in.

"Why," I replied, remembering that I had not told her, "I am only one of a party of some ten or twelve."

"Ah, yes," said she, eyeing me closely, "I see. And all searching for Morengo?"

"Yes," I replied, "but I am a day in advance of them; and as I said, it would really be unjust for me to remain idle here while they are pursuing their laborious search."

"Then they will be here to-morrow?" she asked.

"Yes," said I, "their intention was to follow the trail which brought me here."

"Well," says she, "you must stay until papa comes. I shall have to set table for tea." And before I could interpose a word, she was away. As she left the room I thought how many charms she was the possessor of: intelligent, beautiful, romantic, vivacious; of aesthetic tastes, I was convinced; and then looking round my eyes lit upon the books piled upon the table. I had a curiosity to see them more closely, so I walked over and on examining them found they were the works of authors of renown, and as I opened one after another, I saw upon the fly leaf of a book of poems several stanzas, traced in a most perfect hand. They attracted my attention, and I read them, and while I still held the book in my hand my fair hostess reentered and approached the table by which I stood.

"Pardon me, please," I began, "for examining your library uninvited; but may I ask who the author is of these beautiful stanzas?"

The color that rose to her cheek verified the conclusion I had arrived at, but she merely said: "Oh, no one in particular," and added quickly, "papa has just come; he will be in in a moment."

She had scarcely finished speaking when a tall, dark man with heavy brows, a full black beard and long flowing black hair entered the room, and after the formalities of an introduction were over we sat down, and as his daughter withdrew from the room, in a subdued tone, he commenced: "Violet informs me that you are after Morengo."

"Violet!" she bore the name of my favorite flower; and, oh, how well it fitted her, thought I.

"Yes, sir," I replied; "and any information you could give me would be greatly appreciated. Am I on the right track?"

"Yes," he answered, "I think you are."

I listened intently.

"But you should have left the trail," he continued, "some three miles back. There is a little clearing there. Didn't you see it as you came along?"

"Yes," I replied, "I remember it."

"Well, sir," he continued, "I have a suspicion which I have never yet communicated to any living being, not even to my daughter, and that is that somewhere about that clearing Morengo and his men live."

"But," said I, in surprise, "are you not afraid of your lives, living in such close proximity to such a desperate band?"

"Did you ever hear," he replied, significantly, "of Morengo attacking a house?"

No, I never had.

"And let him dare to attack this house," he continued, with considerable spirit: "that girl of mine and I could give them a pretty rough deal, I reckon."

"Why," I exclaimed, "what could she do?"

"Do!" he replied. "Well, now, she can swing a rifle just as lively as the next bushwhacker."

I was astonished.

"And I never saw a horse so fast," he added, with apparent pride, "that she couldn't lariat on the keen jump."

It is unnecessary to say I was amazed. A lady, thought I, who possessed so many and such varied accomplishments—whose sweet voice I could now hear in the adjoining room as she hummed a familiar song while busying herself about her duties—was a wonder indeed.

The door opened, and supper was announced in readiness.

After supper was over and the table vacated I again essayed to leave, when the father met me with the words:

"Oh, you must stay over night. Your party will be along in the morning, my daughter informs me, and you can join them then."

It was just getting dark, and I insisted on going, although my heart did not: so my horse was ordered, and as I took the proffered hand of the fair creature who had in such a short time filched my heart from me, I gave it a pressure which brought the crimson dye to her fair cheek; and the father, seizing my hand with a vice-like grasp, repeated the warm invitation of his daughter to come again, which I assured him I should.

The moon was shining brightly as I rode slowly away, and, thought I, what can equal the hospitality of a Californian? And as I was about to leave the clearing I took one last look at the house where my divinity dwelt, and was surprised at seeing a form approaching me. Could it be she? I stopped and waited. Sure enough, it was she. I dismounted, and as the fair creature drew near she said:

"I forgot to caution you. It is a very dangerous road you have to travel, and especially at night."

I looked into the dark eyes before me. Could it be possible that I had awakened the same feelings in her heart that she had in mine?

"Do not give yourself a moment's alarm about my welfare," I replied. "I have traveled roads a thousand times more dangerous than this trail."

"Oh," said she, "I do not apprehend any danger, but, you know, a word of warning is sometimes better than an ounce of steel." And then added, archly: "Look out for Juanita Morengo."

I laughed, and told her that I had never yet met a woman whom I thought could worst or take me at a disadvantage. With a merry little laugh she extended her hand, and at the same time handed me a note, requesting me to take it to C—ville; "and promise me," she added, as she looked me full in the eyes, "that you will not look at it till you arrive there. I think I can trust you." I promised by all that was holy that I would not violate her trust, and at the same time deposited the note in a pocket of my saddle-bags. I then raised to my lips the little hand that had laid so confidently in mine and imprinted a kiss upon it, and was soon on my way again.

I had proceeded thus about two miles, and as I neared the clearing, which was now my objective point, I unwillingly expelled the pleasant thoughts from my mind and became more cautious. I entered the clearing by a sharp turn of the trail, and hearing a slight rustle in the undergrowth close by I stopped my horse and listened. All was silent. I had proceeded but a little farther when I suddenly heard a whizzing sound similar to that made by a whip in cutting through the air, and at the same instant I felt my arms pinioned to my side as though a rope were wrapped around my body. Quick as flash of lightning the thought struck me: "A lariat—I am lassoed;" and at the same time made a desperate struggle to seize the knife which I carried in my belt to sever the strands of the lariat that encircled me, but in an instant I was unhorsed and lying prostrate on the ground. I saw a masked face above me, and a white hand pressing something to my mouth and nostrils which had a decided odor of chloroform.

The sun was high when I picked myself up and gazed in wonder around. Slowly, and one by one, I recalled the incidents of the preceding day, but could not understand how I had arrived at this spot, for indeed C—ville was in plain sight, and my mustang was picketed near by. My arms pained me a little, and that called to mind the lariat that had been wrapped around them, and then I remembered being pulled from my horse and robbed—as I supposed. But, strange though it appeared, my horse, my revolvers, and the several slugs which were in my packet, were all intact. I approached my horse to mount, but, to my surprise and horror, my saddle-bags were gone.

That night, as I was sitting sorrowfully in my cabin, there came a knock at my door, and upon opening it one of the party entered.

"Hallo," he exclaimed, "heard you got lariatied last night?" He then went on and told me what the party had accomplished, and to my amazement I found that they had been to exactly the same place I had. He described minutely the trail, the house, the barn, and every thing on the premises, "but," said he, "there wasn't a soul there."

"What?" I exclaimed, "no one there?"

"No," he replied; then very significantly: "They must have got wind that we was comin', for things looked mighty like as if they'd just cleared out."

I felt sick.

"Who do you supposed lived there?" I asked, with a sinking heart.

"Why, Morengo, of course," was the confident answer.

"What proof did you find?" I asked quickly, grasping at the straw.

"Well," said he, "we found about a dozen mail bags, and as many broken express boxes in the barn. Isn't that proof enough?"

I thought I was dreaming; I could not speak.

Another knock at the door roused me somewhat, and another of the party entered and said the agent would like to see me. I hastened to the stage office, where the remainder of the party were assembled. Not a word of greeting did I receive from one of them as I entered. The agent was the first to speak.

"I believe you said you lost your saddle bags yesterday?"

"Yes," I replied.

"Well, the boys found a pair about three miles this side of Morengo's. Are these yours?" he asked, holding them up. I seized them, and plunged my hands into the pockets. The note was gone.

Then said the agent, while his and the eyes of the whole party were fixed upon me:

"Is this yours?" holding up an unsealed note.

"Yes," said I, and, in a rage, demanded: "Who opened this note?"

"Nobody," said one of the party, "twasn't sealed."

I unfolded it quickly, and read these words, traced in the same matchless hand that the stanzas I had read the previous day were:

"Compliments of Juanita Morengo."

As the agent saw the different expressions of my face, he said:

"This is very remarkable!"

I gazed blankly at the sheet; again were the incidents of previous day recalled; I remembered with a vivid distinctness the father's remark of his daughter's proficiency in the use of the lariat; I remembered the soft white hand that had touched my face as I inhaled the fumes of the opiate; I thought of the deserted house, the mail bags, the express boxes. My eyes grew dim; my knees shook; my heart seemed to be forcing itself up into my throat; I was suffocating. It was all plain now. Yet, as I staggered out into the open air, I repeated the words the agent had uttered:

"Yes—it is—very—remarkable."

SAN FRANCISCO, October, 1878. L. H. CUMMINS.

FABLES AND ANECDOTES.

By Little Johnny.

The Delighted Barber.—Fable of the Elephant that lived in a Glass House yet Threw Stones.—The Lady who spelled Satan with two a's.—Jack Brily, the Sailor, makes another Blunder.—Card Playing according to Haul.—Improving Narrative concerning the Conversion of a Gambler by the Homoeopathic principle of "Similia similibus curantur."—Mrs. Doppy's Capital Crime.

Wen Uncle Ned he red my sisters yung mans story bout the barber witch I rote out last week he sed: "I kno a other," and I sed wot was it, and he sed, Uncle Ned did, that one time there was a barber. And one day a feller he cum in the shop for to git shafed, and he handed the barber a card wich was wrot on like this way:

"For my Hair.—Taller, clone, lard, bergmot, pematum, oil, tonnick, restoratif, pitchooly, gum, beeswhacks, kerriseen and tar.

"For my Face.—Cole cream, cam frice, powder, ham fat, sof sope, glissern, poltice, rooje, nammell, giant sement, shoo blackn.

"For my Wiskers.—Sames for the hair, only more taller.

"For my Muchtash.—Do, starch, glew, morter, and sod-der."

Wen the barber he red it he was jest dlited, and he sed to the feller: "You are the most sensible man wich has ever set in this chair, yes in deed, I never see a man of sech good taste."

And then the barber shafed the feller, and tole him all the news wich he cude think, and never stopt tockin, the barber dident, while he shafed, cos he was dlighted. But jes as he got dun shafn the feller, and was gittin reddy to put them things onto him, cordin to the memmy randem, a man wock- ed in and took the feller by the ear, and he sed to the bar- ber, the man did: "This fellers got to go now, cos he is a escape, if you want to finish him you mus fetch them things over to the Def and Dum Ward of the Lunatic Sylum."

One time a lion met a ephalant and the ephalant sed: "You better go and git your hair cut."

But the lion it sed: "Bah! I shant re sent a fellers in sults wich has got his nose tween his own teetths."

But the wale is the largist of all livin things, and his rore is like dissent thunder. Wales is kild with harpoons, wich isent bairpins, the fools wich cant spel rites em jest a like.

One time wen Mister Brily, the butcher, was in his butcher shop a butcherin, a boy brot him a letter sined by a lady, but it want met to give him, but the man wich kep the dri good store, and the letter said: "Send me haf a yard of Satan." Mr. Brily he thot a wile, an then he cut of a long peece of sossidge and sent it to the lady, with this note on a paper: "This is the best I can do for you, its sum like his tail, but you got to devil it yure self."

Wen Mister Pitchel, thats the preacher, was stayn to our house Jack Brily, the sailer, wich is Mister Brily the butch- ers boy, he come in wile we was to our breck fest, and et too. And my mother she asked Jack if he wude have some devild kidny, and Jack did. Bime by wen he had et it ol up he said: "Ile thank you, mam, for sum more of them devil- ish kidnys."

A other time my father had bot some dux, but they was so ded they wasent fit for to be et, and wen he brot em in he sed to my mother: "I clame 2 pints for hi game," and my mother she spoke up and said: "Take a other for bein lo."

But you jest ought to see me and Billy play cards, cos we can beat anny boddy, yes indeed, evry time I play a card Billy he plays a other, and then he says mine is only jest nothin but a trump, but hizzen is a taker. But wen I ast Billy wy I never git enny takers he says thats cos its a square deal.

A preacher wich had been a wicked gamler fore he was a preacher he seen a feller wich was a gamler too, and he sed, the preacher did: "Ile jest play cards with this pore miza- ble sinner, and win ol his munny, and wen he is busted may be he will listen to the divine trooth and be saved."

So thay plade and the preacher he winned ol the fellers munny, evry cent, and then he sed: "Now see how wicked you have ben for to loos yure munny, and yure wwife and babys havent got no bred for to eat."

And the gamler he sed: "Thats so," and bust out a cryin. Then the preacher he sed: "Pore sinner, if you prommice me onto yure onner to not play cards agin Ile giv it ol back, cos lme a preacher."

So the gamler he was a stonish, and he sed: "I never see sech a good man, I prommis, yes in deed, and heven bles you!" and he busted out crine agin, the gamler did.

Then the preacher he giv him back ol his money, and the feller put it in his pocket, and whiped his eys, and blode his nose grateffe, and then he thot a wile, and pretty sune he coffed, and he sed to the preacher: "I feel mity mean taken back this hundred dollars from a man wich has rescwed me from card playn, tel you wot Ile do, you put up a other hundred agin it and weel toss up for the pile, heds or tails, best 2 out of thre."

But my mother she sez its notty for to toss up, and one time when Sammy Doppy was heds and I was tales for 2 kites she sed if we done it agin we better not. But I gess if Sammy's mother was threw up she wude be heds evry time, cos hern is red like fire, I never seen sech a red hed, but wude peckers aint no slowtches too.

SAN RAFAEL, October 8, 1878.

No man can safely go abroad that does not love to stay at home; no man can safely speak that does not hold his tongue; no man can safely govern that would not cheerfully become a subject; no man can safely command that has not learned to obey; and no man can safely rejoice but he that has the testimony of a good conscience.

The good old English poet thought that man should turn out and give an insect the whole road. Were the farmers to follow his advice in these days of potato bugs, they would all be arrested in their serpentine course for beastly intoxication.

When a man bolts his party he gets his political ideas down fine.

NEED AND OPPORTUNITY.

Lo! this is Christdom: this same blessed earth,
From its clear coronals of the air we breathe
Dow to the primal granite underneath
Its mountains, hast had very notable birth
Out of Judaic insufficiency.
But what are we but unbelieving meo,
Who put not Christ in our philosophy,
And only call our brothers brethren when
We meet on Sabbaths? Tooth for tooth is good,
We think, on week days—the old rigor that,
With literal eye for eye and blood for blood,
Through the sad centuries strived to tread flat
The Memorable Hill from which alone
We dare lift steady eyes to the Unknown.

What shall we say then? That our brother's crimes
Aur our own diseases; that his hurts
Imply our shames; that the same bond engirts
Alike the man who lapses and who climbs;
That formulas and credos, when divorced
From the great soul of all-enfolding ruth,
Leaves still the lean and thirsty soul athirst
For the deep heart and blessedness of Truth;
That in the noblest there is something base,
And in the meanest, noble; that behind
The sensual darkness of the human face,
Not to be quenched by any adverse wind,
Enough of heaven's light flickers for a sign
That Man's best possible is its divine.

Here's room for poets; here is ground for seers;
Broad leagues of acres furrowed for the seed
Whose recompensing sheaves of song shall breed
Within the bosom of garnering years
Harvests of prodigal plenty. O ye lips
Anointed for the proper utterance
Of what things lie in worthy fellowships!
O eyes to whom the dread significance
Of Life's vast mystery is visible!
For lack of ye the poor Earth perishes—
The patient Earth, so very beautiful;
The comely Earth, so clung with noble stress;
Achving for God unutterably, and wet
With most immortal tears and bloody sweat.

SAN FRANCISCO, October 7, 1878.

RICHARD REALF.

Father, Take my Hand.

THE PRAYER.

The way is dark, my Father! Cloud on cloud
Is gathering thickly o'er my head, and loud
The thunder roars above me. See, I stand
Like one bewildered! Father, take my hand,
And through the gloom
Lead safely home
Thy child!

The way is long, my Father! and my soul
Longs for the rest and quiet of the goal;
While yet I journey through this weary land
Keep me from wandering. Father, take my hand;
Quickly and straight
Lead to heaven's gate
Thy child!

The path is rough, my Father! Many a thorn
Has pierced me, and my feet, all torn
And bleeding, mark the way. Yet thy command
Bids me press forward. Father, take my hand;
Then, safe and blest,
Lead up to rest
Thy child!

The cross is heavy, Father! I have borne
It long, and still do bear it. Let my worn
And fleeting spirit rise to that blest land
Where crowns are given. Father, take my hand,
And, reaching down,
Lead to the crown
Thy child!

THE ANSWER.

The way is dark, my child, but leads to light,
I would not always have thee walk by sight;
My dealings now thou canst not understand;
I meant it so; but I will take thy hand,
And through the gloom
Lead safely home
My child.

The way is long, my child, but it shall be
Not one step longer than is best for thee;
And thou shalt know at last when thou shalt stand
Safe at the goal, how I did take thy hand
And, quick and straight,
Lead to heaven's gate
My child.

The path is rough, my child, but oh! how sweet
Will be the rest for weary pilgrims meet:—
When thou shalt reach the borders of that land
To which I lead thee, as I take thy hand,
And, safe and blest,
With me shall rest
My child!

The cross is heavy, child, yet there was One
Who bore a heavier for thee—My Son,
My well-beloved. For him bear thine, and stand
With Him at last, and from thy Father's hand,
The cross laid down,
Receive a crown,
My child.

Two Mothers.

I sit and rock beside my cottage window;
My baby boy is lying on my knee—
His tiny hand clasped close about my finger,
His wistful hazel eyes regarding me.
Outside, among the cherry tree's thick branches,
There sings a robin with a crimson breast;
I hear her song and guess its tender meaning—
She has two little eggs within her nest.

The summer days are blossoming around us,
And every heart is filled with summer's joy;
I wander slowly through the sunny garden,
And by my side totters the baby boy.
Gaily sings robin in the tree above us,
The mother-rapture thrilling all her song;
And twittering answers from her two brown birdlings
Fill the soft air with music all day long.

Autumn has come, and crimson leaves are falling,
And golden leaves are flying here and there;
The cherry tree is stripped of half its beauty,
And stretches out its branches brown and bare.
Robin sits lonely 'mid the autumn splendor,
And in my heart echoes her plaintive moan.
This is the end of the sweet summer story;
Our nests are empty, and our birds have flown.

WEST OAKLAND, October 7, 1878.

E. M. D.

PONY GLASSES OF FRENCH BRANDY.

Heureux celui dont le cœur ne demande qu'un cœur, et qui ne désire ni parc à l'anglaise, ni opéra-siera, ni musique de Mozart, ni tableau de Raphaël, ni éclipse de lune, ni même un clair de lune, ni scènes de romans, ni même leur accomplissement.—Jean-Paul.

Il y a des affinités mystérieuses d'autant plus irrésistibles qu'elles sont inexplicables, qu'elles viennent des contrastes ou des similitudes. L'instinct a une lucidité supérieure au raisonnement. C'est d'ailleurs une question d'évidence mathématique; l'amour, comme les axiomes, ne se démontre pas.

Un homme de cinquante ans est plus redoutable à cet âge qu'à tout autre. C'est à cette époque de la vie qu'il use d'une expérience chèrement acquise et de la fortune qu'il doit avoir.—Balzac.

Peu de gens savent s'amuser. Quelques uns se disent: Je fais ceci ou cela, donc, je m'amuse. J'ai payé tant de pièces d'or, donc, je ressens tant de plaisir. Et ils usent leur vie sur cette meule.—A. de Musset.

Lorsqu'un amant donne, il demande, et beaucoup plus qu'il n'a donné.—Parny.

Un homme amoureux n'est plus un mortal ordinaire, c'est un homme inspiré. Dès que l'amour s'est emparé de lui, il ne reconnaît plus ni parents, ni amis, ni lois, ni magistrats, ni souverains; il n'estime et ne respecte rien; l'unique chose qu'il craigne, c'est de déplaire à ce qu'il aime.—Plutarque.

La jeunesse, cette fleur de notre triste et fugitive existence, se fane vite, et tandis que nous buvons, demandant des parfums, des couronnes, des jeunes filles, se glisse traitreusement jusqu'à nous la vieillesse.—Juvénal.

Plus inconstant que l'onde et le nuage,
Le temps s'effuit. Pourquoi le regretter?
Malgré sa pente volage
Qui le force à nous quitter,
En faire usage,
C'est l'arrêter.
Goûtons mille douceurs;
Si notre vie est un passage,
Sur ce passage, au moins, semons des fleurs.

Quand je pense qu'il y a des hommes assez hardis pour regarder une femme en face, pour l'aborder, pour lui serrer la main et pour lui dire sans mourir de frayer: Voulez-vous m'épouser? Je ne puis m'empêcher d'admirer jusqu'où va l'audace humaine.—Sthal.

Monsieur X., ayant lu la lettre de Saint Jérôme où il peint avec la plus grande énergie la violence de ses passions, disait: La force de ses tentations me fait plus d'envie que sa pénitence ne me fait peur.

On parlait dernièrement des femmes, en général, dans un cercle de Bohèmes, à San Francisco. —Il est certain que les femmes aiment le danger, dit un peintre bien connu de ce côté-ci du Pacifique. —C'est peut-être parce qu'elles se rappellent trop bien cette maxime de la Sainte-Ecriture: "Qui s'expose au danger périra," fit remarquer Monsieur de F. qui était présent.

On s'étonnait qu'une femme qui était rousse n'avait jamais failli à la vertu. Quelqu'un dit: Elle est comme Samson, sa force est dans ses cheveux.

Monsieur X. avait vécu quelque temps dans une ville de province, et à son retour, ses amis le plaignaient de la société qu'il avait eue. —C'est en quoi vous vous trompez, répondit-il, la bonne compagnie de cette ville y est comme partout, et la mauvaise y est excellente.

Il n'y a point de femmes laides . . . la nuit.

Ne pourrait-on pas découvrir le secret de se faire aimer de sa femme?—La Bruyère.

Aimer est un bonheur rare; s'il était commun, il vaudrait mieux être homme que Dieu.—Mme. de Staël.

Un homme allait depuis trente ans passer toutes ses soirées chez Madame de X. Il perdit sa femme; on crut qu'il épouserait l'autre et on l'y encourageait. Il refusa: —Je ne saurais plus, dit-il, où aller passer mes soirées.

Un banquier anglais fut accusé d'avoir fait une conspiration pour enlever le roi George III et le transporter à Philadelphie. Amené devant ses juges, il leur dit: Je sais très-bien ce qu'un roi peut faire d'un banquier, mais j'ignore ce qu'un banquier peut faire d'un roi.

L'homme qui entre dans le cabinet de toilette de sa femme est un philosophe ou un imbécile.—Balzac.

—Votre malade est mort, disait-on à un médecin qui l'avait soigné pendant longtemps. —Oui, répondit-il, mais il est mort guéri.

Quelqu'un disait d'un homme très-gros qu'il avait été créé et mis au monde pour faire voir jusqu'où peut aller la peau humaine.

Un lord anglais, étant gris, avait tué un garçon dans une auberge. L'aubergiste effrayé vint lui dire: Savez-vous, mylord, que vous avez tué le garçon? —Mettez-le sur la carte, répondit-il.

Qui se ressemble se devine, se trouve et s'assemble.

Une cour sans femmes, disait François I., c'est une année sans printemps, un printemps sans fleurs, une fleur sans fum.

October 5, 1878.

L. G. L.

BONBONS.—FRENCH AND OTHERWISE.

It's not tea, but its nice—Coffee.

A famous Irishman writes to a friend: "At this moment I am writing with a sword in one hand and a pistol in the other."

Penalties—The penalty of popularity is envy. The penalty of a baby is sleepless nights. The penalty of marrying is a mother-in-law. The penalty of a pretty cook is an empty larder. The penalty of a legacy, or a fortune, is the sudden discovery of a host of poor relations you never dreamed of, and of a number of debts you had quite forgotten.

"Sweets to the sweet," says a young man on passing the syrup to a young lady seated at a hotel table.

"And beets to the beet," remarks the lady, shoving a dish of that vegetable toward the young man. For some reason the observation casts a settled gloom over a countenance just before radiant with smiles.

A poor little boy, without any jacket on, but with a broad patch on the after-deck of his pantaloons, is passing along a street, when a bold, bad man hails him and says:

"Say, sonny, why's your breeches like a paid bill?" The little innocent only says in reply: "What yer givin' us, taffy?" But the man says it isn't taffy, but only a conundrum: and the answer is, that the reason why the breeches are like a paid bill is because they had been resealed. Smart man: embarrassed boy.

An old lady misses two pounds of fresh butter, and accuses her maid of having stolen it.

The maid, however, not only denies the accusation, but fastens the theft upon the cat: averring, moreover, that she caught the cat in the act of finishing the last morsel.

The wily old dame immediately puts the kitten into the scales, and finds it to weigh but a pound and a half.

This mode of accurate reasoning being quite conclusive, the girl confesses her crime.

Merry college jest:

"Your professor has given you some elementary instruction as to bodies?"

"Yes, sir."

"Very well. What is a transparent body?"

(Silence that would reflect no discredit upon a Trappist or a deaf-mute.)

"Well, what is a transparent body? Don't you know?"

"Of course I do; I recollect the words in the book. A transparent—body—is—is—"

"It's a body through which you can see light. Now give me an example of a transparent body?"

"A lock."

"A lock?"

"Yes, sir; you can see light through the key-hole."

Severe Examiner—What is a mountain?

First Student—An elevation of ground.

S. E.—Well, what do two mountains form?

F. S.—The beginning of a chain of mountains.

S. E.—They don't; they form a valley. You can stand down. Your ignorance would make an idiot blush.

(To Second Student—What is a mountain?)

S. S.—An elevation of ground.

S. E.—Well, what do two mountains make?

S. S.—A valley.

S. E.—No, they don't; they form the beginning of a chain of mountains. You are a goose of the first water. (Plucks both.)

The defendant, having been proved guilty of the offense of calling the complainant opprobrious names, as "thief," "robber," etc., is duly fined. He pays the fine, and asks the Judge:

"Your Honor, there is, I understand, a law against calling an honest man a thief: does the law forbid a man to call a thief an honest man?"

"Of course not," replies the magistrate.

"Then, sir," says the defendant, turning to his prosecutor, with a triumphant air, "you are the most honest man I ever met."

Swiss conscript to his superior officer.—Hi, Cap, I say; gimme a light for my pipe.

Captain.—Here's a match; but let me remind you, my gentle youth, that if you were in the Prussian army you wouldn't be allowed to address a Captain in that manner. Not if Von Moltke knows himself.

Conscript.—You're talking; but and the free-born spirit of William Tell flashed in his eyes if we were in the Prussian army you wouldn't be a Captain.

Jeannette.—Ma, are you going to give me another piece of pie?

Ma.—What do you want to know for?

Jeannette.—Because if you ain't I want to eat this piece slowly.

A danceress celebrated of the cancan, on return from the Garden Mabile, meets one of her female companions.

"Well, are you satisfied? Was there a good attendance to-night?"

"O, do not speak to me thereof, my dear," replied the artist; "I am altogether disgusted. Imagine you that the place was literally jammed with economical clergymen."

An old maid has a cat and a canary. The cat dies first. She has him stuffed, and places him in the cage of the canary, saying: "I have put the dear creature where he always desired to be."

The good Dr. N., visiting an actress patient, surprises her fifteen-year-old daughter so intently absorbed in her book that she does not notice his presence.

"My pretty child," says he, "what is't you read, romance or fairy fable, that you are so deeply interested in it?"

"Nothing," says the dear child; "only the book you said I wasn't to read."

THE LATEST MAGAZINE VERSES.

The Invisible Land.

There was a land that lay beyond my sight,
For which I vainly searched the great earth through.
Thither, right often, my companions flew
At day-break, or at noon-tide, or at night,
And never came again. I took my flight,
Explored all portions of the globe, yet grew
No nearer where that mighty retinue
Had fled into the stately fields of light.

But once, when evening her dusk sails had spread,
And I was sleeping, a swift dream came o'er
My spirit; and in it I, rising, said:
"Now is the country mine, long sought before!"
And one I heard lament that I was dead;
And lo! the land stretched just beside my door!
Andrew R. Saxton, in Scribner's.

Silver Buttons.

When I was half asleep, and wholly dreaming,
Out in the maple grove the other day,
A woman and a swift horse passed me, riding
Far down the hill-side in a splendid way.

Oh, there was something very bright about her;
She went so swiftly that I do not know
What all that brightness was, but stars and sunshine
Gleamed down the shady road I saw her go.

She was no angel riding down from heaven,
For she had on a very mundane dress;
All adown it two long rows of buttons
Threw the light of heaven-like worldliness.

All of the scene that I can well remember
Is the swift grace with which she dashed along,
And the two twinkling rows of starry buttons.
What matter, then, is this to make a song?

But it has done it. As the vision vanished
My heart set up a song. Oh, how it sings
Of stars and brightness! And her dashing motion
Gave me the time in which the music rings.

Those buttons! oh, those buttons! Why she wore them
I can not think. Were they for use or show?
And why should I persist in thinking of them?
These all are mysteries I can not know.

Those buttons! oh, 'twas vanity to wear them.
I've learned she sat up late to sew them strong.
Then slept to dream of me, and slyly saw me
The while she rode so loftily along.

'Twas folly I beheld, and now I know it,
I long the more to see the sight again.
She thought of me while setting all those buttons—
Of me alone in this great world of men.
Elizabeth H. Fenn, in Atlantic.

Concealment.

When I beheld some mighty, listening throng,
I marvel, while their faces gleam toward mine.
At the large hope, despair, faith, sorrow, and wrong
That slumber in their midst, and make no sign!

So, when I watch night's thick-starred gulfs profound,
I wonder at all the calmness they reveal,
Though filled with infinite motion and wild sound
From myriads of vast spheres that grandly wheel!
Edgar Fawcett, in Appleton's.

Meeting.—From the Spanish.

Many years have floated by Since we parted, she and I.
Now together here we stand,
Eye to eye, and hand to hand.

I can hear her trembling sighs,
See the sweetness in her eyes.
Silently I hold and press
Her soft hand with tenderness.

Silence, who shall fathom thee?
Who reveal the mystery
Hidden between loving eyes,
Burning hands, and answering sighs.
Harper's Magazine.

Apothegms.—From the Turkish.

AN ANCIENT TREE.

Mock not the fruit-tree's wrinkled face,
Its knotty boughs, its want of grace;
For underneath no barren tree
Could you so many missiles see.

BITTER WORDS.

The knife's sharp cut can be endured—
Its ugly gash by time is cured;
But bitter words, when they o'erflow,
Inflict a deep, unhealing blow.

THE RIGHT ROAD.

How easy 'tis for some to say,
"Your route is wrong, that's not the way!"
For when the carriage breaks, all know
Which road the driver ought to go.

DEATH.

Death is the dark, grim guest
Who slights not rich or poor—
The coal-black camel's form
Which kneels at every door.
Joel Benton, in Appleton's.

A Desire.

Let me not lay the lightest feather's weight
Of duty upon love. Let not, my own,
The breath of one reluctant kiss be blown
Between our hearts. I would not be the gate
That bars, like some inexorable fate
The portals of thy life; that says, "Alone
Through me shall any joy to thee be known!"
Rather the window, fragrant early and late
With thy sweet, clinging thoughts, that grow and twine
Around me, like some bright and blooming vine:
Through which the sun shall shed his wealth on thee
In golden showers; through which thou may'st look out,
Exulting in all beauty, without doubt,
Or fear, or shadow of regret from me.
Susan M. Spalding, in Scribner.

EMBALMED IN SENTIMENT.

The New York World tells the tale of how an undertaker doing business in a Pennsylvania town has discovered a neat way of embalming the dead, whereby he can preserve a "life-like appearance" in his subject for three weeks, by combining four drugs, and applying them to the cuticle so as to "marbleize it." To prove the efficacy of his process, he is at present exhibiting a departed husband "of full habit and addicted to drink," who in the sublime stillness of death is accompanied by his widow, who testifies to her complete satisfaction with what the undertaker has done for her spouse, and stifles her sobs long enough to point to the corpse and show how carefully and beautifully it is preserved. It may be doubted whether ever before has there been seen so beautiful an example at once of wifely devotion and pride as this, for the notion is to be scouted that the lady has any business end in view dependent upon the successful introduction of the new embalming process. Like the ancient Egyptians, she must take a solemn pleasure in the presence of an embalmed friend, but added to this there must be a sort of pride in exhibiting him publicly as one who, of however full a habit he may have been, and however addicted to drink, was her own true love, and would remain with her even after he had lost all enjoyment of her society. As a curiosity such a man is certainly well worth seeing and showing. His devotion rises far above the common capabilities of the flesh, and is worthy of being embalmed in noble verse as well as in a marble cuticle. The mind is loth to believe that any motive less admirable than a laudable pride in a husband so excellent as this could induce any woman to suffer her departed lord to be exhibited publicly. Wishing to show him as an example of fidelity to his family, the lady probably took advantage of the presence of a man with a patent process of preservation, who, while furthering his own unsentimental purposes, would bring into prominence the virtues of a truly noble though now helpless man. Thus sometimes does simple selfishness become the servant of that which is more exalted. And yet it is possible to take another view of the case. Gentlemen of full habit who are addicted to drink are apt at times to make their homes the scene of revelry and mirth which they alone can appreciate. Their jests, their quips and quiddets, in the nature of tables overturned and chairs put to uses for which they were never designed, are far from pleasing to their families; and their wives, though loving them entirely, long at times to see them in a complete state of reasonable quietude which shall endure for an appreciable period. They wish that their husbands could be induced to follow wifely advice—to depart when they bid them and to come at their call. In the natural state of such men implicit obedience is impracticable; and, seeing that it is so, it is no wonder that it should become a settled purpose, or even a mania, on the part of some peculiar women, to have some time when her refractory lord must and shall act precisely as she wishes him to. Likely enough this particular woman has often asked her husband to go with her from Stroudsburg to Philadelphia, and the train started out, but, by the time she had gone a short distance, the wife found that her perfidious and full-habited lord suddenly vanished from her sight at the Delaware Water Gap. There was such a monotony about these occurrences that, when the time came and it was possible for her to lead him to the great city without danger of his escape, she naturally took solid satisfaction in seeing him alight there in a balmy condition and ready to follow her about town whithersoever she would go. Doubtless it was some such feeling as this that led the ancients to place their mothers-in-law in cases, and shift them about from corner to corner and from pillar to post, feeling all the while a joy unspeakable because it was impossible for their old tormentors to raise the slightest objection.

The Rev. J. S. Furnis, an English clergyman, has written an interesting and graphic description of hell, "for the instruction of the young." Hell, he says, is situated four thousand miles from here, at the middle of the earth, and is tenanted by millions and millions of tormented creatures, mad with fury, who dwell in the midst of screams, groans, yells, cries, shouts, shrieks, roarings, hissings, howlings, wailings, fearful blasphemies and thunder, not to mention the sound of "oceans of tears running down from millions of eyes with a great splash upon the floors of hell." The Rev. Mr. Furnis then says: "The roof is red-hot, the walls are red-hot, the floor is like a thick sheet of red-hot iron. See, on the middle of that red-hot iron floor stands a girl. She looks to be about sixteen years of age. She has neither shoes nor stockings on her feet. The door of this room has never been opened since she first set her feet on this red-hot floor. Now she sees the door opening. She rushes forward. She has gone down on her knees upon the red-hot floor. Listen—she speaks. She says: 'I have been standing with my bare feet on this red-hot floor for years. Day and night my only standing-place has been upon this red-hot floor. Sleep never came on me for a moment, that I might forget this horrible burning floor. Look at my burned and bleeding feet. Let me go off this burning floor for one moment—only for a short moment. Oh, that in this endless eternity of years I might forget the pain only for one single moment!' The devil answers her question: 'Do you ask for a moment—for one moment to forget your pain? No, not for one single moment during the never-ending eternity of years shall you ever leave this red-hot floor.'"

Last month a Turk, Fein Pasha, Governor of Banjaluka, with twelve wives, children, and a guard of eunuchs, arrived in Vienna and took lodgings at the Hotel Daniel. Three wives were put in a room, with a guard of two eunuchs at each door. It took a whole day to complete the registration of the party at police headquarters. The most of the wives were real beauties, wearing their raven black hair closely cut and dyeing their finger-nails. Under the Austrian law these ladies were entitled to their personal freedom, and the German reporter naively says, "If they only knew it." Each eunuch carried a gun on one arm and a baby on the other.

Whole years of joy glide, unperceived, away, while sorrow counts the minutes as they pass.—Harvard.

Virtue requires no other recompense than the tribute of self-approbation and respect.—Cicero.

CONFIDENTIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

Walker, Jr., Addresses that Uncle of Mine.

PHOENIX CLUE, San Francisco, Oct. 9, 1878.

MY DEAR UNCLE:—You are now somewhat old, and I observe with regret that the locks of which, fifteen or twenty years ago, you were justly proud, have almost entirely disappeared. Indeed, I have watched them from time to time being roughly removed from the hair brush and irreverently swept into the dust-bin by the Chinaman whom, in spite of Kearney, you insist upon retaining. It is now quite five years since my arrival at an age when the law recognized my liability to jury duty, and my privileges as an American citizen enabled me to relieve you of the charge of my affairs, which, on the death of my revered father, fell into your hands. That I address these letters to you is an evidence that I am not ungrateful for the kindly interest with which you watched over my tender minority, and if from them you may gather any advice of value to you, any hints that may tend to smooth your pathway to the grave, I shall feel that I have not vainly undertaken what is the obvious duty of an affectionate nephew. I can not forget that, when my young mind was but opening, you stored it with wise saws and modern instances, and the reflections, which from time to time will crop up as I write, you will find are but the experiences and observations inculcated upon me by you, developed by the change in conditions and the progress of human life to a point where they may be as useful to you at your years as they were to me in an earlier stage. The practical knowledge of the world which made you such an able mentor when I was most in need of one, has enabled me to reach my present age without having committed any grave or irreparable mistakes, and now, having benefited by that knowledge to keep up with an era of unusually rapid development, I feel proud that I am able to put down on paper for your guidance, certain rules, hints, and regulations, which will enable you to find your way out of the world without compromising your family or your name by senile foolishness. My dear uncle, I need scarcely point out to you that things were very different in your younger days, and up to the time when you became ill-fitted to cope with the rush and racket of life, progress was slow. That, with deadened facilities, in increasing years, you should now find many pitfalls and snares which you did not expect, and of which you were entirely ignorant, is not to be wondered at. Old men are obstinate and cling to old theories and old notions, even in spite of stubborn facts. In every department of his existence the same obstinacy prevails, and I may tell you now, my dear uncle, looking back at some disputes which we have had on various subjects, that more harm comes to young men from the inability of their parents and guardians to recognize the changes in a progressive society, than from the inherent tendency of youth to oppose the strict discipline and authority of age. It may be painful to contemplate, and I feel for one whose sage advice I have so often followed, but it is a certain fact that the world has gone beyond you. This is an age of unexampled rapidity of thought and action, and let me assure you that it is only with an effort that even I, young and strong, and in the full flush of bodily and mental health, can keep pace with its mad haste. In order that you may not be altogether exposed to the dangers that beset men whose associations and ideas are entirely in the past, that, dragging behind in the human procession, you may yet be prepared for the obstructions which I have met and overcome, I pen these letters, trusting to find my account in your gratitude for much anxiety spared, and many discomforts avoided. And first, I would take exception to your associates and constant companions. When I heard that the investment I made for you in Sierra Nevada had been so wonderfully fortunate, I congratulated myself that the honor and respectability of our family were about to take on fresh lustre, and that your wealth would make you a fit coadjutor in my ambitious designs. But on my return from the Exposition, I am deeply affected to find you hand and glove with brokers of the Big Board, Supervisors, Judges, and other officials, whose familiarities are the first things to be avoided. You frequent the saloons between the acts of the speculative drama; you are visible hobnobbing with well known politicians who fill up the time between elections in using their influence with possible candidates, to be carried in mining stocks; you accept cigars from men whose salary of a few dollars a month in official positions enables them to live a fast life, spend a moderate fortune, and lose thousands of dollars on blocks of wildcat securities; you are familiar with men whose knowledge of the law is only useful to them in so far as it enables them to break it with impunity; you visit free-lunch counters with men who indorse and disseminate communistic doctrines, that, when the inevitable absolute reign of ignorance and unscrupulous blackguardism shall begin, they may float on its highest wave, notorious at last, if even only for a moment; you seek the companionship of those whose money comes out of the pockets of the poor, the deposits of savings banks, the purses of women and children. My dear uncle, what can have made you change since you first took me in hand and educated me? You will say, doubtless, that you only know those gentlemen (!) who are known in society. You will say that your most intimate friend is Mr. —, a magnate whose wealth is enormous, who maintains one of the finest establishments in town, whose mansion is filled with rank, and elegance, and fashion, whose wife is a leader of the ton, and with whose charming daughter I am proud to be seen. This is precisely an example of the mistakes you make through your adherence to your old-fashioned principles, and your inability to grasp the difference in the condition of things in this society from that in the old established communities with which you are acquainted. The pioneers who came to California in 1849 did not come to lay the basis of a fashionable and refined society; they came to gather gold. They were not "society" men, and with the rapid change from poverty to wealth they carried all their faults and all their vices. Where you and I were born a man was known by the company he kept, and, apart from his circumstances, was respected or despised according to the status he held in society. It was not possible to move in two classes of the community at once, and the man who elected to visit the pot-house had to find his friends among the sawdust. The principle remains, in a measure, the same, but the company has changed somewhat, and the question is further complicated by the admission of another discordant element. The standing of the parent in old times and in old communities was the standing of the family. The parents and children were of one caste, and to be always in the good graces of the father was not only a passport to the good will of the mother, but often to the affections of the favorite daughter as well. Here it is widely different, and as I am making efforts, which I may say are not altogether hopeless, to make Miss — my wife, I have to request that you will not mention me in public in any connection with her father. Her mother is my friend, and between Miss — and myself a perfect understanding exists, based on a mutual liking, which has no interest for the old gentleman. I should be sorry indeed if it were known that I was in any sense a friend of his, because I am sure that any friendship with him would be a drawback to my progress with his daughter or his wife. He is so seldom at home, and he really knows so little of his family affairs, that I doubt if he is aware that I am received by Mrs. —, or even acquainted with his daughter. I am cognizant of the fact that he signs the checks which are required to sustain the social standing of his family; but I have a shrewd suspicion that in consideration of his asking no questions, the details of his private life are permitted to interest the members of his household less than they do the outside public. Mr. —, my dear uncle, and his wife and daughter, form two parties, and work quite independently of one another. In the brilliant circle, of which I am accounted a member, which surrounds this estimable lady, the name of the male head of the family is rarely mentioned, and although he often gives the assembly the honor of his presence, he and his especial friends are not missed when they retire from the festivities. In tender moments, when the moonlight has thrown our shadows, close together, on the veranda wall, I have heard vague hints of unhappiness from the young lady. Not without considerable apparent pain has the fair girl frequently withdrawn her lips from mine to drop some allusions to family difficulties, and so far as I have been able to guess, there is some syren whose attraction for the father is not relished by the mother or daughter. Indeed, judging from those little straws which blow about the home circle, I am inclined to put down the old gentleman's magnetic variations from the marriage pole at quite forty-five degrees. You will understand from these remarks that I am opposed to your intimacy with Mr. —. I have reason to know that your relations to him have already tended to lower me in the eyes of the fair girl, whose virgin heart is mine, and whom I hope to espouse before a break in the stock market deprives her mother of the opportunity of obtaining from her father a worthy dot for her. But for my own attractive qualities I doubt if the young lady would accept the affectionate attentions which her father's absence and her mother's favor enable me to shower uninterruptedly upon her. Your fortune, my dear uncle, is not a large one, and, if for no other reason than that, I should counsel you to avoid Mr. —. That gentleman has been accustomed to deal with female human nature for many years, and is likely to have many acquaintance of limited accomplishment and expensive tastes. It is only lately that you have been wealthy enough to enjoy the society of widows of refined intellect, whose distressful misfortunes have induced them to seek soothing consolation from gentlemen of means; of pining wives, whose husbands return at inopportune moments and demand satisfaction for their injured honor; of young ladies, whose love of ease and luxury is stronger than their virtue; and of strictly moral women, who erect between their morality and sin a thin wall of conscience, which succumbs judiciously to a battering ram of gold. And then your vanity is in danger. Your worthy friend gauges his flatterers exactly, and is not deceived. You are easily misled by a show of tenderness, and will be duped. If, at your age, vanity is not completely subdued, it is weak in the extreme. Old structures are always feeble; and it is better for a man to do as I have done, let such conceit fall and be swept away with the debris of all other forms of youthful vanity, than to prop it up, to come down in old age when the ruins must encumber the happiness and comfort of his declining years. To this subject I may refer at greater length at some future time. In the meantime I close this letter. There are many points in your general conduct which appear to me calculated to affect adversely both your present and your future welfare; and I can not allow you to go blindfold to ruin after a life which has been, so far as I know, comparatively free from vice. I may next touch upon the general standing of the theatrical profession, toward which you have of late been much attracted; and I mean to offer you the benefit of my experience. I sincerely hope it may be of as much value to you now, as yours was to me when I was young. For the present, believe me,

Your affectionate nephew,
WALKER, JUNIOR.

A dispatch from Calcutta quotes the passionate words of the Ameer of Afghanistan, uttered some time ago before his Court, as proof of the hostility to the British which exists in Cabul. "I have seven crores of rupees by me," says the Ameer, "every rupee of which I will hurl at the British Government, and I will roll the border tribes against them like blasts of fire."

One hour of justice is worth seventy years of prayer.

PROVERBIAL PHILOSOPHY.

Nothing is beneath you if it is within your clutch.

When you take your day off be sure and bring it back again.

Raise no more spirits than you can conjure down, say at four swallows.

What cannot be cured must be endured, but first try Condition Powders.

What we know respecting ourselves increases our contempt for others.

The most powerful man in this country carries a horse scar on his cheek.

Dogs do not snore, but do not fool around a dog long enough to find out.

When asked if you would like to be lynched reply "No, I'll be hanged if I would."

Rather go to bed supperless than rise in debt, now that the bankrupt law has expired.

Who hath a cold hath sorrow to his sops, especially if his handkerchief hath starch in it.

Trust not a horse's heels nor a dog's tooth, neither a man who says he'll pay you Saturday.

When war begins hell's gates are set open, and it is the same when Congress reassembles.

Read carefully the label on the bottle of chill remedy requesting you to shake well before using.

Character is the result of a lifetime; but a single silly act will often win you a reputation, you bet.

A wise man reflects before he speaks; a fool speaks, and then reflects while his eye is getting well.

The man who says yes to everything you say is the hardest kind of a man to borrow ten dollars of.

A short horse is soon carried, but a mule, short or long, will kick you into the middle of next week.

That which is mine is all my own; that which is yours I go halves in. I will also take up a collection.

It is darkest just before day, but that unfortunately is the very time when a chicken is the widest awake.

There are four roads leading to hell, and Bob Ingersoll is opening another. It will be called Fifth Avenue.

The wolves eat the poor ass that hath many owners, but not until he gets the rheumatism in his hind legs.

Immediately after every hard wind farmers come into town with choice lots of fresh, hand-picked apples.

Remember that you can have everything you want, but be careful and don't want any thing you can't have.

The meeting of a man and a lion is majestic. The man runs off with all his might, the lion with all his mane.

Don't despise your poor relations. They may get rich some time and then it will be so hard to explain things.

The world looks different to a man when he has three inches of rum in him, and he looks different to the world.

Who wants to beat a dog soon finds a stick, but already has the dog shot around the next corner yelling "Ki ki!"

The fool never thinks higher than the top of his house, and penneth the festive joke at the expense of the lightning-rod agent.

There is nothing in the world a man resents so quickly and so deeply, as to find you awfully busy when he is perfectly at leisure.

The wind expended in a single political speech by some orators would furnish the motive power to keep a baby crying for a whole year.

The second meal makes the glutton, the second ill word makes the quarrel, and the seconds load the pistols with blank cartridges.

When you are taken from jail and hanged for some slight misdemeanor, there may be some doubt of your guilt, but none of your death.

The best books for us are not always those which the wise recommend, but those brought around by the fellow with a pile on his nose.

Many who find the day too long think life too short; but, short as life is, some find it long enough to outlive their characters, their constitutions, and their estates.

The woman who refuses an offer of marriage should always do it by postal-card. By this means she secures several hours to say her prayers before being murdered.

The number of fools is to the number of wise men as the number of times one gets nothing for something is to the number of times one gets something for nothing.

The fiddler of the same town never plays well at their feasts, because he is too full to distinguish between the "Arkansas Traveler" and the "Dead March in Saul."

Touching and beautiful superstitions prevail among Indian tribes, and one of them is that the scalp of a white man makes a better show on the wigwam wall than an oil painting.

When you want an unreasonable man to go ahead, he will hold back; and when you want him to hold back, he will pull you with all his might. With such men just reverse the engine.

A piece of pasteboard with a verse on it, given as a reward of merit in a Sabbath School, has not half the charm for the boy as the same size piece of pasteboard with the simple talismanic words, "admit one."

Man must not expect to jump into fame all of a sudden. He must either climb the ladder slowly or else marry a woman who will make him famous by eloping with a negro, a Chinaman, or a bald-headed widower.

When the Sunday-school superintendent tells us that some of us are liable to be taken away during the week, there is not a dry eye till the sexton is seen dragging out a fellow-pupil for putting cayenne pepper on the stove.

There are no circumstances under which honesty and integrity of purpose will not stand a man in good stead; but how will it help the man who finds himself suddenly to associate with a bulldog in an orchard with a around it.

"A TOURIST FROM INJIANNY."

The Story as Told by Bret Harte.

We first saw him from the deck of the Usser Fritz, as that gallant steamer was preparing to leave the port of New York for Plymouth, Havre, and Hamburg. Perhaps it was that all objects at that moment became indelibly impressed on the memory of the departing voyager; perhaps it was that mere interrupting trivialities always assume undue magnitude to us when we are waiting for something really important; but I retain a vivid impression of him as he appeared on the gangway in apparently hopeless, yet, as it afterward appeared, really triumphant altercation with the German-speaking deck-hands and stewards. He was not a heroic figure. Clad in a worn linen duster, his arms filled with bags and parcels, he might have been taken for a huckster carrying the luggage of his fare. But it was noticeable that although he calmly persisted in speaking English and ignoring the voluble German of his antagonists, he, in some rude fashion, accomplished his object without losing his temper or increasing his temperature, while his foreign enemy was crimson with rage and perspiring with heat, and that presently, having violated a dozen of the ship's regulations, he took his place by the side of a very pretty girl, apparently his superior in station, who addressed him as "father." As the great ship swung out into the stream he was still a central figure on our deck, getting into everybody's way, addressing all with equal familiarity, imperturbable to affront or snub, but always doggedly and consistently adhering to one purpose, however trivial or inadequate to the means employed. "You're sittin' on suthin' o' mine, Miss," he began for the third or fourth time to the elegant Miss Montmorris, who was revisiting Europe under high social conditions. "Jist rise up while I get it—twon't take a minit." Not only was that lady forced to rise, but to make necessary the rising and discomposing of the whole Montmorris party who were congregated around her. The missing "suthin'" was discovered to be a very old and battered newspaper. "It's the Cincinnati Times," he explained, as he quietly took it up, oblivious to the indignant glances of the party. "It's a little squashed by your sittin' on it, but it'll do to re-fer to. It's got a letter from Payris, showin' the prices o' them thar hotels and rist'rants, and I allowed to my darter we might want it on the other side."

When we were fairly at sea he was missed. A pleasing belief that he had fallen overboard, or had been left behind, was dissipated by his appearance one morning, with his daughter on one arm, and the elderly female before referred to on the other. The Usser Fritz was rolling heavily at the time, but with his usual awkward pertinacity he insisted upon attempting to walk toward the best part of the deck, as he always did, as if it were a right and a duty. A lurch brought him and his uncertain freight in contact with the Montmorrises, there was a moment of wild confusion, two or three seats were emptied, and he was finally led away by the steward, an obviously and obtrusively sick man.

A few days later it was discovered that he was not an inmate of the first, but of the second cabin; that the elderly female was not his wife, as popularly supposed, but the roommate of his daughter in the first cabin. These facts made his various intrusions on the saloon deck the more exasperating to the Montmorrises, yet the more difficult to deal with. Eventually, however, he had, as usual, his own way; no place was sacred, or debared his slouched hat and duster. They were turned out of the engine-room, to reappear upon the bridge; they were forbidden the fore-castle, to rise a ghostly presence beside the officer in his solemn supervision of the compass. They would have been lashed to the rigging on their way to the maintop, but for the silent protest of his daughter's presence on the deck. Most of his conversation was addressed to the interdicted "man at the wheel."

Hitherto I had contented myself with the fascination of his presence from afar, wisely, perhaps, deeming it dangerous to a true picturesque perspective to alter my distance; and perhaps, like the best of us, I fear, preferring to keep my own idea of him rather than to run the risk of altering it by a closer acquaintance. But one day, when I was lounging by the stern rail, idly watching the dogged ostentation of the screw, that had been steadily intimating, after the fashion of screws, that it was the only thing in the ship with a persistent purpose, the ominous shadow of the slouched hat and the trailing duster fell upon me. There was nothing to do but accept it meekly. Indeed my theory of the man made me helpless.

"I didn't know till yesterday who you be," he began, deliberately, "or I shouldn't hev' been so onsocial. But I've always told my darter that in permiskiss travlin' a man oughter be kearful of who he meets. I've read some of your writins—read 'em in a paper in Injianny—but I never reckoned I'd meet ye. Things is queer, and travlin' brings all sorter people together. My darter Loozee suspected ye from the first, and she worried over it, and put me up to this."

The most delicate flattery could not have done more. To have been in the thought of this reserved, gentle girl, who scarcely seemed to notice even those who had paid her attention, was—

"She put me up to it," he continued, calmly; "though she, herself, hez a kind o' prejudice again you and your writins—thinkin' them sort o' low down, and the folks talked about not in her style—and ye know that's woman's nater; and she and Miss Montmorris agree on that point. But thar's a few friends with me round yer ez would like to see ye." He stepped aside, and a dozen men appeared in Indian file from behind the roundhouse, and, with a solemnity known only to the Anglo-Saxon nature, shook my hand deliberately, and then dispersed themselves in various serious attitudes against the railings. They were honest, well-meaning countrymen of mine, but I could not recall a single face.

There was a dead silence. The screw, however, ostentatiously went on: "You see what I told you," it said; "this is all rapidity and trifling. I'm the only fellow here with a purpose. Whiz, whiz, whiz; chug, chug, chug!"

I was about to make some remark of a general nature, when I was greatly relieved to observe my companion's friends detach themselves from the railings, and, with a slight bow and another shake of the hand, severally retire, apparently as much relieved as myself. My companion, who had in the meantime acted as if he had discharged himself of a duty, said: "Thar ollers must be some one to tend to this kind o' thing, or thar's no sociableness. I took a deppytation into the Cap'n's room yesterday to make some proppysitions, and thar's a minister of the gospel aboard as ought to be spoke to afore next Sunday, and I reckon it's my dooty, onless," he added, with deliberate and formal politeness, "you'd prefer to do it, bein', so to speak, a public man."

But the public man deprecated any interference with the speaker's functions, and, to change the conversation, remarked that he heard that there was a party of Cook's tourists on board, and—were not the preceding gentlemen of the number? But the question caused the speaker to lay aside his hat, take a comfortable position on the deck, against the rail, and drawing his knees up under his chin, to begin as follows:

"Speaking o' Cook and Cook's tourists, I'm my own Cook. I reckon I kalkilate and know every cent I'll spend twixt Evansville, Injianny, and Rome and Naples, and every thing I'll see." He paused a moment, and laying his hand familiarly on my knee, said: "Did I ever tell ye how I kem to go abroad?"

As we had never spoken together before, it was safe to reply that he had not. He rubbed his head softly with his hand, knitted his iron-gray brows, and then said meditatively: "No, it must hev been that bed waiter. He sorter favors you in the musstache and gen'ral get up. I guess it was him I spoke to."

I thought it must have been.

"Well, then, this is the way it kem about: I was sittin' one night, about three months ago with my darter Loozee—my wife bein' dead some four year—and I was reading to her out of the paper about the Exposition. She sez to me, quiet like—she's a quiet sort o' gal, if you ever notissed her—'I should like to go thar.' I looks at her—it was the first time sense her mother died that that gal had ever asked for any thing, or had, so to speak, a wish. It wasn't her way. She took everything ez it kem, and durn my skin ef I ever could tell whether she ever wanted it to kem in any other way. I never told ye this afore, did I?"

"No," I said hastily, "go on."

He felt of his knees for a moment, and then drew a long breath. "Perhaps," he began deliberately, "ye don't know that I'm a poor man. Seein' me here among these rich folks, goin' abroad to Parze with the best o' them, and Loozee thar—in the first cabin—a lady, ez she is—ye wouldn't bleeve it, but I'm poor! I am. Well, sir, when that gal looks at me and sez that—I hadn't but twelve dollars in my pocket, and I ain't the durned fool that I look—but suthin' in me—suthin', you know, away back in me—sez you shall! Loo-ey, you shall! And then I sez—repeatin' it, and looking up right in her eyes—'You shall go, Loo-ey'—did you ever look in my gal's eyes?"

I parried that somewhat direct question by another: "But the twelve dollars, how did you increase that?"

"I raised it to two hundred and fifty dollars. I got odd jobs o' work here and there, over-time—I'm a machinist. I used to keep this yer over-work from Loo, saying I had to see men in the evenin' to get pints about Europe; and that, and getting a little money raised on my life insurance, I shoved her through. And here we is, chipper and first class all through—that is, Loo is!"

"But two hundred and fifty dollars! And Rome and Naples, and return? You can't do it."

He looked at me cunningly a moment. "Kan't do it? I've done it."

"Done it?"

"Wall, about the same I reckon, I've figgered it out. Figgers don't lie. I ain't no Cook's tourist; I kin see Cook and give him pints. I tell you I've figgered it out to a cent, and I've money to spare. Of course I don't reckon to travel with Loo. She'll go first class. But I'll be near her if it's in the steerage of a ship, or in the baggage car of a railroad. I don't need much in the way of grub or clothes, and now and then I kin pick up a job. Perhaps you disremember that row I had in the engine room, when they chucked me out?"

I could not help looking at him with astonishment; there was evidently only a pleasant memory in his mind. Yet I recalled that I felt indignant for him and his daughter.

"Well, that d—n fool of a Dutchman, that chief engineer, gave me a job the other day. And ef I hadn't jist forced my way down there and talked sassy at him, and criticised his machene, he'd hev never knowd I knowed a eccentric from a wagon wheel. Do you see the pint?"

I thought I began to see it. But I could not help asking what his daughter thought of traveling in this inferior way.

He laughed. "When I was gittin' up some pints from them books of travel, I read her a proverb or saying outer one o' them, that 'only princes and fools and Americans traveled first-class—and Amerikan gals being Princesses, didn't count. Don't you see?"

If I did not quite follow his logic, nor see my way clearly into his daughter's acquiescence through this speech, some light may be thrown upon it by his next utterance. I had risen with some vague words of congratulation on his success, and was about to leave him when he called me back.

"Did I tell ye," he said, cautiously looking around, yet with a smile of stifled enjoyment in his face, "did I tell ye what that gal—my darter—sed to me. No, I didn't tell ye—nor no one else afore. Come here!"

He made me draw down closely into the shadow and secrecy of the roundhouse.

"That night that I told my gal she should go abroad, I sez to her, quite chipper-like and free, 'I say, Looey, sez I, 'ye'll be goin' for to marry some o' them counts, or dukes, or potentates, I reckon, and ye'll leave the old man.' And she sez, sez she, looking me squar in the eye—did ye ever notiss that gal's eye?"

"She has fine eyes," I replied, cautiously.

"They is ez clean as a fresh milk pan, and ez bright. Nothing sticks to 'em. Eh?"

"You are right."

"Well, she looks up at me this way" [here he achieved a vile imitation of his daughter's modest glance, not at all like her] "and looking at me, she sez quietly: 'That's what I'm a goin' for, and to improve my mind.' He-be-he! To marry a nobleman, and improve her mind! Ha-ha-ha!"

The evident enjoyment that he took in this, and the quiet ignoring of anything of a moral quality in his daughter's sentiments, or in his thus confiding them to a stranger's ear, again upset all my theories. I may say here that it is one of the evidences of original character, that it is apt to baffle all prognosis from a mere observer's standpoint. But I recalled it some months after.

We parted in England. It is not necessary, in this brief chronicle, to repeat the various stories of "Uncle Joshua," as the younger and more frivolous of our passengers called him, nor that two-thirds of the stories repeated were utterly at variance with my estimate of the character of the man, although, I may add, that I was also doubtful of the accuracy of my own estimate. But one quality was always dominant—his restless, dogged pertinacity and calm imperturbability!

"He asked Miss Montmorris if she 'minded' singin' a little in the second cabin to liven it up, and added, as an inducement, that they didn't know good music from bad," said Jack Walker to me. "And when he mended the broken lock to my trunk, he absolutely propothed to me to atkh couthin' Grace if thee didn't want a 'kooier to travel with her to do mechanics,' provided thee would take charge of that dreadfully deaf-and-dumb daughter of his. Wothn't it funny? Really, he's one of your characters," said the youngest Miss Montmorris to me as we made our steamer adieus.

I am afraid he is not, although he was good enough afterward to establish one or two of my theories regarding him. I was enabled to assist him once in an altercation he had with a cabman regarding the fare of his daughter, the cabman retaining a distinct impression that the father had also ridden in some obscure way in or upon the same cab—as he undoubtedly had. I heard that he had forced his way into a certain great house in England, and that he was ignominiously rejected; but I also heard that ample apologies had been made to a certain quiet, modest daughter of his who was without on the lawn; and that also a certain Personage, whom I approach, even in this vague way, with a capital letter, had graciously taken a fancy to the poor child, and had invited her to a reception.

But this is only hearsay evidence. So also is the story which met me in Paris, that he had been up with his daughter in the captive balloon, and that at elevation of several thousand feet from the earth, he had made some remarks upon the attaching cable and the drum on which the cable revolved, which not only excited the interest of the passengers, but attracted the attention of the authorities; so that he was not only given a gratuitous ascent afterward, but was, I am told, offered a gratuity. But I shall restrict this narrative to the few facts of which I was personally cognizant in the career of this remarkable person.

I was at a certain entertainment given in Paris by the heirs, executors, and assignees of an admirable man, long since gathered to his fathers in Père le Chaise, but whose Shakspeare-like bust still looks calmly and benevolently down on the riotous revelry of absurd wickedness of which he was, when living, the patron saint. The entertainment was of such a character that, while the performers were chiefly women, a majority of the spectators were men. The few exceptions were foreigners, and among them I quickly recognized my fair fellow-countrywomen, the Montmorrises. "Don't thay that you've theen us here," said the youngest Miss Montmorris, "for ith only a lark. Ith awfully funny! And that friend of youth from Injianny ith here with hith daughter."

It did not take me long to find my friend Uncle Joshua's serious, practical, unsympathetic face in the front row of tables and benches. But beside him, to my utter consternation, was his shy and modest daughter. In another moment I was at his side. "I really think—I am afraid"—I began in a whisper, "that you have made a mistake. I don't think you know the character of this place. Your daughter—"

"Kem here with Miss Montmorris. She's yer. It's all right."

I was at my wit's end. Haply, at this moment, Mlle. Rochefort, from the Orangerie, skipped out in the quadrille immediately before us, caught her light skirts in either hand, and executed a pas that lifted the hat from the eyes of some of the front spectators, and pulled it down over the eyes of others. The Montmorrises fluttered away with a half-hysterical giggle and a half-confounded escort. The modest-looking Miss Loo, who had been staring at everything quite indifferently, suddenly stepped forward, took her father's arm, and said sharply, "Come."

At this moment a voice in English, but unmistakably belonging to the poliest nation in the world, rose from behind the girl, mimickingly: "My God! it is shocking. I bloosh! O dammit!"

In an instant he was in the hands of "Uncle Joshua," and forced back, clamoring, against the railing, his hat smashed over his foolish furious face, and half his shirt and cravat in the old man's strong grip. Several students rushed to the rescue of their compatriot, but one or two Englishmen, and half a dozen Americans had managed in some way to bound into the arena. I looked hurriedly for Miss Louisa, but she was gone. When we had extricated the old man from the melée, I asked him where she was.

"Oh, I reckon she's gone off with Sir Arthur. I saw him here jist as I pitched into that damned fool."

"Sir Arthur?" I asked.

"Yes, an acquaintance o' Loo's."

"She's in my carriage, just outside," interrupted a handsome young fellow, with the shoulders of a giant and the blushes of a girl. "It's all over now, you know. It was rather a foolish lark, you coming here with her without knowin'—you know—any thing about it, you know. But this way, thank you. She's waiting for you," and in another instant he and the old man had vanished.

Nor did I see him again until he stepped into the railway carriage with me on his way to Liverpool. "You see I'm traveling first-class now," he said, "but goin' home, I don't mind a trifle extry expense." "Then you've made your tour," I asked, "and are successful?" "Wall, yes, we saw Switzerland and Italy, and ef I hadn't been short o' time, we'd hev gone to Egypt. Mebbe next winter I'll run over again to see Loo, and do it." "Then your daughter does not return with you?" I continued, in some astonishment. "Wall, no—she's visitin' some of Sir Arthur's relatives in Kent. Sir Arthur is there—perhaps you recollect him?" He paused a moment, looked cautiously around, and with the same enjoyment he had shown on shipboard, said: "Do you remember the joke I told you on Loo, when she was at sea?"

"Yes."

"Well, don't ye say anything about it now. But dem my skin if it doesn't look like coming true."

And it did. —New York Sun.

TOLD IN LETTERS.

Domestic Fact and Fashionable Fancy.

This has been a week of "openings." First of all, there was the Taber gallery, in the new building corner of Montgomery and Market Streets, where we had a delightful time looking at the pictures, the elegant furnishings, the birds, and flowers, in the afternoon, and an even more charming hour after dark, when the brilliant gaslights brought out all the richness of coloring in everything, and excellent music and pleasant conversation made one forget how time was speeding on. I have always had a fancy I should like to fit up a studio just after my own notion—and this comes very near it. I suspect I know the reason why; there was a woman's hand—and a very artistic one—shaped pretty much everything there. Moreover, Mrs. Taber will—so her husband told me—be constantly associated with him in his business; and that will be a great inducement to many persons to visit this, the most perfect studio in the State. Please remember, too, that there is an elevator to save all uncomfortable steps; and when you come to town (which I begin to despair of your ever doing again) you must just take a peep, if no more. As to pictures, wait till you see Arthur's that is being done there, that's all; it was made instantaneously, by means of electricity. Samuels had his fall exposition of suits, cloaks, and bonnets on Wednesday, and showed some elegant styles. Among other things in the cloak line, were two especially handsome models from Pingat, both of mastic-colored cloth; one trimmed with bias folds of brown corded velvet down the sloping back and sleeves; the other with a rich mass of silk chain stitch embroidery, the pattern of which was closely followed, and filled in with cut moonlight beads, and finished with silk tassels. The border trimming was particularly noticeable, and consisted of a broad band composed of three narrow ones, each an inch in width, of a mossy, mixed brown plush, with an intermediate band of darker brown. This is something quite new, and as unique as it is novel. In shapes, we get nothing newer or handsomer than a modified Dolman, the first of the two I have mentioned being very much larger and looser-fitting than the second, but each being of the same general form. In fact, nothing can be much prettier than this favorite shape. The suits exhibited at Samuels' this week are still of the clinging character of the past year; and the draperies all lie low on the skirt, are loosely put on, and considerably trimmed. Some pretty styles in hats and bonnets are shown, the prevailing tendency being to the close, cottage shape; in which there are one or two felts, moderately trimmed with the very popular Alsatian bows of velvet; and others, notably one of black felt—a round hat with a single velvet bow fastened with a cut steel buckle, and an ostrich feather curling round the low, round crown. Altogether, while Paris has, so far, sent us nothing startlingly new, what we have is handsome and avoids unpleasant extremes. John thinks I have forgotten my promise of some weeks ago, to let him know somewhat of fashions masculine. Not so. I was merely waiting for Messrs. Burr & Fink to get settled in their new place, to get all the particulars of them, as indisputable authorities on the subject. They have an elegant suite of parlors now, opposite their old stand, on Montgomery and Market Streets, and, I think it safe to say, the largest and handsomest stock of goods in the city. Such cloths! I declare it made me almost wish that we women could have only those heavy, durable goods made into the simplicity of men's fashions, and the same minute attention to detail in the workmanship as you find in first-class tailoring work. The neatness of every stitch is really something wonderful. Always looking out for the points on the vexed "woman question," I asked Mr. Fink as to the desirability of women workers in his business, and his reply was that it is so seldom that one can be found who has the muscular strength to do the required pressing of heavy cloths, that they might as well be counted out of that field altogether as first-class hands. I was glad to find that we were not excluded on the ground of neatness, however. The most popular styles, I found, are the single breasted, three-button sack coats, for general wear. The rolling collar comes somewhat higher than formerly, and the skirt seems a trifle longer. Pantaloon, notwithstanding the great latitude taken by the many in the shape and size worn, to be the correct thing, should be loose fitting, perfectly straight, and cut square across the foot; no "spring," and not a suspicion of the old-time Bowery-boy Zouave cut. Cloths, it seemed to my somewhat inexperienced eye, were never handsomer or more varied in design, and made me silently wonder that one ever sees an unbecomingly dressed man on our streets, with such a variety to choose from. Those delicate pearl grays, with just a suspicion of a darker stripe, and the mastic-colored doeskin cloths that will last forever, and then dye, turn the other side out and cut over for one of the boys afterwards, are a match in elegance for the handsomest of our brocades and velvets, and are exceedingly fashionable for wedding suits, in conjunction with black broadcloth dress coats, one of the few English fashions I like, and a wonderful improvement on the all-black suits gentlemen used to wear on such occasions, when one could never tell the bridegroom from the head-waiter if they got mixed up. I mustn't forget an elegant bridal coat, just finished, I saw in the case. It was the handsomest piece of sewing I ever saw, of the finest possible broadcloth, and lined, every inch of it, with heavy black satin. Delicacy forbade my inquiring the full extent of the trousseau, but as Messrs. Burr & Fink provide all gentlemen's underwear in addition to cloth goods, I am sure it will be something elegant. Having some solicitude as to that very necessary adjunct to a gentleman's toilette, the shirt collar, I made some inquiries. The neatest as well as the newest are the turndown, buttoning close in the throat and worn with small ties, although there are various open and flaring styles for those to whom these are becoming. I have been carefully watching the current of events on the subject of hats for some time past, and although I cannot say, as I would like to do, that that abomination known as the "stove-pipe" hat shows much diminution in popularity, yet there are many others that come nearer to my fancy than this, the coldest in winter, warmest in summer, unventilatable, utterly ungraceful—oh, they're altogether horrid! don't let's talk about them. Really stylish are the felts, coming in round and square crowns, flat and turn-up brims, the most popular of which is the shape known as the Derby. Miller is my authority, and he knows all about it. Let's see now what I have found new in hats feminine. One of the queerities shown is the Czigam, that comes down like a roof over the head, and has a tower-like top, with a perked up rim at the back. These are specially intended for seaside wear, and are trimmed with fluffy balls of worsted in bright colors. Camel's hair felts, too, add the finishing touch to the present popular Esau-like costumes. In at Werner's, on Kearney Street, I have seen very lately some very handsome felts in different colors, with crowns of silk plush, or, more properly speaking, the same material from which gentlemen's silk hats are made. Square pieces of velvet are also shown, with embossed velvet designs in the centre, which are to be used for crowns, and much of the very oddest looking trimmings, gold dusted feathers and wings, strips of feather trimmings, and any number of different styles in ribbons. He seems to have made a decided "hit," in theatrical parlance, for the store is thronged at all hours. Cashmere feathers are something entirely new. They are so called because they reproduce the colors seen in cashmere shawls. Very elegant ones are breasts of garnet, with narrow transverse bands of cashmere, and with the one bit of color on a dark bonnet, are charming. I am told that the fancy among milliners just now is for ribbons in width even under No. 12. Trimming on hats is invariably placed on the front, at the left side, or over the crown, in fact, any where but on the inside. "Pekinades," which general name covers the large class of goods that are the reigning favorites, the many-colored, oriental stuffs I told you of the other day, are all the style now. The same designs come in silks, satins, moire, and even velvets. Of course, while these rich, thick fabrics hold on the Princesses will continue in popularity. Lace draperies will be much used with the richer ones, and lace shawls, quite useless articles of luxury in this treacherous climate, can be well utilized in this connection. By the way, at Samuels' opening there was one used in this way, that was very graceful, the two ends being fastened up under the waist, and the most of the fullness being brought down below the hips. Blush roses, if I remember rightly, were the garnitures. A pretty variation of the polonaise is made after the following model: The middle of the waist terminates in a point, or is trimmed with a band of different goods, which falls over the apron. The small side pieces in front are separated from the remainder of the dress, commencing from the lower part of the waist. The apron is joined to the seams in the back, the side pieces are draped over the hips, and trimmed with lace or fringe. The waist, with a panier, is in princess shape, and the panier is to be draped over the train skirt. Draperies will also be used on the waists again. I have been changing the chandeliers in the drawing-room this week, so I can tell you "what I know about" gas fixtures. I found, among a host of beautiful things in this line at McNally & Hawkins, on Market Street, opposite Montgomery, just what I wanted, a chandelier of polished brass, in the Egyptian style, with globes of crystal fairly covered with the loveliest figures engraved in blue. There were some others in brown, real Landseer designs, deers and trees. Among the choicest there were the silver-plated ones, with crystal drops depending from every point. They must light up beautifully. Every variety of fancy is displayed in the newest lights, which are intended for hallways and deep niches. Bronze female figures seem to be the favorite, and many of them are exceedingly artistic. Others, again, have a trifle of open work as the sole ornamentation, and the gas-jet springing from the centre like the calyx of a flower. My guide called my attention to some new shades that were very dainty and graceful, particularly those with wreaths of flowers and leaves in delicate mauve or wood color, and one design, a winter scene, in which the dead white of the snowy landscape shows wonderfully well on the peculiar background. The bronzes at this house are very choice. Verde antique, the blue green bronze, which has no special name, that I know of, and the genuine bronze, are all well represented in such figures as the famous horse, Stonewall Jackson, two mailed figures on horseback, vases after the graceful Greek and Etruscan styles, besides smaller figures, more or less quaint, as John Owens in the character of "Solon Shingle" for instance; this last a capital likeness of that jovial comedian. But I doubt if many of these will remain long in stock, they are so desirable. Sauntering up Market Street yesterday, I noticed a very striking sort of Bombay ware in Lawton's window. It is of brick red and rich yellow, with black lines. With this set comes a pretty little novelty in the shape of a China napkin ring that is fixed in the middle of an upright stand of porcelain, the top being a small open rose to hold a petite bouquet.

LILLAS DUBOIS.

The sarcastic girl rarely succeeds in catching a husband, consequently she runs down upon the lee-shore of old maidenhood as fast as the gale of years can drive her. Her character is not lovable, and only a most confirmed hunter of curiosities would care to marry her for her intrinsic merit.

Victor Hugo asserts that there are children in heaven the same as on earth. Then they can't be happy, for no one ever saw a child yet who didn't sigh to become a man or woman.

No persons make so large a demand against the reasons of others as those who have none of their own, just as a highwayman will take greater liberties with our purse than our banker.

There is no man so friendless but that he can find a friend sincere enough to tell him disagreeable truths.

Bill of Fare for Six Persons.—Sunday, October 13, 1878

Vegetable Soup.
Fried Soles.
Broiled Teal Ducks. Fried Potatoes.
Baked Tomatoes. Summer Squash.
Roast Beef.
Lettuce, Egg Dressing.
Charlotte Russe.
Fruit-bowl of Figs, Grapes, Plums, Peaches, Pears, and Apples.

TO MAKE VEGETABLE SOUP.—To one-quarter pound of fresh butter, boiling hot, add onions chopped very fine. When they are quite soft, throw in spinach, celery, carrots, kidney, turnip, a small quantity of parsnip, parsley (all chopped fine), and peas. Stir them well in the onions and butter until they begin to dry. Have ready a kettle of boiling water, and pour about a pint at a time over your vegetables until you have sufficient soup. Serve with bread or toast in the bottom of the dish. Pepper and salt to taste. A chopped green pepper improves it.

ALL ABOUT WOMEN.

The Shah of Persia has ninety wives. He lies awake and chews tobacco in bed.

There is only one thing stronger than a woman's will, and that is a woman's "won't."

Indian maidens on the Northern Nebraska Reservation have begun to carry parasols.

It is not a misfortune for a young lady to lose her good name if a young man gives her a better one.

Olive Logan says that man existed over 600,000 years ago, and she wouldn't say so if she hadn't seen him herself.

An Oswego man was knocked down by a codfish in the hands of a woman. He pronounced it very like a whale.

Girls, don't keep a business man waiting when he asks an all-important question. He may have another engagement.

The London Athenaeum decides that Charlotte Cushman was "the most powerful and original-minded woman that ever followed her art."

The position of a Gypsy Queen entitles the holder to have the first piece of meat from the skillet at the camp-fire, and to occupy a tent made out of stolen horse-blankets.

"One half of the world don't know how the other half live!" exclaimed a gossiping woman. "Oh, well," said her neighbor, "do not worry about it; it is not your fault if they don't know."

"Not Yet," is the title to a poem by Lilla N. Cushman, of Connecticut. Well, there is only one thing about it, Lilla, we are getting somewhat along in years, and we can't wait much longer.

There are several new leaders of fashion in Paris, who, under the republic, adopt the most extravagant styles of dress, and rival any of the eccentricities for which women of the imperial court were noted.

The little daughter of a leading physician in a country town presented the following as her first school essay: "There was a little girl, and she was very sick; they sent for papa, and she died very quick."

A marriage vow for lady readers, when occasion requires: "I will continue to love my husband so long as he is lovable, honor him so long as he remains honorable, and obey him so long as his commands are just and reasonable."

Ida Lewis, the Grace Darling of America, has a baby. The way in which she rescues it from drowning itself in its wash-tub is one of those sights which make one long for the time when down-trodden woman shall pool her issues in the full view of tyranny and oppression.

We can imagine Mrs. Lot skinning out of Sodom on the occasion of the great fire, and her fatal remark to her husband about its being awful Lot (awful hot) down there. Of course she perished immediately, and her fate should be a dreadful warning to women who try to be funny.

A number of English ladies have formed an association each member of which pledges herself to do everything in her power to make herself handsome. In this country the influences of association are not necessary to persuade ladies to make the most strenuous efforts in the same direction.

What woman among us have not had tickets to sell or begging to do for charitable cause or institution? and who among us have not had our best efforts almost frozen by some human bear, who sits with his feet upon his desk or railing, with his hat on, and a scowl on his crusty face enough to dampen the warmest zeal in the most worthy cause?

A resident who reached home by a noon train, after an absence of two weeks, was met at the station by his eight-year-old son, who loudly welcomed him. "And is everybody well, Willie?" asked the father. "The weldest kind," replied the boy. "And nothing has happened?" "Nothing at all. I've been good, Jeanie's all right, and I never saw ma behave herself as well as she has this time."

A Georgia farmer bought a grand piano for his daughter. His house is small, and, to economize room, the lower part of the partition between the kitchen and the parlor was cut out, and the long end of the piano stuck through. Priscilla now sits at the keyboard, singing, "Who will care for mother now?" and the mother rolls out doughnuts on the other end of the piano in the kitchen.

Skip this paragraph. It is really unfit for publication, got into this column by mistake, and was happily discovered in time to be turned on the press:

IT IS HERE
SOMETHING SHE OUGHT NOT TO KNOW.
BUT YOU
BEHOLD IT
IN OUR SHOW!
NOW WE WILL WAGER
TEN CENTS TO A FARTHING —THAT THIS POINT
SHE'S ALREADY READ—
WE KNOW
SHE GET AT IT
IT SOMEBODY
HAD TO STAND UP AND BEAT HEAD.

ALICE S. NAYLOR

The wife of a Cincinnati man is troubled with wakefulness, and frequently lies awake for two or three hours after going to bed. Her husband told her the other night that if she would just imagine a flock of sheep going through a narrow gate and count them in her mind she would soon fall asleep. When he woke up he did not know how long he had been asleep, but he did know that his wife had reached out to the washstand near the bed, got the soap dish, and smashed him on the nose with it. Mildly and quietly he asked her, in as few words as possible, what in the name of several things she meant, anyhow. "Why," said she, "I was counting them sheep as fast as I could, and I must have went to sleep; for I thought one old black ram got in the gate and would not let the others pass through, and I had just picked up a rock and tried to break his head, when you woke me up." "Picked up a rock and broke his head is nothing, but you picked up that soap dish and smashed my nose," and then the chamber went into executive session. She uses opiates now instead of sheep.

NOTICE.

The Argonaut is published every Saturday, at No. 522 California Street, by the Argonaut Publishing Company.
 Rates of Subscription: $4 per year; six months, $2.25; three months, $1.50—payable in advance. Postage prepaid. City subscribers served for 35 cents per 4 weeks. Single copies, 10 cents.
 Address all communications to "The Argonaut, 522 California Street, San Francisco."
 Branch Office, Cooper's Bookstore, 746 Market Street.
 Agent at San Jose—F. A. Taylor.
 New Dealers and Agents in the interior supplied by the San Francisco News Company, No. 413 Washington Street, to whom all orders should be addressed.
 A. P. STANTON, Business Manager.

THE ARGONAUT.

FRANK M. PINLEY,
 FRED. M. SOMERS,

Editors.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 12, 1878.

There can be little doubt that an ore body of considerable value has been discovered in or near the Sierra Nevada mine; and, although its precise location, dimensions, and some other circumstances connected with it, are still matters of uncertainty, its importance is sufficiently attested to warrant some thoughts upon its probable influence on the future welfare of the coast. Unpleasant as the fact may seem to the more plodding portion of the community, and pernicious as its bearing may be upon the sober industries they represent, it is nevertheless true that mining is still our chiefest occupation—not only from the pecuniary value of its results, but also from its influence upon the character of our people and the relation of the product to the affairs of the world. The production every year of one hundred million dollars worth of gold and silver is itself a matter of magnitude; for it involves the employment of vast numbers of miners, and others engaged in the various occupations required to support mining, produce supplies and machinery, and prepare the precious product for market. But, aside from this, the circumstances of this production have much to do with the composition of our society. Mining is a precarious and hazardous business; it invites a hardy and adventurous class of men to the coast, and it makes those hardy and adventurous who never were so before. If its influence extended no further than this, it would furnish little matter for regret. Unfortunately, it does extend further. It stops not with making men adventurous; it promotes speculation, and that in its worst and most insidious form. Clothed in the respectable garb of corporative shares, the spirit of gambling invades, not only the counting-room and workshop, but the household, the social circle, and even the church. The deplorable effects of this are seen in the multitude of industries neglected, of trusts betrayed, and of homes defiled by the intrusion of avarice and sordid considerations, where alone should reign love, and hope, and confidence. The newspapers are full of embezzlements, defaults, and suicides; the very children have learned to lisp the prices of stocks.

Apart from the local social influence of mining for the precious metals, the results are of far-reaching importance. This coast now produces more than one-half of the entire sum of gold and silver yielded in all the world: a fact that places California in the same relation to monetary affairs in which England, from the magnitude of her coal supplies, stands with reference to manufacturing. The prolificity of our mines and the conditions that may affect it, such as discoveries of ore, new methods of treating it, legislation or legal decisions which may affect the working of the mines, and many other circumstances in the same connection, should be of serious interest to the most distant communities; for these mines essentially control the supply of the materials of which money is made all over the world, and the supply of money has to do with the general welfare of society. It is hardly too much to say that if from any cause the mines of this coast were to be closed to-day, there would ensue before many months, and throughout all Europe and America, a monetary stringency of the most calamitous character. Such being the case, and bearing in mind the peculiar influence of mining upon the social character of our population, it would appear that in encouraging and facilitating mining and mining enterprises, as we do by the easy law of "denouncement" or location, the promotion of stock companies and the establishment of stock exchanges, we are really sacrificing our local welfare to that of the world at large; a piece of self-immolation into the merits of which it might be well worthy to inquire. Some of the nations of antiquity, as the Lacedæmonians, Carthaginians, and even the Romans, making similar observations, came to the startling conclusion to forcibly close their gold and silver mines, and this at various times they severally did, despite the objections of mine-owners and the angry protests of surrounding nations. The Chinese code of Confucius is said to contain an interdict against the reopening of gold and silver mines, and the Hindoo code of Buddha forbids the use of the precious metals at all. Unfortunately for these countries these laws have become obsolete.

With the failure of the Big Bonanza the vein-mining industry of the coast appeared to be on the point of decline, and if in the course of a few years no new ore bodies had been discovered, we should probably have come to the determination to give up mining as an important resource of the coast. But the bonanza in Sierra Nevada has afforded new life to it, and the impulse will probably continue until other discoveries are made. This one proves that the lower levels of the Comstock may repay exploration; and this, to a sanguine people like ours, means the permanency of vein-mining, and the continuance of its long and varied train of consequences.

Whatever may be the future disposition of this momentous subject, we worms of the present have more to do with the new ore discovery itself than with any of the general features of mining. Two months ago Sierra Nevada was selling for $10 to $15 a share; it is now worth $225, and has even touched $280. Union is selling for $180 to $195; Mexican for $75 to $100; Utah for $50. These four mines are held at prices which indicate an aggregate value of more than fifty million dollars. The practical question is, whether the ore body lies in all or only one of them; and if so, which one and exactly where? Next, is it worth the price at which the stock of that mine is held? There are men about the market who believe that the new ore body extends all the way from Utah to Ophir, and who attribute the recent rise in the last named mine, and in those mines immediately next that containing the ore body, to the holding of this belief by others. But this is the sheerest nonsense. The oft-disappointing stringers and fringes of ore in Ophir cannot possibly have any connection with the new bonanza; they are too distant. The same, though less positively, may be said of the "indications" in Mexican. As for Utah, any such connection is preposterous, this mine being half a mile north of the new discovery, and wanting even in "indications." The ore body can therefore, at best, only be in Sierra Nevada and Union, and the three hundred feet of disputed ground which lies between them.

When first discovered, the winze in which it was found was reported to be located in Sierra Nevada, one hundred and twenty feet north of the disputed ground. A week later the winze was located only six feet north of this line, and now we have it, upon authority only second in validity to the surveyor's map, that it is two hundred and thirty-two feet south of the line, or on the disputed ground, sixty-eight feet north of the Union line. That winze must certainly be regarded as fertile of mysterious properties, which, for upward of two months, has managed to maintain a continual march from Sierra Nevada toward Union. Notwithstanding this, we believe in its reality; we only complain that it is a trifle peripatetic for serious descriptive purposes. Its last given location seems also to be tolerably well attested, although in the absence of the surveyor's certificate this cherished opinion may have to be revised. Conceding to this location a tentative reception, it appears that the bonanza is neither in Sierra Nevada nor in that portion of the disputed ground, which, in the event of a partition by compromise, is likely to fall to the share of that doughty corporation. It is on the disputed ground close to the Union line; a fact that contains a world of comment for those premature rejoicers in the fall of Mr. Flood as the king of the Comstock. If our information concerning the location of the bonanza should not be falsified by another removal of that remarkably itinerant hole, and the Sierra Nevada shall have not secretly wrested the control of Union from Mr. Flood, that gentleman will still remain the monarch of all of value that may be surveyed on the north end of the great Lode. It appearing to be tolerably certain that the new ore body is in Union, or in that portion of the disputed ground which Union will obtain in the event of a compromise, we have next to consider what it is worth. It is stated that the ore body was come upon in the winze about half way between the 2000 and 2100-foot levels, and that it has been followed down to the 2200-foot level, where a chamber and station are now being excavated for a crosscut entirely through the vein. On the 2100-foot level a crosscut was made into the ore for a distance of some fifteen or twenty feet, showing rich material all the way. This crosscut is said to have been made to save the holders of the stock on margins at a time when a heavy decline in the market price of the shares threatened to compel them to sell out, as it was feared, to Mr. Flood. Having served this purpose it was not continued further, because its continuance at this level would not have demonstrated the existence of an ore body of any considerable depth, and, therefore, of any considerable value. All this appears to be plausible enough. It, however, seems somewhat remarkable that the winze should have followed the eastern side of the ore body so closely as has been stated. The winze is said to go down southward and eastward at an angle of about forty-five degrees, and if its direction was not changed as it went down, it follows that this also must have been the inclination of the flank of the bonanza. This is not impossible, but it appears to be entirely unique in the history of mining.

As to the prolongation of the ore body downward, or its extension north and south, nothing can be determined without further exploration; and this, from the nature of the material to be pierced, will, under the most favorable circumstances, require many months of time. Until these explorations can be made and particularly before a crosscut shall serve to indicate the width of the body east and west at the lowest level thus far attained, it is evidently impossible to estimate its value. If the crosscut should reveal a wide body of ore, the $18,000,000, at which price the Union mine is now held, would be far too little for it; if, on the contrary, it should reveal a narrow body, the present price would be far too great. The absence of water in the brecciated cover of the ore body and in the ore body itself at the upper levels, and its presence below, indicate that the bonanza was first discovered at the top. The refusal on the part of the manager to employ a diamond drill is alike creditable to them and assuring to the public. We have now only to await the progress of the crosscut, and then, no matter what becomes of posterity, we shall all either be rich men—or poorer than before.

The following letter, dated from the Tulare Plains, and signed "A Sand-Lapper," is indicative of the spirit that populates the sand-lots and breeds the vermin of discontent:

EDITOR ARGONAUT:—You are not consistent; but I believe you take pride in your reputation for inconsistency. You have been for months urging us to leave the city sand-lots and its communistic teachings—to leave sixteen hours' work at car-driving for two dollars, or ten hours' work digging dirt on the Potrero hills for one dollar, and go into the country, where land is to be had for the taking, and make a home. I have followed your advice; gathered up the remnants of what was left me from a broken savings bank, and the little fur that remained after a fight with "wild cats," and have squatted down on the dry plains of Tulare, run up a cabin, and am waiting for rain to put in a crop. What have I left?—hard work, long hours, and poor pay it is true, but also society, for even I had society. I was interested in the Police Court trials, and in the daily fluctuations of Dayton, Woodville, Wells Fargo, and Kossuth. I could dream and build castles in the air on the fortune I would have when the lead was struck in any of them; Skae, Fair, Sherwood, and Lent could not do more with the stock they held in more costly mines. Then when I was out of work, I could hear Kearny, Wellock, and O'Donnell on the sand-lots. There was much comfort in this. I had had the life assessed out of me, and when the wife of one of the directors rode by with a nigger on the box in a silk hat, and coat with brass buttons as big as a saucer, I said there are some of my hard earnings, and it did me good to hear the rich men and sharpers abused. I felt that I wanted to hear good, stout, strong cursing. I put my ten cents in the hat and heard it, and always came away feeling better. Then I had my church on Sunday. I do not mean any of your modern churches, or so-called religious, but a church with authority. You, being a Protestant, or perhaps free-thinker, cannot understand what this is. I mean a church dignified by age, that connects me with the unknown; that has a grand ritual and gorgeous service; where ministers, clad in the vestments of heaven, speak with power as from "the throne"; with grand and solemn music, as if echoing strains from "the mercy seat." You cannot understand, that to the poor and uneducated this is not only theatre, and opera, and lecture, and club, and society, but that it is all these and more; it is the proof and evidence of rest and ease and a happy life hereafter. I took your advice and left all these, and squatted on the dry plains. You ride by in your buggy, with your Jo. Manton turned into a breech-loader, your pate de foie gras and Otard in a hamper, bent only on pleasure; look at my poor home, go back, and call me a "sand-lapper." Have you not advised me to leave the sand-lots and become a sand-lapper—if by that you mean a settler on the public lands? And why should you sneer at my neighbor three miles from me? His father or grandfather moved from North Carolina or Kentucky to Missouri when his neighborhood became too crowded. For three or four generations his ancestors have been moving away from the settlements. The sound of a church or school bell was the signal for leaving, and the tone of a piano was the evidence that the hated Yankee had penetrated his solitude. He is still moving further on in the frontier—but doing what you have advised, going into the country and settling up the public lands. He may not plant trees and white-wash his fences, because, when neighbors get too close, he proposes to sell out and settle again further on. But he is a good citizen, and saves the country from Radicalism by steadily voting the Democratic ticket. He is doing what you ask, staying away from the cities and settling the public land. We neither of us deserve your sneer for following your advice. A review of your article will satisfy you that, for the sake of being witty, you have sacrificed consistency.

We can not be deceived by the author of this communication. He is, evidently, a good-for-nothing, lazy Yankee brought up in Connecticut. His church to which he so mysteriously refers is either the Dunkard or Hard-shell Baptist. We have never advised one of his kind to alienate himself from church preaching, sand-lot teaching, stock-gambling, and lager-beer drinking to make the experiment of country life. Farmers are not made of such material. Farmers are men and gentlemen, are patriots and good citizens. They can live without the sound of the church gong till they can build for themselves; they can get on without schools till population and prosperity make them possible; they can get on without envious cursings of the prosperous, without lager saloons or politics. We hope no one so misunderstands us as to think it is at all our idea that any sand-lot loafer, church bigot, beer-drinking idler, can by any process be converted into an honest farmer, or that any fashionable draggle-tailed gossip, or slander-swapping drab of the town, can become a farmer's wife. A certain amount of intelligence and a large degree of self-respect and self-reliance are necessary to convert the dweller of a city into a contented dweller in the country.

It seems to us that the legal squabble which turns on the ownership of letters written a man already dead might be settled by sending them to the dead-letter office.

PRATTLE.

The newspapers are telling of a lawyer who has the hallucination that he is always attended by a friend and confidant. To this imaginary person he is frequently overheard disclosing his professional secrets, and from him seems to take advice. This is no hallucination; the "friend and confidant" is an eminent counsellor well known in the profession as the senior partner of the great firm of Satan, Mammon & Co. It is a mistake, however, to suppose he gives advice to his brother lawyers; they advise him.

It transpires that the late Dr. Peterman, the famous geographer and explorer, died a natural death: he committed suicide to escape the persecutions of a divorced wife.

The world he'd spied, from side to side,
And marked each hill and dell in;
Said he: "I call the place too small
For us (and them) to dwell in."

"Tis thus, alas! explorers pass
From this world to another;
And Stanley bleats, as he retreats:
"My mother, O my mother!"

A person named Howard has been arrested for swindling two Sacramento girls out of one hundred dollars. He avers that he is a correspondent of the New York Herald, but in this instance he seems to have acted more like a reporter on a local sheet.

Colonel Nicholas Smith, the husband of Ida Greeley, is lecturing in New York in defense of tramps. The Graphic calls him "the Montague and Rignold of the rostrum," and he denounces "those shallow political economists, from Adam Smith to Bonamy Price." Pity that the Montague and Rignold of the press is not living to be proud of his son-in-law! It is, of course, only natural that he who marries into the Greeley family should have a tenderness for the nomadic offspring of the protective tariff.

With an almost incredible fertility of soil—seven bushels of wheat to the acre being no unusual yield; with a measureless abundance of minerals—clay, gravel, sandstone, and flint; with a climate as mild and equable as the temper of a chained rhinoceros, the Atlantic Slope offers advantages to capital and industry unsurpassed by those of any portion of this earth. Unfortunately the lawless traditions of 1620 still impart a bloody tinge to the social system of our Eastern brethren, and human life is but little safer now than in the days of the adventurous Puritans drawn thither by the golden dream of a universal psalm-singing through the nose. There is still the same reckless impatience of the forms of law, the same alacrity to resort to the crude, hasty justice of the mob, that marked the jurisprudence of the New England colonies and Dutch settlements in the times of Cotton Mather and Deidrich Knickerbocker. This ugly legacy of the old evil days—the wild life of the potato-placers—discourages immigration, frightens away Western capital and retards the development of the country. It is time, high time, that these turbulent tendencies were abated and those who exhibit them haled out of their houses and summarily banged.

The foregoing remarks were suggested by the dispatch from Ohio relating how that a negro of "notoriously immoral character" was attacked by an armed mob at his house, near Greenville in that State, and having the hardihood to leg it for his life was shot dead. It does not appear that the deceased silhouette had been guilty of any overt act; his assailants merely reasoned that, local conditions favoring, immorality was contagious. In certain circumstances it is; for example, one is in danger when one's sensitive finger-tips come in contact with the membrane of a thief's pocket. In its more restricted sense immorality is also sometimes incurred at second hand by merely kissing the wife of an immoral neighbor.

Mr. Jones, the man who was recently tarred and feathered and barred and tethered and scarred and leathered by the cherubim and seraphim of Reno, is now in this city, trying to get the Nevadanese justice out of his system. It is to be feared Mr. Jones will not find the rough barbarity of San Francisco life greatly to his taste, accustomed as he is to the golden amenities and affable complaisance of the sage-brush people and their aboriginal neighbors, the mild-eyed, melancholy locust-eaters of the desert. I hope it will be observed that my language is studiously respectful in speaking of Reno's law-loving citizens who applied the pitch and plumage to the Jones' person, for there was a formidable-looking Nevada man in this office last week wanting to thrash me because I had called them "ruffians." Fortunately for me I had retired to my stronghold at San Rafael where no warrior has as yet had the intrepidity to besiege me.

A remarkably pretty literary female—of whom I do not remember previously to have heard—was in, also, last week, displaying a deadly weapon between her teeth, and threatening condign punishment for some offense the nature of which she did not adequately explain. Then there was another belligerent, who, either through craft would not, or from agitation could not, disclose his name. His grievance, however, was revealed in describing (by its contents) the particular paper that he wanted, and for which he paid his ten cents like a man—a formality which I am informed the indignant commonly neglect. Altogether the ARGONAUT office appears to hold its own in the esteem of our community as a place of resort for people who, disliking publicity, wish to enjoy themselves in the quiet manner of a synod of Malay pirates trying to get even on a sea-side hotel.

This thing of still-hunting editors will have to stop some time, I suppose. Being seldom at the office I do not so much mind it myself, but the junior editor says the continued forays of these marauders interrupt his thought and unbalance the business of the paper. As the object of the invaders is to obtain a little cheap newspaper glory by running with "their version" to the reporters whose literary contributions to this journal have been respectfully declined, it is under discussion here whether it would not tranquilize the future to act henceforth on the familiar principle that dead men tell no lies. It is believed by our legislators that the best way to put a stop to Chinese immigration is to retain the bones of the immigrants. That is going a little too far; our undesirables may have back their carcasses and welcome.

A man entered a New York church during service, the other morning, and stabbed a woman. This, under any circumstances, he ought not to have done, but what renders the act specially censurable is that the lady was not his wife (as he supposed), but a stranger. It is to be hoped some statute may be found to cover this offense. True, the offender had not, in one sense, a criminal intent, but it seems to me a consideration of at least equal force that the victim had not, in any sense. Something—an apology at the very least—would seem to be due, also, to the pastor and congregation of the church. The question is mainly one of morals, but it has at the same time a social side which it would be a stretch of civility to wholly ignore.

My domestic policy is beginning to attract attention; I will dispatch a fleet to the Mediterranean.—MacMahon. That fellow is dispatching a fleet to the Mediterranean; we must strengthen our Alsatian frontier.—Bismarck. Ameer of what? I never met the man in all my life!—Gortschakoff. How can I begin military operations until I find a good rhyme for Afghanistan?—Lord Lytton. There is corn in Egypt.—Beaconsfield. Occupation? I should say so!—Andrassy. They cannot rob me of my hope in Harem.—The Sultan. Our earnest desire is for peace with Austria—somebody touch off Garibaldi.—Umberto. The agricultural fair—God bless them.—R. B. Hayes.

In an Oakland paper the statement that "it is believed a marriage is arranged between Lord Beaconsfield and Queen Victoria" is appropriately put under the head of "Local Intelligence." The marriage would of course occur abroad, but the belief is purely local, and it marks the magnitude of Oakland's "intelligence" in a singularly accurate way.

It seems a waste of military power to make the army suppress the popular insurrection against law in New Mexico. Why did not Gov. Wallace cut down that apple tree and let the insurgents be dispersed by the sun?

"Sire," said Caratbeodoa Pasha, kowtowing to the Sultan, "it transpires that five hundred Russian officers were robbing their accursed master's exchequer during the entire war. Allah be praised! they have cost him a pretty penny, truly." "By the beard of the Prophet!" exclaimed the Commander of the Faithful, thoughtfully stroking his own, "I think thieving Infidels are worse than honest. The Dog of Darkness has charged their peculations to me in the indemnity!"

As southward Tom Lawton, the murderer, steers,
In far Arizona to dwell,
Says Justice: "I pardon." But Mercy in tears
Cries: "Hang him and send him to h—!"

Instead of setting out occasional luncheons in Platt's Hall for liquidation of their debts, why do not the churches establish and maintain permanent restaurants? By practice their cooks would learn to compound innocuous provand for the secular palate, and the unwary sinner be no more a holy Christian martyr in spite of himself. God, they say, gives food and the devil sends cooks—a hoary dictum the which no church-luncheon patient would dispute to save his life, or, but for the moderation that comes of disgust, could save his life to dispute. But there are cooks and cooks, and those in the devil's pay may be readily distinguished by their inability to speak French. It is the mark of Cain, set upon him who has slain his brother.

I once rode fifteen miles to visit a friend, arriving in the dead of night. There was not a light in the house, no one came to resent my thundering assault upon the door. The place was like a tomb. Finding an unfastened window at the back of the house I raised it, entered and promptly fell over an iron pot, ejaculating: "My God!" Faint babbling responses—mere audible shadows of speech—came from every direction—"Mon Dieu—mon—mon Dieu—mon Dieu—Dieu." "Bah!" I cried, as angry as a trapped bear, "one's mother-tongue is the language of a broken shin." A clamor of unearthly voices encompassed me, ran all round the room like file-firing, culminated in a volley, and died away in dropping, desultory vocal explosions—"Ici on—ici—ici on parle—on parle—ici—on—ici—parle—ici on parle Français—Fran—par—i—on—çais." They were the echoes of the place, and blundering over a range I discovered I was in the kitchen. A holy peace overspread my hateful temper, as the last, sincerest smile relaxes the rigid features of the dead. I would rather be alone in the kitchen of a man who keeps a French cook than with him and all his family in his parlor. His dining-room is another matter.

I remained in that kitchen all night dining on words—a human chameleon fattening on air. I said "oysters," and the echoes returned "huitres" in every style; "soup," and they brewed as many sorts of "potage" as there were nooks and crannies in which to concoct them; "fish," and they gave me so bewildering a variety of "poisson" that my senses swam in the contemplation; and so on, through the most insufferably long ménus that ever the mind of man conceived and brought forth. And at daybreak next morning my imagination was so poddily surcharged with toothsome viands—so apoplectically replete with all palatable comestible—that it was unable to travel, and was left behind; and I have ever since been without—the same as the local novelists and poets.

A sperm whale one hundred feet long has come ashore near Trinidad. That is a pretty large whale, but if the odor that came ashore with him had been visible he would have looked like a fly-speck done up in a thunder-cloud.

The New York Sun has the nose of a fox-hound for explanations and the stomach of an ostrich to digest them. It explains the Democratic defeat in Ohio by the circumstance that the party had formally recognized the validity of the President's title to his office. Whether this abandonment of principle made them unable to vote, or provoked the Republicans to outnumber them, is not stated. Fairly formulated, that journal's opinion seems to be, however, that because the Democratic leaders conceded Mr. Hayes' right to sit in the presidential chair, the "rank and file," who deny that right, joined the party that took him by the shoulders and thrust him into it. True, an ingenious reason is better than a silly one. Unfortunately the Sun has given us the silly one.

Man and woman are like the weight and pendulum of a clock. Man does the work and woman the ticking.

The Bulletin man figures it out that Columbus discovered America 396 years ago, and figures will not lie. But when they hint that we are living in the year 1888, without a clear knowledge of where we spent the decade immediately preceding, I call it a pretty base insinuation.

Yellow fever and politics make a most savory mixture. New Orleans is now blessed with it, that city having for weeks presented the grotesque combination of a political fight, crape streaming from every other door-knob, bears blocking the street, committees rebuking in formal resolutions candidates who have found the fever a convenient excuse for leaving the city, and others figuring on the death rate as a means of carrying off voters, and thus increasing the chances of party success.

Mr. Henry Widmer has not thought it expedient to act upon my studiously respectful suggestion that he disavow the insulting falsehoods published concerning me in his name. Moreover, I can prove him their author—that he devoted the life which I mercifully spared to systematic defamation of my character and misrepresentation of my conduct. I, therefore, take this opportunity to remind those who have the misfortune to know him, and inform those who have not, that he has the distinguished honor to be, not a man of principle, but a ruffian; not a man of truth, but a liar; not a man of courage, but a coward.

In order that there may be no mistake as to what member of the canaille I mean, I will state that I refer to Fiddler Widmer, the charming blackguard.

Concerning Fiddler Widmer's nameless friend (probably the Trombone or the Triangle), who did me the honor to call on me with him, witnessed all that occurred, and must have noted Mr. Widmer's accounts of the interview, I beg to remind him that he has not as yet addressed me a note repudiating Mr. Widmer. Vous verrons.

LEONIE'S AUNT'S AUNT.

Four Conversations Tell the Story.

Conversation First takes place between LEONIE BELL, a lovely blonde of eighteen, and her most intimate friend, JULIE CORMIER, a pretty brunette of the same age, on the morning of the 3d of September, 1878, in the room of the former, Fountain Hotel, Undine Island.

JULIE [just returned from the Catskills, after an absence of three weeks, and now idly swinging back and forth in a low rocking chair by the window]. "Oh, by the bye, Leonie, who was the lady who joined your party on the porch as I said my last farewell to you?"

LEONIE. "Which lady? There were two shaking hands with Aunt Eleanor, right and left, at that sad moment."

JULIE. "Sad moment. What a little humbug you are! I saw you laughing gaily with that silly Pauline Tracy before I reached the corner. The tall, slender lady in silver-gray silk, with bonnet and gloves to match, I mean. I think her eyes also matched. And she had pretty brown hair, a wonderfully bright smile, and a cameo face."

LEONIE. "Good gracious! Julie, it is very evident you only glimpsed at her. If you'd looked longer and closer you would have seen streaks of gray in the 'brown hair,' and wrinkles in the 'cameo face.' She's my aunt's aunt, and ever so old, in spite of the tall, graceful figure, wonderfully bright smile, and eyes to match her silver-gray dress. An old—in fact, a venerable maid. Five and forty, if she's a day. And goody-good to an extent most awfully awful. Believes in marrying for love; thinks slang dreadful, and sleeveless dresses improper; reads and remembers Carlyle, George Eliot, and the Brownings, and visits the poor. From all of which you may safely infer that she and I don't pull well together."

JULIE [laughing]. "I should think not. But, Leonie, I must confess I never dreamed an old maid could be so pleasant to look upon. She might, for all her appearance betrays her, be the happiest of young married women."

LEONIE [giving her hair, which she is arranging before the mirror, an impatient twist]. "Bother my aunt's aunt! Why will you persist in talking about her when there are a hundred much more interesting things to talk about?"

JULIE. "Rudolph Hall, for instance."

LEONIE. "Well, he's a trifle better than the 'cameo' spinster."

JULIE. "Rumor, floating over the Catskill Mountains, confided to the echoes your engagement to him."

LEONIE. "Rumor, as rumor often is, was wrong. I am not, and never shall be, engaged to him."

[Miss JULIE CORMIER opens her black eyes to their fullest extent, then opens her fan to its fullest extent, and slowly fans herself in silence.]

LEONIE [with a flash of eye lightning]. "Well?"

JULIE. "Nothing."

LEONIE. "'Nothing,' spoken in that way, always means a great deal. Julie, your thoughts, or I'll drop this switch and pinch you!"

JULIE. "Haven't you accepted his escort every where ever since we came here two months ago? Haven't you danced, driven, rode, walked, picnicked, sailed, played croquet, and gazed at the moon with him? Haven't you worn his favorite flowers, sung his favorite songs, and ate his favorite ices? Are you not [glancing at her hand] wearing the ring he gave you?"

LEONIE [drawing the ring from her finger and dropping it into her pocket]. "No. Go on, Miss Cormier."

JULIE. "And if your affair with Rudolph was not—I see I'm to speak of it in the past tense—a bona fide love affair, intended to end in a wedding, what was it?"

LEONIE. "Only a double-dyed flirtation, my dear."

JULIE. "And this 'double-dyed flirtation,' when did it begin to fade? It was as brilliant as ever when I left here three weeks ago."

LEONIE [with mock seriousness]. "Three weeks is a very long time, Julie. A great many changes can take place in three weeks. It began to fade August the twentieth, late in the afternoon—I remember the date, because papa sent me a check in the morning—when Mr. Gillbradden, the millionaire, descended from his elegant carriage in front of the Fountain Hotel, and ascended the hotel steps, looking the while at your unworthy friend, who was framed in one of the drawing-room windows. I wore my morning-silk with blush ribbons and roses, with eyes that said—you may guess what; and it grew three shades, at least, dimmer when he sought an introduction, ten minutes after, my dear, to my aunt's aunt, that he might through her be introduced to me. And it hadn't a vestige of color remaining the next evening, when he never left my side aunt had one of her bad headaches, and couldn't leave her room, and your silver-gray Sister of Charity kept her company, for three mortal hours."

JULIE [with great emphasis]. "Leonie, he's ever so old! In fact, venerable—sixty if he's a day."

LEONIE. "Fifty-six his last birthday, dear. My maid asked his valet. And, after all, what does a few years more or less matter in a man? The farther side of a half century may, it is true, be too far off for round dances, but then one would never want to dance round dances with one's husband. You saw Mr. Gillbradden at the breakfast table?"

JULIE. "Scarcely. He was leaving the room as I entered. I was late, you know."

LEONIE. "Well, a glance was enough to show you that he is extremely distinguished, and bears his years as lightly as though they were but half their number. And as for gallantry! Would that the young men who do here congregated would take a few lessons from him! They need them. The most delicious bonbons every morning, the most magnificent bouquets every evening; all the new music—not that I ever play it; all the new books—not that I ever read them. He treats me like a spoiled child—an only child—a princess. And I, really, Julie, I quite adore him."

JULIE. "Would you 'quite adore him' if he were not a millionaire?"

LEONIE. "Julie, you are unkind. Indeed, you are. In your heart you are calling me mercenary. I assure you, on my word and honor, that I'd quite adore him if he were only a millionaire."

JULIE. "But not if he were as poor as Rudolph Hall?"

LEONIE. "Decidedly not. I could not live on five thousand a year. If I could—[sighing]. Poor Rudolph!"

JULIE. "Mr. Gillbradden's proposal must have followed soon after his introduction to you."

LEONIE. "Oh, he hasn't proposed yet. That is, not in words. But if, as you say, actions speak louder than words, he has asked me to marry him a dozen times. But the words are coming—I'm sure of that. I see them trembling on his lips. They will be here this afternoon. I have promised to drive with him, and your congratulations may be ready a few moments before dinner."

JULIE. "And you really intend to say yes?"

LEONIE. "'Intend to say yes.' Good heavens! would any one say no? Think of the diamonds, the pearls, the emeralds, the all sorts of precious gems; the silks, the satins, the velvets; the town house, the country house, the fast horses, the balls, the private theatricals, the box at the opera; the visits to London, Paris, Rome—all the world! Say yes, I should think so."

JULIE [glancing from the window]. "See, the conquering hero comes! You are right, Leonie, he is distinguished. Tall, well formed, erect, a little lame, but, take him for all in all, finer-looking than half, perhaps three-quarters, of our younger men. He has a gorgeous posy, for you, I suppose, and he is walking with—she has a posy, too, of white lilies—with your aunt's aunt."

LEONIE. "The dear, good soul! What greater proof of his devotion could you ask? Fancy his devoting hours to that old, old maid because [smiling at her reflection in the glass, and then at her friend] he can talk to her of me. The other women are wild with envy. They say—the nasty, spiteful things—that some member of the family is constantly on guard for fear he may escape. Escape, indeed! Never was captive more in love with captivity. There, thank heaven! my hair is done at last. Fasten this crimson rosebud in the topmost puff, that's a dear! Mr. Gillbradden likes crimson roses. Rudolph's favorites are—dear me, how forgetful I am! I promised Rudolph an interview in the library this morning—he selected that place because nobody goes there—and I've no doubt he's waiting for me this very moment. I do hope he's going to be reasonable. I hate tragedy—off the stage. What's the time?"

JULIE. "Quarter past eleven."

LEONIE. "Eleven was the appointed hour. Julie, my love, if I stay longer than fifteen minutes, send some one to tell me my aunt, or my aunt's aunt, is sick, or dying, or any other piece of news potent enough to turn a duet into a solo, or, more properly speaking, a dialogue into a monologue. Remember, I depend upon you!"

JULIE. "Poor Rudolph!"

LEONIE. "Yes, it's very sad, but can't be helped. By-by."

Conversation Second, between LEONIE BELL and RUDOLPH HALL, in the library of the Fountain Hotel.

RUDOLPH [who has been pacing the floor for half an hour, turns to Leonie as she enters the room]. "You are late."

LEONIE. "Only fifteen minutes."

RUDOLPH. "Only fifteen minutes! They have seemed like hours to me."

LEONIE. "Have they? I'm awfully sorry. I forgot—that is—"

RUDOLPH [grasping her hand, and speaking with suppressed emotion]. "Leonie, did you ever love me? Or did you lie when you told me your heart was mine? For heaven's sake, explain your conduct. The last two weeks have seemed to me like a dreadful dream. When we have met, you have treated me with light indifference. You no longer wear my flowers—you no longer wear my ring. Only when I wrote the third time, demanding instead of beseeching it, did you grant me this interview—you, whose blue eyes used to invite me to follow wherever you went. Leonie, can it be possible—great heaven! can it be possible—that you, so young, so lovely, have thrown me over, to marry a man for his money, old enough to be your great-grandfather?"

LEONIE. "Mr. Hall, you exaggerate. Mr. Gillbradden is not even old enough to be my grandfather."

RUDOLPH. "Leonie, cease trifling, I beg of you. How can you jest when I am in torment? Answer me; are all your fond words, your smiles, your promises, to go for nothing? Am I, once your acknowledged lover—"

LEONIE [interrupting him, and wresting her hand away]. "To become my friend? Yes, if you will."

RUDOLPH [with great indignation]. "Your friend! Madam, from the grave of Love, murdered by Falsehood, Friendship can never spring. I shall think of you no more; or, if I do, it will be as of any other bauble that can be bought for gold."

LEONIE [flushing]. "Mr. Hall, you are rude."

RUDOLPH. "Miss Bell, it is truth that is rude—not I. Good morning."

Conversation Third. Miss BELL and Mr. GILLBRADDEN in his carriage. A beautiful and lonely road; the sun sinking in the west.

GILLBRADDEN [leaning toward her with a smile, and speaking in a low voice]. "Miss Leonie, I asked you to drive with me to-day for a particular purpose. I have something to say to you which is best said away from, as the poet has it, the garish crowd. And, in addition, I have a great favor to beg of you."

LEONIE [modestly, her long lashes shading her lovely eyes]. "A favor to beg of poor me, Mr. Gillbradden? It is granted."

GILLBRADDEN [smiling]. "Bless the innocent child! Well, my dear, will you have the patience to listen to a little story?"

LEONIE. "I delight in little stories."

GILLBRADDEN. "But perhaps I did wrong to call it a story. It's a bit of my autobiography."

LEONIE [clapping her hands]. "Oh, that is much nicer! Pray go on."

GILLBRADDEN. "I am, as you know, my dear, an old bachelor; not from choice, but because, until a few years ago, I had an old father and mother and invalid sister dependent upon me, and, unfortunately, my fortune did not come to me until after their deaths. So you see, my dear, even if I had been so inclined, I could not have married. But, living in great seclusion, I met no woman who approached my ideal—for I had an ideal, as I suppose every single man has, if he will but confess it—and consequently was spared the temptation. Well, Miss Leonie, after tardy Fortune had at last made up her mind to shower her golden gifts upon me, I traveled all over Europe, meeting and liking many lovely women; but when I thought of love—Don't laugh, my dear."

LEONIE. "Nothing was farther from my thoughts. You make a charming story-teller. You said when you thought of love—"

GILLBRADDEN. "Yes—love (for neither romance nor happiness, as some writer says, neither love nor mental youth, is a matter of years, and, after all, we are only as old as we feel, and certainly no older than we look), my heart came back to my native land, and I saw again the face of my dream-wife. And then I felt, my dear, she waited for me there. A month or two ago I returned to America, and the fate that ordained us for each other led me to this place. Here I found her—the perfect realization of my dreams. And although only two weeks have passed since I met her first smile, I have sped so well in my wooing that to-day I know she is to be my wife in reality, and make, God willing, the Indian summer the brightest time of all my life."

LEONIE [dropping toward him]. "No woman could claim a prouder title."

GILLBRADDEN [kissing her hand]. "It gives me great joy to hear you say so. [Looking at his watch.] But we must return; it is later than I thought. John [to the coachman], back to the hotel as soon as possible. And now, my dear, for the favor: will you go to town with me to-morrow—I'm as ignorant as a boy about such matters—and help me to select the bridal gifts? There will be also your own costume to choose, and that of Miss Cormier, who, of course, will act as second bride-maid."

LEONIE [suddenly sitting very upright]. "My costume! Miss Cormier second bride-maid!"

[There are but two or three more sentences exchanged between the lady and gentleman before the drive is ended.]

Conversation Fourth. Short but not sweet. Time, just before dinner. Place, Miss CORMIER'S room in Fountain Hotel.

MISS BELL [rushing into the room with flushed cheeks and sparkling eyes]. "Where's Rudolph?"

JULIE [in astonishment]. "Why, what a strange question to ask me! But I can tell you where he is not—in the Fountain Hotel. He left here an hour ago. Am I to congratulate you?"

LEONIE [laughing hysterically]. "Ha-ha! congratulate me! Oh, yes, certainly, if you wish to congratulate me on having been the greatest little fool that ever existed! Julie [solemnly], if ever you tell, I'll never, never, NEVER speak to you again!"

JULIE. "Tell what? That you have been the greatest little fool?"

LEONIE [speaking very fast]. "He didn't propose—he never thought of proposing—to me. He is not in love, and never has been—with me. On the contrary, he is wildly in love, impetuous youth! and has proposed to somebody else. O Rudolph, if you but knew how quickly you have been avenged! And he wants me to select her bridal gifts."

JULIE. "And the wildly loved?"

LEONIE. "The diamonds, pearls, emeralds, rubies, and all sorts of precious gems; the silks, the satins, the velvets, and all sorts of costly fabrics; the private theatricals, the opera-box—"

JULIE [impatiently]. "Well?"

LEONIE. "The town house, the country house, the yacht, the fast horses, the tours to Europe, have all—" [pausing for breath.]

JULIE [prompting her]. "Have all?"

LEONIE. "Been offered to my aunt's aunt!"

The Chinese Ambassador, Chin Lin Pin, now in Hartford, is under instruction from his Government to make a careful investigation of the means adopted at various institutions in this country for the cure of opium-eating, and is deeply interested in the matter. He is at present accumulating what facts he can, and in due time will report the result of his investigations to the home government. It is a fact not generally known that an edict was officially issued in China last year forbidding the culture of the poppy after 1879 in any part of the kingdom, and forbidding all importations after 1880. An edict has also been sent to all governors and leading generals of provinces, requiring them to submit plans of laws which shall effectually do away with the use of opium under pain of death after a period of three years. The task will be one of gigantic proportions, no doubt, as it is estimated that 6,000,000 of people in the Chinese Empire are addicted to the habit of opium-eating. A large hospital has been established in Hong Kong for the cure of opium-eaters, and it is the plan of the Government to build up other institutions of the same kind. It is the aim of Ambassador Chin Lin Pin to discover the best means for their management, and the best system of cure, to be introduced into them. For a century the Chinese have suffered untold miseries from the opium trade, and in spite of legislation to the contrary the production of the poppy has increased. But a terribly earnest effort has now been decided on for tramping out the evil.

Frank Polk felt resentful because the Mayor of Pisgah, Texas, fined him for drunkenness. He got a rifle and rode up and down in front of the mayor's office, daring him to come out. The chief of police drew a revolver, and ordered him to throw down his gun. Polk fired, hitting the officer, who, in falling, shot Polk in the body. The mayor ran out and shot three balls into the desperado. The latter fired three shots at the mayor, but he escaped unhurt. The chief and the desperado died. Hurrah for the beatitude of municipal government!

The new dueling code in Maryland is as follows: The offended party shall challenge. The challenged party shall keep the cartel in his pocket a week. The challenger shall publicly announce that he has sent a challenge. The challenged party shall declare that honor has been violated by publicity and he "will have no more to do with it." Both parties shall then announce that they are satisfied.

INTAGLIOS.

Old and Young.

They soon grown old who grope for gold
In marts where all is bought and sold;
Who live for self and on some shelf;
In darkened vaults hoard up their pelf;
Cankered and crusted o'er with mold;
For them their youth itself is old.

They ne'er grow old who gather gold
Where spring awakes and flowers unfold;
Where suns arise in joyous skies,
And fill the soul with their own life;
For them the immortal buds have sung;
For them old age itself is young. —Scribner.

The Wanderer.

A butterfly into the city flew,
Leaving meadows of green and skies of blue.
Fled from a garden of countless sweets,
O'er dismal dwellings to noisy streets.
A church-yard stood in a gloomy square,
The beautiful Wanderer lay there;
But neither dew nor honey was found,
Though pale flowers grew on many a mound.
Some mischievous idlers out for play
Saw her alight on her weary way;
Stealthily crept, and with raptured eyes,
Charmed by her beauty, sought the prize.
Rudely their hands upon her fell;
What was her fate? Ah, sad to tell!
Spoiled and bruised were her beautiful wings—
Gone! Like the bloom of lovelier things
That fly from the country into the town,
To be by libertines hunted down!

Embalmed.

This is the street and the dwelling;
Let me count the houses o'er—
Yes; one, two, three from the corner,
And the house which I loved makes four.
That is the very window
Where I used to see her head,
Bent over book or needle,
With ivy garlanded.
And the very loop of the curtain,
And the very curve of the vine,
Were full of a charm and a meaning,
Which woke at her touch and sign.
I began to be glad at the corner,
And all the way to the door
My heart outran my footsteps,
And frolicked and danced before—
In haste for the words of welcome,
The voice, the repose and grace,
And the smile, like a benediction,
Of that beautiful vanished face.
Now I pass the door and I pause not,
And I look the other way;
But ever like wafted fragrance,
Too subtle to name or to stay—
Comes a thought of the gracious presence
Which made that past day sweet,
As still to those who remember
Embalms the house and the street—
Like the breath from some vase now empty
Of a flowery shape unseen,
Which follows the path of the lover
To tell where a rose has been.

The Dream of Life.

'Twas but a bubble—yet 'twas bright;
And gaily danced along the stream
Of life's wild torrent, the light
Of sunbeams sparkling—like a dream
Of heaven's own bliss for loveliness—
For fleetness like a passing thought;
And ever of such dreams as these
The tissue of my life is wrought.
For I have dreamed of pleasure when
The sun of youth existence ended
Upon my wayward path, and then
Her promised sweets my heart beguiled,
But when I came those sweets to sip,
They turned to gall upon my lip.
And I have dreamed of friendship, too;
For Friendship I had thought was made
To be man's solace in the shade,
And glad him in the light; and so,
I fondly thought to find a friend
Whose soul with mine would sweetly blend,
And, as two placid streams unite,
And roll their waters in bright
And tranquil current to the sea,
So might our happy spirits be
Some onward to eternity;
But he betrayed me, and with pain
I woke—to sleep and dream again.
And then I dreamed of Love; and all
The clustered visions of the past
Seemed aye nothings to that last
Bright dream. It threw a magical
Enchantment o'er existence—cast
A glory on my path so bright
I seemed to breathe and feel its light;
But now that blissful dream is o'er
And I have waked, to dream no more.

Beyond the farthest glimmering star
That twinkles in the arch above,
There is a world of truth and love
Which earth's vile passions never mar.
Oh, could I snatch the eagle's plumes,
And soar to that bright world above,
Which God's own holy light illumines
With glories of eternal day!
How gladly every lingering tie
That binds me down to earth I'd sever,
And leave, for that best home on high,
This hollow-hearted world forever.
—GEORGE D. PRENTICE.

A Ballad of Dreamland.

I hid my heart in a nest of roses,
Out of the sun's way, hidden apart;
In a softer bed than the soft white snow's is,
Under the roses I hid my heart.
Why would it sleep not? why should it start,
When never a leaf of the rose-tree stirred?
What made sleep flutter his wings and part?
Only the song of a secret bird.
Lie still, I said, for the wind's wing closes,
And mild leaves muffle the keen sun's dart:
Lie still, for the wind on the warm sun does,
And the wind is unquiet when thou art.
Does a thought in thee still as a thorn's wound smart?
Does the pang still fret thee of hope deferred?
What hids the lids of thy sleep depart?
Only the song of a secret bird.

The green land's name that a charm incloses—
It never was writ in the traveler's chart,
And sweet on its trees as the fruit that grows in—
It never was sold in the merchant's mart.
The swallows of dreams through its dim fields dart,
And sleep's are the tunes in the tree tops heard;
No bound's note wakens the wildwood hart—
Only the song of a secret bird.

ENVOI.

In the world of dreams I have chosen my part,
To sleep for a season, and hear no word
Of true love's truth or of light love art—
Only the song of a secret bird.—SWINBURNE.

THE SHERIFF'S MISTAKE.

An Episode of Life on the Great Plains.

"Thar's strangers," said the Sheriff, suddenly setting down his tin cup of regulation whisky untouched, and shuffling to the door.

The Sheriff was a safe man to believe, though how he made out anything in the blinding glare of evening sunlight that flooded the level prairie west of Buffalo Station no one but a professor of optics could have told. The old man had the eye of an eagle.

"Two on 'em with a pack pony," he added; and just then a sudden sunset shadow crept across the lonely waste, and we saw them, too.

They were about a quarter of a mile away, heading for the station and its single combination building of store, dining-room, tavern, and freight-house. They came on at an easy gait, driving their pack pony before them. As they neared us we could note the signs of hard travel about them. From their dust-soiled clothing and their loose seats in the saddle, as well as the jaded canter of their ponies, everything in their appearance spoke of long ride and a weary one.

They crossed the track and drew up in the shade of the station, one of them only replying to the Sheriff's cheery hail with a curt nod. He dismounted stiffly, and addressed a few words to his companion, who remained in the saddle with one leg crossed over the bow; and a moment later his gaunt, bucks-kid-and-frieze garbed figure vanished in the cool shadow of the store.

"A likely boy," said the Sheriff, who had been eyeing his companion intently. "They might be Texican drovers—and then again they mightn't."

He added the latter sentence reflectively, never relaxing the scrutiny of the mounted stranger. That person was a "likely boy," indeed. Afoot he might have stood nearly six feet on his bare soles. His swarthy face—handsome as a gypsy girl's, and delicately shaped and set as any lady's—was framed with a shock of tangled, wavy hair, of whose black, glossy glory any court dame might have been proud; and his eyes—full, black, and lustrous as those of a race-horse—flashed under the finely penciled brows. The hand, which rested lazily on his knee, was large, and in perfect keeping with his well-knit figure, but, in shape, clean cut and handsome as a woman's.

I was still scrutinizing this somewhat singular apparition, with more than ordinary curiosity, when the Sheriff turned suddenly on me.

"What's yer pony, Tom?" he asked.

"In the shed!"

"Saddled?"

"With a loose girth—yes."

"The sogers is in the Hundred Horn Gulch," he went on, speaking rapidly. "Slide furrer an' brig 'em up. May the big wolf of Devil's Run devour me if there ain't two of our men."

I knew the Sheriff too well to hesitate or question further. As I girthed my pony in the shed, a shadow floated across the doorway and was gone. When I rode out the two strangers were cantering off to the southward, pointing for the Republican River, and as I gave my pony rein and galloped in the opposite direction, I saw the Sheriff mounting his big gray mare, which had been tied to the corner post of the store.

The Sheriff and a party of soldiers from Fort Hays were on the watch for the train robbers who had stopped the west bound train at Big Springs eight days before, and who were supposed to be striking for the Texan border with their rich spoil. The soldiers, as the Sheriff had said, were posted in a ravine known as Hundred Horn Gulch, a few miles from the station, and where the main trail from North Platte crossed the railroad track.

The sun was just dipping when I rode up to the station ahead of the troopers. The Sheriff, who was studying a written description of the marauders by the waning light, put himself at our head without a word, and we trailed off, a long line of creaking, jingling, hoof-beating clamor through the windy silence and gloom of the darkening prairie.

The ride was a long one, for our quarry had an hour's start of us, and the moon rose, a globe of copper fire, and found us still clanking on. I had joined the Sheriff and the leader of the soldiers. We were a silent trio until I ventured:

"Are you certain, Sheriff, of our men?"

"Sure as the moon," said the old man, tersely, drinking in the sweet air of the sublime night with a sigh which seemed to say, "Let me alone. I know what I'm about and won't be questioned."

Silence again. The brisk breeze was blowing rifted clouds across the face of the moon, mottling the dim plain with fantastic shadows. Suddenly these clouds swept away, a full, clear burst of light flooded the prairie, and not half a mile away we saw three moving figures, which, in the now marvelously brilliant lunar illumination, could be easily distinguished as those of two mounted men and a pack animal.

The wind was in our faces, blowing the noise of our approach from the fugitive's ears, and though we rode hard, and with no attempt at stealthiness, it was not until we were close upon them that they suddenly drew in and faced about, both men sitting bolt upright in their saddles, with their hands at their hips.

In gesture and bearing they meant fight, and looked every inch dangerous and desperate men. "We halted, too. For a moment a dead silence fell upon us. Then the Sheriff's gray mare neighed, and the charm was broken.

"Who's there?" called one of the fugitives in Spanish, emphasizing the challenge by the sharp click of his pistol as he brought it to a cock.

The rattle of a dozen carbines falling into position drowned the Sheriff's reply. Then the clear voice of the younger fugitive arose: "If we must die, we might as well die like men," it said.

What followed was almost like the flaming of a flash of lightning. I heard the Sheriff call out: "Throw up your hands," and saw him spur straight for the strangers; then came a flash, a rattling fire of carbines and revolvers, and a fierce oath from a trooper behind me who tumbled from his saddle with his thigh smashed. At the same time, and before I could kick clear of the stirrups, my poor pony staggered and fell dead, with a pistol ball between his eyes, and in his fall pinned me to the earth.

The fight was as brief as it was furious, and, like all really desperate encounters I ever witnessed, was an almost silent one, as far as any sound of voices went. But the sharp reports of revolvers and the duller discharge of carbines freighted the night wind, and the ground oiled lumbered into a clumsy fight on the unwounded senses. Finally, a single flash flamed across the light, thin vapors of the firing, a single report was blown to leeward sharp and clear, and then the discharges ceased. With a desperate effort I dragged myself clear of my dead animal, and limped to my feet.

The Sheriff and half a dozen soldiers were grouped about the body of one of the fugitives. Another soldier supported the figure of the "likely boy." Some black shapes on the prairie marked the whereabouts of the rest of the dozen troopers, and told at what cost the victory had been won.

The boy himself, only held half upright by the soldier's strong arm, was still alive. The bright moonlight, shining on his handsome, girlish face lighted it to unearthly beauty. In the struggle his coat had been torn off, and a broad, dark, slowly-spreading smear was visible on his coarse, gray shirt. His breathing was hoarse and quick, the sure index to a shot in the lungs.

"He's goin'," said the Sheriff, mopping the blood from a bad cut in his forehead with his sleeve. "Great snakes! what a fight he made."

"Here's the pony, Sheriff."

One of the men led the pack pony, which during the entire fight had been quietly grazing; at a little distance off, up to the group. With a quick jerk he dragged off the tattered blanket which covered the pack.

There were a few camp utensils, some provisions, and a bulging sort of double bag thrown over the front of the pannier. With an effort he pulled this off, but its weight tore it from his hands, and it fell with a metallic crash. As it struck the earth its seams burst. The queer-shaped sack was simply an old pair of pantaloons with the legs tied up, and its contents rolled, jingling and sparkling, over the short grass a cascade of minted gold.

Before the musical ring of the precious metal had died away the group about the dead man and the wounded boy parted with an exclamation of startled surprise. The boy had suddenly struggled to his feet. He stood swaying dizzily to and fro for an instant, and then snatching a revolver from the belt of the amazed soldier who stood beside him, fired point blank at one of his captors directly in front of him.

The man fell dead, and his murderer, with the smoking pistol still in his hand, tottered forward a step and sank in a heap on the corpse of his companion, with his face upon his breast and one arm about his neck.

Stranger! Well, however that may be so far, the strangest part is to come yet. Of course, you have suspected all along that the handsome boy was a woman? Well, he wasn't! and what was more, the pair, far from being the train robbers, were a worthy Texan drover and his son, who had sold out their beasts at North Platte and were on their way home with the money. They had eleven thousand dollars in coin with them, and probably fancied that our party were the robbers for whom we mistook them. The boys had the laugh on the Sheriff for many a long day after. For once his vaunted acuteness had failed him.

What was done with him? Why, great Scott! stranger, what do you suppose? Are we not all liable to make mistakes?

Natural History in Small Chunks.

THE LION.

"What is this?"
"This is a lion, called by some folks the king of beasts. Take a sharp look at him, so you may hereafter tell a lion from a mule."

"What is the color of a lion?"
"Their natural color is tawny. Where you see one fixed off with red, white and blue, you may be sure that some circus man has been painting him."

"Lions must be very strong?"
"So they are. It is a pity that their strength can not be used in drawing street cars."

"Are there any wild lions in this country?"
"Not very many; but then we'd advise you to get into the house as soon as night comes. Africa is the home of the lion. He has every chance to spread himself there; the nights are so warm that he doesn't have to draw his tail into his den for fear of frost."

"Can a lion carry an ox?"
"It is said that he can, but it would be far better for the ox to carry himself off before the lion got hold of him. There isn't much doubt that a lion could trot off quite easily with a rabbit."

"Does a lion ever attack a white man?"
"Very rarely. When a man is home at reasonable hours, keeps plenty of wood split, buys his wife four hats a year, and votes our ticket, he is not often disturbed by lions. They walk right past him to grab one of those fellows who will never lend his wheelbarrow or snow-shovel, and whose sidewalk is always in need of repairs."

"Do lions roar very loudly?"
"They do. The sound is almost as loud as that of a dish-pan falling off its nail in the dead of night."

"Why do they roar?"
"Naturalists differ about that. Some say that he roars to let the other denizens of the forest understand that he is on deck and ready to argue matters, and others assert that he roars when he has nothing else to do—just as Congressional speeches are made. The roar won't hurt you, no matter how they decide it."

"Can a lion catch a horse?"
"Yes, unless he stubs his toe or stops to pick up a tender and juicy child for luncheon."

"Can a man look a lion out of countenance?"
"That depends. Some of these modern defaulters and office-holders could look a lion out of countenance, with one eye shut. In ordinary cases it is better for the man who tries the experiment to be up a tree."

"Can the lion vanquish the elephant?"
"If the elephant had sore eyes, and had been speering around all night, and the ague was kind o' hovering up and down his spinal column, a lion would be apt to do so."

"Can a lion ever be tamed?"
"Never. After one has been jolted around the country with different circuses for twenty years, sold at bankrupt sale a dozen times, fed on shin-bones and shavings, and poked up with hot crowbars, he no sooner gets out of his cage than he eats ten or fifteen people and kills half as many more. You will always see an account of it in the papers just before the menagerie comes around.—Free Press.

They had been engaged about fifteen minutes and she nestled her head a little closer under the shadow of his monumental shirt collar, and whispered, "And now what are you going to call me, Algernon?"

"Birdie!" he whispered, rapturously, while his voice trembled with tender emotion, "always and ever, nothing but Birdie!" And she fairly cooed with delight.

He kept his word, although, with the growing precision of middle age, he has become specific and does not deal in sweeping generalities any more, and so it was that day before yesterday a neighbor going in the back way to borrow the axe, a cup of sugar and the cistern pole, heard him call her an old "sage hen."

NEW

BOOKS

The Vision of Echar, and other poems. By John Greenleaf Whittier. 12mo. $1.25
Catholicity, and its Relationship to Protestantism and Romanism. By Rev. F. C. Ever, S. T. D. 12mo. 1.50
What is the Bible? By J. T. Sunderland. 12mo. 1.00
A Rebel's Recollections. By George Cary Eggleston. New edition. 12mo. 1.00
Early Rome, from the Foundation of the City to its Destruction by the Gauls. By W. H. P. D. 12mo. 1.00
Van Dyck. Artist Biographies. 12mo. 50
Uncle Chesterton's Heir. By Mme. Colomb. Translated by Henry Frith. 12mo. 1.75
Marrying Off a Daughter (Marier sa Fille). By Henry Greville. Translated by Mary Neal Sherwood. 12mo. 1.25
Mildred Keith. By Martha Finley (Martha Farquharson). 12mo. 1.25

BANCROFT'S
721 MARKET ST. S.F.

FALK'S

MILWAUKEE BEER

If you are going overland, or on a picnic, or making a trip by steamboat or steamer, or visiting in the country, let us suggest that you take with you some of this celebrated Beer. It is the very best for these trips.
For sale by all dealers.

CUTTING & MURRAY,
Sole Agents, 206 Front Street, S. F.

BUTTERICK'S

PATTERNS—OCT. STYLES.

Send stamp for catalogue. AGENCY, 124 POST ST., San Francisco.

RETURNED.

HAVING RETURNED FROM THE
East, I respectfully announce to my friends and the public that I shall resume practice on WEDNESDAY, Sept. 5th, 1878.

S. W. DENNIS, M. D., DENTIST,
No. 33 KEARNY STREET.

HOME IN THE COUNTRY.

NOOK FARM.

FAMILIES WISHING TO SPEND
the Summer in the country will find this a cheerful home, and beautiful scenery of such endless variety as tempt to healthful exercise and recreation. We furnish good accommodations and an excellent table. Good fishing and hunting on the premises. Four trains from San Francisco pass the station daily. Address
E. B. SMITH,
Rutherford, Napa County, Cal.

AURORA

EXPORT

Bottled Lager Beer

Is decidedly the finest Beer in the market.

For Sale Everywhere. TRY IT.

R. D. HUME & CO., AGENTS.

221 FRONT STREET.

R. C. MOWBRAY, M. D., DENTIST
224 STOCKTON ST., corner Post, S. F.

RARE ENGRAVINGS
AND ETCHINGS.

W. K. VICKERY NOTIFIES HIS
customers and the public that he has removed to a larger and more convenient office at No. 23 Kearny Street (next door to Snow & May's), where he has a large collection of these beautiful and rare Works of Art. To those who can not visit his collection, he will be glad, on receipt of a postal card, to take a portfolio of Engravings for inspection at their residence any forenoon or evening. 23 Kearny Street. Hours, 10 to 5 P. M.

It does not say much for the amusement or instruction offered to us on the stage last week that we give the place of importance to the least satisfactory performance of La Fille de Madame Angot we have seen for a long time. This compliment we pay to the merits of the piece, low as it may place our opinion of the productions at the other "first class" theatres. The initial performance of the opera was worse than a dress rehearsal, and, save that Mrs. Oates has since put her whole soul into a part which suits her admirably—"Clairette"—the later representations show but little improvement. The previous week closed with La Perichole—a work considerably beyond the powers of the company generally. Mrs. Oates, as "La Perichole," had no opportunity for the display of her peculiar characteristics, and the piece had to depend mainly on the music and an old prisoner, played by Mr. Meade. There can be no doubt that the hard work of the past three years has been telling on Mrs. Oates' voice; and even if she were entirely rid of her objectionable cold, she is not what she once was. For this reason "La Perichole" was not a good performance; and Mr. Beverly, in the tenor part, was very unsatisfactory. It has never been our lot to hear such an irregular singer; at one time he sings an air with great effect, the next time without any; sometimes we think he has a good voice, and sometimes we think he has none. Neither the rest of the cast nor the chorus came out in any way brilliantly in La Perichole, and its withdrawal was wise. But La Fille de Madame Angot was not sufficiently rehearsed, and it will probably be withdrawn before we hear the company do their best in it. As it is, it seems to be beyond their power. It has scarcely been done at all in this city less satisfactorily than it is now played. Mrs. Oates, as "Clairette," puts in all the abandon of which she is capable, but she has eliminated the little piquancy she used to possess, and we have a picture of an unadulterated French flower girl without the grace or attraction. Mr. Beverly has no idea whatever of "Ange Pitou," and, as we have said, his singing is so uneven that it would be mistaken praise to call him a success. Mr. Connell is even more lumbering and heavy, and has less fun in him than the worst baritone Mrs. Oates has ever had in the part of "Larivaudiere," though he makes up a little for that when he gets a chance to sing. Mr. Taylor comes into comparison with two or three excellent representatives of "Pomponnet," and does not shine. He is not well cast in the part, being a broad comic actor, and not much of a singer. Besides our old favorite, Drew, was particularly well suited to "The Barber," and it was one of his best performances. The illness of Mr. Graham throws the management on the chorus for a "Louchard," and he does not perhaps deserve any severe criticism if he can not take Jones' place. "Trenitz" has been much better played than by Mr. Meade. Miss Stevens wants a great deal more experience of the stage before she can take the part of "Mlle. Lange." As it is, she has little conception of it, and her general style is opposed to the characteristics of the French woman of pleasure. Her voice will do when she can act. Altogether, it does not seem as if the company can grasp the opera. English people are bad enough in the line at the best of times, but Madame Angot seems to be too much for them in this case. The performance on Monday night terminated in confusion, the last act being simply ruined by the unpardonable conduct of all on the stage, as well as many in the audience. "Mlle. Lange," in her temper with "Clairette," fell in striking an attitude, and "Clairette" followed suit. The audience roared with laughter, and the entire following scene was lost between the howling of the audience and the hilarity of the actors. It is a very simple matter, evidently, to make San Francisco people laugh, and we have no doubt with the hint given, the "gag" will be inserted frequently. It matters but little what becomes of the music so long as the actors get a guffaw from the galleries.

With a regularity worthy of special notice, Mr. Williamson's engagements in San Francisco begin with success and end with failure. When we see Struck Oil announced, we know that the popularity of "John Stofel" and "Luzie," both in their dramatic and private characters, will draw crowded houses. We know that Mr. Williamson will be un-entirely praised by the newspapers, and that Mrs. Williamson will be applauded for her acting, and encored in her songs; we know that the two will be set down as the most finished Dutch impersonators on the stage; we know that Struck Oil will be withdrawn on its second week, and an Irish play substituted; and that very thereupon Mr. Williamson will sink into an uninteresting position, and Mrs. Williamson's friends will forgive her acting for her pleasing voice. The audience will fall off; Struck Oil will be revived, and show by its comparatively brilliant success again what weak positions the lady and gentleman hold as actor and actress. This seems the usual routine of Mr. and Mrs. Williamson's experience, and yet they persist in drawing the money with the Dutch play, and dropping it with the Irish drama. We are inevitably told that Barney Williams made a success in The Emerald Ring, or whatever play Mr. Williamson elects to produce; and the money he has missed or lost in a vain endeavor to repeat Barney Williams' great success represents a moderate fortune. The public have forgotten Barney Williams, and we doubt if, were he still alive, he would not find it necessary to materialize some of his defunct plays. If Dion Boucicault has done us any service, it is that he has made the Irish drama much more attractive to us than it was in the days of The Fairy Circle. If he could not put intelligence and coherence into it, at least he has spiced the incoherence with startling stage effects and thrilling climax. He has made much more effective use of the old, old mythical legends of English tyranny, has made the laziness of the Irish peasantry a theme of praise; he has idealized the coarse, almost barbaric life of the most discontented race on the face of the earth; and he has reduced absurdity and extravagance of sentiment to a remunerative and attractive form; and Barney Williams with his noddily sentimental dialogues, his weak, half-hearted villainy, his Irish songs and dances, sinks into insignificance before the dramatic idol of Ireland and the Irish. But Mr. Williamson is weaker than Barney Williams. As if The Emerald Ring was not sufficiently tempting fate, Mr. Williamson has damaged Mrs. Williamson's reputation by putting up The Child of the Regiment. It is a very poor play to begin with. The motive is very simple, the material is slight, and it shows no attempt whatever at dramatic construction. As the piece de resistance of an evening's entertainment it is too unimportant, even if the leading part were filled with music sung by a first-class artist. It would be unattractive, under ordinary circumstances, even as an afterpiece; and there are many farces much more worthy of a place on the bills. Mrs. Williamson is a clever artist in her line. She plays an Irish or Dutch girl admirably; she possesses a good voice, plenty of animal spirits, and she is full of fun and life; but she cannot play "The Child of the Regiment." It is perhaps unfortunate that she should have tried it, for her performance of "Josephine" is only illustrative of the erroneous judgment she has formed of her powers, from her popularity in the song and dance line. When she is dealing with "Hit him Again" and "My Grandfather's Clock" she knows exactly what she is doing. She can put her soul into the patriotism of an Irish song, and she knows exactly what will fetch the gallery; but when she attempts the operatic, the lack of training shows in every note. To hope to carry The Child of the Regiment through with good singing was excusable; but she is not at home in the music, and, in "Josephine," she made a superficial coarseness produce all the effect, and presented us with no artistic conception of the part beyond that. The entire performance throws a shadow of doubt upon her capabilities as an actress. We have the fact established that she can do an Irish or Dutch girl—no more. Although "Josephine" is not a high dramatic part, her playing of it showed that conception of character is not her distinguishing feature. Mr. Williamson played "Sealade," but any body might do that. Mr. Bishop always manages to make something out of even the meanest part, and his "Pumpernickel" caused a ripple of laughter occasionally. The others call for no special mention. A stranger visiting Baldwin's last week would have doubted that Mr. Maguire had one of the most expensive and strongest companies in the United States. On Tuesday and Thursday Struck Oil was played, and last night Mr. and Mrs. Williamson had a benefit.

The prestige of the California is now tradition. Its glory seems to have departed, and the home of the respectable and legitimate, the theatre which Californians held up as a model to the United States, the place that never knew a second-class performer, and that was sealed against every thing not high art, seems to be now a refuge for any thing that can be got to come. Is it to end a glorious career so? Or will the management take fresh courage, and sacrifice a few quarters in the gallery for a few dollars in the dress circle? When the old management undertook to play one of the best companies in the United States, and to star variety performers, and replaced the artistic drama with vulgar gallery pieces, it sealed its doom. From that time it was doubted, and people who in its palmy days scarcely thought of looking at the bill before they went, always feeling sure of a high class performance, took to careful study of the pieces and the actors as they paid their dollar or took their seats. We look back upon the history of the California for eleven years, and there is the point clearly marked where its fortunes really turned. The new management have staid on an economical basis. They have deliberately procured a second-class, cheap company, and trust to luck to carry them through. So far luck has not been altogether with them, and luck is, more than any thing else, good management. Up to this week it was not open, perhaps, to the critic to censure them. The stars they brought rendered a first-class company a needless expense; and even in the present instance the company is not the bone of contention. The Streets of New York is the objection, not entirely because of the piece or the star, but because of the general tone given to the production. If there is a play on the stage which serves no purpose but to amuse a hoodlum gallery, which presents a contemptible plot, a thoroughly unreal and injurious motive, and which panders to a morbid and dangerous moral sentiment, it is Boucicault's hash of improbable people in impossible situations, dialogue without taste or meaning, and stage effects that ought to disgust even the lowest classes, called The Streets of New York. The dime novels of the worst kind, the thrilling stories in cheap hoodlum newspapers, and the slums of a great city, furnish the heroes. If we owned the name of Livingston—a name honored and respected in New York—we should sue Boucicault for defamation of character, for bringing it in such a piece. Artistically speaking, "Kadger" reveals to us that Mr. Mayo's "Davy Crockett" is a piece of careful rehearsal. It does not seem possible that any man, capable of forming a true opinion of the backwoodsman and of appreciating the beauty and nobility of the character, roughly as it is set, could possibly bring himself to play such a contemptible part as the impossibly low bank clerk, the rough Bowery boy, finishing up in a virtuous rôle as a policeman. It seems to us that this "star" business is not only a mistake, but it is mismanaged. A manager of a theatre, in making up his list for the season, sets down therein the leading known stars, and engages them, apparently without the least regard to what they are going to play. It does not appear to be customary to interfere with them when they come. If Crane and Robson had requested that the company should be cast for The Two Gentlemen of Verona, we suppose Mr. Hill could not have said no. The entire charge of the theatre is given over to the leading attraction of the moment; and, as a rule, the management has to bear the loss accruing from any error in judgment. This is how it looks to the public. There are not half a dozen people who travel with star pieces who are qualified to play out of them, or in them all, or even to decide upon which of them they play best. Mr. Mayo is engaged for the fourth time, and for the fourth time he plays Davy Crockett and The Streets of New York. Maggie Mitchell comes and gives Fanchon, Mignon, and Birds of Passage, apparently without any consultation with the management as to which of them they will risk most upon. We suppose we shall have the Florences in The Mighty Dollar, and No Thoroughfare again, and Raymond as Colonel Sellers, even if he has a new play to fall back upon. The moral of the late engagements is, that if the management had procured a strong company and trusted mainly to it, even if they had to get some stars, the season would have been more remunerative and less expensive, and the balance would probably have been on the right side of the book more heavily, if it happens to be there now. In addition, the public would have been pleased. But we do not blame Mr. Mayo for playing a piece he knew would fill the gallery, when Davy Crockett failed to fill either that or the dress circle. He knows what is best for his own reputation possibly. Every man has the right, even before the public, to decide what reputation he desires; but the management, we presume, are responsible for the contemptible display of Irish and Chinese specialties, which must have disgusted all sensible people. They were on as low a scale as we have ever seen on the boards of a second-class variety show. Witless, pointless, vulgar, and coarse, they were not accepted with any enthusiasm by the gods, while the audience in the dress circle were forbearing enough only to hiss when a feeble attempt was made up stairs to have them repeated. There has never been anything so common on the California Theatre stage. Had they been offered in Paris or London the gallery itself would have been benchless. The acting does not call for any comment. Mr. Felix I. Morris, the new comedian, was unfortunate enough to make his first appearance in "Dan," a part which, if it is supposed to be his line, shows him to be a poor actor. The scenery was worthy of a better piece. The California must look to its laurels if it wishes to retain its reputation as a first-class theatre. It is missing a chance of making money which may pass away at any moment, and which may not return for years. Stocks do not "boom" all the time.

On Monday night A Woman of the People will be presented for the first time at Baldwin's, and the occasion will be taken to tender Mr. Maguire a benefit. Miss Rose Wood plays the leading part, and we notice a new name on the bill, a Miss Louise Maurice, who is said to be not altogether a debutante. The play is by d'Ennery, one of his early efforts, and we can only hope that it will come up to The Celebrated Case. It has one misfortune as compared with that success. It has not Mr. Cazauran to superintend it, and it wants the prestige of the Union Square Company, that fiction having been dropped. Mother and Son, Sardou's new piece is mentioned as in the future, but nothing certain is announced. We shall soon know what that arrangement with Sardou really amounts to.

MOURZOUK.

ARTISTIC DRESSING.

Eastern and foreign journals have more than once of late commented on the exquisite taste in dress of the ladies of San Francisco, indeed, it is getting to be one of the most marked features of our society, a fact which our local press as well has not been behind hand in mentioning. There are two reasons why our ladies should be thus singled out for this just praise: One is that they are among the handsomest in the United States, both as to beauty of face and symmetry of figure, embracing, as they do, every variety of type, from the fairest Saxon to the dark-eyed daughter of the South; the other, that there is probably no city of its size within the same limits so well catered for in all that go to make up faultless toilettes. We were more than ever impressed by the latter fact during a late visit to the White House, which establishment, as is well known, keeps several purchasing agents resident in Europe for the purpose of procuring the freshest novelties. A brief mention of a few of the most noticeable will serve to illustrate. Among them was a carriage-dress of a fanlike insertion of broche of the same color and garnished with ribbons in five different shades; a combination toilette of the new Turkish satin in moss green, with a garnet court train, having an oddly arranged revers of ivory satin, hand embroidered, running down the side, and similar bands in front; another of bronze silk, with a deep shirred flounce, lined with variegated brocade, and having a plaited brocade train and basque waist. A still more noticeable costume was a reception dress of fawn silk; court train, bottom reversed with bronze silk, the Princess top being made of the fawn color, brocaded with pink and bronze. An extremely stylish and unique toilette was composed of dark blue Duchesse satin combined with rich brocade of gold, bronze and red, and finished with a superb chenille fringe. A vest of the blue Princess sides and coat-tail back completed the combination. In all black reception dresses, a Turkish satin combined with moire, full train, and belted across the front of the waist was very elegant. Walking suits were well represented by combinations of camel's hair goods in garnet, moss green, brown and fawn, and velvet, the latter material being used mainly in the diagonal striped rather than the plain goods. One especially, Nan Dyck red, combined camel's hair, velvet, and rich shirrings of silk. The basque waist is much in vogue for these. A very quaint costume, and one that will prove exceedingly popular with a rapidly increasing class of brisk business women, is one of invisible green plaid goods, made with a perfect coat back, cut-away coat front, finished by rows of stitching in red, silk, and brass buttons. A separate vest, modeled exactly after the masculine garment, a looped overskirt, with the same style of trimming, complete what is known as the "Vienneuse Costume." In cloaks we noticed a long sack of black satin, trimmed back and front, with jet passanterie, the bottom of the skirt and the neck and sleeves finished with heavy quiltings of black silk. A Dolman of the same rich material displayed a cape back, square front tabs, and short, closed sleeves, and was finished with garnitures of jet passanterie down the back and front, and a double row of mingled fringe and lace headed by the same. A black Sicilienne paletot, the back inserted with satin, the front simulating a vest, also of satin, and covered with jet and fringe. Something entirely novel was a material in silk and wool resembling Turkish toweling, and in the fashionable fawn color, of which a wrap (the back a double cape) was made. The et ceteras to this charming model were passanterie and fringe in the same shade. While the expensive importations are a specialty with this house, it must be remembered that the home work in all these lines reaches a much higher figure, hundreds of suits, cloaks, and ball costumes being sent out every season, and not only through the city and adjacent country, but to the East, and even to the French capital itself, the regular stock presenting as great a variety in the finest classes of goods as can be found anywhere. For example, in the new worsted goods, whose name is legion, we saw no less than seventy-five different styles, including the new invisible plaids, the various modifications of the bonnet cloths, serges, bouges, camels' hair goods, chudach cloths, cassimeres, and the heavier cloths for walking suits. For all these, with a perfection of shading that is almost surprising, come the accompanying velvets—plain, ribbed, embossed, and charmingly brocaded in colors—as well as satins, plain and figured; silks, embroidered, satin-striped, figured, and plain. In the latter goods, elegant designs in the newly revived polka dots are shown, and combinations of satin and moire stripes are among the newest patterns; these in every known color and shade. Combined with an experienced corps of assistants, it is no wonder that this house stands unrivaled on the Pacific Coast for elegance of design and workmanship. Mention must particularly be made of recently imported ball costumes, among which are several of the exquisite fabric known as mouseline de l'Inde, heavily embroidered with variegated designs, and flowers in the natural colors; white tulles, embroidered in white chenille, and others literally sown with seed pearls combined with silk embroidery; some worked in silk with heavy wreaths of marguerites, pinks, and ferns; and still others with a garniture of chenille forget-me-nots, red and tea roses, will rival any evening toilets that have yet appeared. Bands of similar trimmings, to be applied to silk or satin costumes, also come by the yard; and the same style of garniture, composed of seed pearls, fine white chenille, and a hair line of gold bullion running through the whole, are among the most striking novelties of the season. Silk crepe flowers, hand-embroidered in colors, and strips of black satin of a similar character, and for the ornamentation of the favorite "Princesse," are also new. Artificial flowers seem to have reached the limit of perfection, if one may judge from the fleurs and clusters designed to accompany these costumes—notably a wreath of primroses, heath, and mignonette; another composed entirely of the pale pink sweet pea blossom; and a wonderfully life-like mass of "maiden hair" and other varieties of ferns; while brunettes are remembered in a massive wreath of scarlet poppies mingled with field daisies. For the little ones, whose costumes keep even pace with those of their mammae, are elegant models in suits and coats, the latter showing combinations of fawn-colored canvas cloths with peacock green velvet trimmings, cream white velvet cloth and navy blue velvet, with pearl buttons, besides darker cloths for every-day wear. Suits are still in "Princesse" form, a navy blue striped velvet, with a vest of white satin and small plain gilt buttons, being one of the many handsome samples for a miss of ten or twelve. A pink cashmere, trimmed with figured blue broche and pearl fastenings, was also piquant and pretty. Hosiery has attained so great importance in considering the make-up of a toilette that no details are complete without its special mention. Something new is being devised at nearly every change of the moon, and we have now, both in light and dark colors, and both for out-door and evening wear, dozens of different fancies. The most elegant, however, are in two colors, or one embroidered in a second. These can be had in silk, as well as open-work silk thread, and in either quality in the most minute gradations of color, to match with the prevailing tints in dress goods, and in all sizes and designs. We of San Francisco are most largely indebted to Messrs. Davidson & Co. for the extensive cultivation of taste in all these respects, through their unequalled business energy and tact, that not only watches every interest at home with appreciation, but ensures the constant purchase abroad, through experienced and artistic buyers, of the freshest novelties.

Have you seen the new style of "Montagues" at Sullivan's, No. 120 Kearny Street?

The papers bring us mean insinuations against our esteemed friend, Bret Harte. They actually say that he tried to enjoin Mitts to make a little money. Nonsense! There is one other sensible reason why Bret Harte should wish to withdraw Mitts. It does not do him much credit. He was very likely afraid he might be accused of writing the play.

Just received at Sullivan's, No. 120 Kearny Street, a large invoice of new goods, comprising the latest models for cloaks, dolmans, ulsters, and other out-door wraps. Also, a heavy line of ladies' and children's suits, ladies' morning wrappers in every variety of trimming and material, and a particularly taking model known as the "Montague." All kinds of cloths, Siciliennes, and other suitings, constantly being renewed from abroad, as well as the very latest designs in buttons and other cloak fastenings, whalebone, and other fringes, tassels, chenille, and all kinds of trimmings and garnitures. Mourning suits made at the shortest notice.

Messrs. Doane & Henshelwood, No. 1 Montgomery Street, are this week offering some extraordinary bargains in the celebrated "Bon marché" make of black silks, as well as fine embroidered velvets, satins, and "Pekiniades." Also, a large line of fancy and Scotch plaid suitings, camels' hair cloths, etc. Fine table linens from Brown & Sons, of Belfast, are a specialty of this house. Ladies', gentlemen's, and children's underwear, the Union flannel suit, and many choice novelties in neckties, satin and plush ribbons, bows, and other articles of neck-wear, always in stock, and of the latest importations. Fine lace goods and ruchings constantly on hand. The Harris seamless gloves also a specialty.

Have you seen the new styles of "Montagues" at Sullivan's, No. 120 Kearny Street?

You will never look again exactly as you look now. There is matter of reflection here for those who are looking their best now. Perhaps you can not afford an oil portrait till Sierra Nevada gets up to a good selling figure. Then get a photograph, and the superior picture can be painted from that. Dames & Hayes, at 715 Market Street, take photographs that are better likenesses than the human face. It is true; all the incongruities, the inconsistencies, the faults of nature, that quarrel with the general effect, disappear in these pictures—melt out, as it were. They make the sun an artist, in short. How it is done—with what magic of posing, or witchery of light and shade—how should we know?

BOSTON DRESS REFORM.

California "Worth" Princess Suits, Skirts, and attachable Flounces: Cashmere and Merino Union Suits for ladies and children; ladies' and misses' shoulder-brace Corsets; Abdominal Corsets. No. 430 Sutter Street. A. W. BAKER, the only Dress Reform Agent in the city.

This paper is printed with ink furnished by Chas. Eneu Johnson & Co., 509 South Tenth Street, Philadelphia, and 59 Gold Street, New York.

Mrs. Parker, of the Ladies' Depository, has opened a new store at 126 Post Street. Dolls dressed in all styles. New Lace Patterns.

BUSH STREET THEATRE.

CHARLES E. LOCKE.....PROPRIETOR.

Continued success of the American Prima Donna Comedienne,

ALICE OATES,

And her

ENGLISH COMIC OPERA COMPANY.

SATURDAY AND SUNDAY EVENINGS, Oct. 12 & 13
SATURDAY MATINEE AT 2 P. M.,

LA FILLE DE MME. ANGOT.

In preparation, the latest Parisian furor,

LE PETIT DUC.

Reserved seats at box office six days in advance.

CALIFORNIA THEATRE.

BARTON & LAWLOR.....MANAGERS.
BARTON HILL.....ACTING MANAGER.

LAST WEEK OF

MR. FRANK MAYO.

Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday, Oct. 14, 15, 16, 17, positively last four nights of the great success,

STREETS OF NEW YORK,

With its great Fire Scene, and others attractive specialties.

Friday, Oct. 18 (Farewell Benefit of Frank Mayo); also, Saturday Matinee and Evening, Schiller's great play,

THE ROBBERS.

Monday, October 21, magnificent production of

FATANITZA,

And first appearance in English of MATHILDE COTTELLY and MAX FREEMAN.

JUST RECEIVED AND ON EXHIBITION

.....AT.....

THE WHITE HOUSE

On Monday, October 14th, and during NEXT WEEK,

The largest and most complete line of

PARISIAN NOVELTIES

.....IN.....

DRESS GOODS AND SILKS,
SATINS IN PLAIN AND STRIPES,
VELVETS IN PEKIN AND BROCHE.

.....ALSO, OUR.....

NEW PARIS COSTUMES FOR LADIES & CHILDREN.

OUR HOSIERY DEPARTMENT

Will be found the most complete in the city.

THE NEWEST STYLES IN LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S

Lisle, Silk, Balbriggan, and Fancy Cotton.

J. W. DAVIDSON & CO.

Northwest corner Kearny and Post Streets.

NEW IMPORTATION OF THE LATEST STYLES OF EMBROIDERIES

OF EVERY DESIGN.

ALSO, CANVAS OF NEW COLORS.
Ladies' Shopping Baskets of unique shapes.
Bronzes, Clocks, Ivory Carvings, Toilet and Fancy Goods, Vienna Bronze Ornaments.

H. SIERING & CO.

(SUCCESSORS TO LOCAN & CO.)

19 MONTGOMERY STREET,
LICK HOUSE BLOCK.

BALDWIN'S THEATRE.

THOMAS MAGUIRE.....MANAGER.
F. LYSTER.....ACTING MANAGER.
G. R. CHIPMAN.....TREASURER.

Last Nights of the Successful Engagement of

MR. & MRS. J. C. WILLIAMSON
(MISS MAGGIE MOORE).

This (Saturday) Afternoon, at 2 o'clock,

STRUCK OIL.

Saturday and Sunday Evenings, Oct. 12 and 13,

CLOUDS AND SUNSHINE, - THE FOOL OF THE FAMILY, -

—AND—
THE CHINESE QUESTION.
SPECIAL NOTICE.

Monday, Oct. 14, COMPLIMENTARY BENEFIT to

MR. THOMAS MAGUIRE.

First performance in San Francisco of

A WOMAN OF THE PEOPLE,

In a prologue and five tableaux, adapted from the French of A. d'Ennery, author of "A Celebrated Case," and "The Two Orphans."

DECKER BROS

COMPLICATED WATCHES

CHRONOGRAPH,
REPEATING,
SPLIT SECONDS, ETC.

AND A LARGE STOCK OF GOLD
and Silver Watches, Chains, Diamonds, Jewelry,
Silver Ware, and Fancy Goods at

ANDERSON & RANDOLPH'S

CORNER OF

MONTGOMERY AND SUTTER STS.,
SAN FRANCISCO.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

The New Republic. By W. H. Mallock. Cloth.....$1 50
Music and Some Highly Musical People. By J. M. Trotter. Cloth.....2 50
Short History of Canada, from 1500 to 1878. By Chas. R. Tuttle. Cloth.....4 00
Historical Student's Manual. By Alfred Waite. Clo. 75
The Boy Trapper. By Harry Castleman. Cloth.....1 25
Growth of the Steam Engine. By R. H. Thurston. Cloth.....2 50
How to Parse. By E. A. Abbott. Cloth.....1 00
History of Music. By H. C. B. Hunt. Cloth.....1 00
Sound. By A. M. Mayer. Cloth.....1 00
Primer of American Literature. By C. F. Richardson. Cloth.....50
Roxa. A Novel. By Edward Eggleston. Cloth.....1 50
The Secret of Three Generations. By Kate C. Barton. Paper.....50
The Law of Population. By Annie Besant. Paper.....50
Sea Bathing. Its Use and Abuse. Paper.....25

NEW STATIONERY

RECEIVED DAILY.

BILLINGS, HARBOURNE & CO.,
BOOKSELLERS AND STATIONERS,
NO. 3 MONTGOMERY STREET.

PUBLIC ADMINISTRATOR,

WILLIAM DOOLAN,

Office No. 12 Nevada Block.

PIANOS ARE THE BEST

ARE YOU

INSURED?

THE TRAVELERS

LIFE AND ACCIDENT

INSURANCE CO.

OF HARTFORD, CONN.,

GRANTS

Life and Endowment Policies,

LOW RATES, ALL CASH.

ALSO,

GENERAL ACCIDENT POLICIES

Solid Cash Assets.....$4,460,000
Surplus to Policy Holders.....1,225,000

Parties contemplating Life Insurance are invited to call before insuring elsewhere.

ALEX. M. DEAN, Gen'l Ag't,

NO. 403 CALIFORNIA ST., S. F.

NEW BOOKS AT ROMAN'S.

Sensible Etiquette. By Mrs. Ward.....$2 00
Walks in London. By Hare. 1 vol., $3 50; 2 vols. 3 00
Little Good for Nothing. By Alphonse Daudet.....1 50
In Paradise. By Paul Heyse. 2 vols., cloth.....2 00
Shakespeare's Tragedy of Hamlet. Edited by W. J. Rolfe.....90
Lectures on Medieval Church History. Richard Crevier Trench, D. D., Ph. D.....3 00
Early Rome. W. Ince, Ph. D.....3 00
A History of Roman Literature. Charles Thomas Crutwell, M. A.....2 50
The Great German Composers. Paper.....30
The Life of the Honorable Benjamin Disraeli. Sheets. 10
Scientific Memoirs. John W. Draper.....3 00
Villages and Village Life. N. H. Egleston.....1 75
Lessons in Cookery. Ed. by Eliza A. Youmans.....1 50
Illustrated History of Ancient Literature, Oriental and Classical. J. D. Quackenbos. Illustrated. 1 75
French Revolution. H. A. Taine. Tr. by J. Durand. Vol. I.....2 50
A Concise History of Music. H. G. Bonavia Hunt, B. Mus., etc.....1 00
Researches into the Early History of Mankind and the Development of Civilization. Edward B. Tylor.....3 50

A. ROMAN & CO.,

11 Montgomery Street,

Lick House Block,

San Francisco.

PALMER BROS.

726 TO 734 MARKET ST.,

Have a full assortment of

LADIES' AND GENTS' FURNISHing Goods, Toilet Articles, Corsets, Embroideries, French and Valenciennes Laces, a fine assortment of Veil-ings and Ruchings, and the largest stock of

MILLINERY GOODS,

And the best stock of

BOYS' CLOTHING AND HATS & CAPS
In the city.

KEANE BROS.

WOULD RESPECTFULLY ASK A
visit of inspection to their new departments.

CLOAKS, SUITS, COSTUMES,

Etc., etc. Ladies will find only the latest novelties of this season's production from London, Paris, Berlin, and New York. Our cutters and fitters are thoroughly reliable, and combined with moderate charges we can confidently ask a share of public patronage.
All the newest materials and latest designs are to be found in our Silk and French Dress Goods Departments.

KEANE BROS.

107, 109, 111, AND 113

KEARNY STREET, SAN FRANCISCO.

BEST KOHLER & CHASE

SAN FRANCISCO
& OAKLAND

PETER COOPER AND THE BOYS.

A correspondent of the Cincinnati Enquirer writes: I met the venerable Peter Cooper yesterday. He is now eighty-eight years old, and still drives down town almost every day, in his old-fashioned one-horse carriage.

In person, Mr. Cooper looks strikingly. He wears his white hair long, hanging down his back. His hat is a wide-brimmed Kossuth; his nose is arched like a parrot's beak, and over his eyes he wears huge eight-cornered goggles. He looks as if he had come down from the last century.

"The year I was born," said Mr. Cooper, "New York had only 27,000 people. It was about half as large as Syracuse."

"Do you feel as if you had outlived all your companions, Mr. Cooper?" I asked.

"Yes, I have outlived them all. Bryant was four years younger than I. Richard H. Dana, now ninety-one, is only two and a half years older than I am; he is about the only old friend left. There is a class of boys, like George Lincoln, Emerson, and Longfellow, however, coming on, who—"

"What! Do you call Emerson and Longfellow boys?" I interrupted.

"Why, yes. Longfellow is seventeen years younger than I am, and Emerson is thirteen years younger. Thomas Carlyle is now eighty-three; he would be a very proper companion for me; but Tennyson, who is sixty-nine, and Tupper, who is sixty-eight, are altogether too young and frisky for old Peter Cooper."

"Yes," continued Mr. Cooper, "my old friends are all dead—Morse, Greeley, Seward, Chase, Farragut, General Scott—all gone! I can ride the whole length of Broadway now and not see a single familiar face."

"At what age do public men generally die?" I asked.

"Well, they generally die under seventy. Death will make fearful havoc among the fifty-year old men during the next twenty years. Not one in fifty will live to be older than seventy; not one in a hundred will live to be as old as I am."

"Let's see; s-e-v-e-n-t-y," mused Mr. Cooper. "Suppose all of our public men should die at the age of seventy, and after I am dead—say twenty years from now—suppose some young man like Webb Hayes should call the roll—that is, the death-roll in 1897?"

This is the way the great men now living would answer, "provided they died at the age of seventy," said Mr. Cooper, figuring on a slate:

Ex-Senator Hendricks? Answer. "Let's see. Hendricks is fifty-eight," mused Mr. Cooper. "He's got twelve years to live if he dies at seventy. So the answer in 1897, twenty years from now, would be, he died eight years ago."

"And the others," continued Mr. Cooper, continuing his figuring on a slate, "would answer this way:

Charles Reade? Answer. Died fourteen years ago, aged seventy.

Oliver Optic? Answer. Died six years ago, aged seventy.

Senator Thurman? Answer. Died in 1882, aged seventy.

Robert Browning? Been dead sixteen years.

Mark Twain? Got only seven years to live.

George W. Curtis? Died four years ago.

Ralph Waldo Emerson? Been dead twenty-five years.

Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe? Died sixteen years ago.

Martin Tupper? Been dead eighteen years.

Walter Collins? Died three years ago.

John Ruskin? Been dead nine years.

John G. Saxé? Died twelve years ago.

Henry W. Longfellow? Died twenty-one years ago.

T. H. Huxley? Been dead three years.

Oliver Wendell Holmes? Been dead eighteen years.

Simon Cameron? Died twenty-five years ago.

Charles A. Dana? Been dead eleven years.

Alexander H. Stephens? Don't remember any such man.

Samuel J. Tilden? Died twenty years ago.

Henry Ward Beecher? Been dead eighteen years.

Bret Harte? Got eleven years more to live.

Susan B. Anthony? Died fourteen years ago.

George Eliot? Died in 1850, aged seventy years.

Darwin? Been dead nineteen years.

Swineburne? Got to die in nine years.

Eli Perkins? Must die in eleven years.

Donald G. Mitchell? Been dead six years.

Jeff Davis? Don't remember when he died.

"Won't it be a sad thought to you, that you, who are now thirty-nine, will probably live to see all those great names pass away?" mused Mr. Cooper.

"The babe in arms to-day, twenty years from now," said a friend standing by, "will look upon poor dead Ben Butler, Tennyson, Beecher, Longfellow, and Emerson as we now look upon Edgar A. Poe, Thomas Paine, Tom Corwin, and Sam J. Tilden. I use Mr. Tilden's name among the very dead men," he said, "because one arm, one ear left, one eyelid, and one leg which Mr. Tilden carries around have been paralyzed and dead for years. In fact, half of Sam Tilden has been dead for twenty years, which is the same to the public, for the purposes of science, as if the old man had entirely died ten years ago."

A correspondent of the New York Times writes: You probably saw the story of the row in the palace car. Some wag, observing Mr. Beecher hanging his hat, with some pains, on a peg immediately over his berth, managed to detain him in the smoking-room until all had retired, slipped out, and removed the hat to a peg over the berth of an antiquated lady of single propensities. When Mr. Beecher essayed to retire there was a shriek, and every head was popped out to see what the row was all about, and there stood Mr. Beecher, amazed, while Mrs. Beecher, from the adjoining berth, exclaimed: "Oh, Henry!"

Patrick Mulvey, a well known political aspirant, was found by his friend in a saloon the other day looking very dissatisfied and weary. "Why, Pat, what's the matter, you look as blue as a road under a harrow." "Fart and I've good reason to be. We've had twins in the family, and then twins is born politicians. They are alternates, and work the ward lively. One yells all day, and the other yells all night, and, begorra, between the two I haven't kept a wink for the last tin day."

Brightly shines the moon, lightly laughs the loon as he dabbles with the spoon of a two shilling stew.

"How can we help our town?" asks a Chicago

"And you ever try leaving it?"

ARLINGTON HOTEL,

SANTA BARBARA, CAL.

NO HOTEL ON THE PACIFIC
Coast can surpass the ARLINGTON in the airy cheerfulness and convenience of its arrangements. None can equal it in the natural and artistic beauty of its surroundings. The readers of the ARGONAUT will be pleased to know that the problem of combining solid comfort within doors, inexhaustible pleasure without, and calm contentment all the time, at a very economical rate of expenditure, has been solved at the ARLINGTON, and is respectfully submitted by
GEO. T. BROMLEY, Manager.

BERKELEY GYMNASIUM.

The Berkeley Gymnasium (a preparatory school to the University)—a first-class boarding-school establishment in the interests of higher education, and in opposition to the cramming system of the small colleges and military academies of the State. The next term will commence July 24th. Examination of candidates for admission July 22d and 23d. By request, instructions have been provided during the summer months for students preparing for the August examinations at the University. For catalogue or particulars, address

JOHN F. BURRIS, PRINCIPAL,
BERKELEY, CALIFORNIA.

NOTE.—We desire to call special attention to the organization of our Grammar Department, separate from the Academic, and solicit the patronage of parents and guardians of small boys.

GOLDEN GATE ACADEMY

AND CADET SCHOOL.

Next quarter will commence October 7, 1878.
For circulars, address

D. P. SACKETT, A. M., Principal,
Oakland, Cal.

REDINGTON'S

FLAVORING EXTRACTS

ARE THE PERFECTLY PURE
and highly concentrated Extracts of

FRESH FRUITS

Prepared with great care. They are put up in superior style, in a bottle holding twice as much as ordinary brands of Extracts.

Comparing quality and contents, none other are nearly so cheap.

Wherever tested on THEIR MERITS, they have been adopted in preference to all others, and now are the

STANDARD FLAVORING EXTRACTS

Of the Pacific coast. Dealers will find them to give better satisfaction to the consumers than any other kind and are respectfully requested to give them a trial.

REDINGTON & CO.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

O. F. WILLEY & CO.,

IMPORTERS AND MANUFACTURERS OF

FINE CARRIAGES AND WAGONS

No. 427 MONTGOMERY ST., SAN FRANCISCO.

Agents for the sale of Wagons manufactured by
BREWSTER & CO., New York.
W. D. ROGERS, Philadelphia.
C. S. CAFFEY, Camden, N. J.
WOOD BROTHERS, New York.
H. KILLAM & CO., New Haven.
COOLING BROS., Wilmington.

ALSO, AGENTS FOR
HAKNEY MANUFACTURED BY WOOD GIBSON,
TOMPKINS & MANDEVILLE, AND
A. H. DUNCOMB.

Also, a fine assortment of Robes, Blankets, Nets, Whips, etc.

MILLER & RICHARD,

SOLE MAKERS OF
EXTRA-HARD METAL
SCOTCH TYPE.

SPECIAL AGENTS FOR
THE CAMPBELL, HOE, AND PEERLESS
PRESSES.

No. 329 COMMERCIAL STREET.
And 203 Leidesdorff Street, San Francisco.

GEO. W. PRESCOTT. IRVING M. SCOTT. H. T. SCOTT.

UNION IRON WORKS

(Founded 1849.) Post Office Box 2128.

COR. FIRST AND MISSION STREETS,
SAN FRANCISCO

MANUFACTURERS OF
Compressed Engines,
Air Compressors,
Rock Drills,
Portable Hoisting Engines,
Marine Stationary and Portable Boilers
Baby Hoists, complete.

CONSTANTLY ON HAND AND FOR SALE.

Direct-acting Pumping and Hoisting Engines,
Upright and Stationary Engines,
Quartz Crushing and Amalgamating Machinery,
Blake's Rock Breakers,
Smelting Furnaces,
Quicksilver Pumps,
Chloridizing Furnaces,
Cornish Pumps,
Steam Pumps.

All manufactured by us of the best materials, design, and workmanship, and furnished at lower rates than by Eastern manufacturers.
PRESCOTT, SCOTT & CO.

J. H. JONES & CO.,

Member S. F. Stock and Exchange Board,

STOCK AND EXCHANGE BROKERS
Office, 320 Pine Street, San Francisco.

CHAS. N. FOX. M. E. KELLOGG.

FOX & KELLOGG,

ATTORNEYS AND COUNSELORS
AT LAW, San Francisco, Cal.

Office, No. 550 California Street, Rooms 1, 2, and 3.

S. B. WAKEFIELD, A. W. FOSTER.

Member S. F. Stock and Exchange Board.

S. B. WAKEFIELD & CO.

STOCK & EXCHANGE BROKERS,
314 Pine Street, San Francisco.

FRANK KENNEDY,

ATTORNEY AT LAW, 604 MERCHANT STREET, Room 16. Probate divorce, bankruptcy, and all other cases attended to.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District, of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

MARY E. HENRY, plaintiff, vs. JAMES J. HENRY, defendant.—An action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to JAMES J. HENRY, defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District, of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days; otherwise within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony existing between plaintiff and defendant (as will appear more fully by reference to the complaint on file herein, to which your attention is hereby directed), and for general relief and costs of suit.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this Third day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight.

THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.
By W. STEVENSON, Deputy Clerk.
T. J. CROWLEY, Attorney for Plaintiff,
No. 629 Kearny Street.

OFFICE OF THE SIERRA NEVADA

Silver Mining Company, San Francisco, October 2d, 1878.—In accordance with a resolution adopted at a meeting of the Trustees of the Sierra Nevada Silver Mining Company, held this day, a special meeting of the stockholders of said Company is hereby called, the same to be held at the office of the Company, Room 47, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California, on Monday, the fourth (4th) day of November, 1878, at two (2) o'clock P. M., to take into consideration and decide upon the proposition to increase the capital stock of said Company from ten million ($10,000,000) dollars, divided into one hundred thousand ($100,000) shares of the par value of one hundred ($100) dollars each, the present capital stock, to fifty million ($50,000,000) dollars, divided into five hundred thousand ($500,000) shares of the par value of one hundred ($100) dollars each.

JOHN SKAE,
CHAS. H. FISH,
JOS. CLARK,
A. E. HEAD,
R. N. GRAVES,
Trustees.
W. W. STETSON, Secretary.

CONSOLIDATED IMPERIAL MINING COMPANY.

Location of principal place of business, Gold Hill, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Directors, held on the 12th day of September, 1878, an assessment (No. 7) of twenty (20) cents per share was levied on the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room No. 8, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the seventeenth (17th) day of October, 1878, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and, unless payment is made before, will be sold on THURSDAY, the seventh (7th) day of November, 1878, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

W. E. DEAN, Secretary.
Office—Room No. 8, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

CALIFORNIA FARMERS' MUTUAL

Fire Insurance Company

[ESTABLISHED IN 1874.]

Paid up Capital .....$300,000
Assets exceed..... 326,000

PRINCIPAL OFFICE, 209 SANSOME ST.
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.,

THOS. FLINT, President. J. W. FOARD, Manager.
FERD. K. RULE, Secretary.
I. G. GARDNER, General Agent.

COMMERCIAL

INSURANCE COMPANY OF CALA,

FIRE AND MARINE.

Principal office, 405 California Street, San Francisco.

JOHN H. WISE, President.
CHAS. A. LATON, Secretary.

THE STATE INVESTMENT

—AND—

INSURANCE COMPANY, FIRE AND MARINE

CASH ASSETS.....$450,000

Principal Office, 218 and 220 Sansome Street, San Francisco

OFFICERS:

A. J. BRYANT, President.
RICHARD IVERS, Vice-President,
CHAS. H. CUSHING, Secretary,
H. H. WATSON, Marine Surveyor

SILVER HILL MINING COMPANY.

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Gold Hill, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the thirtieth (30th) day of September, 1878, an assessment (No. 4) of fifty (50) cents per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 8, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the first day of November, 1878, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction; and unless payment is made before will be sold on MONDAY, the twenty-fifth day of November, 1878, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

W. E. DEAN, Secretary.
Office—Room 8, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

CROWN POINT GOLD AND SILVER

Mining Company.—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Gold Hill, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 13th day of September, 1878, an assessment (No. 35) of one dollar per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 10, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the twenty-third (23d) day of October, 1878, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before will be sold on WEDNESDAY, the thirtieth day of November, 1878, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

JAMES NEWLANDS, Secretary.
Office, Room 10, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

CHOLLAR-POTOSI MINING CO.

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia Mining District, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the fifth (5th) day of September, 1878, an assessment (No. 15) of five dollars per share, was levied on the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 8, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the eighth (8th) day of October, 1878, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before, will be sold on TUESDAY, the twentieth day of October, 1878, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

W. E. DEAN, Secretary.
Office, Room 8, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

OPHIR SILVER MINING COMPANY.

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 10th day of September, 1878, an assessment (No. 33) of one dollar per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, No. 203 Bush Street, Room 9, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the 15th day of October, 1878, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before, will be sold on MONDAY, the fourth day of November, 1878, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

C. L. MCCOY, Secretary.
Office—No. 203 Bush Street, Room 9, San Francisco, California.

SAVAGE MINING COMPANY.

Location of works, Virginia, Storey County, Nevada.

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California.
Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Directors, held on the sixth (6th) day of September, 1878, an assessment (No. 35) of one dollar ($1) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 15, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the eighth (8th) day of October, 1878, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and, unless payment is made before, will be sold on MONDAY, the twenty-eighth day of October, 1878, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

E. B. HOLMES, Secretary.
Office—Room 15, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

COMMENCING SUNDAY, JULY 14, 1878.

Passenger trains will leave San Francisco, from Passenger Depot on Townsend Street, between Third and Fourth, as follows:

8.30 A. M. DAILY for San Jose, Gilroy, Hollister, Tres Pinos, Pajaro, Salinas, Soledad, and all Way Stations. At Pajaro, the Santa Cruz R. R. connects with this train for Aptos and Santa Cruz. At Salinas, the M. & S. V. R. R. connects with this train for Monterey. At Santa Cruz connections made with this train. PARLOR CAR attached to this train.

10.40 A. M. DAILY for San Jose and Way Stations.

3.30 P. M. DAILY (Sundays excepted) for Gilroy, Pajaro, Hollister, and Way Stations. Stage connection made with this train at SANTA CLARA for Pacific Congress Springs.

4.40 P. M. DAILY for San Jose and Way Stations.

6.30 P. M. DAILY for Menlo Park and Way Stations.

SUNDAYS AN EXTRA TRAIN will leave for San Jose and Way Stations at 5.30 A. M. Returning, will leave San Jose at 6.00 P. M.

EXCURSION TICKETS to San Jose and other points and return sold on Saturdays and Sunday mornings. Good for return until following Monday, inclusive.

Also, Excursion Tickets to Monterey—good from Saturday until following Monday, inclusive.

A. C. BASSETT, H. R. JUDAH, Superintendent, Asst. Pass. & Tkt. Agt.

SOUTHERN DIVISIONS.

Passengers for points on the Southern Divisions of the road will take the cars of the Central Pacific Railroad via OAKLAND, leaving SAN FRANCISCO via Ferry Landing, Market Street, at 4.00 P. M. daily, and making close connection at GOSHEN for Summer, Mohave, LOS ANGELES, Wilmington, Anaheim, Colton, Colorado River, and YUMA.

SAN FRANCISCO AND NORTH PACIFIC R. R.

Commencing Monday, October 7th, 1878, and until further notice, Boats and Trains will leave San Francisco: (Ticket Office, Washington Street Wharf.)

3.30 P. M. DAILY, Sundays excepted, Steamer "James M. Donahue" (Washington Street Wharf), connecting with Mail and Express Train at Donahue for Petaluma, Santa Rosa, Healdsburg, Cloverdale, and way stations. Making stage connection at Lakeville for Sonoma; at Geyserville for Skaggs Springs, at Cloverdale for Ukiah, Lakeport, Mendocino City, and the GEYSERS.

Connections made at Fulton on the following morning with Fulton and Guerneville R. R. for Korbel's, Guerneville, and the Redwood. (Arrive at San Francisco 10.35 A. M.)

8.00 A. M., Sundays only, Excursions, Steamer "James M. Donahue," connecting at Donahue with trains for Cloverdale and way stations. RETURNING—Trains will leave Donahue at 4.40 P. M., and arrive at San Francisco at 6.55 P. M.

Freight received from 7 A. M. to 2.30 P. M. daily (except Sunday).

TICKET OFFICE, WASHINGTON STREET WHARF. ARTHUR HUGHES, Gen. Manager, A. A. BEAN, Sup't. P. E. DOUGHERTY, Gen. Pass. and Tkt. Agent.

NEWTON BOOTH, C. T. WHEELER, Sacramento, J. T. GLOVER, W. W. DODGE, San Francisco

W. W. DODGE & CO.,

WHOLESALE GROCERS,

Northwest corner Clay and Front Streets, San Francisco.

ALASKA COMMERCIAL CO.

No. 310 SANSOME STREET,

WHOLESALE DEALER IN FURS.

MUSIC BOXES

OF ALL DESCRIPTIONS AND OF Standard Reputation, playing from one to over one hundred airs. The largest and best assortment in this city. MUSICAL BOXES WITH CHANGEABLE CYLINDERS always on hand. New and interesting styles constantly received. Call and examine our stock. REPAIRING OF MUSICAL BOXES thoroughly done in all their particularities.

M. J. PAILLARD & CO.,

MANUFACTURERS AND IMPORTERS,

120 Sutter Street, San Francisco.

Branch of House, 680 Broadway, New York.

MOODY'S

Drug and Prescription

STORE,

Northwest corner Polk and Pine Streets.

Prescriptions prepared with care from the purest of Drugs and Chemicals.

C. P. R. R.

COMMENCING MONDAY, OCTOBER

7, 1878, and until further notice.

TRAINS AND BOATS

WILL LEAVE SAN FRANCISCO:

OVERLAND TICKET OFFICE AT FERRY LANDING, MARKET STREET.

7.00 A. M. DAILY, VALLEJO Steamer (from Market Street Landing), connecting with the trains for Napa (Stages for Sonoma), Calistoga (The Geysers), and Sacramento. Connecting at Davis (Sundays excepted) for Woodland and Knight's Landing, and at Woodland for Williams and Willows. (Arrive San Francisco 8.10 P. M.)

7.00 A. M. DAILY, LOCAL PASSENGER Train (via Oakland Ferry), arriving at San Jose at 9.45 A. M. Connecting at Niles with train via Livermore, arriving at Tracy at 11.30 A. M., and connecting with Atlantic Express. (Arrive San Francisco 6.05 P. M.)

8.00 A. M. DAILY, ATLANTIC Express Train (via Oakland Ferry, Northern Ry. and S. P. & T. R. R.) for Sacramento, Marysville, Redding (Portland, Or.) Colfax, Reno (Virginia City), Palisade (Eureka), Id., and Omaha. Connects at Galt with train arriving at Galt at 3.40 P. M. (Arrive San Francisco 9.15 P. M.)

SUNDAY EXCURSION TICKETS TO SAN PABLO AND MARTINEZ AT REDUCED RATES.

10.00 A. M. DAILY, (VIA OAKLAND FERRY), Local Passenger Train to Haywards and Niles. (Arrive San Francisco 6.05 P. M.)

3.00 P. M. DAILY, SAN JOSE Passenger Train (via Oakland Ferry and Niles), stopping at all way stations. Arrive at San Jose at 5.29 P. M. (Arrive San Francisco at 9.35 A. M.)

3.00 P. M. DAILY, NORTHERN Railway Passenger Train (via Oakland Ferry) to San Pablo, Martinez, and Antioch. (Arrive San Francisco 9.15 A. M.)

4.00 P. M. DAILY, SOUTHERN Express Train (via Oakland Ferry, Northern Ry., and S. P. & T. R. R.) for Lathrop (and Stockton), Merced, Madera, Visalia, Summer, Madera, Newhall (San Buenaventura, Santa Barbara), LOS ANGELES, "Santa Monica," Wilmington, Santa Ana (San Diego), Colton, and Yuma (Arizona Stages and Colorado River Steamers). Sleeping cars between Oakland, Los Angeles, and Yuma. (Arrive San Francisco at 12.35 P. M.)

4.00 P. M., SUNDAYS EXCEPTED, Vallejo Steamer (from Market Street Landing), connecting with trains for Calistoga (The Geysers), Woodland, Knight's Landing, and Sacramento, and at Sacramento with passenger train, leaving at 9.35 P. M., for Truckee, Reno, Carson, and Virginia. Sleeping cars between Vallejo and Carson. (Arrive San Francisco 11.10 A. M.)

4.00 P. M., SUNDAYS EXCEPTED, Sacramento Steamer (from Washington Street Wharf) for Benicia and Landings on the Sacramento River. (Arrive San Francisco 8.00 P. M.)

4.30 P. M. DAILY, THROUGH Third Class and Accommodation Train, via Oakland Ferry, Northern Ry., and S. P. & T. R. R., connecting at Lathrop with train arriving at Los Angeles on second day at 11.55 A. M. (Arrive San Francisco 7.30 A. M.)

4.30 P. M. DAILY, LOCAL PASSENGER (via Oakland Ferry) to Haywards, Niles, and Livermore. (Arrive San Francisco 8.35 P. M.)

5.00 P. M. DAILY, OVERLAND Emigrant Train (via Oakland Ferry and Northern Railway), to Ogden, Omaha, and East.

Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

FERRIES AND LOCAL TRAINS.

FROM SAN FRANCISCO, DAILY.

To	To Alameda	To Farnham	To East Oakland	To Niles	To Berkeley	To Del Norte
A. M.	P. M.	A. M.	P. M.	A. M.	P. M.	A. M.
6.10	12.30	7.00	7.00	6.10	7.00	6.10
7.00	1.00	8.00	8.00	7.00	8.00	7.00
7.30	1.30	9.00	9.00	8.00	9.00	8.00
8.00	2.00	10.00	10.00	9.00	10.00	9.00
8.30	2.30	11.00	11.00	10.00	11.00	10.00
9.00	3.00	12.00	12.00	11.00	12.00	11.00
9.30	3.30	P. M.	P. M.	11.30	P. M.	11.30
10.00	4.00	1.30	1.30	12.30	4.00	12.30
10.30	4.30	2.00	2.00	1.00	5.00	1.00
11.00	5.00	3.00	3.00	2.00	6.00	2.00
11.30	5.30	4.00	4.00	3.00	7.00	3.00
12.00	6.00	5.00	5.00	4.00	8.00	4.00
12.30	6.30	6.00	6.00	5.00	9.00	5.00
.....	7.00	7.00	7.00	6.00	10.00	6.00
.....	8.10	8.10	8.10	7.00	11.00	7.00
.....	9.20	9.20	9.20	8.00	12.00	8.00
.....	10.30	10.30	10.30	9.00	1.00	9.00
.....	11.45	11.45	11.45	10.00	2.00	10.00
.....	12.45	12.45	12.45	11.00	3.00	11.00

B—Sundays excepted. C—Sundays only. * Alameda passengers change cars at Oakland.

TO SAN FRANCISCO, DAILY.

From	From Del Norte	From Berkeley	From Niles	From East Oakland	From Farnham	From Alameda	From Oakland
A. M.	P. M.	A. M.	P. M.	A. M.	P. M.	A. M.	P. M.
6.10	12.30	7.00	7.00	6.10	7.00	6.10	7.00
7.00	1.00	8.00	8.00	7.00	8.00	7.00	8.00
7.30	1.30	9.00	9.00	8.00	9.00	8.00	9.00
8.00	2.00	10.00	10.00	9.00	10.00	9.00	10.00
8.30	2.30	11.00	11.00	10.00	11.00	10.00	11.00
9.00	3.00	12.00	12.00	11.00	12.00	11.00	12.00
9.30	3.30	P. M.	P. M.	11.30	P. M.	11.30	P. M.
10.00	4.00	1.30	1.30	12.30	4.00	12.30	4.00
10.30	4.30	2.00	2.00	1.00	5.00	1.00	5.00
11.00	5.00	3.00	3.00	2.00	6.00	2.00	6.00
11.30	5.30	4.00	4.00	3.00	7.00	3.00	7.00
12.00	6.00	5.00	5.00	4.00	8.00	4.00	8.00
12.30	6.30	6.00	6.00	5.00	9.00	5.00	9.00
.....	7.00	7.00	7.00	6.00	10.00	6.00	10.00
.....	8.10	8.10	8.10	7.00	11.00	7.00	11.00
.....	9.20	9.20	9.20	8.00	12.00	8.00	12.00
.....	10.30	10.30	10.30	9.00	1.00	9.00	1.00
.....	11.45	11.45	11.45	10.00	2.00	10.00	2.00
.....	12.45	12.45	12.45	11.00	3.00	11.00	3.00

B—Sundays excepted. C—Sundays only. * Alameda passengers change cars at Oakland.

CREEK ROUTE

FROM SAN FRANCISCO—Daily—8.15—9.15—10.15—11.15 A. M.—12.15—1.15—2.15—3.15—4.15—5.15 P. M.
FROM OAKLAND—Daily—8.10—9.05—10.05—11.05 A. M.—12.05—1.05—2.05—3.05—4.05—5.05 P. M.
B—Daily, Sundays excepted.

"Official Schedule Time" furnished by Anderson & Randolph, Jewelers, 107 and 109 Montgomery Street.
A. N. TOWN, T. H. GOODMAN, General Sup't. Gen. Pass. and Ticket Ag't.

FRENCH SAVINGS AND LOAN SOCIETY.

411 BUSH STREET, ABOVE KEARNEY, SAN FRANCISCO.

G. MAHE, Director.

S. P. C. R. R.—(NARROW GAUGE).

NEW ROUTE TO ALAMEDA, SAN JOSE AND SANTA CRUZ.

SUMMER ARRANGEMENT, 1878.

Commencing Saturday, June 1, 1878, and until further notice, train and boat will leave San Francisco, at the new Ferry Landing, Market St.:

5.00 A. M., via Alameda Ferry, daily, for Alameda, West San Leandro, West San Lorenzo, Mount Eden, Alvarado, Hall's, Newark, Mowry's, Alviso, Agnew's, Santa Clara, San Jose, Lovelady's, Los Gatos, and Almal.

9.20 A. M., via Alameda Ferry, daily, for Alameda, Newark, Alviso, Santa Clara, San Jose, Los Gatos, Almal, and all way stations, connecting at Los Gatos with Colgrove's stages for Old Wells, Patchen, Mountain Charley's, Martin's Ranch, Scott's Valley, and Santa Cruz, or via Knight's Summit, Hotel de Redwood, Comstock's Mill, Mason's Grove, Soquel, to SANTA CRUZ. Also, connecting at Los Gatos with Elabon's stages for Saratoga and CONGRESS SPRINGS. (Dinner at Los Gatos.)

4.20 P. M., via Alameda Ferry, daily, for Alameda, Newark, Santa Clara, San Jose, Almal, and all way stations.

On Saturdays only stages will connect with the 4.20 P. M. train at Los Gatos for Santa Cruz and Saratoga. Returning, leave Santa Cruz at 4 A. M. Monday (breakfast at Los Gatos), arriving in San Francisco at 10.15 A. M.

FERRIES AND LOCAL TRAINS

Will run as follows:

LEAVE SAN FRANCISCO DAILY.

A. M.	A. M.	A. M.	A. M.	P. M.	P. M.
5.00	6.40	9.20	10.30	4.20	6.20

LEAVE HIGH STREET (ALAMEDA) DAILY.

A. M.	A. M.	A. M.	P. M.	P. M.	P. M.
5.40	7.30	9.25	10.30	4.25	7.00

* Sundays only.

THOS. CARTER, GEO. H. WAGGONER, Superintendent, Gen. Pass. Agent.

PACIFIC COAST STEAMSHIP CO.

Steamers of this Company will sail from Broadway wharf for PORTLAND (Oregon), every five days, direct, and for LOS ANGELES, SANTA BARBARA, SANTA CRUZ, SAN DIEGO, SAN LUIS OBISPO, and other Northern and Southern Coast Ports, leaving San Francisco about every third day.

For day and hour of sailing, see the Company's advertisement in the San Francisco daily papers.

TICKET OFFICE, No. 214 MONTGOMERY ST., NEAR PINE.

GOODALL, PERKINS & CO., Agents, No. 10 Market Street, San Francisco.

PACIFIC MAIL STEAMSHIP CO.

First-class steamers with unequalled accommodations for passengers will leave San Francisco:

FOR YOKOHAMA AND HONGKONG, On the 1st of every month.

FOR SYDNEY AND AUCKLAND, via HONOLULU, September 2d, and every fourth week thereafter.

FOR NEW YORK, via PANAMA, CENTRAL AMERICAN, MEXICAN, AND SOUTH AMERICAN PORTS, HAVANA, and all WEST INDIA PORTS, on the 5th and 19th of each month.

FOR HONOLULU, April 27th, and every four weeks thereafter.

FOR VICTORIA, B. C., PUGET SOUND PORTS, and PORTLAND, Oregon, on the 10th, 20th, and 30th of each month.

WILLIAMS, BLANCHARD & CO., Agents, Corner First and Brannan Streets.

OCCIDENTAL AND ORIENTAL

STEAMSHIP COMPANY

—FOR—

JAPAN AND CHINA,

Leave Wharf, Cor. First and Brannan Streets, at noon, for YOKOHAMA AND HONGKONG.

Connecting at Yokohama with steamers for Shanghai, GAILIC, OCEANIC, BELGIC.

Saturday, May 18. Tuesday, June 18. Thursday, Aug. 1. Saturday, Aug. 17. Tuesday, Sept. 17. Wednesday, Saturday, Nov. 16. Tuesday, Dec. 17. October 16.

Cabin plans on exhibition and Passenger Tickets for sale at No. 2 Montgomery Street. For freight apply at the Pacific Mail Steamship Company's Wharf.

T. H. GOODMAN, Gen'l Passenger Agent. DAVID D. COLTON, President.

RE-OPENED.

HAYWARD WAREHOUSES

Are now receiving

GRAIN ON STORAGE.

THE PATRONAGE OF FARMERS

and others is respectfully solicited. Storage, one dollar per ton for the season. Advances and Insurance effected at the lowest rates.

Refer by permission to Chas. Webb Howard, President Spring Water Valley Company, Bray Bros., M. Waterman & Co., San Francisco; John Zelle, Hayward's; J. West Martin, President Union Savings Bank, Oakland.

R. H. BENNETT, Proprietor.

T. J. PETTIT &amp; CO.'S

LABEL, SHOW CARD,

ENGRAVING AND PRINTING

ESTABLISHMENT,

528 CALIFORNIA STREET, SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

THE NEVADA BANK OF SAN FRANCISCO

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA.

Paid up Capital.....$10,000,000 Gold

Surplus (U. S. Bonds).....3,000,000 "

DIRECTORS:

LOUIS McLANE, President. J. C. FLOOD, Vice-President. JOHN W. MACKAY, W. S. O'BRIEN, JAMES G. FAIR.

Cashier.....H. W. GLENNY.

Agent at Virginia, Nev.....GEO. A. KING

Agents at New York, (C. T. CHRISTENSEN, (62 Wall Street.) GEO. L. BRANDER.

Issues Commercial and Travelers' Credits, available in any part of the world. Makes Transfers by Telegraph and Cable, and draws Exchange at customary usances. This Bank has special facilities for dealing in bullion.

EXCHANGE

On the principal Cities throughout the United States, Europe, Japan, China, and the East Indies, the Australian Colonies, and New Zealand, and on Honolulu, Hawaii.

NEW YORK BANKERS.....The Bank of New York, N. B. A. Amier. Exchange Nat. Bank.

LONDON BANKERS.....Messrs. Smith, Payne & Smiths. The Union Bank of London.

THE ANGLO-CALIFORNIA BANK (Limited.)

No. 422 CALIFORNIA STREET, SAN FRANCISCO.

London Office.....3 Angel Court

New York Agents.....J. & W. Seligman & Co

Authorized Capital Stock.....$6,000,000

Surplus Earnings.....150,000

Will receive Deposits, open Accounts, make Collections, buy and sell Exchange and Bullion, loan Money, and issue Letters of Credit available throughout the world.

FRED'K F. LOW, } Managers. IGN. STEINHART, }

CHICKERING
PIANO WAREROOMS,
31 POST ST., Mechanics' Institute Building.
ELEGANT PIANOS.
L. K. HAMMER,
Sole Agent for Pacific Coast.

EST. Owners of Chickering Pianos are specially requested to leave orders for tuning at warerooms, 31 Post Street.

 MUSIC
KNABE PIANOS,
IRVING PIANOS, ROGERS' UPRIGHT PIANOS,
Prince Organs, Waters' Organs, Sheet Music.
BANCROFT, KNIGHT & Co.,
733 MARKET STREET.

PIANOS
SCHOMACKER AND HENRY F. MILLER CELEBRATED PIANOS.
Pianos Tuned, Rented, and for Sale on the Installment Plan.
WOODWORTH, SCHELL & Co.
12 Post Street San Francisco.

HEMME & LONG
UPRIGHT PIANOS
FIRST CLASS PRICES LOW
COR. N. SUTTER & MONTGOMERY STS. S.F.

JOE POHEIM
The Tailor,
203 Montgomery St. and 103 Third St., has just received a large assortment of the latest style goods.
Suits to order from .....$20
Pants to order from ..... 5
Overcoats to order from .....15

EST. The leading question is where the best goods can be found at the lowest prices. The answer is at

JOE POHEIM,
203 Montgomery St. and 103 Third St.

Samples and Rules for Self-Measurement sent free to any address. Fit guaranteed.

MULLER'S OPTOMETER!
The only reliable instrument for Testing Defective Vision.
MULLER
IN THE LARGEST OPTICIAN
135 MONTGOMERY ST.
Near Bush, opposite the Occidental Hotel.

THE PACIFIC LAND AND TRUST CO.
RENT HOUSES,
COLLECT RENTS, MANAGE ESTATES
HOUSES AND LOTS FOR SALE
in this city, Oakland, and Alameda. Lands and Ranches for sale in all parts of the country. Agents in the principal cities. Collections made throughout the coast.
No. 534 CALIFORNIA STREET.

THE VERTICAL FEED.
THE ONLY POSITIVE SUCCESS IN all departments of sewing. Lightest running shuttle machine in the market. The NEW DAVIS VERTICAL FEED SEWING MACHINE, 130 Post Street.
MARK SHELTON.
P. S.—Howe, Florence, Wheeler & Wilson, Grover & Baker, Domestic, Weed, Willcox & Gibbs, for sale at $10 each.

RUPTURE.
BUY NO TRUSS
Until you see what has been accomplished by DR. PIERCE'S late invention. Call and send for New Illustrated Book. Prices reduced.
MAGNETIC ELASTIC TRUSS
CO., 609 Sacramento Street, San Francisco.

PACIFIC BUSINESS COLLEGE,
230 Post St., San Francisco.

REMOVAL.
I. W. TABER
The leading Photographer of this city, has just occupied his new and handsome parlors over the HIBERNIA BANK, CORNER MARKET AND MONTGOMERY STREETS.
Entrance on Montgomery Street. Elevator connected with building.
Easy of access. The handsomest Photograph Rooms in the city. Give him a call.

THE CAL. FURNITURE M'FG CO.
HAVE FIVE TIMES AS MUCH
FURNITURE
As any other house on this Coast, which has been purchased so low that we CAN and WILL sell at such prices that the poor can gratify their WISHES and the rich their TASTE. At the old stand,
NOS. 224 AND 226 BUSH STREET, S. F.

HERRMANN'S
FALL STYLES
ARE NOW OUT AT
336 KEARNY STREET, BETWEEN BUSH AND PINE, & 910 MARKET STREET, ABOVE STOCKTON.
SEND FOR ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE.

MISS K. McCARRICK,
MILLINERY PARLORS
135 KEARNY STREET, NEAR SUTTER, UP STAIRS.
The finest assortment of French Millinery Goods in the city always on hand.

MRS. M. M. COLEMAN,
DRESS MAKING PARLORS
NO. 115 KEARNY STREET,
Rooms 13, 14, and 15, over Keane, O'Connor & Co., San Francisco.

HEALD'S BUSINESS COLLEGE,
No. 24 Post Street,
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
Opposite Mechanics' Institute.
IMPARTS A THOROUGH PRACTICAL
Education in all Commercial and English Branches, French, German, Spanish, Drawing, and Telegraphy. This school having greater facilities, and enjoying a more extensive patronage than any similar institution on the Pacific coast, continues to base its claims for recognition and patronage upon the good sense and enlightened judgment of the public.

LIST OF FACULTY.
E. P. Heald, F. C. Woodbury.
H. M. Stearns, A. R. Capp.
Mrs. C. Woodbury, T. R. Southern,
J. A. Chesnutwood, Mrs. W. J. Hamilton,
A. P. Dullief, F. Sereniti,
R. Sorcini, Geo. J. Johns,
Lloyd Baldwin, A. Vander Naillen.
For full particulars, call at the College, 24 Post Street, or address E. P. HEALD, President Business College, San Francisco.

THOMAS BOYSON, M. D.
(University of Copenhagen, Denmark),
PHYSICIAN AND SURGEON. Office and Residence, 112 Kearny Street. Office hours, 11 A. M. to 1 P. M., 6 to 2 P. M., Sunday 11 to 1 only. Telephone in the office.

PALACE HOTEL RESTAURANT,
FIRST CLASS IN ALL RESPECTS.
QUIET AND DESIRABLE PLACE
for Ladies, Gentlemen, and Families. EST. Entrance south side of Court.
A. D. SHARON.

SHIRTS AT

MORRIS, SCHWAB & CO.
FINE-ART DEALERS.
FREE ART GALLERY.
A complete assortment of ARTISTS' MATERIAL, GOLD FRAMES, etc.
19 AND 21 POST STREET.

WEBER
PIANOS ARE THE BEST
WAREHOUSES, N. W. CORNER KEARNY AND SUTTER STREETS.
SHERMAN, HYDE & CO.
SHEET MUSIC, MUSIC BOOKS, MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

GROVER & BAKER
ELASTIC STITCH
SEWING MACHINES.
THE HIGH REPUTATION OF THE
Grover & Baker Machine is the result of true work and long years of honorable service.
J. W. EVANS, 29 Post Street.

H. P. WAKELEE & CO.,
Wholesale and Retail
Druggists, Importers of Foreign and Domestic Drugs, Chemicals, and Perfumery,
No. 140 Montgomery Street, under the Occidental Hotel, San Francisco.

PARTICULAR ATTENTION PAID
to compounding Physician's Prescriptions, the dispensing of which is entrusted only to the most competent hands, while every care is taken to ensure the purity of all preparations.
W. LITTLE.....J. B. CUMMING.

LITTLE & CUMMING,
CARPENTERS AND BUILDERS, No. 34 O'Farrell Street, San Francisco.
Estimates given on all classes and styles of work. General jobbing promptly attended to. Offices and Stores neatly fitted up.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—THE STATE INVESTMENT AND INSURANCE COMPANY.—Dividend No. 65.—The monthly dividend for September will be paid on October 10th, at their office, Nos. 218 and 220 Sansome Street.
CHS. H. CUSHING, Secretary,
San Francisco, October 5, 1878.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—OFFICE OF the Standard Gold Mining Company, San Francisco, Cal., Oct. 7, 1878.—At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above named company, held this day, Dividend No. 14 of one dollar per share was declared, payable on Saturday, October 12, 1878. Transfer books closed on Wednesday, October 9, 1878, at 3 o'clock P. M.
WM. WILLIS, Secretary.
Office, Room 29 Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, third floor, San Francisco, Cal.

OFFICE OF THE BODIE GOLD Mining Company, Room 3, San Francisco Stock Exchange Building, No. 327 Pine Street, San Francisco, Cal., October 9, 1878.—At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above named company, held to-day, a regular dividend (No. 3) of two dollars ($2) per share was declared, payable on Monday, October 14, 1878.
WM. H. LENT, Secretary.

OFFICE OF THE EUREKA CONSOLIDATED Mining Company, Nevada Block, Room 37, San Francisco, October 5th, 1878.—The annual meeting of the stockholders of the above named Company will be held at the office of the Company, Room No. 37, Nevada Block, San Francisco, on MONDAY, the twenty-first day of October, 1878, at 2 o'clock P. M., of said day, for the election of Trustees to serve for the ensuing year, and for the transaction of such other business as may be presented. Transfer books closed Tuesday, October 15th, at 3 P. M.
W. W. TRAYLOR, Secretary.

BELCHER SILVER MINING CO.
Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Gold Hill, Storey County, Nevada.
Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Trustees, held on the eighth day of October, 1878, an assessment (No. 16) of one ($1) dollar per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 12, Cosmopolitan Hotel Building, 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.
Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the 12th day of November, 1878, will be delinquent, and advertised at public auction, and unless payment is made before will be sold on TUESDAY, the third day of December, 1878, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with cost of advertising and expenses of sale.
By order of the Board of Directors.
JNO. CROCKETT, Secretary.
Office—Room 12, Cosmopolitan Hotel Building, 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

BEAMISH'S

H. A. CALLENDER
650 MARKET ST.
Below Kearny.
JEWELER.
FINEST GOODS. LOWEST PRICES.

EDUCATIONAL!
French, Spanish, and Italian taught by Prof. Barthelmy de Philippe, by his easy, new method, saving months of study. Classes for beginners will be formed September 10th; also private lessons. PACIFIC BUSINESS COLLEGE, 329 Post Street.

MME. B. ZEITSKA'S
FRENCH, GERMAN, AND ENGLISH INSTITUTE
FOR YOUNG LADIES,
922 POST ST., BETWEEN HYDE and Larkin.
KINDERGARTEN connected with the Institute.
The next term will commence October 2d.
A limited number of Boarding Pupils received.
MME. A. ZEITSKA, Principal.

The Argonaut.

VOL. III. NO. 15.

SAN FRANCISCO, OCTOBER 19, 1878.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

THE DIARY OF A WOMAN.

Translated for the Argonaut from the French of Octave Feuillet.

[CONTINUED FROM LAST NUMBER.]

A few moments afterward I was asked to sing something. My voice is a mezzo-soprano, pretty strong and somewhat cultivated, but I dislike to use it in public. My friends know this, and as a general thing do not ask me to sing. However, I went to the piano, and began that air from Norma, "Casta Diva." My surprise was great, and my mortification not less so, when I noticed that Captain d'Eblis, after a few moments, opened the door of the salon very softly and disappeared. I thought it a very shabby proceeding, but I did not the less continue to warble my notes with that conscientious care with which I do every thing. I had just finished in the midst of murmured compliments when Monsieur d'Eblis returned, and coming up to me said, pointing to a window that had been opened on account of the heat of the evening:

"Roger is there on the seat in the court-yard. He would be exceedingly grateful to you if you would have the kindness to sing that air from Norma again."

"Very willingly," I answered, and commenced singing with all my heart.

I was well repaid for my trouble. Madame de Louvercy, who stood overjoyed beside the window while I sang, leaned over it the instant I left the piano and exchanged a few words with her son. Then she came forward, took my hands in hers, kissed me, and said with much emotion:

"I thank you, for his sake and for my own. It is the first time for a long period that I have seen any appearance of happiness in his face."

It was a success indeed to have drawn this savage from his cave. I am proud of it, and I shall sleep over it the sleep of the blessed.

June 25th.—For eight or ten days I have stopped writing, my scruples again overcoming me. I feared giving a reality to my dreams by fixing them on these pages. I was afraid of strengthening (and pleasing myself in doing so) impressions which it were better to let vanish into thin air; and it was my grandmother, who again, without knowing it, encouraged me to follow my fatal inclination, and continue those confidential relations with my locked book and with myself.

When I went into her room this morning to wish her good day, she kissed me with more than usual tenderness, and then, holding one of my hands in hers, she asked:

"Have you nothing to tell me, my child?"

"I think I have, grandma."

"Ah! Has Monsieur d'Eblis been making love to you?"

"I don't know, my dear grandma, that Monsieur d'Eblis has made love to me, for he did not say a word which in the slightest degree appeared to be a declaration; but he seems to like to be near me. He addresses me with a sort of respect and confidence, and at times even with a certain timidity of manner which I do not notice when he is with others. He addresses me as though the matter was a personal one, and takes in the least thing which I utter as though my words were pearls. If that is what is called making love to a woman, I really think he has made love to me a little."

"I have noticed it," said my grandmother, gravely, "and all that does not displease you."

"No."

"No. Very naturally; but the house is not on fire yet, is it? You are not crazy about the gentleman?"

"Crazy! No."

"He simply pleases you?"

"Yes, a little."

"Yes? Well, me also. Listen to what I have to say, my dear child. We did not come here for the purpose of looking for a husband; but if we find one here, it is just as well to take him here as anywhere else. Isn't that so? Only understand, my dear little one, that this is an affair of a most serious nature—one over which we must think twice before deciding. From the moment that I noticed the behavior of the gentleman I did not wait three minutes before I asked Madame de Louvercy about him, and, moreover, I have written to Paris and informed myself thoroughly as to his standing. Well, all these investigations result in the fact that there can be no serious objection to him. But allow me to say, child, that neither my opinion nor the opinions of others should for one moment influence your personal feelings. There are no serious objections to him, and that is all; family, reputation, fortune even—all as they should be, and very suitable. But, notwithstanding all that, I conjure you, ma chérie, do not yield too quickly, too easily, to a first impression. Take time to consider it. I know you well, my child. If you are not happy you will be miserable. You are of the kind who do not love twice, of the kind that must not deceive themselves. When you have opened your heart to a tender sentiment—when love, to speak clearly, shall have entered there—there he will remain; he will seat himself on a royal throne to leave it only with life."

The angel within me, as Cécile says, had for some time whispered, though in less benevolent words, the truths which grandma uttered aloud. He put me on my guard; he warned me that my first would be my only love, all-powerful, eternal—that it must be well-chosen, or I should die from its effects.

These are mere phrases; but I believe them.

To love the man who deserves all my affection, all my esteem, and all my respect, and to be beloved by him, is my dream. Am I really and truly near, very near, its realization? Let us see for a moment.

That a man like Monsieur d'Eblis, of an agreeable and imposing appearance, refined manners, great merit, of an heroic, and at the same time amiable character—that a man thus constituted, and apparently almost perfect, should answer all the ambitions of a woman's heart, nothing can be more simple. That a young girl who feels, or believes that she is honored by the particular attentions of this superior being, should be flattered and touched by them—that she should find a peculiar pleasure in her daily intercourse with one possessing his soul and intellect—that she should feel a secret pleasure in the thought of some time exchanging this intimacy of a few days for a union which would last forever—again, nothing can be more simple or more natural.

But what appears to me, unfortunately, to be less natural and certain, is that a man like Monsieur d'Eblis, who, it seems to me, can choose at his pleasure, throughout all the world, a companion worthy of him, should in so short a time become seriously attached to this pale and romantic Charlotte. It is so easy to believe what one wishes! Am I not deceiving myself? Am I not the dupe of a few polite attentions which have been offered me because they could not be offered elsewhere? We are in the country; one becomes bored, Cécile is seen surrounded on all sides and very much occupied, and I on the contrary am neglected—that seems unjust, and a few little attentions are offered to me for humanity's sake.

And is that all? Still, if I mistake not, he is incapable of disturbing a woman's peace for his own amusement. And yet how have I been able to please him? By what merits? If I have any, he can not have discovered them. I do not easily reveal my thoughts and feelings, nor tell my secrets. I have told him nothing more than I ought to tell about matters of little consequence. I know that I am not wanting in beauty; and without doubt, at first sight, it is attractive even to a man like him. But if that were all, how many women much more beautiful than I am has he not met in his life?

After considering the matter well, I think that my principal virtue in his eyes, and that which gains me his sympathy, is the compassion I feel for his friend Roger. It is quite evident that friendship for Monsieur de Louvercy is his dominant passion, and he can not help liking all that encourages it. From the day of his arrival I have unthinkingly helped to cultivate this weakness; and, as I call things to mind, I have often had opportunities of touching this tender spot in his heart. You must know that Monsieur Roger, thanks to the kind influence of Monsieur d'Eblis, has for several days come to our table. The first time that he consented to do so our surprise was very great, and very great our pleasure, particularly that of his mother. The poor woman was delighted. He had had his hair cut, and had taken care of his dress, which he generally neglected. His handsome, pale, fierce-looking countenance brightened and softened little by little in our company, though he became gloomy and drew within himself the moment anything reminded him of his infirmities—for instance, whenever he needed assistance in helping himself at table, and in sitting down and rising. It was in these little things that I found means of showing him the sincere commiseration with which he inspired me. After dinner he generally remains for a little while on one of the garden benches which are just under the basement windows.

The other evening Cécile and I, noticing that he was not comfortably seated, made a sign to each other. She ran to the salon for a pile of cushions, which she passed out of the window to me. Monsieur d'Eblis, to whom I handed them, tried to place them so that the arm and leg of the wounded man would rest upon them; but he went the wrong way to work, and, jokingly scolding him for his awkwardness, I said to Monsieur de Louvercy:

"Allow me to try;" and with a woman's tact soon adjusted the cushions.

As Monsieur de Louvercy was thanking me with some diffidence, Monsieur d'Eblis said gayly to him: "Isn't she an excellent nurse, Roger?"

Monsieur d'Eblis seemed more grateful to me for these little attentions than did the one who was more directly the object of them. At such times he regarded me with a deep, pensive, and, I think, almost tender look. Nevertheless, whatever may be his feelings for me, they are only betrayed by these slight evidences of his gratitude, and by the pleasure with which he appears to seek my presence and make himself agreeable to me.

Is this sufficient, mon Dieu, to render it wise for me to open my heart, and nourish in it a predilection which to-day is only a passing reverie, but which to-morrow, if I am led away by it, may become an everlasting passion?

July 5th.—This morning, after an almost sleepless night, I arose with the dawn—that is at seven—intending to do something extraordinary. Taking under my arm my precious locked book, and in one hand my parasol, and in the other my bamboo case which holds my writing materials, I passed quietly out of the North Tower by its southern door. Fronting the door is a long avenue, at the left of which is a winding way. At the end of the way there is a grove, and in the grove a statue of Flora, Ceres, or Pomona, with a rustic table and three chairs. A charming spot, particularly on a beautiful morning like this! A religious half-light reigns there; the branches of the trees fall over and cross each other, forming as it were a thick lattice, through which it is difficult to make out a few patches of blue sky. The sun casts here and there on the sand, on the chairs, and on the shoulders of the goddess, a few luminous bands—a few rays which seem stained by the colored glass of a church window. A delicate odor of orange blossoms passes off with the dew from clusters of white acacias; and to finish all, one hears from the ravine, which one can not see, the musical gurgling of the little brook that feeds the swan's pond and then passes away, one does not know where.

Neither does one know how the idea came into the head of Mademoiselle Charlotte d'Erra to choose this delicious spot in which to write what happened last evening. Perhaps she wished to richly frame with gold and with flowers a simple episode in the life of a young girl, which might become—if God in his goodness were willing—the first page in the life of a young wife.

After dinner yesterday, we were, as is our daily custom, spread over the court-yard of the chateau, breathing the fresh evening air mixed with the perfume of roses and cigars. Monsieur de Louvercy was smoking as he reclined on his favorite bench in the midst of the cushions we had heaped about him. Cécile, always as unsteady as a star, all at once conceived the unfortunate idea of playing with the crutch of her cousin. At first she examined it timidly; then, taking it up, she brought it to her shoulder as though it were a gun. Her father has just sent her a small one, with which she proposes to kill all the rabbits and squirrels in the park. In the meanwhile she went through the exercises with the crutch, taking careful aim with it at imaginary rabbits, represented by Messieurs Henri and René de Valnesse. I noticed that Monsieur Roger was scowling and Captain d'Eblis biting his moustache. I cast my sternest looks at Cécile, but had my trouble for my pains. Encouraged by the enthusiastic admiration of her two lovers, she cruelly aggravated the folly of her action by placing the crutch under her arm and trying to walk with it, with one foot in the air as her poor lame cousin does. She took a few steps in the court-yard in this way with a very serious air and without the slightest thought of wrong, simply to see, as she said, if it were very difficult. Monsieur Roger pretended to smile, but I could see a frown on his brow. Perceiving it, I was going to Cécile to warn her, when Monsieur d'Eblis stepped before me. He went quickly up to her, and said in a low tone, but with much vivacity of manner, a few words which I did not hear. But I heard Cécile answer him perfectly:

"Always reproofs."

"This, I think, is well merited," said Monsieur d'Eblis.

She seemed taken aback, as though hesitating a moment between her devil and her angel; then returning with quick steps toward the house, she gently rested the crutch against the bench, and breaking off from the trellis which goes over the window a sprig of jessamine, she began to put it in Monsieur de Louvercy's button-hole.

"Let me decorate you, cousin," said she.

Monsieur Roger snatched the flower from her hand and threw it on the sand.

"You are crazy," said he. Rising immediately, he bowed slightly to me, and went in.

As soon as he disappeared, Cécile clasped her hands, and, raising her shoulders, exclaimed:

"There are times when I could kill myself."

Then sinking upon the bench, she hid her face in her hand and began to sob. Monsieur d'Eblis gave me a look and a smile; then stooping over toward Cécile, he said:

"Come, mademoiselle, your grief is excessive for so small an affair—mere child's play. Well, what do you say," added he, as he picked up the sprig of jessamine; "are you willing that I should take your poor little flower to him?"

Still weeping, she made a sign that she wished he would; then raising her head a little, and smiling at Monsieur d'Eblis through her tears, she said:

"You are always a father to me."

We walked a little distance away to allow her to recover herself. All the guests of Madame de Louvercy walked up and down in groups, chatting in undertones as though penetrated with the beauty of the night. It was mild and very beautiful. A moon of dazzling brightness filled the vast court-yard with its limpid light; the water in the basin was like a sheet of silver, in the middle of which the two large swans slept immovably in their snowy whiteness. Exchanging with each other words of little import, Monsieur d'Eblis and I went and came between the end of the basin and the first trees of the avenue, whose arches in the midst of this light were as dark as a cathedral at midnight. After some moments of silence, I remarked to him that so quiet and peaceful a scene must form a striking contrast to his souvenirs of the war. He stopped, and said:

"Mademoiselle, have you the gift of second sight?"

"I have hardly the gift of first sight," said I, laughing, "for I am very near-sighted. But why do you ask me that question?"

"Because at that very moment my memory brought back a scene of my military life—on a night like this, less mild, but quite as peaceful."

"Will you tell me about it?"

He paused, sighed, and then bowed slightly: "Oh, mon Dieu, yes," said he. "I was then just Metz. On the night of which I speak I was charged with some orders, the meaning of which appeared but

I was more particularly ordered to stop the march of one of our regiments, the number of which I have forgotten. I had caught up with it, and stopped it in fact, and was about to go on. I was only waiting to let my horse blow a little. We were at the time in a plain near a village called Colombey, I think. The awful storms which marked those unlucky days had ceased for a few hours; a calm looking moon was reflected in the ponds of water which covered the fields in every direction. The imagination brings strange things together. There is certainly but little in common between the pleasing order of everything which surrounds us here and those desolate swamps; yet that moonlight on the water reminded me of them just now, and those beautiful swans which are sleeping there made me think of my escort of dragoons, as motionless as they in their long white cloaks. The regiment, waiting further instructions, kept its ranks. They had lighted a large bonfire, around which some officers were conversing in a low voice and with very sad looks. Rumors of a capitulation had circulated through the camps ever since the previous day. The Colonel, who was a man in his prime, with moustaches just turning gray, was walking up and down alone, at a little distance apart from the others, crumpling in his hands the order which I had brought him. All at once he approached me and seized my arm: "Captain," said he, in the tone of a man who wishes mortally to provoke another, "two words, if you please. You come from headquarters—you ought to know more than I do—this is the end, is it not?"

"They say so, Colonel, and I believe it."
"You believe it? How can you believe a thing like that?"
"He let go my arm with a jerk, took a few steps, and, coming roughly up to me again, he looked me in the eyes: "Prisoners then?"
"Colonel, I fear it."
"There was another pause, and he remained some time facing me in an attitude of profound reflection; then, raising his head, he asked, with extraordinary emotion in his voice: "And the flags?"
"I don't know, Colonel."
"Ah! You don't know?"
"He left me again, and walked aside for five or six minutes; then, advancing to the front of his men, he said, in a tone of command: "The flag!"

"The subordinate officer who bore the flag stepped out of the ranks. The Colonel seized the staff with one hand, and raising the other toward the corps of drummers, "Beat the roll!" ordered he. The drums beat.

"The Colonel had drawn near the fire, carrying the flag on high. He placed the staff on the ground, looked around the circle of officers, and uncovered his head. They immediately followed his example, and the attentive troop of soldiers kept a death-like silence. He hesitated for a moment, and I could see his lips tremble, and his eyes cling with an expression full of anguish to those glorious shreds of tattered silk—sad emblem of his country. Finally, he was decided: and bending a knee, gently embedded the eagle in the burning brands. A more vivid flame shot up suddenly, and clearly lighted the pale faces of the officers, some of whom were weeping.

"Beat the roll!" ordered the Colonel, and for the second time the lugubrious roll of drums soaked with rain resounded through the air.

"He put on his kepi and came toward me: "Captain," said he, in a stern voice, "when you arrive down there, don't have any scruples—not one—about telling what you have seen. I salute you!"

"Colonel," said I, "will you let me embrace you?"
"He drew me violently to his breast, and almost stopped my breath as he pressed me.

"Ah, my poor child!" murmured he, "my poor child!"
At this part of his story, Monsieur d'Eblis turned away from me, and I heard a kind of sob. I could not help offering my hand to him. He seemed astonished, took it, and pressed it very hard, saying:

"You understand all that one must suffer at such moments, don't you?"

"Yes," And as I attempted to withdraw my hand, he retained it gently.

"If any thing in the world," added he, "could make one forget them, it would be a moment like this."

I did not answer, and he gave me up my hand. After taking a few steps in silence, I said:

"Let us go."
"Well, any thing that you wish."

And we went in.

Nothing more. But from so reserved, so true a man, is it not much, is it not every thing? His words, when I recall them, when I read them, seem almost insignificant; but the expression he put in them, so deep, so tender, so penetrating—was it not that of a heart which offers, devotes, consecrates itself? I think so truly. And to judge by myself, one such moment, one single instant on which two souls are brought together and unite so closely, is sufficient to make them belong to each other on earth, and in heaven, and forever. Oh, I beseech Thee, my God, let me not deceive myself!

July 13th.—For several days I have not had the courage to take my pen in hand. I do not know what has happened. I do not know what wicked genius has touched the chateau with his wand, cast a gloom over all our spirits, embittered all our tempers, and changed all hearts—except mine, alas!

The first symptoms of this disturbance became manifest on the very evening that so happy an impression had been left on my mind, and I fear so deceptive a one. When I rejoined Cécile under the parlor windows after separating from Monsieur d'Eblis, I thought she seemed angry with me, and I asked her the reason. As usual, I had to beg her for some time to get her to tell me, and then, as I insisted, she drew me under the lilacs, and told me very seriously, and with a bitterness quite unusual from her mouth, that I was a bad friend, that I completely neglected her interests and betrayed her confidence, that I was amusing myself she did not know how, while she was hanging suspended in the air between her two admirers in a horribly painful and even ridiculous situation. My head bent under the storm, acknowledging to myself that I did somewhat deserve the reproaches, and that for some time I had been more preoccupied with my interests than with hers. I calmed her as well as I could, pretending that it was so difficult to choose, and promising to have a conversation with her very soon, and try to come to some decision.

It seems that at that very moment a much more serious quarrel was taking place between Captain d'Eblis and Monsieur de Louvercy, and no one could tell on what account. I merely learned from Madame de Chagres that Monsieur de Louvercy, who had gone in immediately after the little scene with Cécile, soon after returned to the court-yard: that he had accented Monsieur d'Eblis the moment I left him; and that they had talked together under the shadow of the gloomy arch of the avenue. There they had heard them converse in a most excited manner. Madame de Chagres said that the voice of Monsieur de Louvercy gave evidence either of anger or of a most distracting grief. They were afterward seen to cross the court-yard in silence, Monsieur d'Eblis sustaining Monsieur de Louvercy, who seemed to walk with more difficulty than usual. A little while afterward Madame de Louvercy was sent for. Her son, they said, had a severe nervous attack. After this accident three or four days elapsed without his appearing among us.

Monsieur d'Eblis also kept much away from us during the same interval. He was closeted all day with his friend, or drove over the fields with him, and we saw them only at meal times. He was remarkably sad and quiet, his manner toward me embarrassed, and his words unusually cold, and one would say affected. If it were possible for me to think that I had been in question in this quarrel with Monsieur Roger, and that the latter had slandered me, I should believe it. But that supposition is inadmissible. Whatever may have been the cause of their disagreement, no trace of it now remains between them. Their friendship seems stronger than ever; one would say that it has become strengthened by some new bond. This feature is more apparent in Monsieur Roger's manner, whose conduct toward Monsieur d'Eblis gives evidence of a certain penitence of feeling, as though he had done something which he wanted forgiven. It is clear that the wrong is on his side. But what wrong?

Madame de Louvercy knows, apparently, for she is more thoughtful than usual. From contact, doubtless, my grandmother seems preoccupied, and the Messieurs de Valnesse themselves, as well as their sister, seem to be dreaming in corners.

As for me, I will not dwell on what I experience. I was soaring through the heavens among the stars; suddenly my wings were clipped, and I fell heavily to the earth. That is all. I am forcing myself to forget the blissful illusion of a moment, but I can not—I never shall be able to, I fear.

July 22d.—Have I not perhaps too soon yielded to a feeling of despair? It seems to me now, that after that unaccountable disturbance everything has returned to its accustomed order. Monsieur d'Eblis did certainly suffer from a severe shock which at first overcame every other feeling in him, and which he had great difficulty in getting rid of. But he has driven away the cloud little by little, and seems now to be entirely free from it. He has also resumed his old habit of chatting pleasantly and confidently to me, but not without a certain sadness and constraint of manner. Under his seriousness, however, he possesses a fund of humor which Cécile in particular has the power of exciting. That charming, honest, fantastic, crazy character interests and amuses him. While blaming, he likes those capricious and cunning ways, a mixture of the graceful and grotesque, which she is so full of. Yesterday morning, for instance, she resolved to try her skill with a gun in a wood beyond the park. We all accompanied her. Monsieur d'Eblis, in his quality of soldier, was asked to preside over this dangerous expedition. The rabbits ran about the wood like mice in a garret, but it is unnecessary to say that Cécile killed none. She came near laming the Messieurs de Valnesse, however, who had to jump behind a tree whenever she took aim.

As we were returning gayly from this fruitless campaign, following a road opening through the wood, Cécile all at once spied in the very middle of it, just before a green gate, one of those brown stone pitchers used for milking.

"Do look," said she; "there is a pitcher down there walking along all by itself."

Put out by her want of success with the rabbits, she conceived the bright idea of taking her revenge upon this unfortunate pitcher. Quickly bringing the gun to her shoulder she fired.

"I did hit it," cried she, and there in fact lay the pitcher smashed to pieces, while a stream of milk was trickling all over the ground. At the same moment the milkmaid, not at first seen because she was busy shutting the gate, appeared suddenly in the road. She was a little country girl of about ten years of age, whose flaxen hair was partly hidden by a cap. When she perceived the wreck of her pitcher, the poor child threw up her arms in great consternation. She seemed stunned for a moment, and then burst into tears, saying that her mother would beat her, she was sure.

"No, no! Don't be alarmed," cried Cécile. "I'll pay for the milk."

While speaking she ran forward, and noticing that the bottom of the pitcher still held a considerable quantity of it, she exclaimed: "How lucky, for I am as thirsty as a wolf!" and putting her lips down drank with zest. Then stopping to take breath, and noticing the admiration with which we all regarded her, for she was really charming with her bit of pitcher in hand and every dimple smiling, she cried out: "A 'Greuze'!" and then began to drink again. After she had had enough, there still remained some milk in the broken pitcher.

"Who will have some?" asked she. Monsieur de Valnesse, the brun, seized the pitcher with avidity and moistened his lips.

"It is worth twenty francs," said Cécile.
The young man laughed, drew forth his purse and gave her a louis. Monsieur de Valnesse, the blond, drank in his turn.

"Twenty francs," repeated Cécile. "Now it's your turn, Captain," said she to Monsieur d'Eblis, but he did not take it.

"Mine, Mademoiselle?" asked he. "I don't like milk, but here are my twenty francs."

(CONTINUED IN NEXT NUMBER.)

Characters never change: opinions alter, characters are only developed.

HOBSON'S EXCURSION.

On Wednesday last Mrs. Clarissa Hobson entered a suit in the District Court of Alameda County against John Hobson.

On the same day and afternoon John Hobson entered a similar suit in the County of San Francisco against Clarissa Hobson.

Mrs. Hobson's complaint and affidavit charged desertion. So did Mr. Hobson's.

The chain of circumstances which led to this sudden disposition to separate, after a blissful wedded existence of thirty years, is certainly worthy of being described. In my humble opinion half the suits for divorce entered in San Francisco have their origin as did this one of Hobson vs. Hobson and the other of similar name and title.

On Saturday last Mr. and Mrs. Hobson sold out their ten shares of Gould & Curry, which had been purchased at low quotations, and feeling a trifle elated over the realization of money acquired without any special mental or physical endeavor, determined to take a little run from San Francisco across the bay, and concluded that a private excursion to San Leandro would fill the bill.

They were informed by the clerk at the Palace Hotel that the boat connecting with the San Leandro train started at three o'clock p. m., and returned promptly at five the same afternoon.

Hobson was particularly anxious to go and return that day, so as to not miss a meal at the Palace, where he was paying his board by the week.

Crossing the ferry they got on the train at Oakland Point, and were quickly whirled up to Alameda, where they got off and looked about them. It was evidently not San Leandro.

Hobson prowled about the place to find some one who could tell him the next move to make, leaving his wife on the platform.

Presently he was accosted by a flash female whom he had noticed had sat behind him all the way.

She said she was anxious to reach San Leandro. Dobson said he was bound for that same point, at which the woman remarked that she would keep him in sight.

Then Hobson and his wife jumped into a sort of open omnibus, followed by the strange women, and were taken across a sort of bridge to Oakland.

Then they took a car and went to Brooklyn. Here was a delay of half an hour. One of the employees of the road, who is paid $30 per month to mislead travelers, said that the cars would start soon; but the conductor, who is paid $100 a month to complete the work begun by the underling, sent Hobson and wife across the country to catch the horse-car.

The strange woman followed, and presently began to attract the attention of Mrs. Hobson.

"Who is the woman who follows us so close?"

"I don't know, my dear; never saw her before."

Here the woman overtook Hobson, and remarked:

"I thought you said you were going to take me to San Leandro?"

A hack was passing. Mrs. Hobson hailed it and got in.

"I see I am in the way, Mr. Hobson," she said airily.

"If you are going about the country making assignments with such creatures, pray don't take me along as a blind. Drive to the Grand Central immediately, Mr. Driver, immediately!"

She slammed the door, the hack started, and left Hobson and the strange woman staring first at each other and then at the departing hack.

As a matter of course the hackman drove Mrs. Hobson to the Grand Central? No, to Tubbs', where she learned that the driver could not speak the English language.

Mrs. Hobson now got on a horse car to go to Oakland Station. It took her, however, the wrong way, and she met a car containing Hobson going the other way. She saw Hobson and the woman, who was still determined to make the unfortunate man her guide.

Reaching the terminus Mrs. Hobson took the back track for Oakland. Being alone in the car she gave herself up to her own gloomy reflections.

At nightfall the driver reached a stable, where he put up his horses, saying he went no further that day.

The stars came out one by one, and the melody of the vocal frog filled the damp air. She now began to feel that she was alone.

The driver next ran the car into a sort of stable, which caused Mrs. Hobson to vacate the place and set out on foot.

Alone in the trackless wastes of Alameda. She knelt down to pray. Let us leave her struggling with Providence.

Meanwhile Dobson, after tiring himself out chasing the hack, started for San Francisco, where he expected to meet his wife, and arrived in due form at Lathrop, San Antonio, Alameda, Newark, Petersville, Oakland Station, Oakland Point, Elm Cottage, and seven other points not on the map.

The woman who was the cause of his sufferings stuck to him all the way, and would not be shaken off. She was out of money, and Hobson was obliged to buy all the tickets.

He finally purchased a ticket to Sacramento, and she said she guessed it would be easier to reach it than to get to any place in Alameda County. Exit flash woman.

Dobson reached the Palace next day, and did not find his wife. Concluding she had eloped with the hackman who drove her off he entered a suit for divorce.

As soon as Mrs. Hobson could find a lawyer she did the same.

The time-tables, schedules, railroad maps, and tickets purchased by Hobson and Mrs. Hobson, will be introduced as evidence to show the whereabouts of the two parties. Hobson will of course see all in a different light before the trial is half over. So will Mrs. Hobson.

Then he will sue the Central Pacific Railroad Company for conspiring to cause him to travel nine times over their road when he only feels inclined to travel once.

The brakemen, conductors, ticket agents, and switch tenders will be criminally prosecuted as accessories.

An impartial jury will give him a verdict for a million damages, and the Hobsons will start again in the world.

SAN FRANCISCO, October, 1878. SAM DAVIS.

Our ideas, like pictures, are made up of lights and shadows.—Joubert.

FABLES AND ANECDOTES.

By Little Johnny.

Our Tiny Contributor relates certain Fish Stories and Endeavors to Oblige a distant Correspondent.

One day ole Gaffer Peters cum to our hous with his fishn pole and sum worms, and he sed to Uncle Ned: "Ederd les go a fishn."

But Uncle Ned, wich, thot it was Sundry, he sed no, cos that wude be whicked.

Then Gaffer was a stonish, and he sed: "Wot do you mean? It aint Sundry, cos its Mundy."

Uncle Ned he thot a wile, reel a shamed, and then he sed: "I kano that wel a nough, Gaffer, but to a man wich has ben in Injy, and evry were, it is jest the same thing, cos Mundy is the Sabth of the Galoots, and mebbay thay is right, I wont take the chances."

But Gaffer he sed: "I aint got no respect for the relidgous scoopils of them hethens in their blindness wich bows down to wooden stone, but if you are one of em lle go a fishn ol alone by my own sellar."

After a wile Uncle Ned he wocked out to were Gaffer he was a fishn, but he had went to sleep with his fish line in the water, but he had cot some and they was in a basket. Uncle Ned be cum to the house and got sum dride herrins and he took ole Gaffers fish away and put the dride herrins in the basket and one on the hook too, and cum a way. Bimeby I seen Gaffer cumin back, and Uncle Ned be put on his stoppe hat and his Sundry gloves and went out to meet Gaffer, and fore Gaffer cude speek a word Uncle Ned he sed: "Wy, Gaffer, you ben fishin agin? If you haint any spect for the lidgious faith of the Galoots I think you ot to hav for our own Sabath."

Gaffer he got wite like a sheet, and tride for to say sum thing, but he cudent cos he was trembly. Then Uncle Ned he sed a nother time: "I shude think a feller wich fishes on the Sabath, sted of goin to church, like Ime a goin now, wude be struck senseless for a week, and his fishes wude dry up, and mebbay blo a way. Thats how it wude be if you was a Galoot, but I gess our Providence aint so strick bout them things as the wooden stone feller."

Then ole Gaffer, which was witer and witer evry minit, an more trembly, he sed: "No, nothing of that kine has happen to me, but I jest ben up to Sackermanto for a fue days."

Then Uncle Ned he sed: "Cum, Gaffer, les go to church or we will be late."

But Gaffer he cofed a little, and blode his nose, and then he sed: "Ederd, I gess I wont go to meetin anny more. I ben goin some, but that's cos I like Mister Pitchel, thats the preacher, but at hart I was always a Galoot."

But wen Gaffer got home and foun out it was Mundy yet, and he haddent been gone but jest 2 hours, he was the hopinest mad ole man wich was ever saw!

Jack Brily, the sailer, wich wude be a offie liar only he give me a kite, he was tellin ole Gaffer one day how he was to Virginny City, and how he set an fished down a mine with a fish line 20 hundred feet long. Gaffer he sed: "Wot a wopper, I ben to Virginny City my ownself, and I kano the whoter in the mine is bilin hot."

Then Jack he said: "Thats wot makes it so eesy for to catch em, you only got to use ice cream for bate, them pore fish is jest crazy for ice cream."

But Gaffer he sed: "Wy, Jack Brily, do you think Ime a idiet, if there was fish in that woter they wud be biled;" and Jack he sed: "Thats jest it, Gaffer, thats jest the idee, cos I dont con sidder fride fish is fit for to be et."

But gimme plenty tatoes, and mints pize, and pserves, and some do nots, and mlases, and sos, and lle take em fride and biled too.

My father he sed: "Johnny, did you ever hear a bout Jony and the wale?"

But I sed: "You cant fool me, you want me to say yis, and then yule say taint so, cos twassent no wale at all, but only jest a fish, and wales aint fishes."

Then my father he sed, my father did, reel sollum: "No, Johnny, it was a wale, I give you my werd of onner it was a wale, and wot I wanted for to pint out is that the Bible says that he was throte up by the wale after bein swollered, but it stans to reason that it wasent so. No, Johnny, he must have be come part of the wale, cos wen he was shet up in the stomach of its belly the thot of home an frens wude natuly make him blubber."

Then my mother she spoke up an said: "Henry," cos that is fathers giv name, "any one which wil falsfy the Scripeter, and put his werd against a Bible truth for sech a joke as that, wil go were the werm dieth not."

But my father he said: "Ile take along a early bird, and we wil have some fun with that feller."

A man wich lives in Luzanny has rote to me, and he says the man does, can I tel him wich is the most imorl, men or wimmin? So I ast my sisters yung man, which she got married to; and he sed: "Wel, Johnny, it de pens on what the fool means by imorl, if its drinkin wisky, an playn cards, and chune 2 backo, and fitin, and swarin, we can beat the wimmin fokes ol to deth at that, but if he means bein ol night comin to bed wen the mometer is ten degrees blow Nero, wy thay can giv us pints and git a way with the game evry time."

Wen he had went out I shode the letter to my sister, and ast her what did the man mean by bein imorl, and she loked ol round the room and then she sed: "Means to enjoy hisself, I spose, the notty feller!"

But I sed: "You dont understand, wot is it for to be imorl?"

Then she thot a wile, my sister did, and then she looked at her new shoes, and Billy he has got sum new boots too, with legs to em, not like hern, and after a wile she got reel red like beets, and she sed: "Johnny, you needent say any thing, but I gess he means kissin."

But if thats so the wimmin fokes is the most imoral, cos the men dont kis no body but jest them, but they kises the men, and their selfs too, but if a uthor boy wude kis me lde wack him on the snoot of his nose.

SAN RAFAEL, October 16th.

Kindness is the golden chain by which society is bound together.—Goethe.

THE LATEST MAGAZINE VERSES.

The Tress of Hair.

A single strand of golden hair,
How comes it here upon my shoulder?
Blown from the head of lady fair,
Where did I meet or last behold her?
I'm certain that she must be young,
And pretty? Yes! But then I wonder
What pain it was her heart that wrung,
And made her tear her locks asunder?

"Only a woman's hair," wrote Swift,
Form words so tender and so bitter,
In each light breath to sway and drift,
And in each passing ray to glitter.
Slight tendrils of most sacred vines—
Oh, think upon it, ye who bind them—
These little threads, these slender lines,
Will drag the whole world behind them.

It isn't yours, O lady mine,
Down from the wall serenely gazing,
While in my heart "that look of thine"
The ghost of buried hopes is raising.
There may be one would prize this hair
As I the look from those soft lashes;
There may be one, I can't tell where,
And so—I'll throw it in the ashes.

T. GRAY ASHTON, in Peterson's Magazine.

In Praise of Sleep.

There is a Land where nightly I repair,
At whose dim gate I lay my cross aside,
Stretch out my arms toward Rest as toward a bride,
And am fondly assuaged. Ah! even there,
Beyond fond hope, beyond the stress of prayer,
Beyond the hurt and smart of wounded pride,
With no more hunger for sweet things denied,
My heart has rest and respite from despair.
O Land of mystic shapes and languid pleasure!
O waste field of poppy, without track it seems;
O scentless lilies, by the voiceless streams
Where come my ghosts and dance a silent measure,
Hold my lost joy now only in dear dreams;
Give back to me, sometimes, my buried treasure.

I have no heart in me for Love's delight.
How sweet the summer was. I know its spell,
Who care not now what stars may have to tell.
For me the day is void, and void the night.
Upon her dim and inaccessible height
Fame stands above me, robed and crowned. Ah, well,
Let those who love her find her pleasurable,
She hath nor grace nor merit in my sight.
I only am in love with tender Sleep—
Dew on my sad unfruitful flower of life,
Of which no man the memory may keep.
O most divine forgetfulness of strife,
My sky is not too gray, my path too steep,
While thou art mine, for friend, for love, for wife!

PHILIP BOURKE MARSTON.

An Air-Castle.

I built a house in my youthful dreams,
In a sunny and pleasant nook,
Where I might listen the whole day long
To the voice of the gurgling brook;
A cottage, with wide and airy rooms
And broad and shining floors—
A house with the hidden charms of home
And the freedom of out-of-doors.

Fair morning-glories climb and bloom
At will by the eastern eaves,
And on the doorstep and window-sill
The roses shake their leaves,
And fair old-fashioned lilacs toss
Their purple plumage high,
While honeysuckles drop their sweets
On every passer-by.

Down at the end of a pleasant path
Is a group of evergreen trees—
Pine and hemlock, and spruce and fir,
With their spicy fragrances;
And, sweetest picture of calm content
That mortal ever saw,
Under a low-boughed apple tree
Is a bee-hive made of straw.

I have pictured it all a hundred times—
I shall do it a hundred more;
But I shall never own the pleasant home
With the roses over the door.
Never a dream of mine came true—
It is Fate's unbending law;
I never shall see the apple tree,
Nor the bee-hive made of straw.

But yet in the airy realms of dreams,
Where all my riches be,
I enter into the heritage
Which is else denied to me.
I have but to close my eyes to find
My Eden without a flaw—
The home, the garden, the apple tree,
And the bee-hive made of straw.

ELIZABETH AKERS ALLEN ("Florence Percy"), Baldwin's Monthly.

The Ballad of Prose and Rhyme.

When the roads are heavy with mire and rut,
In November fogs, in December snows,
When the North Wind howls and the doors are shut,
There is place and to spare for the pains of prose;
But whenever a scent from the whitethorn blows,
And the jasmine-stars at the lattice climb,
And a Rosalind-face at the casement shows,
Then hey! for the ripple of laughing rhyme!

When the brain gets dry as an empty nut,
When the reason stands on its squarest toes,
When the mind, like a beard, has a "formal cut,"
There is place and to spare for the pains of prose;
But whenever the May-blood stirs and glows,
And the young year draws to the "wanton prime,"
Whenever Sir Romeo courting goes,
Then hey! for the ripple of laughing rhyme!

In a theme where the thoughts diadematic strut,
In a changing quarrel of "yes" and "noes,"
In a starched procession of "if" and "but,"
There is place and to spare for the pains of prose;
But whenever a soft glance softer grows,
And the birds are glad in the pairing time,
And the secret is told "that no one knows,"
Then hey! for the ripple of laughing rhyme!

ENVOY.

In the valley of life, for its needs and woes,
There is space and to spare for the pains of prose;
But whenever the joy-bells clash and chime,
Then hey! for the ripple of laughing rhyme!

AUSTIN DOBSON, in Belgravia.

FLIRTING FACTS.

A jealous man with a pretty wife who will flirt is in a very unenviable condition.

Of what use is it for him to forbid her to go to this or that place, or to speak to such and such young men.

Either she will boldly refuse to obey him, or she will promise—only to deceive.

To watch her day and night is manifestly impossible.

The husband must occasionally go to see a friend, and the moment his back is turned the wife is at liberty.

He may hire a man to watch her in his absence; but, as the man who can be hired to watch a wife is necessarily open to bribery, he will certainly be bribed by the wife or by her friends.

The Turk is enabled to calm his jealousy by keeping his wives locked up; but there is no American wife living who, if locked up in the third-story back room, could not contrive to escape within fifteen minutes after her husband's departure from the house.

Among certain tribes of savages the husband breaks his wife's nose, or in some other equally effective way renders her no longer attractive to young men; but these wretched heathen have never heard of the proverb of biting off—otherwise disfiguring—one's wife's nose in order to spite one's personal face.

If some association of philanthropic business men were to fit up a safe-deposit office, where wives could be left whenever their husbands were absent from home, jealous men could feel a reasonable confidence in the permanence of their domestic happiness; but the experiment is yet to be tried.

Various crude and unsatisfactory schemes for the prevention of flirting on the part of married women have been tried from time to time.

There was a man somewhere who cut off his wife's beautiful yellow hair on the pretext that it was a vain and unchristian adornment of her person, but really in order to prevent her from receiving visitors until the hair should grow again.

This, however, seriously impaired the wife's value, and was merely a modification of the savage nose-breaking process.

Another man constantly spread abroad rumors that his wife was suffering from diphtheria or scarlet fever; but, finding that there were young men who could not be thus terrified, he finally contrived to have her inoculated with the small-pox.

For about a week he enjoyed the success of his ingenious plan, but at the end of that time his wife died, putting him to the expense of a funeral and the annoyance of being without a wife for nearly five months.

The most noteworthy plan which was ever devised for enforcing marital faithfulness was that tried by a Chicago man.

Two years ago he married a widow of remarkable beauty and a well earned reputation.

She had never been accused of any really immoral act—such as eloping with a poor man or an impostor—but being extremely fond of admiration and society, she was the centre of a group of young men who were currently said to bask in her smiles, though there is a difference of opinion among scientific authorities as to what constitutes basking.

The latest husband of this charming woman is a man of a particularly jealous disposition, and his acquaintance propheesied that the widow would drive him to insanity, murder, or suicide, in a very brief time after the honeymoon.

He was well aware of the difficulties of his position, but calmly determined to prevent his wife from flirting, and was strengthened in that determination by the open pity which his friends expressed for him.

It so happened that he had learned through some occult source that the widow's teeth, which were marvelously beautiful, were false.

He was the only human being besides the dentist who possessed this terrible secret, and he felt well assured that it would enable him to repress all flirting tendencies on the part of his future bride.

The honeymoon was passed at the Lakes, and no opportunity was given to the wife to indulge her fondness for society other than that of her husband.

On the very first morning after the pair returned to Chicago the husband rose early, put his wife's entire set of teeth in his pocket, and coolly informed her that hereafter he should never leave her alone without taking her teeth with him.

Tears, entreaties, and threats had no effect upon him, and he carried off the teeth, remarking, as he went out of the door, that it was his duty as a husband to guard her from the approaches of designing men, and to thus prevent any shadow of discord from blighting their married happiness.

For the next three months that unhappy wife was never seen apart from her husband.

Scores of young men who called upon her in his absence were politely told that she was not at home.

Obviously, this was the only course which she could pursue.

Every day when her husband went to business he carried her teeth with him; and she would sooner have died than have shown herself in a toothless state.

Every evening her teeth were restored to her, and she was permitted to receive calls in her husband's presence.

The whole neighborhood was lost in wonder at her absolute cessation of flirting, and hundreds of husbands were ready to offer unlimited wealth to learn how she had been so completely subjugated.

Last week, while the husband, with the teeth in his pocket, was about to leave his place of business and to return home, a note from his wife was put into his hands.

It informed him that, weary of his intolerable cruelty, she had eloped.

The companion of her flight was a man both of whose legs had been shot away.

"We have offset my teeth against his legs," said the note, "and we can overlook each other's peculiarities."

"Don't you love her still?" asked the judge to a man who wanted a divorce. "Certainly I do," said he; "I love her better still than any other way, but the trouble is she will never be still." The judge, who is a married man himself, takes the case under advisement.

Habit is ten times nature.—Wellington.

BONBONS.—FRENCH AND OTHERWISE.

There are some who never would have loved if they never had heard it spoken of.

The whisper of a beautiful woman can be heard farther than the loudest yell of duty.

An inquisitive country gentleman thus accosts a boy who is tending pigs: "Boy, whose pigs are those?"

"The sow's, sir," is the prompt reply.

"Well then, whose sow is it?"

"Father's."

"Well, well, who is your father?"

"If you will mind the pigs I will run home and ask my mother."

Patriotic Frenchman discussing the prospects of war in Europe: "Ah! I would give half my fortune to prevent another invasion of the soil of my beloved country."

Enthusiastic friend: "Noble heart!"

Patriotic Frenchman: "Yes, I had too slow a time in Belgium the time of the last one."

An old maid from Boston, a Miss Warren, leaves the hop-room with a young gentleman from Cincinnati to sit in the flirting balcony.

After sitting there ten minutes, saying little and looking at the moon a great deal, Miss Warren draws a long sigh, and says:

"Nobody loves me, my dear Mr. Johnson, nobody—"

"Yes, Miss Warren, God loves you, and—your mother loves you."

"Mr. Johnson, let's go in."

And five minutes afterward Miss Warren has another young gentleman on the flirting balcony.

A scientific gent lays his finger on the table in front of a buzz saw to feel the momentum of air.

The saw is going so fast that the teeth are not to be seen. His finger is taken off.

While he is looking at it the foreman comes up with the question: "How did you do it?"

"Why, I put my finger down so," he answers, placing the other forefinger as he thinks well away from the teeth.

Both are horrified to see the saw take that one, too, clean off at the second joint.

If you want to have a man for your friend, never get the ill-will of his wife. Public opinion is made up of the average prejudice of womanhood.

At a discussion meeting held by negroes the question of the evening is: "Which am de mudder ob de chicken—de hen wot lay de egg, or de hen wot hatches de chicks?"

The question is warmly debated, and many reasons, pro and con, urged and combated, when a shrewd fellow puts the case thus:

"S'pose dat you set one dozen duck's eggs under a hen, and dey hatch, which am de mudder—de duck or de hen?" This is a poser, but the chairman extricates them from the difficulty.

Rising from his chair in all the pride of conscious superiority, he announces: "Ducks am not before de house; chickens am de question; therefore I rule the ducks out."

And so he does, to the complete overthrow of those who hold a different opinion.

Her pa was one of the Montgomeries de Montflomerie, though she married a Smith. (A Smith, not a Smyth, or a Smythe, or even a Smyth, but merely a Smith.) This fact she liked to make public upon her cards and in her formal correspondence. Thus when she gave her garden party the invitations ran:

"Mrs. Smith (née Montgomerie de Montflomerie) begs to invite," etc., etc.

Among the guests was an aged colonel who dearly hated a snob. Also, his nose was tip-tilted like the petals of a whole bouquet of flowers. He took his pen quickly and wrote:

"Colonel Blank nez Retroussé accepts with much pleasure," etc., etc.

The proprietor of a great restaurant, just recovered from a recent illness, is at the desk, supported by his faithful wife and partner.

"Number heleven's bill, sir," says the waiter.

"Lemme see. Bisque for two—15 francs."

"Twenty francs, dear," says his wife, softly.

"Yes, 20 francs. Turbot—25 francs."

"Thirty francs, my love," says his spouse. "Why, Isidore, you are hardly yourself yet."

"How are the stairs?" said the lady to the house agent; "not steep, I hope."

"Steep, madam? I should say not. It's the easiest staircase I ever saw in my life. Why it's so easy that when you're going up you'd swear you were going down."

At Moscow, a traveler, enchanted by the beauty of some tapestries, which the dealer asserts are from the ancestral home of the Vypurchmofsky family, having been embroidered by a Princess of that house in the seventeenth century, and never having left the chateau, s'hel'p'm, till last week, asks their price.

"Twenty thousand francs, your Excellency."

"Twenty thousand francs! Why, I can get precisely the same articles in Paris for fifteen thousand."

"I know you can, but you add on the freight from Paris here, and the duties, and you'll see we can't sell 'em for a centime less than twenty thousand."

"Drunk again, Alphonse," said his indulgent master; "some night the police will take you to the hotel where there is no objection to your wearing your boots in bed."

"Thaz allr, olefer, hiccoughed the valet with a wink of amitable wisdom; "allers carryourcard mypock—thinks 'n. Shee?"

THE OLD STORY.—IN OLD METRES.

I.—The Meeting.

(Rondell.)

A pair of eyes! Ah, how they beamed;
I saw them and they pierced me through!
I gazed in speechless joy and dreamed
Of heavenly light from stars most true,
Of glistening gems most fair to view,
Of all bright hopes that ever gleamed.
A pair of eyes! Ah, how they beamed;
I saw them and they pierced me through!

When first their splendor shone, I deemed
My duty then to die or do;
Her fate was mine, for well it seemed
That eyes like hers must shine for two.
A pair of eyes! Ah, how they beamed,
I saw them and they pierced me through!

II.—The Wooing.

(Villanelle.)

Don't laugh, treasured maid, in my face,
And say I don't know my own mind,
While Love yearns for loving embrace.

For my words with my thoughts must keep pace;
I beseech you, sweet maid, then be kind;
Don't laugh, treasured maid, in my face.

I am hasty, perhaps, and my case
May be one that can scarce be defined,
While Love yearns for loving embrace.

Affection defies time and place!
Then, pray let your heart be inclined;
Don't laugh, treasured maid, in my face,
While Love yearns for loving embrace.

III.—Doubt.

(Tridlets.)

What! ask mamma and let me know?
Why don't you ask yourself, my own?
'Tis not her joy—'tis not her woe.
What! ask mamma and let me know,
And then consent if she say so?
Just ask your heart and that alone,
What! ask mamma and let me know?
Why don't you ask yourself, my own?

I promise you that she'll consent
If you say "yes," in fondness free.
If on love's triumph you are bent,
I promise you that she'll consent.
Oh, ask her to your heart's content,
But not until you've answered me.
I promise you that she'll consent
If you say "yes," in fondness free.

IV.—The Reply.

(Rondeau.)

Forever mine! Is life so sweet?
Is this delusion or deceit?
Or has the gift most rich and rare
Of daily thought and nightly prayer
Been laid at Love's victorious feet?

There is no tongue with utterance meet
To sing of pleasure so complete
As this, new-born in accents fair,
Forever mine!

We feel the pulse of passion beat!
Soft music for the soul's retreat
In lover-land, where weighty care
Grows lighter than the empty air.
Ah, love, those magic words repeat—
Forever mine!

V.—The Marriage.

(Ballade.)

Have ye wooed, have ye won, is the wooing
Of a maid not a world of delight?
Oh, the charm of the playful pursuing
Of love from its noon to its night.
But the heart that shall feel not afright
When the glee of its passion is done,
Shall hold in its tenderest sight,
But the perfect sweet image of One.

In fair bowers, ye wooers renewing
Mad vows in a passionate plight,
When the harvest of hearts now accruing
Shall gather around ye in night,
Ye will ask is there none to requite,
For a love that shall last with the sun?
And then there shall rise ever bright
But the perfect sweet image of One.

Ere the deed that shall know no undoing
Shall bind you in penance contrite,
Ere the pathway that joy has been hewing
Through roses be ended in blight,
It were well—were it not, it were right,
Ere the new page of life be begun
To feel that Love's soul can invite
But the perfect sweet image of One.

ENVOY.

Poet—whose verse in mad flight,
Has worshiped strange gods as they run;
Thou art wedded! Then learn to indite
But the perfect sweet image of One.

SYDNEY ROSENFELD.

Bill of Fare for Six Persons.—Sunday, October 20, 1878.

Tomato Soup.
Muskmelon.
Lobster en Coquille.
Broiled Snipe on Toast.
Green Peas. Egg Plant.
Roast Beef. Sweet Potatoes.
Vegetable Salad.
Lemon Pie.

Fruit-bowl of Apples, Pears, Peaches, Figs, and Plums.

TO COOK LOBSTER EN COQUILLE.—Cut the lobster into small pieces; mix them with Bechamel, or cream sauce; sprinkle over with bread-crumbs, and brown slightly in the oven. The lobster is put in scallop-shells before baking.

The ex-Empress Eugenie does not rise from her sewing-machine when gentlemen call on her, but works the cushioned pedal more merrily than ever. Eugenie has a very pretty foot.

The St. Louis Post says: "In his youth the Boston Post funny man wanted but little ear below. He got that little long."

FROM MY SKY-PARLOR.

The occupant of the sky-parlor mourns for the apathy and prosaic character of events in his block in Grub Street. He has no fashionable movements to record among its elite. Grub Street, like Calypso, can not console herself for the departure of her Ulysses MacDooligan, the millionaire, who, "grand, gloomy, and peculiar," sits upon his throne on Nob Hill. His charming family are in Europe. A live dis-Count, we learn, is paying devoted attention to the fair Margaret. Bernard's frequent presence gladdens the waiters at Mabelle. He had heard that all Frenchmen are victims of the romantic passion; the only romantic passion he says he has noticed in them is what Artemus Ward calls "a romantic passion for gratuitous drinks." Mamma can be daily seen riding in the Bois de Boulogne, with her faithful attendant, her young nephew Lawrence MacShinnegan, from a neighboring island on the other side of the channel. She is very busy arranging a fête champêtre like those of Le Petit Trianon, in honor of a distinguished American general who wears as decorations all the different corps badges of the Army of the Potomac on his manly breast. She will receive dressed as a Watteau shepherdess, the MacShinnegan coronet of diamonds above her fair brow, a crook in her hand, and leaning on the arm of the distinguished general, who will have his mustaches fiercely waxed out by a first-class French artist for this especial occasion, and a Napoleonic curl on his forehead after the manner of General Daniel Butterfield. The young gent in the hosiery department of the palatial dry goods store on Kearny Street has made a turn in stocks. His aesthetic tastes are now devoted to the purchase of brilliant and stunning cravats. He has become the sole possessor of a diamond pin that lately glistened in the windows of Uncle Harris. Though he has not the divine afflatus, he is redolent of patchouly and Savage's Ursina. When the occupant of the sky-parlor first reached these hospital shores he made the acquaintance of a young gent, who, on a certain occasion, attempted to give him a lesson in the proprieties. While walking on Kearny Street the occupant stopped at one of the windows to feast his eyes on the opulence of watches, jewelry, sabres, compasses, and so forth, therein displayed. The young gent seized his arm and hurriedly withdrew him from the spot. "It may be thought nothing of in the Empire City," said he, "but in San Francisco it is quite vulgar to stop at the windows of pawn-shops." A few weeks after this event he met the young gent at an afternoon concert, and noticed him casting sheep's eyes on a very pretty, well dressed young lady. He was very dilatory in leaving the concert-room, and when they finally moved off the occupant perceived that the goddess immediately preceded them. The young gent's whole figure seemed to dilate at the nearness of her presence. They were approaching a pawn-shop. Seized with an inspiration of revenge, the occupant quickened their pace till they were immediately behind the divinity, and then drawing out a five-dollar gold piece ostentatiously, he exclaimed, in loud and guileless tones: "My dear fellow, I am tired of seeing that silver watch of yours hanging in that window. Here, go in and redeem it." Since that memorable event young David does not recognize his Jonathan, but the occupant of the sky-parlor now stops at all the windows of pawn-shops, especially on Saturday afternoons. The occupant of the sky-parlor has been to see Mèropé a number of times. He finds it is generally pronounced Mee-rope by fair damsels here. But that he is forbid, he could a tale unfold of the delightful and profound criticisms that he has heard during his visits to the Lost Pleiad (Ply-ad). Two young ladies have been indicated to him, each as the bright particular one whose arms were the models of those of Mèropé, and another fair visitant, who spends much time there, has her ears tingled not unpleasantly with the whispering comment that her hands inspired the hands which Rodgers wrought from the marble. Certainly he has heard no one lay claim to having furnished that sharp angular chin. Wherever he goes, however, he finds one universal wail and lamentation on account of the anticipated dullness in society this winter, owing to the absence in Europe and the East of A, B, C, D, E, F, and G, who, on account of their great wealth, and consequent ability to give sumptuous entertainments, have ruled society here. Even phlegmatic Dutch bands bewail this prognosis of events over their beer. Perhaps some Mrs. Cheese-Cream or Mrs. Syllabub may aspire to take the pas in that line this winter. A good deal of this kind of froth has been beaten up from the bottom lately, and is as full of inflated bubbles as some wash-tub over which she may have diligently stooped in departed days.

M.

Ye Quail Hunter.

The foolish cow frisketh her tail and cheweth her cud and goeth forth with joy to browse in the thicket the whole day long.

But the wise cow knoweth that quail shooting hath begun, and she harkeneth unto the voice of wisdom, which saith, Lo! the hunter is come anon, girt about with the shot-pouch and the powder-horn, and in his hand he carrieth a weapon, the barrel of which be doubled.

And he goeth about seeking the birds that do run upon the ground with exceeding swiftness, that he may ensnare them and slay them with the weapon, and devour them, even upon toast.

And the weapon goeth bang, and ye hearth the sound thereof, and ye smelleth the powder, but ye knoweth not, nor doth any man know whereunto the discharge appertaineth.

For it flyeth with haste into the thicket and into the region located thereby, even into the whole territory thereunto adjacent.

And it falleth upon the cow, and it smiteth her sore, so that she lifeth up her tail and flyeth, being sorely and grievously displeased.

But the bird escapeth the wrath, and from a rail in a remote corner of the land laugheth he the hunter to scorn.

Therefore has the wise cow said in her heart, I will lay me down in the home pasture, and will not go into the thicket, nay, not for the hunter or any udder man.

Misery loves company, and so does a marriageable young lady.

INGERSOLL ON BOBBY BURNS.

A Talk with the Western Orator about the Scottish Poet of the People.

At the Pennsylvania railroad depot in Jersey City I saw Bob Ingersoll last Friday morning, buying tickets for Washington. He had that morning landed from the steamship after a tour of a portion of Europe. Soon after we started on the express, the great infidel appeared by my side and answered a few inquiries I desired to make.

"Where have you been, Colonel?"

"I have been to Scotland, sir; I have been to the grave of Robert Burns; in fact, I have chased Burns' history from point to point, and that was my main purpose in Europe."

"I suppose you are going to lecture on Burns; now, tell me how you came to pick out that subject for a lecture."

"Because Burns hated the Presbyterians. Although a Scotchman, and raised in the Kirk, he had sense enough to despise John Calvin and his ministers."

"Colonel, I have a very obscure idea of Robert Burns. I know that he is idolized by his countrymen, but his dialect I don't understand. What was he?"

"Burns," said the Colonel, "was a simple peasant with a big brain. He looked out on the world and saw jackasses eminent in it; he saw merit depressed and talent poor, and flunkiness the law. He held Almighty God responsible for such a distribution of things, and he shot his darts from the beginning at God himself for doing such injustice to His human creatures. Burns was emphatically the republican poet of the British kingdom. It is true that once or twice in his deep poverty he threw butter over some aristocrat who patronized him with money or an office; but the natural expression of the man was indignation, contempt, and laughter for the patronizing class." The Colonel then repeated a stanza from Burns' "Dirge" to show his republican spirit:

If I'm designed yon lordling's slave—
By Nature's law designed—
Why was an independent wish
E'er planted in my mind?

I said to the Colonel: "Give me an idea of how Burns began and ended his life. I mean the time."

"Burns was born in 1759," said Colonel Ingersoll, "at Ayr. He died in 1796, three years before Washington's death, and seven years after the French Revolution opened. Do you know that he sent two cannon to the French Assembly in honor of the revolution?"

"How the deuce could he buy two cannon, Colonel, when he was so wretchedly poor?"

"Well, as I understand it, these cannon belonged to a smuggler that came ashore, and they were put up at auction, and Burns got them cheap, and sent them, with his compliments, to the French."

"Did Burns sympathize at all with the American Revolution, which began when he was sixteen years old and had just begun to issue his poetry?"

"He did," said Colonel Ingersoll, and quoted as follows:

Poor Tommy Gage, within a cage,
Was kept at Boston ha', man,
Till Willie Howe took o'er the knowe
For Philadelphia, man;
Wi' sword an' gun he thought a sin
Guid Christian blud to draw, man;
But at New York, wi' knife an' fork,
Sir-loin he hacked sma', man!

"Give me an idea, Colonel Ingersoll, of Scotland and the vicinage of Burns."

"Well, Scotland is a good deal like Massachusetts, an upland and sterile country, with indented shores and numerous streams. Burns originated on one of these creeks, the Doon, about a mile and a half from the ocean. The country is not remarkable; it reminds me a good deal of Central and Western Massachusetts. It was a very poor country at one time, but industry and an improved stage of gardening and farming have brought it up since Burns' time."

"Are you of Scotch descent, Colonel, that you take such an interest in Burns?"

"No; I take an interest in any man who adorns human nature and speaks his mind boldly. From my reading I formed a great admiration for Burns, and I think higher of the Scotch nation than the English. I can't like the English; they are such flunkies."

"How did you travel through the country where Burns lived?"

"I took a carriage and did it all up carefully. I went to the cottage where Burns was born to begin with. It was a mud cottage, only one story high, and with a single room, in area about eleven by thirteen feet, with only one window, about a foot square, one door, and a recess for a bed."

As Colonel Ingersoll gave this description I saw the tears start behind his glasses and silently run down his cheeks. He continued: "One end of this cottage was attacked by a storm the night Burns was born, and his father, William Burns, had to move him to another house, and when the cottage was repaired the couple and infant moved back again. There, in indigence, almost in squalor, the great peasant was born and passed his youth. He had to turn out and work as a common laborer from a boy. His father was a gardener."

"Colonel, did you discover any reason why such an intellect as Burns' should have been begotten?"

"Only the existence of a fine natural mind in the mother. His father was not at all remarkable. Scotland had no distinctive poet of the people in that rising time of individuality and liberty. Burns took great delight in stating that his father had been a Jacobite rebel, and fought the house of Hanover, and ought to have been hanged. All his life was marked by distress, mixed with Bohemian humor and indifference. He sold his effects at auction to avoid daint, and coming back home to the empty house of his friends, took all the money the effects had produced to have a good spree. When he awoke the next day, at twelve o'clock, and found every cent gone, instead of repining, Burns and his friends said: 'By George, we'll start it again,' and they went on the second night with the same drunk."

"Was he married once or twice? I forget."

"Once; his wife was Jean Armour, and she survived him several years. Burns left two sons; Robert, who died at Dumfries in 1857, and William, who died as late as 1874. The sons were well-to-do, and provided well for their mother. One of them was a full colonel in the British army, and I think both had been in India. None of his blood exists to-day."

"It must have been an uninteresting trip for you there, Colonel, seeing none of Burns' tribe? Did you see anybody who had ever seen Robert Burns?"

"Not a soul. I did see, however, his two nieces, whose name is Begg. They were aged ladies, and unmarried. They were rejoiced at seeing me, and said to me: 'Our uncle has always been better appreciated in America than in Scotland. More and better pilgrims come to his grave from America than from any part of the world. More light has been shed on his genius by American orators and scholars than by Scotchmen.'"

"Colonel Ingersoll, why did not Burns, being poor and loving liberty, come out to America?"

"Well, sir, he did get ready to come to America, but not to the United States. He had an opportunity to be an overseer in Jamaica, and got all ready to start when he was induced instead to repair to Edinburgh and issue the second edition of his poems, which had begun to attract attention. He stayed in Edinburgh nearly a year, and that broke up his design of leaving Scotland."

"How far did Burns ever travel from his native district?"

"I think he was never south of Berwick-on-Tweed. He never was in London at all; he made one trip to the highlands of Scotland."

"Where did he die?"

"He died at Dumfries, fifty miles or so from the place where he lived. He died in a tenement part of a common house, and in the same street is now kept a ragged school. His dying hours were distressed by the constable, and his final words were devoted to cursing the creditor who pursued and disturbed him."

"I am surprised to learn that Scotland is not foremost in appreciation of Robert Burns."

"Well, the Scotch of our day are only less flunkies than the English. The British example embraces Scotland, and makes them bow down to rank and wealth. There are three monuments to Burns in Scotland, but all poor affairs; while Sir Walter Scott, a man who wrote without a heart, has magnificent monuments in every direction. I saw a monument in Edinburgh to George IV., a damned scoundrel. When I saw the inscription on its base I swore like a pirate. It said: 'This statue is erected to commemorate the visit of his Majesty, George IV., on such a day.'"

"You were disappointed, then, at the extent of the appreciation of Burns in Scotland? Did you see any signs on the taverns or shops to indicate that strangers were expected to be looking for Burns?"

"Yes, there were a few. On the whole, however, I was not satisfied with the hold Burns had on Scottish society. I went to almost every place where he resided or which he commemorated." Mr. Ingersoll then gave a list of such places, but I forget the names. He said that Burns was an excise officer—a gauger, with a salary of $250 to $350 a year. I expressed surprise that so good a poet could have been a small Custom House officer. The Colonel said, however, that Nathaniel Hawthorne had been a gauger.

"I possess," said he, "the first edition of Burns' poems issued at Kilmarnock ten years before he died. The second edition was issued at Edinburgh."

"Who now inhabits Burns' birth-place?"

"It was occupied by a person named Morley. When I went into the cottage and registered my name this man said to me: 'Are you Bob Ingersoll of the United States?' I said 'Yes.' He shook both my hands warmly, and said: 'There is nobody I am so glad to see. I served in the Federal army, Colonel Ingersoll, four years. I have read your lectures on "Liberty," "Hell," "Ghosts," etc., as they have been republished in this country in the Reformer.'"

"Colonel Ingersoll, did you see Burns' grave?"

"Yes; he was buried in one place, and then dug up and taken to another place. A lady who admired him very much asked to be deposited in the grave which had been emptied of him, and there she lies to-day. I was taken through the graveyard, and there was a sign up telling what fees were to be paid to see this and that pertaining to Burns. I said to the sexton:

"Don't you think it is rather mean business that the Church, which Burns detested and covered with odium, should be collecting money for showing his tombstone?"

"Yes," replied the sexton; "I'll be dommed if you ain't right."

"Are you dissatisfied on the whole with the places Burns wrote about?"

"No; they were all in miniature. The Bridge of Doon is only a little bridge of one arch and Kirk Alleyway is a very simple church."

"How much money did Burns ever possess?"

"Twenty-five hundred dollars, or five hundred pounds, of which he sent nine hundred dollars to his brother at once to make him independent in his homestead."

"Did Burns accomplish anything? Do you see his influence on the liberality of the Scottish Kirk, for example?"

"Oh, yes; they have become much liberalized. At Glasgow and Edinburgh you see immense numbers of people going out into the country on Sunday, and lying down on the grass. The influence of such a man is unconsciously felt all through the country he belongs to. As I have said before, there is a great deal of time-serving in this Scottish character; but the ever arising generation of young people recognize in Burns the pioneer of independent thought and feeling in the race."

"Why are Burns' poems so coarse? I am told that there is great licentiousness even in Edinburgh?"

"That arises," said the Colonel, "from a want of the decent separation of the sexes. They are banded together without privacy."

"I suppose you went to Stratford-on-Avon after you made the rounds of Burns' locality?"

"I did, and spent some time in that vicinity."

"Did you recognize any resemblance between Burns and Shakspeare?"

"Yes, the same difference and the same likeness that you have between a cottage and a palace. Shakspeare's house and surroundings show a man in good condition; he was well-to-do. The only trouble I have in identifying Shakspeare is that he could ever have been an Englishman. The terrible severity of the English character is wholly foreign to the genius of Shakspeare."—Gath, in Philadelphia Times.

ALL ABOUT WOMEN.

Women are like a cold—easily caught, but mighty hard to get rid of.

A Boston girl never thoroughly enjoys herself while bathing. She is too suspicious.

General Mite's mother is a widow. Perhaps it isn't necessary to give the rest.

The worst thing about a handsome woman is some other arm than your own.

Mrs. Partington says that her minister preached about "the parody of the probable son."

A Chicago woman has hair of mixed red and black, locks of two distinct colors being mixed.

A bachelor merchant's advice in selecting a wife—"Get hold of a piece of calico that will wash."

Many a woman has spoiled a bright future by foolish pride, and saying no at the wrong time.

An old lady said she had often seen "men struck with a happy thought, but could never see where it hit 'em."

Mrs. Grundy says, tell a man the truth about himself and he will hate you, particularly if he affects to despise flattery.

When men, women, and opportunity meet, the devil sits down, knowing that the fire will burn without aid from him.

"Dipped into a weak solution of accomplishments," is the term now applied to those of our girls professing to be so highly educated.

The Memphis Avalanche says: "Parents have deserted children and children parents, husbands their wives, but not one wife a husband."

When a man returns home at night and kisses his wife with more than ordinary tenderness, she may be pretty certain that he has been into some mischief.

"Bob, did you ever see Miss Simpkins?" "No," replied Bob. "How do you know she is handsome, then?" "Because the women are always running her down."

A little girl wanted more buttered toast, and was told that she had had enough, and that more would make her ill. "Well," said she, "give me anuzzer piece, and send for the doctor."

At a recent New York party a young lady sang, with touching effect, "I'm saddest when I sing," when a critic remarked: "Well, miss, I know of no one who has greater occasion."

"I should just like to see somebody abduct me," said Mrs. Smith at the breakfast table the other morning. "H'm! so should I, my dear—so should I," said Mr. Smith, with exceeding earnestness.

Jennie June tells us that the young men of our country do not marry enough, but we are of the opinion that some of them marry too much. The trouble is they don't stick to the one they married first.

Twenty-one young girls of Kenosha, Wis., have "Resolved," That if the young men won't come and see us, we will go and see them." And the young men are stepping down and out, and taking to the woods.

The Post-office Department has ruled that a husband has no control over the correspondence of his wife. But this decision does not prevent a man from carrying his wife's letter in his inside coat-pocket three weeks before mailing it.

A Virginia woman offers to sell her husband by auction, and apply the proceeds to the liquidation of the State debt. "I can recommend him to purchasers," she adds, "as a man possessing all the qualities a woman capable of controlling him could desire."

It was very discouraging to young genius, traveling with his sweetheart and her mother, to write home to the local newspaper that "the ladies' quarters were very large and handsome," and then have the word "quarters" come out in the paper "garters." But the other word wouldn't have been just the proper term either.

A tall, slim-waisted woman, aged forty, called at the Brighton House, Detroit, and demanded to be registered as a voter. When politely informed that she didn't belong to the voting sex, she struck the table with her fist, upset a bottle of ink, and said: "I'll vote if it takes me a thousand years!" And she'll keep her word.

Farmer Gilman fixed a gun in his melon patch, in Sumner, Iowa, in such a way that the person who stirred a certain large, ripe melon would receive a charge of beans. He meant to remove the gun in the morning if no thief was caught in the night, but before daylight his mother-in-law went out to get a melon, and got the beans. She was seriously wounded, and refuses to believe that Gilman did not set the trap for her.

Five noble and wealthy English girls are about to take the veil, all having considerable fortunes in their own rights. They are Lady Edith Noel, daughter of the Earl of Gainsborough; the Hon. Constance Howard, sister of the Marchioness of Bute; two daughters of the Hon. Maxwell Stuart, of Traquhar, Peeblesshire, and the youngest daughter of Mr. Blount, of Mapledurham, the representative of the staunchest Catholic family among commoners in England.

We think of "Miss Kilmansegg and her Golden Leg" as a mere fable, and all the more so that her dress was looped up to the knee to exhibit it at her grand ball, and yet she actually had a precedent, for in 1795 a young Scotch lady had the audacity to intrude herself into the presence of her most chaste majesty, Queen Charlotte, at a ball at the "Queen's House," as Buckingham Palace was then called, with a silver gauze dress so festooned that at every turn of the Scotch reel her garter, with l'amour upon it in plain gold letters, stood revealed. The fair Caledonian, however, wasn't asked again, there was such a precious amount of "Well, I never," "Did you ever?" audible in the room.

MISS MERIVALE'S WILL.

Miss Mehitabel Merivale's life had been so very simple and quiet that, but for such strange interweaving of itself with other lives at the last, there would, perhaps, have been nothing in it worth writing about; yet it had been long, as we count our earthly years, and lonely; for she had far outlived father, mother, and stalwart brothers who had died in their prime. Sole heiress of her large ancestral estate, she was still living with Janet Cameron, her old-maid servant, in the same great house where she was born. One sees many not unlike it in New England.

The picture of Miss Merivale, hung up among other early memories, shows her in her seat in the old church, of a summer Sunday morning—a slight, shy little figure in a black satin gown, half obscured by the high walls of the old-fashioned pew; her small gloved hands crossed upon the Bible in her lap; her head, with its band of gray under the close silk bonnet, bent slightly forward; and her timid glance, lifted only to the face of the old minister, in the lofty bird's-nest of a pulpit roofed with its odd sounding-board.

Her face, a very smooth one for her years, had yet a certain quality which was wont to fascinate my childish gaze, and move me to vague wonder. Now, with the light of maturer observation thrown upon its remembrance, it might be said to have worn the repressed look of a shrinking, affectionate nature, hungry for sympathy, yet morbidly dreading misunderstanding or repulse. I understood it better when, long afterward, I heard the story of the gallant young captain-lover, whose ship had gone down just outside the harbor-bar, only a month before the wedding-day that should have been. Miss Merivale—a sweet-faced young girl then—had fallen like dead that day; but, the first cruel shock once over, she had made no lamentations, and no one remembered to have heard her speak his name again. Yet none the less, I think, had something gone from her which no measure of content or blessing could ever quite restore. Not one, perhaps, of all the fifty summers following, had held a single day so perfect that, looking out upon the miracle of spring-blossom, tossing bough, or far, fathomless blue sky, she could once more be glad just to be alive—in June!

Across the little common she would go, with Janet always at her side—Janet, whose shrewd, courageous Scotch face, strongly marked enough to be made a model for a gargoyle, was so strange a contrast to her own. Miss Merivale was sure of one friend, at least. To Janet she would always be "Miss Hitty," young, beautiful, and tender; to be served and guarded with a fidelity and passionate devotion, the outgrowth of the old family relation between mistress and maid, which the new modes and exigencies of our changing civilization have rendered so nearly obsolete.

Janet, in her way, was a character. Intensely human in her sympathies, with a keen but kindly inquisitiveness concerning all the happenings of the village, and a tongue often sharply, if justly, critical of men and motives, her staunch loyalty made her, nevertheless, absolutely reticent when the affairs of her mistress were in question. Whatever she might talk about, in her round of marketing, or over the gate, with some neighbor passing in the early evening, "Miss Hitty" was too sacred to be made a theme for even the most innocent gossip. So it happened that those who lived nearest Miss Merivale knew little, after all, of the life and thought of the lonely lady. The visits of ceremony duly made upon her from time to time, by the village gentlefolk, were as duly returned. There was talk of the weather, the Sunday's sermon, the latest wedding, or funeral; yet nothing ever quite drew aside the shy reserve which clothed her like a veil.

Once only, for a moment, I saw her soul look out at her eyes, like a caged thing fain to break its bars. It was the last time she came to church, before she was borne there in her coffin. It had been understood for some time that Miss Merivale was "failing," but I think no one had known how really ill she was. As she rose to leave her seat, putting her hand in Janet's arm and leaning upon it with unconscious heaviness, she raised suddenly her downcast eyes, with one long, sweeping glance, which gathered and embraced the congregation, each by each, from the minister upon the pulpit-stair, to brown-haired Leila Thornwell standing, like St. Cecilia, in the choir, her whole soul thrilling yet with the last chord of the psalm. If there was in that look all the pain of unsatisfied yearning, there was also all the tenderness of a caress. How silently our best opportunities pass us by! The time was not far distant when some, at least, whom her garment brushed in passing, would have given almost a year of life to have kissed its very hem that day.

"What will she do with her money?" people asked each other, when it was known that Miss Merivale was slowly but surely dying. The question took on all shades of emphasis, from the careless tone of a merely idle curiosity to the eager whisper of envy. One bold spirit ventured to approach Janet upon the vexed question, but was repulsed with a resentment so fierce that none dared repeat the experiment.

The agent of a certain charitable endowment, a good man but a narrow do-specialties in benevolence tend, sometimes, to narrowness; sojourning in the town, felt himself forthwith called as a messenger of God to demand from the invalid the bequest of all her possessions. Full of joyful zeal, he sought an interview with her, and returned, a self-righteous but disappointed man.

It was after this that Miss Merivale sent sometimes for the old pastor of the church. Two or three times her attorney from the city was also present, and to these conferences Janet Cameron was always admitted.

She died quietly as she had lived, reclining in her easy-chair before her western window, with the low sun flooding all the chamber with radiance. "She spoke to me," said poor, heart-broken Janet, "then turned her head on the pillow—so—and was gone!"

With what strange distinctness and solemn reverberation the first sound of the tolling bell shivered the quiet air! Even the children at play upon the village green paused to count with hushed voices the measured strokes. On and on, past the twenties and thirties and forties. They looked at each with awed faces—to the young old age seems so impossible! After the seventy-third stroke came silence, as the solemn echoes lost themselves among the enduring hills.

"Miss Merivale?" said one to another; and while they made the band of crape on the door-handle of the great hall mutely answered the question.

There seemed some slight incongruity in the announcement of a public funeral for one whose life had been so secluded. The little church was quite filled when the bearers brought in the light coffin and placed it on the bier. The poor lady's lonely lack of kindred had never been so sadly apparent as when Janet, in her black dress, bent and trembling, took the seat of chief mourner. It was at this moment that sweet Rachel Morris, with flushed cheeks and eyes heavy with unshed tears, stepped swiftly and noiselessly forward and laid the bunch of snowy lilies she had carried upon the velvet pall. A little thing, indeed, to do; yet, perhaps, an hour later, she was more glad to have done it than for any other action of her life.

The congregation was not a large one, although nearly every family in the little village was represented in it. A few well-to-do were scattered here and there, but the majority, people of moderate or scanty means, had done long battle with the clamorous cares of life, armed only with weapons of honest work and self-denying economy. No ignoble conflict, surely! Out of such, in all the years of the republic, has been born the sturdy strength that saved her in the hour of her consummate peril. Yet, sometimes in our weary hours, we wonder why the most perplexing problems of our life concern the matters for which we are bidden to "take no thought"—what we shall eat and drink, and wherewithal we shall be clothed.

The old minister had of late had cause for some such troubled thoughts. His faith had not wavered, but it had been sorely tried. To save a wayward younger brother, dear to him as his own son, from deep disgrace, he had stripped himself of the careful savings of many self-denying years. Not more than two or three of his parishioners knew how even the rarest and most precious volumes of his library had gone to the bookseller. There had been tears in the good man's eyes as he wrapped them tenderly for the express man; he could fancy them the faces of dead friends. He was an old man, and must soon give his place to a younger, and then? All the self-respecting independence of his Puritan ancestry rose up within him at the question, but he crushed it back. It should be with him as God willed.

And Rachel Morris, despite her tender thought for the dead, had brought a heavy, wounded heart to church. The flush on her cheek deepened, and her whole nature thrilled like a sensitive plant, as Mark Atherton took his seat in the pew before her. A noble face was Mark's—a face to trust, to love and be loved, but it was prematurely care-worn, and about the mouth to-day were some new, hard lines of trouble, revealing the thought of one who had grown suddenly uncertain of mastery, brought to bay by his own disappointed hopes. Rachel felt the look as he passed her, although her own eyes were scarcely lifted; she had seen it there three days before for the first time.

Seven years ago—how long it seemed!—they were betrothed. Mark was a senior at Harvard then; brilliant, admired, "with a future before him," the professors said. Ah, that vacation summer! Was it not worth even this pain to have known three months so perfect? Sitting there in the quiet church she thought of all that followed: the sudden death of Mark's father, his recall from college, the settlement of the estate, the crushing surprise of finding that the payment of the debts left absolutely nothing for the support of the invalid, heart-broken mother and the troop of young brothers and sisters. She remembered how Mark had taken the burden on his strong, young shoulders so nobly and cheerfully—how proud she had been of him for that! It had been a hard, brave struggle; over and over they had put by their own plans and struggles; over and over he had said: "In one year more, my darling!" and she had answered: "One or ten, dear Mark!"

But now, at last, when the good times seemed really near, he had come to her with the darkness of a new reverse upon his face. When before he had been weary and impatient she had soothed him; he had drunk at the spring of her hope and courage. But this time she was powerless.

"I can never marry, Rachel!" he said, in a hard, bitter voice which she could not recognize. "I have been a fool to think of it. Fate is against me. You are wearing out your youth working and waiting. I should be a coward to let it go on longer. Henceforth you are free!"

"O Mark! Mark!" she cried, "you do not know what you say! You can not make me free! My own heart binds me; would you break my heart?"

But he said not a word. He grasped her wrists until she could have cried out with pain, devoured her face with bitter, despairing eyes, kissed her once, twice, almost fiercely, and went away. "Mark! Mark!" she called in agony, but he neither turned nor answered.

She had not seen him since until to-day. Was this the end of all? she thought. If he had loved her, could he have left her so? She might touch him with her hand, yet how far and cold seemed the distance between them! And life was so long. She forced herself to think: she should grow old and weary with small toils; her hair would whiten and her face grow wrinkled; at the last she should lie—like that! She shuddered as if the heavy pall were wrapped about her heart.

Just across the aisle sat John Hemenway with his gentle wife. He, too, had his own sorrow. The reticent, laborious man could never have told any one how dear was the little cottage where he had taken his young bride long ago; the chamber in which his children had been born; the pretty garden where they played, and where, too, one little grave had been made, because the church-yard seemed so lonely for the tender nursing that had never slept one night out of the mother's arms. But sickness and ill-fortune had come, and left the cottage hopelessly encumbered; next month the mortgage would be foreclosed; he must begin anew. He did not murmur; he was made of better fibre; but the small mound with the white rose-bush at its head was not the only grave of hope which the little homestead covered.

Leila Thornwell turned the leaves of her psalm-book with a touch that was a caress. Even the printed symbols of sweet sound touched her with some strange, dimly-comprehended emotion of kinship. One upon whom the divine birthright has not descended can but vaguely suggest what music meant to this child, with the rare artist-face and far-seeking eyes, and the small hands stained and hardened by work in the mills. Leila had never heard a great singer except in her dreams, but only God and her own heart knew how the note of a bird, the far, sweet chime of evening bells, even the sound of her own wonderful voice—how wonderful she never guessed—in the dusky twilight woods, where she went sometimes alone when work was over, would make her very soul burst with longing for the unattainable. "Let me learn or die!" she cried out often, with her face pillowed on the cool mosses, and the brown leaves drifting over her head. Heaven, to some weary souls, might mean white robes and rest; to others, long fettered by adverse circumstances, freedom and growth; to Leila it was "the Song of Moses and the Lamb."

Kind-hearted Charley Carroll, passing Widow Mullane's cottage on his way down the street, had encountered the wistful eyes of little Patsey from his couch before the door, and forthwith taking him inside to be made neat, had brought him on his broad shoulders to church. Poor Patsey, with both legs crushed in the runaway last year, would never walk again. "So patient—the darlint!" said his mother often. "Niver a word of complainin' from the mouth of him, though it's himself that must many a time set alone the whole day. Ah! the one thing I'd be wantin' a bit of money for 'ud be to make him more comfortable loike."

The simple sermon from the grand text, "I am the Resurrection and the Life," was not long, and as the speaker closed the book, he bent for a little silent space over the pulpit rail.

"My brethren," he said at last, "it has been my custom upon occasions like this to speak according to my knowledge and ability of the life and character of the deceased. Not wholly of my own judgment, but after mature consultation with the friend now present, who has been the administrator of the worldly affairs of our departed sister, I have decided to forego my usual habit, and introduce what may seem a strange innovation.

"I bear upon my heart to-day a great sadness. Our sister has passed among us a more solitary life than was meet. Far be it from me, my brethren, to accuse you of undue self-absorption! In this fault, if fault there be, I stand also with you, and may God mercifully judge our sin of omission! "The confidence of the dying is sacred, yet the words spoken to me not many days since by our sister belong to me, as it seems, only as your representative. I have, therefore, no hesitancy in transmitting them to you.

"A message was brought to me that she desired my presence. I found her greatly changed since I had seen her last. With exceeding calmness and self-possession she told me that, in the opinion of her physician, she had not long to live. Her words, my brethren, are vividly impressed upon my memory. 'It is better so,' she said. 'My time has been long, and perhaps few should be so little missed as I shall be. It has seldom been my fortune to attract where I have myself been attracted; yet the people with whom my home has been so many years are very dear to me. I have much money, more even than I myself knew, until of late. My wants have been few and my expenditures small, and the investments which Mr. Ayrbright has made for seem to have marvelously prospered. I have, as you may know, no kindred; I have been ill a long time, and what was at first scarcely more than a fancy, has grown to be the dearest wish of all my life.

"I have thought that I should like, if I could, in dying, to make every one in the village a little happier. To some, who need, I would give aid; to others, the fulfillment of some long-cherished wish; to others still, I might be the cause of some pleasure not otherwise experienced. Once I might have been sad to think that no tears, except my poor Janet's, would be shed for me, but not now! I would have smiles instead! I trust it may not be a selfish thought, but I have dared to wish that even the little children I have watched so often on the village green might play the merrier for my sake."

"My brethren, I will not add words of my own. You will understand now why I asked Mr. Ayrbright, who is present with us to-day, to read in your hearing the last will and testament of our dear sister who has left us."

In the great stillness which had fallen upon the room, all eyes were turned upon the lawyer, who rose in his seat, and advancing to the vacant place beside the coffin, slowly untied a thickly-folded paper, and holding it to the light, began to read.

Miss Merivale's will was a long document, too long to be reproduced here, with many codicils. The plan she had confided to the pastor had been carried out to its smallest details with wonderful fidelity. Every family in the little village, either as a whole or through some representative, was remembered there—not one left out. But the marvel of it all was the intuition which seemed to have guided her in the selection of her gifts. Even the mementoes for the few wealthier townspeople had been chosen with rare discrimination of individual character and tastes.

If, unseen, she had presided over every household council, nay, had shared the solitary perplexities of those on whom the burden of life had been laid, she could scarcely have decided more unerringly. There were no careless bequests, made out mere delight in giving. Wherever existed age or ability compatible with effort, her gift, whether small or large, took the form of a means to more efficient and independent self-help. More than one in the little church that day saw the "lost chance" which had passed him by in the unsuccessful race of life, turn back to meet him, like an angel with outstretched hands.

First of all, as was meet, had been the generous provision for "Janet Cameron, the devoted companion and faithful friend of many years, upon whose unfailing affection I have leaned, and to whose wise judgment I have deferred with especial satisfaction in these closing arrangements of my life."

Faithful Janet! No crown could have touched the wrinkled brow with such sacred honor. To how many hearts the words from an old Book seemed to whisper silently, like dreamed-of music: "Blessed are those servants, whom the Lord, when he cometh, shall find watching: verily, I say unto you, that he shall gird himself, and make them sit down to meat, and will come forth and serve them."

Strange scenes were enacted. One by one, the grave and decorous faces gave way before the deepening flood of an emotion which could not be checked. The tears which the dying woman had resigned without a pang were mingling with the smiles she longed for, in a bow of promise whose radiance encircled all.

No more trembling visions of an old age fed by charity

TOLD IN LETTERS.

Domestic Fact and Fashionable Fancy.

for the white-haired man of God sobbing his heart out in thankfulness upon the pulpit rail!

Let the baby rest still in the garden-earth, John Hemenway, for the cottage is your own again!

And Mark—O Mark and Rachel! do you hear? "To Mrs. Jane Atherton, widow, my homestead, except the rooms heretofore reserved for the life use of Janet Cameron." Then, following close, are designated the terms of annuity which will reinstate the mother in the old independent comfort. Before the quick blood which leaped to Rachel's heart can seek her cheek again, she hears her own name in the lawyer's clear voice:

"To Rachel Morris . . . . the cottage owned by me, known as 'The Vines.'"

Nothing for Mark? Yes, everything for Mark! Love, hope, the world to conquer! They clasp each other's hands across the pew, as utterly alone amid those crowding faces as were the first man and woman in Eden!

"O Patsey, listen!"—it is Charley Carroll's eager whisper—"don't you understand? A beautiful wheeled chair—you turn it with your hand—your own hand, Patsey! It will take you everywhere—it will be like walking again! And money, Patsey, for books and lessons, and—"

Ah! Charley Carroll, hush! There is no color in the small, thin cheek; the light figure falls limp against your encircling arm, faint with excess of joy.

"To Leila Thornwell, whose singing has been an inexpressible aid to my feeble aspirations, I would recommend a life devoted to musical study. If this plan coincide with her own wishes, I direct an appropriation of money to defray all the expenses of the most thorough musical education possible to be obtained by her, under the best masters, both in this country and Europe."

Ah! Leila! Leila! Press closer to her, if you will; she does not see or hear you; but kneeling on the white wood floor, you may see her face, as it were "the face of an angel."

The long list of individual bequests was over at last. The two remaining were of collective interest. The former provided for the establishment and maintenance of a free public library; the latter directed the erection of a commodious building surrounded by ample grounds, and adapted for the uses of a "Kindergarten." Not in vain had Miss Merivale read Friedrich Froebel. The clear, succinct text of the will portrayed like a vivid picture the large and beautiful gardens where the children should play, where each should have his own little spot of ground, and learn his first independent relationship to the soil.

"Let us pray!" said the minister, as Mr. Ayrbright finished; but his voice ended in a sob and he sat down.

There was no formal invitation, but the whole assembly, as by one common impulse, moved gently forward, when the sexton had unscrewed the coffin-lid. Very calm and sweet she lay in her snow-white robes. There was no semblance of extreme age in the dead face; it was as if her own lost youth had met her at the door of Heaven, and led her smiling across the golden threshold.

How many lips that never touched her living face, pressed now in passionate yearning upon the cold, still brow, murmured: "If we had known, if we had only known!" It mattered little—she would never be lonely again! "For so He giveth His beloved sleep."

Years have passed since Leila Thornwell came back from Italy. She had been long abroad, but the fame of her marvelous success crossed the ocean before her. It was a proud and happy concourse that welcomed the great singer to the home of her humble birth. Fresh and unspoiled still, she met their greetings with a sweeter joy than the most enthusiastic applause of London and Parisian salons had ever been able to impart.

A deputation of her townsmen came to her, after the first fatigue of her journey was over.

"Will you not sing for us?" they said. "The town hall is not fit, but it is our largest room."

"I will sing for you," she answered, with a strange light in her beautiful face, "but not in any hall. To-morrow will be the anniversary of Miss Merivale's burial. I will sing to you beside her grave."

The people gathered in the odorous hush of the summer twilight. The church-yard was quite full, and many stood in the street outside. A strange stillness brooded over all, broken only by the distant rushing of the rapid river. Miss Merivale's monument gleamed white amid the dusky pines. The towns-people had raised it to her memory, even the little children dropping their pennies eagerly into the common fund. The sculptor knew the story, and he had put his heart into his work. There was a massive pedestal of purest white marble, and upon it a woman's figure, winged and veiled, bending slightly forward as if for flight, with both hands outspread in blessing. There were many flowers upon the green mound; from early spring-time until the late frosts of autumn it never lacked such offerings.

Leila stood close beside the stone, a slender, graceful form, with a face pure and clear as the artist's sculptured ideal. If music be indeed the language of the immortals, well might her luminous eyes reflect the radiance beyond.

The level sunset touched her brow with a glory; slowly it faded, and the shadows deepened about her head. Still she sang—old-folk songs, tender and sweet, born of the pathos of living and dying; hymns that bore on their strong wings the conflict and triumph of the ages; grand arias, in which the souls of Handel and Mendelssohn compelled immortality; strains that had lost themselves among old cathedral aisles, or soared to heaven from the lips of chanting armies waiting the battle charge for God and native land. The grandeur of the Old Dispensation, the tender promise of the New, were embodied in a living voice.

The faint moon had stolen into the sky, when she ceased at last. "My friends," she said, "all you who love her who was born into heaven so many years ago this day, sing with me now, 'Praise God from whom all blessings flow!'"

The people bent like a wind-swayed forest. Not one was there whose life had not been somehow broadened and ennobled by the tender beneficence of her who slept beneath the flowers.

The choral harmony rose and swelled and died away, but somewhere, may be—who can tell?—out in the infinite where God's lonely hearts find home and rest, other lips took up the strain, and the praise of earth became the joy of heaven.

MARY A. P. STANSBURY.

MY DEAR EM:—I dropped into the midst of something new and charming the other day, at 38 Geary Street, where the Wakefield Rattan Company has its headquarters. You would be surprised indeed to see the almost endless variety of articles that are manufactured from a simple stick of cane. Chairs of every description, rockers, high chairs for babies, low ones, footstools, and invalid chairs—the best things of the kind I ever saw, for they are at once so light and so strong, with none of the disagreeable feeling of insecurity that all the common wicker work gives; no creaking of every joint, and no untwisting of stray straws; these last are made with foot-rests, high backs, and arms, large wheels, and a handle at the back to propel it by. They would almost reconcile one to permanent invalidism. Then there are cribs and cradles—one with a canopy top, finished in blue and white lace, which was exhibited at the late Fair—music stands, book racks, wall pockets, brackets, shaving cases with French plate mirrors attached, corner dagres, photograph stands, firewood baskets, settees, tables of all shapes and sizes—some with a broad tray midway between the top and bottom, and a host of other contrivances. Extra handsome are the different varieties of work baskets and work tables. They come both in wicker and rustic work; are lined with quilted silks and adorned with cords and tassels; one has a double covered basket, with a mirror above the top one. Scrap-baskets, too, that are really ornamental, are made in the form of open-work barrels and lined with bright colors. This is the depot for the famous Kurrachee rugs I have told you of before, which, together with all these other articles, are made in Wakefield in the far-away State of Massachusetts.

New lingerie at Chester's includes some elegant scarfs of Valenciennes, Duchesse, and Point, among the more expensive trifles, and a dozen or more different styles in bows, ties, ruchings, and sets. Parures in nainsook and colored linens are made up in the "cock's comb" scallops, with additional garniture in the shape of open work on the edges and hemstitching running lengthwise; ties of the same are attached and cuffs come to match. They are pretty for morning wear—in the absence of greater novelties. Real bargains are the embroidered and hemstitched sets, selling for one dollar. Shoulder capes of Sicilienne and cashmere, richly beaded and silk-worked, are among the newest things there; the same pretty things in heavy silk nettings, and in various colors, finished on the edges by fringes, are exceedingly handy to be used as scarfs over outside wraps. Doane & Henshelwood showed me yesterday one of three pieces of the "Bon marché" black silk just received, which they are selling at the ridiculously low figure of three dollars a yard. It is fully the equal of the Ponson and Bonnet, and far enough ahead of the various other makes. I find this an exceedingly satisfactory store to deal with; everything is so excellent in quality, and there are no glaring extremes in anything you find there. Mrs. Lewis, of Thurlow Block, gives me many items this week as to the modes. She is making many street suits of quite brilliant colors, some combining three and four even. Long loop bows, lined with a contrasting color or shade, are absolutely indispensable; and combinations of faille, satin, and woolen goods are now the favorites for street and house and carriage wear. Black silks are now combined with moire, satin, or brocade, instead of velvet. A most elegant toilet was one just completed, of a bluish sage-green silk and a silvery blue green brocade. The trimmings consisted of pipings of red silk, and a superb light green chenille fringe, the balls of which were connected by crimson bands. Plastrons of fine plaitings are as much used as ever, and a pretty variation consists of the dress itself, where it meets the plastron, being cut in scallops and bound with contrasting silk. The two styles at present are the Princess and a separate skirt and basque, or a combination of the two. "Laveuse" plaits will be much used, but in ordinary overskirts the irregular pouffs will rule, and trimming may be very profuse or very scant, according to taste, so very obliging is Dame Fashion just at this transition period. The favorite colors are caroubier, garnet, Vandick, Russian green, Ophelia pink, which shades on gray, seal brown, and the newly-named shade of mastic, now called "livery," or coachman's gray. By the way, Sullivan has some lovely cloaks in the different shades of grays and brown, and among them one of this new color, of heavy beaver cloth, made up in Dolman shape, with the round closed-sleeve, and trimmed with a broad band of garnet velvet and deep mastic fringe. Mr. Sullivan has just returned from Paris, and has brought back any number of novelties in the way of cloaks and suits, besides there is no telling how many ideas to be worked out by his busy brain as fast as time will permit. Buttons for outdoor wraps will be large again, which seems to me more suitable than small ones, and I saw at this same house a great variety of polished wood ones, pearl, vegetable ivory, silk, satin, and velvet. A very elegant trimming for cloaks is the chicoree ruche. It is made of heavy silk, plaited through the centre either in clusters or continuously, and the edges pinked. Sometimes the pinking is done in large scallops composed of finer ones, and a still more showy style is the serrated leaf. Different styles are employed, according with the quality of the silk. A most comfortable article in the way of a traveling wrap is the "Montague," and I hear they have been having a tremendous run there ever since they were first displayed. Morning wrappers of particularly new and fresh combinations seem to be one of Mr. Sullivan's pet specialties. There is an exquisite blue one embroidered in colors now in the window, attracting universal admiration, and others of bright cashmere with neck and sleeve trimmings of broad Irish point, that are not far behind it in beauty. The side button, or "Provost" glove, still retains its popularity, and elaborately embroidered kids of both styles are much worn. Seed pearls are sometimes introduced, reminding one of the days of the Charleses, when the gloves were the prime consideration of the toilet. These are extremely handsome with all white toilets, particularly where the garniture of the dress consists principally of pearl trimmings. I find a very full and complete assortment of these articles at the Lace House. Miss Baker, of Boston dress reform fame, at 430 Sutter Street, tells me that the balayouse is being superseded by a plaited flounce, edged with Mirecourt lace, and made after the Worth model (for which she is the sole agent here), attachable to the Princesse skirts. I am glad to hear on all sides how these excellent improvements on our underwear are gaining friends. The Union suits in flannels, as well as the continuous drawers that combine both chemise and drawers in one, are vastly superior to the detached garments we have hitherto been tormented with, and as they come ready-made from head-quarters, there is no delay if one wants ever so large an outfit; at the same time, they will be made to order if preferred. Every patent in the way of skirt and stocking supporter is to be found here, and Miss Baker is also the agent for Mrs. Clark's self-supporting corset. Fancy hosiery is in hair-line stripes running round the leg, and sometimes showing an addition of embroidery up the side. I saw some beauties at the White House in silk and Lisle thread the other day. The silks of the most delicate tints are warranted fast colors. Lisle threads, both open work and plain, have designs in one color only, gray or the neutral greens, browns, etc., and even with a difference of a single shade, to match the dress goods now in vogue. The most beautiful ones to my fancy are the black and white that look like all lace, and the pearl grays worked in the same shade. Our bottiers seem determined to keep pace with all the refinements of other foot-wear, and show some elegant fashions in their line. Kast, who is always getting in something new and tempting, had some remarkably pretty walking boots of matelassé in black, gray, and invisible green, with foxing of soft, dull red, and then narrow straps across the toes, through which the cloth is seen. Mottled and checked goods, though worn when according with the suit, will never become as popular as plain goods, as the latter only have the tendency to diminish the size of the foot. For evening and full dress occasions the variety is infinite, even verging on the most extravagant of the theatrical styles, which, by the way, Mr. Kast makes a specialty. Gold, silver, bronze, pink, blue, and green, are some of the kids seen in high laced and button boots, low slippers, ties, and the different shapes known to the trade for this particular line of custom, while others are in colors, flaked or scaled like armor, with gold and silver, embroidered, stitched, and otherwise "wonderfully made." Delightfully comfortable toilet-slippers are made of cloth on quilted silk, lined with flannel and edged with fur. Unlike most fur-trimmed shoes, they do not look unduly large or cumbersome. But with all this fancy work I think Kast is strengthening his previous reputation most by his make of walking-shoes that are now cut and shaped on purely anatomical principles, have broad, low heels, and are marvels of good sense and fine workmanship. I see that Roman advertises Miss Youman's new book, Lessons in Cookery. I have it, and think it the best thing in its way I ever got hold of. Not only is it chuck full, as they say down in Maine, of excellent receipts, but it goes into the depths of the cooking question until it arrives at the dignity of a philosophical dissertation, adding to its extremely practical instructions several such chapters as these: "Sick-room Cookery," an essay on "The Principles of Diet in Health and Disease," by Dr. Thomas K. Chambers, which includes the consideration of diet as the source of both bodily and mental strength, its regulation in corpulent, consumptive, and gouty tendencies, and the proper balance of meat and vegetable diets in various conditions of life. The author is a pupil of the South Kensington Cooking School of London, and every receipt given is in constant use there, and, therefore, as fully verified as is possible for it to be. There is nothing cookable that is not fully discussed, and canning, pickling, and preserving are entered into at length. I have been reading too, of late, another work, which I recommend to you for solid consideration; it is the History of Ancient Literature, by Quackenbos. It begins with the earliest vestiges of Aryan literature, and comes down through oriental, Grecian, and Roman, successively, to the beginning of the decline in letters under the last-named empire; is illustrated by both engravings and maps, and gives a condensed account that is extremely useful to home students interested in these subjects, which I fancy you are somewhat. Adieu, till next time.

Yours, always, LILIAS DUBOIS.

Beauty gets plenty of praise. Poets sing it, romancers furnish it in abundance to their heroines, dramatists use it as the motive of their most stirring plays, painters and sculptors delight to portray it, all the world worships it; and yet there is much to be said about the noble qualities of ugly little women. There is often more charm in the vitality, energy, unselfishness, and gaiety of an ugly little woman than in a half dozen tall, queenly beauties, who have to be on the watch all the time to pose well and make their points effective. There have been men in the world who thought it a fine thing to say that "an ugly woman has no place in the economy of nature." But if the records of the world were intelligibly written it would be found that ugly little women have been the heroines, the helpmeets of the heroes. It is the function of beauty to get men into trouble. Helen of Troy, Cleopatra, Mary Queen of Scots, and hundreds of others, wherever they came they brought calamity. Beauty and anguish have walked hand in hand the downward slope to death, and whenever the poet dreams of fair women he is sure to dream of something doleful. If he were to dream of ugly little women it would be full of brightness, loyalty, devotion, sincerity, fortitude, and all these other lovable female qualities that make some one happy. Tall Beauty is epic; Little Ugly is lyric, homely. Just think what a deep-seated compliment is involved in calling irregularity of feature homeliness! It means that she is not for the ball-room, but for the home, for the friendships that cluster around the hearth, for the merry little sociable, the picnic or off-hand game, or for the darkened sick-room, where she brings rest and comfort. "Pretty is as pretty does" is an old maxim, whose truth is only half appreciated, for in the plainness of feature and insignificance of person of homely women there are often found an earnestness, a whole-souled sweetness and sympathetic expression that win love far quicker than mere beauty. The world could far more easily afford to lose its supplies of beauty than to give up its precious stores of ugly little women. The beauties wait to be loved; the others delight in loving.

Berlin fashion gossips say the Empress Auguste's dress is a false neck of wax.

NOTICE.

The Argonaut is published every Saturday, at No. 322 California Street, by the Argonaut Publishing Company.
 Rates of Subscription, $4 per year; six months, $2.25; three months, $1.50—payable in advance. Postage prepaid. City subscribers served by express for 4 weeks. Single copies, 10 cents.
 Address all communications to "The Argonaut, 322 California Street, San Francisco."
 Branch Office, Cooper's Bookstore, 716 Market Street
 Agent at San Jose—F. A. Taylor.
 News Dealers and Agents in the interior supplied by the San Francisco News Company, No. 413 Washington Street, to whom all orders should be addressed.
 A. P. STANTON, Business Manager.

THE ARGONAUT.

FRANK M. PIXLEY,
 FRED. M. SOMERS,

Editors.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 10, 1878.

When, on the 4th of March, 1880, the successor of President Hayes is inaugurated, the national Democratic party will have been in the minority an even twenty years, and its leaders will have cut but a poor and contemptible figure in the history of national politics. "Contemptible" is but a feeble word to express the miserable history of this miserable party. Treason to the republic, fraud to the elective franchise, betrayal of honorable trusts, conspiracies, intrigues, intestine feuds, personal broils, have characterized the whole history of Democratic leadership since away back in the time of Buchanan, when Northern Democrats struck hands with Southern slave-holders to inaugurate a rebellion in the interest of the twin devils—Slavery and Democracy. This coalition was accused of God, and failed, not for want of will or skill of party leaders—not for failure of bloody purpose and wicked intent. There were no trembling Macbeths, no Banquos, no terror of dreams to defeat this conspiracy against liberty. It simply failed because there is a power that holds the destinies of nations, and such monstrous conceptions as this always fail. The womb of Time refuses to consummate such devilish treason, and the monster is untimely ripped, to be destroyed ere life is possible. There was a time when the Democracy—if its professions had been honest—might have elected, as President, Governor Seymour of New York, but for the unparalleled treachery, inspired by Tilden, that, without notice, and on the eve of the election, tore out from under him the support of the New York World, the party organ; a piece of treachery never equaled in the history of any party in any country; a piece of treachery not only momentous in itself, but important as illustrating how complete, organic, deep-seated, wide-spread, and incurable was the disease that had corrupted the whole organization. The election of a Democratic leader and gentleman seemed possible when Greeley was nominated against General Grant's second candidacy. Liberal Republicans came to the front with a generous and manly resolve to bridge the chasm, reconstruct on generous principles the Southern States, and give to the nation a national administration, the basic idea of which was a forgetfulness of the war and its wounds. The conduct of the Democracy was then, as ever, disgraceful. Its conduct was simply a recognition of all the baser qualities—cowardice, ingratitude, and an utter betrayal and surrender of every honorable and moral pledge upon which it entered upon the campaign. The South was hopeless and helpless under the mailed and iron hand of political power that gripped its throat and held its arm. There came another, and we believe the last opportunity. If, instead of Samuel Tilden, a Democratic Tammany politician, doubly-dyed in a long line of disgraceful party intrigue; getting old, and therefore desperate; a childless, narrow-minded, narrow-hearted intriguer who recognized only two dominant forces in American politics, viz: money and fraud—if, instead of this embodiment of every thing to be hated and feared, Mr. Thurman of Ohio, Mr. Bayard of Delaware, or any other of a hundred respectable gentlemen had been chosen to the party leadership, and the campaign by fraud on one side had not incited to fraud on the other, it is possible that a Democrat might have been elected, or it is at least possible that there might have been an honest election, and we would know to-day who was de jure President of the United States. Still with nearly twenty years of experience we see the same disastrous and dirty party work going on. Mr. Tilden is as ambitious of party management to-day as four years ago. Mr. Manton Marble cuts as prominent a figure in his councils as when the World betrayed Seymour. We see the Democracy to-day crawling upon its belly as it did when it wanted Eve. It has not one manly principle. It avows no single national and patriotic idea. It dares take issue upon no single question of right and wrong. It slobbers over the greenback party; it drools and drivels in the presence of national bankers; it trembles in the presence of great corporations, and now with a more humble abasement, it seeks to get itself under the very foot of the labor movement. It panders to Butler, to Kearney, to mobs, to riots, to communists, to chaos, in the hope, for the chance, that some unexpected stroke of fortune may turn it up to the possibility of office loot and party plunder.

Democracy has never had the courage to resist the mob. As a party it has never dared to attempt to guide or control popular opinion, but has uniformly adopted the policy of pandering to it. This was less dangerous before the excessive foreign immigration turned upon our shores, and into the Democratic organization, a great, unthinking, undisciplined mass of voters. This mass of voters first enjoyed themselves with the ballot as a plying; later they began to understand its use as a weapon. At first they brandished it playfully, as the shillalah at a frolic; then, as the foreign hordes become more insolent and felt their power, the ballot became in their hands a merciless bludgeon and they wielded for destruction. This element the Democracy has always encouraged. It is afraid of it. It is an element within the party more powerful than the party itself; and it may be safely proclaimed as a political axiom, that there is no action so outrageous, and no popular sentiment so vile, that the Democratic party will set itself up in opposition to it. If tomorrow a strong popular sentiment should develop itself to repudiate the national debt—an unmistakable popular movement in that direction—the Democracy would accept the situation and justify the movement. By this we mean to declare that the Democracy has passed into that condition of minority and hopeless despair, that it can no longer indulge itself in the luxury of independent thought and honest opinions. It is grasping blindly for power. It has lost the splendid opportunity afforded all minority parties, to be resolute, independent, fearless, and honest. If, when the Democracy lost the administration, it had become a political Diogenes; had become the fearless advocate of economy, retrenchment, and an honest administration of public affairs; of a sound financial policy, of a generous reconstruction, and had taken a stand of resolute independence against the greed of corporations, and the insolence of power, it would not to-day be the mean, cringing, sycophantic thing it is, but would have been, if not a majority, a great formidable power in the government—honored, feared and respected. A minority party in England is in position to make itself the fearless and patriotic champion of every right measure, thus laying its foundations deep in public sympathy; taking advantage of government mistakes, like the pendulum of the clock it moves steadily back to power; every swing of the popular pulse bringing it nearer and nearer to governmental control. The Democratic party is like a bruised, blind athlete in the ring. It thinks itself brave to take punishment so it comes to time every election, swollen, bruised, bandaged, blind of eye, groggy on its feet, and is at every Presidential election knocked out of time, and sent bleeding to its corner to be sponged back in time for the next Presidential round. Tilden still sits in his corner, the same bottle-holders having him upon their knees, hoping to give him another opportunity for the belt. Poor old dead beaten apology of a leader. Better toss him out of the ring, get an honest candidate, make one honest, manly canvass, in the hope that an honest defeat will give that to the Democracy which as a national party it now essentially lacks—an honest and sweet smelling reputation.

That a telegraphic cipher should have been used in the political correspondence that followed the Presidential election is not unusual. That Mr. Samuel Tilden and the leading advisers of his campaign should under the circumstances have desired to give the matter full investigation is not surprising. That there was fraud on the part of both Democratic and Republican managements in the States of South Carolina, Florida, and Louisiana, no one who is intelligent doubts. That Stanley Matthews, Sherman, and the other visiting statesmen of the Republican side did villainous and dirty work, there are few to question. But the Republicans have this advantage—it may be regarded as a poor and mean one, and may have happened because in the opinion of his friends Governor Hayes could not be safely intrusted with political secrets: the President is personally free from any contact with the disgraceful business, while Tilden is up to his ears wading deep in this most nasty and foul conspiracy to steal the Presidential office, to buy it, not by contributions, promises of office and hope of future political rewards, but with coin, his own bank account, using his own personal checks. These telegrams came to Gramercy Park, his private residence, his nephew acting as his confidence man at the New York end. Such a scandal never before occurred in our history. There have been intrigues, plots, and conspiracies, but never before anything so vulgar, so criminal, so audacious, as this attempt with coin to bring about a result. We wish the Republican party and its leaders were guiltless of conspiracy and fraud, but that they have not been is no reason for withdrawing from Tilden and his Democratic confederates the censure that justly belongs to their disgraceful and dishonorable conduct.

Since writing the above there is printed the letter of Mr. Tilden disclaiming in the most emphatic manner his knowledge of or connection with the negotiations for the purchase of electoral votes. We think the New York Tribune is not illiberal when it says: "Mr. Tilden's card is before the public. We wish to speak of it with the respect due to the explicit, earnest utterance of a man of great ability and recognized position—a man whom half the people in a nation of forty millions voted to make their Chief Magistrate, and a citizen of New York whose character is part of our civic wealth. What he says is clear, emphatic in terms, and meets the case against him as far as a mere denial can meet it; but has there ever been a person acquitted in the teeth of strong evidence, upon his bare plea of not guilty? Such is thus far Tilden's sole reply. Against very powerful evidence, which fits marvelously in a thousand details all that is known of his legal habits, his weaknesses of character, his fondness for political 'still hunts,' his confidential relations with the persons acting, and his use to this day of peculiar ciphers in telegraphing—against all this he puts his naked and unsupported word. The world over the denial of a person accused of an infamous deed has no weight whatever with jury, judge or public opinion. If his character has not been such as to render all evidence against him incredible, his word as against that evidence counts for nothing. It is merely a plea of not guilty; and does any man suppose that he who is capable of crime is incapable of untruth to escape the penalty of crime? With real regret we are compelled to tell Tilden that as matters stand the world will find it impossible to accept his naked assertion as final." It is very late indeed for Mr. Samuel Tilden to put forth his disclaimer of any knowledge of or participation in these questionable proceedings. First, they are the acts of his own household, his own relations, his own friends, and this correspondence is with Gramercy Park, his own home. Two years are allowed to pass, Congressional and other investigations to be had, and not till these doubly complicated ciphers have been explained does he come forward with his plea of not guilty. We have had all sorts of special pleadings, motions to strike out, demurrers, and dilatory pleas; so that now when the denial comes in we are at least justified in withholding our opinion till the day of trial comes on. In our judgment Mr. Tilden does not show clean hands in this electoral business, and we are sorry for it.

Our newspaper contemporaries seem just now to be finding a great deal of fault, because, as they assert, George C. Gorham is running the Republican party, and running it his own way. Now, it seems to be essential that somebody should be at the helm. The thing has been drifting of late, and, to us, looked very much as though it was going stern on to a dangerous shore. One of the charges against Gorham is that he will not distribute Hayes' speeches as campaign documents. In this we think George is clearly right, and that even his own speeches can not be very much worse than the specimens we have seen of Executive eloquence. It is true, George run the California machine upon a snag, ripped a hole in her bottom, so that the thing has never been quite able to float, but such incidents go to make up experience. Then, Gorham undertook to be captain, mate, and boatswain. He undertook to run the vessel without officers or crew. It is quite possible that he may be a better man at the helm than at the fore. At all events, if he has the sense to suppress the efforts of the good Mr. Hayes as campaign documents, we shall take it as evidence of such intellectual growth that in time he may realize the importance of suppressing his own. We do not despair that Gorham may become a successful politician yet. We think of that spider that attempted to crawl up so many times on the wall in the prison of the Scotch king, and finally succeeded. George has many of the qualities of the spider besides perseverance.

Again the tidal wave of foreign immigration is upon us with more voters for the Democratic party. Last month the arrivals of immigrants at New York were 8,955, against 6,673 for the same month last year; during the last three months they were 25,263, against 20,109 in the same time last year. Causes are now at work that will still further add to this increase. The Socialists in Germany have avowed their intention of emigrating to the United States by the wholesale to avoid persecution at home. There are something like 900,000 Socialist voters in Germany; should they all take it into their heads to come it would make a most delightful addition to the uneasy and incendiary element of our population. The hard times in Great Britain will also send us a not very desirable class of citizens, and the famine in China means "more moon-eyed lepers" who will not go.

Those who believed the Republican party dead have had occasion to change their minds since the recent elections. It is the Democracy that has been so grievously wounded, and the Greenback party that had its little air cushion punctured to the death. The Republican party is still alive.

PRATTLE.

The California provincial vanity has been again tickled by the pen of a foreigner and smiles dollars. The tickler is a Frenchman, M. Leon Donnat, whose book, L'Etat de Californie, will be eagerly devoured, if translated, by the local patriot who fancies heaven bounded by his visible horizon when he is at home. M. Donnat spent as much as several weeks in California, and being unable to understand a word of English must have made some valuable additions to his French. He devotes a laudatory chapter to the press, which is not ashamed to manifest its satisfaction and make payment in kind.

If you love me, why, I love you,
And we love one another;
If you didn't love me I wouldn't love you,
And your silly old book I'd smother!

Sing.

With all due deference to M. Donnat's superior qualifications and opportunities, I venture to think I have observed one thing that he has had the politeness to overlook, and that is that the newspapers of this State, like most newspapers everywhere, manifest an unsleeping sycophancy—an alert and aggressive obsequiousness to their patrons that would be creditable in an English small shop-keeper, but neither creditable nor possible in an American one. There is no popular ignorance too deep and dark, no vulgar vanity or prejudice too unlovely, no local vice too base, for them to feed it with what it loves and scratch its back while it eats. If the people of California were proud of running at the nose, the catarrh editor of the Morning Call would compassionate the nasal aridity of "our Eastern brethren." If they believed stealing meritorious, the Chronicle would lay on a thief to teach the art. If they considered the Mechanic's Pavilion earth's foremost architectural gem, the Bulletin would labor to prove that Greece "proudly wears the Parthenon" in vain.

These are extreme illustrations. It is not conceivable that we should boast of catarrh, but we boast of our "intense nervous energy," a worse disease. We do not think stealing honorable, but we justify murder by mobs. We are not proud of the Mechanics' Pavilion, but we perform raptures concerning "the beautiful city by the Golden Gate"—the ugliest and most forbidding town that chance, cupidity, and lack of taste ever conspired to produce, or benevolence and toleration ever yearned to demolish.

As to our climate—we have a thousand; that of this Peninsula is conspicuously the most detestable in the belt of civilization. But we all clear our throats of the fog and gravel to sing its praises, as if we had made it. Our soil is pretty good in spots, but take a map and trace off a space on the Atlantic sea-board, having the same area as that of California, and embraced by the same parallels of latitude. The nobler and richer variety of products in this area may be sufficiently indicated by explaining that you will have inclosed the whole of Virginia, Maryland, Delaware, North Carolina and South Carolina, nearly all of Pennsylvania, and parts of New Jersey and Georgia. There is some good climate in that region, too.

Of Pacific Slope art, literature, learning, and general culture, I prefer to say nothing at present, for the reason, among better ones, that there is as yet nothing to say it about.

With all our inferiority in the things that distinguish enlightened from barbarous peoples; with all our isolation, and that fatal narrowing of the intellectual horizon that isolation begets; with all our raw, crude, and ill-digested civilization, our impatience of law, our childish rage at criticism, our irreverence of antiquity ablaze with its luminous lessons—knowledge that we scorn because we do not possess it, and will not acquire because we scorn it; with all these disadvantages and incapacities, and because of them, we are the most conceited sodality of insufferables for whom in the order and economy of nature it is appointed that the Adversary shall receipt to the Fool-killer.

It is herein that the press (pace, Mr. Pickering) is not an unmixed good; for we note the precession of penitence to reformation, conviction to penitence, and admonition to conviction. It is the necessary sequence. But if the journalist, perceiving our sin, will not exhort, but makes percussion of applauding palms instead, it is clear that whatever influence he may have (concerning the measure whereof let himself testify) is given against progress, and in confirmation of error. If the unlovely grub believe itself a gorgeous butterfly will it struggle to rend its hampering chrysalis? Having repeated assurance that it is a perfected frog, will the tadpole not resist the secession of its wayward tail?

As to the morality of flattering the people, there is no argument; it is immeasurably base. As a business method it is a mistake as crass as that of the man who should butter the pole he means to climb. It is an error having its origin in a misleading analogy and a misinterpretation of fact. The individual is enamored of adulation and impatient of rebuke; the community neither rewards the one nor resents the other, for no man draws his dividend of praise or pays his assessment of censure. Man is a fool, but men are not such fools as to make personal application of what is said about him. Successful journals are such, not because of their sycophancy to the public, although most of them are sycophant, nor in spite of it, although they commonly disgust. Success is a thing apart, and that writer has not duly considered its elements who subordinates the manner of his work to its matter.

The average local journalist knows this—that whereas his readers will not resent his psalms of praise, psalm he ever so ill, they will not endure to be preached at by dunces. He writes badly, but he makes honest confession by eschewing themes interdicted to bad writers. He has observed that the growl of a lion is more interesting than the hiss of a goose. He can not growl, he will not hiss, and so be cackles, and would have the public believe it has laid an egg.

Who writes well writes what he will; who writes ill writes what he must. It is the prerogative of genius to tell the truth, but dullness is condemned to falsehood—a life sentence. Talent bites in security the leg upon which mediocrity must fawn. Fancy De Young venturing, with the regal impudence of a Sam Williams, to fasten upon the "shrunk shank" of Poesy, in the trousers of Prince Hector Stuart, or imbed his teeth in the "fatted calf" of Military Power, in the nether garment of General John McComb!

The remainder of my ideas on this subject I feel bound in honor to withhold for my forthcoming "Letters to an Infant Journalist," addressed to the alleged city editor of the Evening Examiner, but in conclusion of this present screed I can not forbear disclosing (to the profession) this important professional secret, expressed—in order that it may be the more palatable—in terms of advice; the public will have the goodness to politely avert its ear: Remember that in writing manner is everything, matter nothing. This will do you no good, for, whereas your subject is of choice, your style is appointed by nature. On no subject are you to write all you know, nor the half of it, and on every one be careful to omit (after making it obvious) some important consideration or controlling fact; I leave the reason to your sagacity—the public, I fear, is listening. Last but most important—do not try to please your reader. Destitute of art and style, you can not; having them, you need not. Indulge him in frequent dissent and occasional anger, but beware how you suffer him to once despise you. Pray why should you greed for his approbation, or make exaction of his esteem? Is it not enough that he reads?

The showman, blessing in a thousand shapes,
Parades a "School of Educated Apes!"
Small education's needed, I opine,
Or native wit, to make a monkey shine;
The brute exhibited has naught to do
But ape the larger apes who come to view—
The hoodlum with his horrible grimace,
Long upper lip and furtive, shuffling pace,
Significant reminders of the time
When hunters, not policemen, made him climb;
The lady loafer with her dragging "trail,"
That free translation of an ancient tail;
The sand-lot quadrupane in hairy suit,
Whose heels are thumbs perverted by the boot;
The painted actress throwing down the gage
To elder artists of the sylvan stage,
Proving that in the time of Noah's flood
Two ape-skins held her whole profession's blood;
The critic waiting, like a hungry pup,
To write the school—perhaps to eat it—up,
As chance, or luck, occasion may reveal
To earn a dollar or maraud a meal.
To view the school of apes these creatures go,
Unconscious that themselves are half the show.
These, if the simian his course he trim
To imitate the tricks they got from him,
Will call him "educated." Of a verity
There's much to learn by study of posterity.

Delegate Beerstretcher has submitted to the Constitutional Convention an article providing for a cumulative tax on all property above $5,000 owned by one person or corporation. It is a good notion: it will compel men who make money here to invest it elsewhere, and keep those who make it elsewhere from investing it here. Thus we shall be protected from a double danger, the unchaste bondholder be circumvented, and the Digger Indian resume his primal importance in finance and trade. And to think that we should owe this instauratio felicitatis to Beerstretcher—a man whom, to look at him, one might think a fool!

I beg that some public-spirited Delegate will adopt and urge the following provisions as part of the Constitution. No fine-tooth comb shall be made with fewer than twenty teeth to the inch. Door-plates are illegal. It shall not be lawful to place foot-warmers in coffins. Schoolma'ams are not to struggle when being kissed. Potatoes shall be a cent apiece. All who are willing to work shall be supported by the State without labor. Horses shall not run away in the streets. It is a capital crime to eat mustard on mutton, or put less than twice as much oil as vinegar in salad dressing. The family is the social unit. Preachers shall be shot. Wednesday shall be Sunday. Nobody is entitled to a light from his first match. The Chinese must pay before they go. A prisoner acquitted of murder in one county can be tried in another and another until convicted. In pardoning State convicts there shall be no nepotism. People who do not like to walk shall ride in barouches. It shall be illegal in rainy weather to wipe your gums on the door mat. A dog is a cow. There is no hell. God is forbidden to interfere with the public schools.

"Owing to the dropping out of the type from the forms while the press was running, several thousand copies of today's Bulletin were printed with only a portion of the head."

—Bulletin.

The Deacon irascibly raved as he said:
"We've lost—oh, condemn it!—a part of our head."
When old Mr. Pickering heard the mad moan,
He eyed the poor gentleman's capital cone,
And said: "The part missing is only the brains—Philistines will quake while the jaw-bone remains!"

"I read those 'Prattle' paragraphs last week for the first time," said "a subscriber from the beginning," the other day, "and of all—see here, do you mean to keep up that kind of thing?" "Why, you impregnable pachyderm," coldly replied the editor, "those are not reading matter; they are put in to balance the long, solid articles on the opposite page, according to the law of typographical counterpoint. If you read them that is your affair, but don't tell me I don't know what to put into a newspaper."

A friend of mine whose yacht is heavily mortgaged calls it his floating debt.

Assuming that the stock market was broken by unscrupulous manipulators, the Virginia City Chronicle sheds a few natural tears over its blasted hopes, then thinks better of it, and blazes with indignation for the wrongs of its neighbors. It is of the opinion that "on the heads of those who, to increase their own wealth, could thus cruelly conspire to rob the poor, there are invoked to-day [last Wednesday] the heart-felt curses of many a ruined man and woman."

O the pity and the shame
That the player isn't able
To defeat the little game
Of the man who keeps the table!

O the man who caught a Tartar—
Hear him bellow, see him slobber!
O the ruined, ruined martyr
Who essayed to rob the robber!

"It sifts the sopbistries of politicians and theologians," saith the Call, speaking of a free press. Except, dear, when the sifter happens to be himself a sophist, a politician, or a theologian. Did you ever observe that he commonly is?

"People," says Mr. Beecher, "are prone to think evil. Their ears are open to hear, their mouths to speak, and their hearts to believe, the worst of others. And it is as much, if not more, so in the church than elsewhere." For what purpose, then, does the church exist? If it has not even succeeded in reducing the number and abating the severity of bites at the human back, it has probably done nothing that was worth doing. The support of the clergy might have been managed by raffles.

The star which has been on fire in the heavens ever since last autumn is now entirely consumed, leaving a nebular residuum resembling ashes of roses. No insurance. Supposed to be the work of a poet.

It is proposed to hold a National Newspaper Paragraphists' Convention.

O won't they be a merry set,
With Bailey there and Bob Burdette,
And every dunderhead that pokes
The public ribs to point his jokes,
And winks with tongue acheck, to show
He isn't serious, you know—
O no,
Not serious,
Ha-ha! ho-ho!

God bless us how their wit will shine!
While "I've another." "Now, hear mine,"
Will be the cry of every dunce—
All getting in their work at once;
Each ass protesting in his glee:
"The man who's funny isn't me—"
Taint me,
Some other man,
Ha-ha! te-he!

A boy finds three hundred dollars and restores it to the owner. The owner places one hundred dollars to his credit in a bank, to be paid to him when he is twenty-one years of age. That is generous and commendable, but reasons are given at considerable length in the newspapers—the boy's mother is a widow, has five other children, and is sick. Explain by diagrams on the black board the relation between the needy and ailing condition of the lady, and the provision of capital to start a full grown man in business some years hence. Point out, also, the relevancy of the "five other children."

THE "GREAT I AM."

A Chapter from His Life.

Physically, the Great I Am was anything but great. Less than five feet eight in height, with a face which unusually fine eyes barely rescued from the reproach of insignificance, his claim to the title "Great" was both intellectual and pecuniary; on his part not a claim at all, on the part of his friends merely an acknowledgment of brains more readily merchantable than their own.

No one has traced the origin of the title by which his familiars liked best to speak to him. His taxable name was Theodore Tobin; commonplace enough surely, but the Great I Am was no ill-chosen caption for a man who believed so thoroughly in himself, and could so surely turn his self-trust into current coin.

Theodore Tobin was a stock-operator, and the period at which this sketch opens was the halcyon season of—, when everything was a buy, and the bears were nowhere. He was a busy man among busy men, in daily business association with the keenest of speculators; his evenings were those of a money-making, money-spending bachelor, and the phrasing under this head need not be more explicit.

A man so situated naturally surrounds himself with a coterie of friends, satellites, servants, who are pleasant, endurable, serviceable.

There was Charley Le Dascey, a man of points, bristling with information in regard to anything and everything; a man who knew infinitely more about the future of the Comstock than most men knew of its recent past; a traveled man, who had breakfasted with Ouida in Naples, and had dined with Dom Pedro at Berne; an art-lover; a trifle less loquacious than Thackeray's "Grandish," and twice as opinionated. Yet on this man's self-taught, self-satisfied personality a few drops of the milk of human kindness had somehow fallen. He could forsake his egotism long enough to do a good action on the sly, and he could win or lose with the same calm impressiveness which made the picturesque ugliness of his Teutonic features almost classic.

There was Brownell Brown, man of the world, son of the church, pupil of the Sunday-school, prodigal and truant toward all three; a good-looking, careless, open-handed spendthrift; one of the most persistent and successful poker-players in all San Francisco; and the squarest, most gentlemanly spendthrift that ever played at the devil's baize.

There was Clarence Hebbard, society sharp and dilettante; actor, author, musician; profession and earnest occupation, nil; livelihood, the interest on dead men's shoes. One of the handsomest, kindest, most dashing fellows in any set; and—this is a stage secret—privately accused of being the "Only Jones."

There was G. Duncan Krux, professional critic, sui generis. Scorning the traditions, he was neither "Soaper" nor "Snarl," nor had he "failed in literature or art." He wrote straight-forward, honest, not always flawless English, and earned honorable exception from the sweeping disapproval of the great press censor who sits in weekly judgment upon us all.

There was Harry Centreton, "Our 'Arry," six feet two in his hose, and an athlete—not in the narrow sense of gymnast merely, but in the full meaning of the term. He could swim a mile against wind and tide, could walk all day, dance all night, and go home with the girls in the morning; could vault four chairs single-handed; could bend backward and pick a pin off the floor with his teeth; could do more clever feats of skill and strength, and perform greater marvels of endurance than there is space to chronicle; and could not stay ten minutes in a furnished room without breaking something, to save his life.

Most readers will remember the failure of — in —. An honorable failure, as such transactions go; but honorable or not, it carried disaster to at least a score of homes, and defaced the gilded lettering of more than one plate glass window on California Street, behind which solvency and business prestige were believed to be impreguably intrenched.

Among the heaviest losers by this failure was Theodore Tobin. His name stood second on the list of creditors, and numbers one and three, who lost almost to the full limit of their assets, were indebted to the Great I Am in sums aggregating $50,000.

Tobin's sunny second-story rooms looked out upon one of the busiest blocks of Kearney Street. Exceedingly pleasant rooms they were, fitted with bachelor taste and bachelor comfort—the former dubious, the latter unmistakable. These rooms were a favorite lounging place for the young men herein described. They called themselves "Gideon's Band," and the rooms "the ranch."

On the afternoon of the day on which the Great I Am's checks were thrown out of bank, Brown and Le Dascey were at the "ranch," playing cribbage for nominal stakes. Hebbard was present also, reading the ARGONAUT, and Tobin's brother Joe—not previously introduced, and in fact a lay figure as regards the vitality of this sketch—was twirling his moustache and looking wise, after the manner of young men and brothers who are fond of drawing sight drafts, and averse to the boredom of business drudgery.

It was Saturday, and the four young men were waiting for the matinee to close. As Le Dascey put it, they "did not care to sit with a parcel of women and watch overworked actors gush each other." But they liked to see the tide of faces flow past from the California and other Bush Street theatres.

During the afternoon other members of the band happened in, until all the persons hitherto mentioned as friends of the Great I Am, with several others, were present, and the rooms were almost crowded; yet, strange to say, no one present had heard a word concerning the failure.

Brother Joe had gone home. The matinee maskers had passed by. The last censorious, kindly, witty, commonplace comment had been flung into the ocean of speech, and the young men had returned to their cards and kindred fritter.

A hurried step is heard in the hall, a door is thrown suddenly open, and Smeethe Yendis enters. He catches at the mantel edge, not ungracefully—faces the room, not undramatically—and says under his breath, "T. T. has failed—for a hundred thousand."

It is hoped that Mr. Smeethe Yendis, never-do-well by cetera, et cetera, will pardon this tardy recognition of his place and power; but the hurry of dramatic storytelling leaves a very narrow margin for description, and on margins in general Smeethe was invariably "short." Yet this man was nearer to the inmost ego of the Great I Am than any other human being. Fidus Achilles means much or little, according to the writer and the person written about. The phrase is perhaps inexact as an explanation of the relation in which Smeethe Yendis stood to Theodore Tobin, for neither directly or indirectly did the former serve the latter, except to borrow his money, drive his horses, and drink his wine. However, to bridge an explanation which threatens to expand indefinitely, let it suffice that in all the circle of his acquaintance there was no one else who so truly answered the best intellectual and spiritual needs of the Great I Am as did this last, and least, among the men who illustrate this sketch.

"T. T. has failed for a hundred thousand."

The sentence brought out the characters of the men, as a sentence so often will. A few sought their hats by instinct, and stole silently away. The sympathy of others evaporated in commonplaces, which found no echo, and they, too, went out into the pure evening air, with sharpened appetites and loosened tongues. They had something new to discuss over their black coffee.

When the room was cleared of all except the "band," Hebbard's mellow voice broke the silence, which followed Smeethe's last explanation, with "What's to be done?"

"Set him up again, by —," answered Le Dascey.

"I'm in," said the disciple of Schenck.

There was another awkward pause. Krux was figuring on a scrap of paper; presently he said:

"He owes one hundred thousand dollars. He ought to realize twenty per cent. on a clean-up. Half the balance can doubtless be fixed by notes, and we must raise the other forty thousand."

"Put me down for fifteen thousand," said the man of points. "I see you," said Brown.

"I have an aunt who never failed me yet," remarked the society sharp. "I am good for five thousand sure; maybe more."

"As an exception to the rule that the chronic condition of newspaper men is 'bust,' I promise two thousand dollars, which I can raise on my Berkeley property—thanks to T. T.'s advice."

"My five hundred is not much," said Harry Centreton, "but—"

"It goes in all the same, old boy," said Hebbard.

Smeethe's voice trembled as he said, slowly: "Of course it would be ridiculous to expect coin or any other substantial help from me. I suppose you all know me well enough to be sure that I am with you in feeling. I have a spavined mare on grass at Centreville, and I have a picture of St. Catherine, by—"

"Your name is down for the odd twenty-five hundred," said the art authority. "I always fancied St. Catherine; you have done me a real favor, Yendis."

Smeethe thanked him with a look. The cash value of the picture was less than the æsthetic value of Le Dascey's opinion.

The conversation which followed resulted in the drafting of a paper, substantially as follows:

The undersigned promise to furnish Theodore Tobin, for use during his pleasure, forty thousand dollars in United States gold coin, without security. The money to be at his disposal Monday, —.

(Signed),

CHAS. LE DASCEY,
BROWNELL BROWN,
CLARENCE HEBBARD,
H. CENTRETON,
G. DUNCAN KRUX,
SMEETHE YENDIS.

The agreement was signed and copied. The original was retained by Krux, and a copy intrusted to Yendis to be shown to the Great I Am that evening. Then all except Yendis went home—to such homes as they had or cared to have.

Smeethe waited, though with shallow patience. He was not unaturally excited. He heard the clock strike six, seven, eight. He heard the hacks rumble on the street below. He heard a lodger on another floor howl elastic opera, when she should have been at dinner. Yet he only half heard anything. He paced to and fro in the lonesome room; forgetting to be hungry, forgetting to be thoughtless, forgetting everything except his plans for helping his best friend in this his hour of need.

At last he heard the well-known step: the door swung open and the Great I Am entered. A trifle haggard about the eyes, somewhat paler than usual, yet, to an ordinary observer, not greatly changed, nor unduly moved. But to Smeethe, —eager, yet almost afraid to speak—the change was terrible.

T. T. put out his hand instinctively, and smiled—a peculiarly sweet smile, that few men and few occasions ever won from his calm, calculating features.

"It's all up, old man," he said. The look and tone were too much for Smeethe; his eyes filled, and he sobbed like a baby.

For a moment a great wave of feeling almost unmanned the fallen speculator; but he brushed the hasty tears impatiently away; and, laying both hands on his friend's shoulders, said quietly, but proudly: "You are a man, Smeethe. Don't make me forget that I am one, too. Other men have pulled through worse than this. I have blood in my veins yet, and years to make it tell. I shall pay every cent I owe, and you must help me."

Smeethe dried his tears—perhaps the most creditable tears he had ever shed—and asked: "Are you going anywhere? Have you had dinner?"

"Yes, I'm going somewhere, but I've not had dinner."

"Let us get something to eat first, Theo.; for I, who have failed at least once a day for the past twenty-six years, am hardened and hungry."

The Great I Am smiled—this time rather grimly. "Yes, I suppose we must eat, whether our creditors are paid or not; whether our victims go to Stockton, and their wives and children to Lone Mountain, or not."

"True; too true," said Smeethe; and the young men went out arm in arm.

"We'll go to Freeman's, and have some oysters and a small bot, Theo."

"A cup of tea and a sandwich will be better; I can't spend money for wine until it's mine to spend."

"Do you think I would let you pay for it? It's my night, old boy; the first, I guess, but it won't be the last, though, by George!"

They entered the oyster-rooms and ordered their supper. The Great I Am was silent and thoughtful; his companion alternated betwixt sense and nonsense, sentiment and sententiousness. After the first glass of Roederer the color returned to T. T.'s face, and Richard was himself again.

The use of good wine, like the use of a thousand other good things, may be abused, no one wants to deny that; but here the weakness is least excusable, because the maximum of bibulous enjoyment is so easily reached. To most men one or two glasses of good wine affords more real pleasure than twenty. It is only the faded debauchee—but this is not a treatise on alcoholics, or an advertisement for champagne. The Great I Am was a very moderate drinker. Mr. Smeethe Yendis was an exceedingly immoderate one. After the first few glasses Tobin leaned half across the table and said, in a half whisper:

"Do you where I was going to-night?"

"No," said Smeethe.

T. T. handed him an ivory locket containing a miniature photograph.

"Not beautiful," thought Smeethe, at a glance. "Strong, vivid, taking, though," he said to himself as he examined the picture.

"Do you know her?"

"No, by George, I don't. You have kept it deuced quiet. Is she —?"

"You might have put the question in a less offensive way, for it is offensive; doubly so from you who should have read 'refinement,' 'modesty,' 'purity' at a glance."

"I beg your pardon, Theo., but one can't tell at a glance; certainly not from a photographic counterfeit. I don't set up for a student of face, anyhow; and then, you know, wiser men than we have been fooled in face, since Garrick thought Woffington an angel of light."

"But if ever truth and goodness were written—"

"Of course, of course. Did you ever see that portrait of Nell Gwynne in Le Dascey's collection? It has a score of contemporary indorsements on the back, yet the face is nearer my pious conception of what a Madonna should be than anything else I've seen on canvas. But we need not quarrel over that. Who is she?"

"She was to have been my wife. We were to be married next Sunday. You were to be best man, and we were all going to the Islands for three months."

"Well—and now?"

"And now I shall go to her and say: 'The work of ten years has been undone. I must begin again. I release you.'"

"And do you think—"

"She said to me once, 'I like fine things, comfortable, luxurious, beautiful things. I enjoy the uses and the privileges of wealth. I should be dwarfed without them.' I shall repeat her words, and ask her if she means them now."

"But you need not, old boy, you need not," said Smeethe, joyfully; "read this," and he handed him the agreement copy.

The Great I Am read it, flushed, smiled, and said quietly: "It's splendidly generous, and with forty thousand I could pull through easily; but I can't take it, Smeethe. I must fight it out alone."

"The deuce you can't! Not for her sake?"

"Not even for her sake. I thank the boys, all of you, from the lower levels of my heart; but I must play my own hand now as always."

Smeethe only looked his disgust. But he muttered betwixt his teeth: "You are a fool, my boy; a doubly dashed ass, my boy."

The "small bot." was empty, and by its side another was empty also. The little supper room was blue with the smoke of the last cigar.

"Are you going there to-night?" said the never-do-well.

"You have a nerve if you do," he added.

"No, it's time to go to bed." And the two friends separated at the door.

At eleven on the following morning nearly all the "band" were assembled at the "ranch," which they found deserted, with a note from T. T. stating that he would return at twelve sharp, and asking his friends, mentioning them by name, to wait for him.

Smeethe arrived last of all, and was eagerly questioned. "The pig-headed idiot refused our aid," he said angrily.

"REFUSED!"

"Yes, refused! What are you going to do about it?"

"Make him take it; send him a certified check," suggested Centreton.

"He would return it with thanks," said Krux. "Has any one a list of the creditors?"

"I have," said Smeethe Yendis, and he pulled down his cuff.

"We must see these fellows to-night, effect a settlement with all we can, and give a check to the coin sharks for the balance. Then when Monday afternoon comes, he may whistle for his outraged dignity," said the nettled critic.

When the Great I Am came in at twelve, he found his friends apparently resigned to his will. Every one accepted Hebbard's invitation to a quiet, early dinner, and the plotters fairly wearied their victim with delicate attentions and thoughtful solicitude. "Has he seen her?" thought Yendis. But whether he had or not, the Great I Am gave no outward sign, and the never-do-well did not ask him.

Monday morning came. A few business associates dropped in to Tobin's office to ask in an informal manner concerning his reverses and the outlook. Three o'clock came, but no creditors. One or two notes of receipt came in from complaisant Shylocks who had been paid in full. "What the deuce does it mean?" thought Tobin, at first. The notes made it clear enough, and when the huge dimensions of the stolen march dawned upon his puzzled senses, he hardly knew whether to laugh or to wax indignant. He went to his rooms, half expecting to find the band there, but the rooms were empty. "I'll go tell Laura," he said to himself; "perhaps she will give me a little dinner."

Six weeks from that day a card of invitation to the marriage of Theodore Tobin and Laura Douglas was received by each member of the "band." On the card received by Smeethe Yendis was written, in a firm though unmistakably feminine hand, "She does not love 'luxury' less, but friendship more."

R. S. S.

SAN FRANCISCO, October, 1878.

INTAGLIOS.

A Hint.

Our Daisy lay down
In her little nightgown,
And kissed me again and again,
On forehead and cheek,
On lips that would speak,
But found themselves shut, to their gain.

Then, foolish, absurd,
To utter a word,
I asked her the question so old,
That wife and that lover
Ask over and over,
As if they were surer when told.

There, close at her side,
"Do you love me?" I cried:
She lifted her golden-crowned head,
A puzzled surprise
Shone in her gray eyes—
"Why, that's why I kiss you," she said.
—Eclectic Magazine for October.

A Moment.

When the lightning flashes by night,
The rain-drops fall like hail,
A million jewels of light
In the moment's gleam.
And often, in gathering fears,
A moment of low
To jewels will turn the tears
That it can not remove.
F. W. B., in Spectator.

Sonnet.

A year ago, love, for the space
Of a brief moment, nobly fraught
With deeper meaning than our light hearts thought,
You held my hand and looked into the face
Which, poor in gifts, has since by God's good grace Grown dear to you; and the full year has brought Friendship—and love—and marriage; yet has taught
My heart to call you in its sacred place
Still by the earliest names; for you who are My lover and my husband, and who bring Heaven close around me, will not let me cling
To that near heaven, but tempt my soul afar
By your ideals for me; till life and
My calm, dispassionate, sincerest friend,
MRS. WELLINGTON ROLLINS.

The Shadow of Love.

The branching shades, in woodland glades,
Seem to the under-fern
Wide as the night that leaves no light;
No shape can they discern.
And we, who seek in senses weak
Love's form to entertain—
So far Love's whole o'er spreads the soul—
Too oft see only pain.
FRANCIS W. BOURDILLON.

Old Loves.

Louise, have you forgotten yet
The corner of the flowery land,
The ancient garden where we met,
My hand that trembled in your hand?
Our lips found words scarce sweet enough,
As low beneath the willow trees
We sat; have you forgotten, love?
Do you remember, love Louise?
Marie, have you forgotten yet
The loving barter that we made?
The rings we changed, the sun that set,
The woods fulfilled with song and shade?
The fountains that were musical
By many an ancient trying tree—
Marie, have you forgotten all?
Do you remember, love Marie?
Christine, do you remember yet
Your room with scent and roses gay?
My garret—neath the sky 'twas set—
The April hours, the nights of May?
The clear calm nights, the stars above
That whispered there were fairest seen
Through no cloud-veil? Remember, love!
Do you remember, love Christine?
Louise is dead, and, well-a-day!
Marie a certain path has ta'en,
And pale Christine has passed away
In southern suns to bloom again.
Alas! for me and all of us
Marie, Louise, Christine forget,
Our bow of love is ruinous,
And I alone remember yet.
HENRI MURGER.

"Ein Fichtenbaum Steht Einsam."

A pine-tree stands alone on
A bare bleak northern height;
The ice and snow they swathe it,
As it sleeps there, all in white.
"Tis dreaming of a palm-tree,
In a far-off Eastern land,
That moans, alone and silent,
On a ledge of burning sand."
HEINE.

Two Moods.

I.—HATE.

Drawn o'er the airy sapphire of the day
In vague perpetual way,
He sees one dulling film of dreary gray.
The fragrant bird, or dewy leaves that shine,
Flower, bird, or lissom vine,
All hold weird hints of something saturnine!
Big weights of wrong and insult always pressed
Upon his tired-out breast,
Imperiously distract him with unrest;
And through his mind, quick ghastly fancies float,
Where sometimes he can note
His enemy's loathsome shape, and clutch its throat!

II.—LOVE.

For him alone the exultant thrushes call,
The grand suns rise and fall,
And the sweet winds blow benediction!
A sovereign sense his being seems to brim,
Thrilling heart, brain, and limb,
That all this radiant world was wrought for him!
One blissful faith his life divinely cheers
With heavenly joys and fears,
That sometimes leave his sight in holy tears!
And through his soul, rich-warmed by sacred heat,
Dear memories move and meet,
Like shadowy ripples o'er golden wheat.
EDGAR FAWCETT.

Little Things.

Some little things we may not do
Will haunt the longing heart;
Sweet simple things might cause unrest,
Though far from blame apart.
Last night I heard a song was wont
To thrill me when a child;
Fain had I wept, but alien eyes
Had looked askance and smiled.
Last night a flower was dropped—ah, me!
My inmost soul was fain
Instant to gather up the prize,
When prudence said, "Refrain!"
But when the gala lights were out,
Love played his own true part;
I searched the darkened room, and now
The flower lies next my heart.
—Lady's Bazaar for November.

A RACE FOR LIFE.

I.—The Message.

"My dear fellow, I am delighted to see you," exclaimed my friend McCausland, as he met me at the door of his house.
I had gone on a visit to Holmesdale, a little town in the north of England. McCausland was engineer to the water company there, and had invited me to go down for a week.

After the usual interval for dressing we sat down to an excellent little dinner. Not unnaturally the conversation turned upon the weather.

"I am sorry this rain continues," said McCausland, "it spoils my water supply. People bully me as if I could help it."

"Are your reservoirs near the town?" I asked.

"No," he replied, "away in the hills. We can go over to-morrow if you like. I'm due there."

The excursion was arranged.

We pursued our way up the hill, and crossing the brow, reached a small inn. Here we found a country gig awaiting us. Into this we clambered, and proceeded along a wooded by-road, stony and rutful. At length, when hope had almost given way to bad language, we pulled up at another small inn, called the "Reservoir."

We got out of the gig gladly.

An engineer foreman accosted us politely.

"Is all right, Johnson?" inquired McCausland.

"Yes, all is right; but—"

"Well, but what?"

"I don't quite like the South Reservoir embankment," was the reply.

McCausland turned pale to his very lips.

"Come with me," he said, abruptly. We hurried after him in silence, and with a strange dread upon us.

We soon came in sight of the extensive embankment which confined the waters of the largest of the three reservoirs of the Holmesdale Company. A fresh breeze was blowing the water in small though noisy waves against the paved top of the bank.

Here and there a tongue of liquid spat upon the stone work, and at one spot it trickled down into and apparently came through the grass.

"This is the spot," said Johnson.

"You had better have a few men to puddle up this," said McCausland, indicating a tiny crack that would have escaped less experienced eyes.

We then continued our inspection, but during our progress round the works the clouds had massed themselves in wild grandeur above the hills, and lay heavily above the Apps Valley in front. The railroad crossed the valley on a graceful viaduct near Ammering Junction. The dark, slaty clouds hung suspended over this district. Long tendrils of the scud came forth from them like fingers. The trees scarce moved, yet the water rolled up against the reservoir bank as if agitated by an unseen whirl.

All seemed conscious of the disturbance of the atmospheric conditions, and the leaves whispered strange confidences to the motionless boughs above our heads.

The men had all gone up to the reservoirs. McCausland and I sat chatting together.

"Do you think you could find your way back alone?" he asked suddenly.

"Why?" I said. "Do you intend to remain here? Is there any danger?"

"Well, scarcely that; but I think I ought to be on the spot. I will return to-morrow or next day."

"Can not I stay too?"

"Certainly, if you desire it. We rough it up here, though."

"I do not mind that," I replied. So it was settled. Fortune it was that I did remain. As we were preparing to visit the sluices again, we were startled by a vivid flash of lightning, which had hardly passed when the rocks rang out with a thousand thunder echoes.

Nature rested not that livelong night.

At five o'clock in the morning, as the gray light was struggling into life, McCausland came, fully dressed, into my room. I started up.

"Dress yourself as quickly as you can, and come down stairs," he said. I began to ask questions.

"Lose no time, there's a good fellow; I want your assistance." He left the room.

I dressed quickly, and joined McCausland in the little parlor. He was studying a private copy of the railroad time-tables, which, as an official, he always carried.

"Will you take the horse and ride down to Ammering Junction with a message?"

His collected manner assured me. Was this all? A ride through the rain was not much. "Of course I will go."

He grasped my hand firmly. "Are you nervous?" he said, as he held it in his own steady grasp.

"Nonsense," I replied, laughing. "I'll be ready in five minutes, if it's important. Is the horse here?"

I ran up for my water-proofs. When I came down, the horse was at the door, and McCausland inspecting him.

"Now," I said, "for this great message, if you please."

McCausland's tone had something very solemn in it as he replied:

"Tell the station-master of Ammering Junction, and any people you see, that the South Reservoir will not last three hours. It will burst down the valley, and will destroy the Apps Viaduct, and carry away the bridges on the Holmesdale branch. Stop the traffic, and save the passengers. God bless you! and, hark ye, ride for your life. I will fire the signal cannon as a warning. Good-bye."

II.—A Wild Ride.

Mechanically I gathered up the reins, nodded to McCausland, for I was too stupefied to reply in words, and started upon my wild ride. Three hours hence and the water would be pouring down the valley through which my course lay. No wonder I had to ride for my life, and perhaps the lives of hundreds of my fellow-creatures depended on mine. Ammering Junction was some miles away. My route lay through an unknown country, intersected with flooded streams, and swept by wind and rain.

I must do it, I thought, as my horse picked his cautious way amid the loose stones down the steep by-road we had ascended the previous day. I should need all my strength though to execute my task, so I pressed on. A valuable slice out of my time had been expended when I reached the broad highway and urged my horse to speed. I had to turn off again, I knew, but I fancied I could easily find the path. Besides, was there not a sign-post? Therefore, urged by dreadful tidings, and with the fierce wind and biting rain by turns and all together assailing me, I urged my horse onward. I reached the turning, and pulled up to read the direction I was to take. I nearly fainted with horror as I read. The fatal finger pointed up the cross-road I was pursuing—"To Holmesdale and Seabam." The opposite index pointed—"To Ruddall and Ammering."

I could scarcely credit my senses. Surely I was right! We had come up the previous day, and up the hill to the reservoirs. I had merely to reverse the route we had traveled. At that moment, if you will believe me, the true state of the case and my own stupidity flashed upon me. We had come from Holmesdale: I was now bound for Ammering, which lay at the opposite side.

This a terrible mistake. It was now past six o'clock. One of three precious hours had elapsed, and I was further from Ammering than when I started. I was seized with despair: what ever could I do now? Two hours remained, and I had three up-hill miles to ride, and then about seven more across the moor, before I could reach the junction, and before that the trains might have started, and then—

I burst out into a cold perspiration at the thought, and then, desperate and only half conscious, I rode madly back to the Ammering road and up the hill again.

As we gained the more open ground the blast came down with such violence as to stagger us. It tore across the hill-side, and whizzed and hissed among the gorse and swaying grass. The rain came down more determinedly than ever. At length I reached a small cluster of stone cottages, and halted under the lee of the last one to take breath for a fresh struggle over the moor. From the elevation where I was I could trace the channel of the Apps River down the valley, and could guess the spot at which the flood would strike the railroad, and the branch line over the spur of the hill. I could just distinguish the junction in the middle distance. A dark smoke appeared to be rising from it; an engine, perhaps, waiting to start with a train, and I was lingering on the hill. All this, and more, I could perceive as I rested on the summit. Then I rode manfully forward into the storm.

How my horse kept his feet I do not to this hour understand. The wind, which had been high before, appeared to have gathered new force while we had halted, and it rushed across the track terrifically.

I was quite alone, for there was not a human being in sight; but suddenly the whistle of a locomotive was carried to my ears. An engine moved out of the station. Another whistle shortly afterward. That train was safe. I watched it glide away over the viaduct. Five minutes later I rode into the station and called for the station-master. As I dismounted the clock struck eight. The time was up, and no signal from McCausland. Telegraphing would now be easy. A porter came out in response to my summons.

"I'm sorry ye lost the express," he began.

"I don't want the train," I replied; "I must telegraph at once, though. Where is the station-master?"

"He'll be here in a minute. But ye can't telegraph. The wires is blown down. We had to send a 'pilot' with the express to clear the line up to Handleigh."

"Not telegraph! I tell you, man, I must stop the traffic. The South Holmesdale Reservoir will burst this very hour."

"Can that be true?" inquired a cool, gentlemanly man at my elbow. It was the station-master himself.

"True!" I echoed. "It is only too true. I have ridden to tell you. We must stop the trains."

"The excursion leaves Handleigh at 8.5," mused the station-master. "There may be time; come with me." He crossed the line and entered a shed opposite. I followed. Just then a loud booming sound rent the air. The sound came back from the hills like thunder.

"It is the signal," I exclaimed. "The water is out. Heaven help us now!"

The station-master called out. A cleaner appeared.

"Is that engine ready?"

"Yes, sir; waiting for the excursion."

"Run and open the points—Now, sir, get up."

I obeyed mechanically, and before I quite realized the situation we had crossed to the up line. The station-master stopped to get a red flag and give a few instructions to his subordinate. I now perceived that we were to race the flood. Steam versus Water. Which would conquer?

A whistle: we started. "The flood! the flood!" shouted the porter. We turned one glance up the valley. A moving brown wall, capped with a snowy ridge, was tearing down to the devoted viaduct. No time to lose. "Go ahead!" cried the station-master. I turned on steam, put the lever over another "notch," and the race began in earnest.

We flew along the metals. A few minutes would decide it. We must get to the viaduct and over it first, or the excursion, unwarned, would dash to destruction. A depression in the ground ran beside the railroad for a short distance. We trusted to this to turn the velocity of the approaching water. It was an exciting race, and one never to be forgotten.

On rolled the flood. We were running "neck and neck" for one terrible half minute. Now the resistless flood bore directly to the bridge. Stones were rolled before it like marbles. Trunks of trees, haystacks, debris of every description, came head-long down upon the doomed structure. We fled like lightning over the rails. Our speed told now. Sparks flew from the chimney. Another "notch"—the beat of the piston quickened to an almost inconceivable rapidity. We were on the bridge. Hurray! The curling wave beneath seemed to spring forward. It broke against the buttresses. In a second we were across. I shut off steam, the station-master put down the brakes. A tearing, rending sound that was not the brakes—a crash! We looked back. The line dropped behind us like a stage trap. The bridge gave way, and, with a roar that was heard two miles off, the pretty viaduct was swept away by the boiling, furious water.

And now to save the excursion. Speeding forward again, whistling like a demon, our good engine—Vigilant by name—soon came in sight of the excursion train. By waving our red flag we averted another danger—a collision.

We soon gave the bewildered passengers to understand the narrow escape they had had. Fervent and sincere were the thanks we received.

By the time we had arranged matters and returned to the broken viaduct the water had subsided. The work of destruction was complete, but a "break-down" gang was quickly on the spot. A footway was constructed across the muddy river-bed, and trains stopped at both sides of the stream, the passengers exchanging from one to the other.

The loss of cattle and farm produce caused by that terrible flood was very great. Had the catastrophe occurred during the night, the loss of human life would have been appalling. As it was, some unfortunate people were drowned, but some had most marvelous escapes.

I found McCausland and his staff at the reservoir awaiting me. He wrung my hand fervently, and said certain words that I shall not easily forget.

The viaduct was quickly rebuilt, but the station-master at Ammering does not forget the race of Steam versus Water on the Vigilant locomotive.

Nor do I!

NEW

BOOKS

Recollections of Writers. By Chas. and Mary Cowden Clarke. 12mo. $1 75
Nelly's Silver Mine. A Story of Colorado Life. By H. H. 12mo. 1 50
Songs of Italy. By Joachim Miller. 12mo. 1 50
The New Republic; or Culture, Faith, and Philosophy in an English Country House. By W. H. Mallock. 12mo. 1 50
The Refugee. By author of "Omoo," "Type," etc. Each. 12mo. 1 00
Peterson's Dollar Series. (Wisdom Series.) Wisdom of Solomon. Ecclesiasticus. (Wisdom Series.) 12mo. 1 50
All Round the House; or How to Make Homes Happy. By Mrs. Henry Ward Beecher. 12mo. 1 50
Sound. By Alfred Marshall Mayer. (Experimental Science Series for Beginners.) 12mo. 1 00
The Ceramic Art. A Companion of the History and Manufacture of Pottery and Porcelain. By Jennie J. Young. 8vo. 5 00

BANCROFT'S
721 MARKET ST. S.F.

FALK'S

MILWAUKEE BEER

Is made from first class materials, and is especially recommended by the medical profession for ladies and others suffering from general debility. It is strengthening and delicious to the taste. Ask your grocer for it, and take none other.

CUTTING &amp; MURRAY,

Sole Agents, 206 Front Street, S. F.

BUTTERICK'S

PATTERNS—OCT. STYLES.

Send stamp for catalogue. AGENCY, 124 POST ST., San Francisco.

EDUCATIONAL!

French, Spanish, and Italian taught by Prof. Barthelmy de Filippis, by his easy, new method, saving months of studies. Classes for beginners will be formed September 20th; also private lessons. PACIFIC BUSINESS COLLEGE, 320 Post Street.

HEALD'S BUSINESS COLLEGE,
No. 24 Post Street,
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
Opposite Mechanics' Institute.

IMPARTS A THOROUGH PRACTICAL Education in all Commercial and English Branches, French, German, Spanish, Drawing, and Telegraphy. This school having greater facilities, and enjoying a more extensive patronage than any similar institution on the Pacific coast, continues to base its claims for recognition and patronage upon the good sense and enlightened judgment of the public.

LIST OF FACULTY:
E. P. Heald, F. C. Woodbury,
H. M. Stearns, A. R. Capp,
Mrs. C. Woodbury, T. R. Southern,
J. A. Chesnutwood, Mrs. W. J. Hamilton,
A. P. DuChief, F. Seragni,
R. Sorcini, Geo. Jebens,
Lloyd Baldwin, A. Vander Nellen.
For full particulars, call at the College, 24 Post Street, or address E. P. HEALD, President Business College, San Francisco.

RETURNED.

HAVING RETURNED FROM THE

East, I respectfully announce to my friends and the public that I shall resume practice on WEDNESDAY, Sept. 5th, 1878.

S. W. DENNIS, M. D., DENTIST,

No. 33 KEARNY STREET.

AURORA

EXPORT

Bottled Lager Beer

Is decidedly the finest Beer in the market.

For Sale Everywhere. TRY IT.

R. D. HUME &amp; CO., AGENTS.

221 FRONT STREET.

R. C. MOWBRAY, M. D., DENTIST

224 STOCKTON ST., corner Post, S. F.

BACON & COMPANY
PRINTERS
CLAY ST. CORNER SANSOME

Surely Mr. Thomas Maguire is a very popular manager. Perhaps it would be better to say "man." He is at least constant in his devotion to his love—not his first love, but his best love—the drama, or the art of minstrelsy.

They are, unfortunately for the first, too much the same to him. If he has a fault in his managership, that is it.

Long years ago he made money in the Thespian business. Long years ago he lost it. He has been principally losing since.

But still he stands at the door of the Thespian temple, no longer the chief receiver of the sacrifices, but sufficiently interested to be pleased with a full dress circle, and to adore a crammed gallery.

He has always been fond of the "boys," and they have assumed the patronage of his career so long that he is gradually coming to the opinion that his own star began to wane with The Danicheffs.

I really believe he almost dislikes the dress circle. But he does not despise its money.

He clings with a fondness as foolish, as fondnesses generally are, to the old-time audiences and the old-time entertainment; and although he has given us two detachments of the Union Square company, some of the finest plays ever written, and the grandest opera company the coast ever saw, still he is not happy.

The kid-gloved people, who do not applaud for fear of splitting their expensive hand-coverings, are having all too much their own way for him; but he yields all his prejudices to circumstances, and feels that Baldwin's Theatre is not Maguire's Opera House.

So far has he acknowledged the change that he puts on for his benefit a strong ancient-modern piece, which has only something of a gallery reputation.

I fear he was not satisfied with the comparatively quiescent condition of that portion of the house on Monday night, in spite of the full parquette, and the almost unusual heartiness of its applause.

He scarcely heeded as was his wont, and I saw him in the doorway of Baldwin's Hotel comparatively uninterested, while the audience were calling Rose Wood before the curtain, once in a while inviting James O'Neill to come with her.

It was a good house, though, and showed that people really did think something of Mr. Maguire, for all the other theatres were empty. It was a complimentary benefit tendered by the company; but a good number of the company went with Mr. and Mrs. Williamson into the provinces, to assist in the proper presentation of the great Dutch drama, also for Mr. Maguire's benefit.

After a tour through England and Europe, it is quite possible that his purse required replenishing, and I dare say the company had a glimmering idea of that when they decided to play in A Woman of the People as a compliment to their popular manager.

Whether that was the case or not, the object brought a good deal of money into the house, and the performance was at least worth it.

A Woman of the People struck Mr. Maguire strongly when he saw it played by Madame Beatrice, in London. I don't think it would have struck me, certainly not either as a piece for San Francisco, or as a piece for Mr. Maguire's company. It is an old, a very old play.

It belongs to d'Ennery's crude days, when he did not show the talent which has since made him famous.

Those literary and dramatic firms are curious things any way. If I may judge from this piece, in comparison with The Two Orphans and A Celebrated Case, I should say Cormon is the man, not d'Ennery.

There is not an sign in A Woman of the People of the genius which characterizes the later efforts. It is an almost plotless drama. Such a plot to-day would not be looked at.

A friend of mine once edited a comic paper. Don't be alarmed, he is not anywhere near here. He one day received an invitation to dinner from an old gentleman who had a rising family. After dinner the host produced a somewhat dirty piece of paper on which was a rough drawing of a desk, with the under portions of two human bodies, one on a high stool by the desk, the other sitting. Prefacing his remarks by a story touching the figure on the high stool, he remarked that his son, an unusually clever and bright boy, had made this marvelous sketch of the incident, and if my friend could get the artist of his comic paper to fill in the heads and shoulders, and put the proper expression into the faces, he thought it would be a telling contribution to the next number.

It is much the same with A Woman of the People. It is a play, some one of the numerous rising dramatists of San Francisco, had taken this play to Mr. Lyster and asked him to get Miss Rose Wood to go through five acts of straight agony, and Mr. James O'Neill to do what he could with an uninteresting drunken carpenter, without any plot or story to keep the attention of the audience. Mr. Lyster would have blandly and politely explained that the engagements of the theatre would not permit its presentation.

Mr. Lyster would then have told anybody who asked him about it frankly, that it was a demitition bid play.

But d'Ennery wrote it. It was in fashion years ago, when people went to the theatres for one of two purposes, to laugh or to cry. Then two or three hours of harrowing agony were as acceptable as two or three hours of hilarity, and everybody was pleased.

Besides, when it was played before, M. d'Ennery was satisfied with three acts. That was as much of it as people would stand even in those days. Now he gives us six acts, and they are six acts of d'Ennery without Cormon.

It is quite evident that Cormon is the burnt sugar in the dramatic medicine manufactured by the firm, and uncommonly fine burnt sugar he is.

A Woman of the People is a capital specimen of the hysterical drama. It opens with a wedding, rudely broken in upon by a disclosure of misplaced affection, and it closes with the reunion of the two hearts, somewhat broken in upon by a disclosure of misplaced maternal affection. It has no relief for the harrowing agony of its six scenes.

There is not a smile which is not out of place.

True, on Monday night, Miss Wood tried to lighten the effect by dropping her darling child's head out of the cradle, but that was not repeated. In fact, a plain attempt was made to disabuse the minds of the audience with regard to the wooden material of which that head was composed by the careful presentation of a real baby afterward. But that child was changed in the cradle.

The prologue shadows forth the misery by showing the young husband drunk on his wedding day. In the first act the agony begins, and Miss Wood gives us a round of painful poses, which she repeats in each of the following four, only the scenes being changed.

Two of the acts are enough for any one piece, and there is but little in the other characters to make up for the rest of the time. It is a very weary play, without motive, without art, without finish or genuine dramatic force.

There is scarcely a situation in it which appeals to the audience with any striking effect. It is a series of culminations that never rise to climax; and even the ending only satisfies us because we feel that the miserable, unhappy, hysterical wife needs rest, and we are glad that she does not need any longer to shriek and rave about "my chi-ild."

But if the play is so poor, it only shows how well Miss Rose Wood does her work, that the audience recall her after almost every act. She deserves it. I have never seen anybody work so hard. If, when the piece is withdrawn, she goes to Mr. Lyster and asks for a holiday, she shall have my certificate, for one, that she has richly earned it.

It is a pity she has not a heavier physique and a stronger pair of lungs; as it is, she only wants them to be as good a "Marie" as one could wish to see. But her lithe figure, and her light, comedy voice, drive her into hysterics not altogether becoming the hardy work-girl who maintains her idle husband.

I am not willing, however, to say a word that will reduce the credit that must and ought to accrue to her reputation from her earnest, and at times powerful, performance of "Marie."

Mr. James O'Neill has a very disagreeable and unimportant part. It should not be unimportant, but it is so in the play.

He showed how little more a leading man, at two hundred dollars a week, can make out of a small part, than a subordinate at twenty-five.

Mr. Lewis Morrison threw his body into his somewhat stereotyped attitudes of villainy, and added an "a" to his words to make an Italian accent.

Mr. Morrison plays a monotonous villain. He comes on with exactly the same hasty stride in the beginning, pushes up his shoulders and sticks his head forward through the various acts, and goes off, or is taken off, at the end with the same defiant snap of the fingers in every part he plays. Between his "good" young men and his "bad" young men there is merely the difference of opening or shutting his eyes and his mouth. He caught the Italian accent very well at times, but a man can not be expected to get that up perfectly in a day or two.

I did not see him in the processional celebration of the discovery of America on Sunday. That was the place for him to study dialect; only he might have mistaken the Mayor for an Italian.

Miss Maurice, who played the "Countess," is a lady of some experience on the stage. She possesses two recommendations, not always found in the countesses of the stage—a lady-like appearance and repose of manner, and a pleasant, lady-like voice. There was not much for her to do, but she made a most agreeable impression upon me.

Mr. Herne evidently thought "Remy" was a buffoon.

The mounting of the play was really high class. Some of the scenes were simply admirable paintings. But the care and finish given to the stage arrangements and situations in A Celebrated Case, Agnes, and Les Danicheffs were conspicuously lacking.

A piece called Proof Positive is advertised to follow. Where is Mother and Son?

The Streets of New York have been somewhat deserted this week.

I am not surprised at it.

The play has been played in all the best theatres of the world; but the criticism of last week applies to it just as truly all the same. It does not belong to this age of dramatic literature.

It is of the style which kept the theatres in disrepute, and drew all the lower classes to them as patrons.

It is as dead as the old Adelphi dramas, which have long been relegated to second class places of amusements.

They were in a much higher style of art. In them are some of the finest acting characters known to the stage; and, for the sake of those, the old plays will always be dear to actors and theatre-goers.

But we do not want them, we could not stand them now, and it is a pity to see such relics of low-class art as The Streets of New York kept on the boards, while Green Bushes and kindred dramas have been sent into limbo.

The Punch and Judy display, and the Irishman and Chinaman, who are evidently strong partisans of the moribund Kearney, get an occasional laugh from the gallery.

Mr. Mayo played Hamlet for his benefit, a much more creditable bill.

On Monday we are to have Fatinitza, and if rumor can be relied on, it will be a success.

I am much inclined to believe rumor on this occasion, because I happen to know that Mr. Max Freeman has been working very hard to make the production perfect.

The libretto, by Mr. Percy Wilson and Mr. Barton Hill, is to be a model of sensible and artistic translation.

Miss Cottrelli is slightly nervous about her English, but I do not think she need fear a San Francisco audience in matters of courtesy. We stand a good deal, and we can surely be lenient and kindly to a strange lady dealing with a strange language.

The piece is being wonderfully advertised.

One thing is creditable about it—every bill, poster, and lithograph has been drawn and printed in San Francisco. There is nothing about the play save the play itself and the music that is not home manufacture. It will be a triumph of some importance if it is a success. It will show that we can get up an opera on the spot.

We are aware that we can write plays, and even music, of course. I know plenty of people ready with both if this goes. That is the only objectionable feature of the success of Fatinitza.

Mrs. Oates has not been freely patronized this week.

I think it was a mistake in Mr. Locke not to keep up the excitement with his new pieces, and leave his repetitions till the very last week of the engagement. It is hard to bring people back when the audiences have once dropped off.

Still there is no reason why Le Petit Duc should not see crowded houses again. It has the reputation of being Lecocq's best, the numbers being pronounced generally of higher average than even Girofle-Girofla.

If the prima donna could only be induced to leave the audience alone a little more, and if she would direct her entire attention to the business of the opera, I do not know of anybody who could rival her in English opera bouffe.

But the attention of everybody to herself seems to be her ruling passion, and it will forever interfere with her reputation.

Le Petit Duc comes on Monday.

The Dramatic News has got hold of the plot of Boucicault's new Irish play so long promised. It was played in England, in some less prominent theatre for Mrs. Boucicault's benefit, under the name of Norah's Love. I shall not be sorry if it is never given.

What a moral Mr. Boucicault's career points of the effects of puffery!

Mitis is advertised all over the country. Each special advertiser has sole right. A Miss Ada Gilman makes a point of Bret Harte's having forgotten to copyright the story. MOURZOUK.

Clara Morris has a new horse, which she named "Aimée" the moment she put eyes on her, and this horse has a little history.

Mr. Harriot happened to be at a sale the other day, and among the stock to be disposed of was an apparently worthless animal, for which there was no demand.

After some spirited bidding the horse was knocked down to the actress' husband for something like $50.

When Miss Morris saw the acquisition she simply remarked, "Aimée," because, as she said afterward, "she looks so demure and is so vicious, and because of her general cussedness."

"Aimée" is blooded, has a handsome head, is gold color, with four little white feet; is banded very short, and takes a wall or fence like a bird. "She looks so gentle, so demure, and is the devil," says Miss Morris. "She can out kick any mule, donkey, or blonde I ever saw."

A WELL DESERVED COMPLIMENT.

The social as well as the financial status of a city is most markedly seen in the character of its stores, more particularly in those lines of businesses that come directly in contact with what is known as our social life, as dry goods and general house furnishings. Among our first-class places of business, the most notable instance of enterprise to-day, is the recently enlarged establishment of our old friends, Messrs. Kennedy & Durr, formerly of Nos. 108 and 110 Third Street, but now at Nos. 834, 836, and 838 Market Street. The "Pavilion," as it is now called, has already achieved an enviable reputation among shoppers since its removal, and now stands preeminent among those stores at which only the best goods are to be found, and at the most surprisingly low prices. From minute personal examination we feel justified in saying that nowhere within San Francisco can the same line of goods be obtained for the prices asked, one reason of which is the fact of the unusual facilities this firm enjoys for the purchase of goods abroad, for they are their own importers, and by this means save to their customers at least one heavy item of expense in the ordinary profit of wholesale middle men. A cursory glance at this fine stock showed one of the largest lines of dress goods in the city, under which head may be mentioned all the latest styles in the popular Bourrette cloths, and the still more novel Pekinades, Chuddah cloths, Burrapoor cloths, Palmira broches, and the different varieties of camels' hair goods in all the various fashionable tints and shades. In this department we noted a difference of from fifty to seventy-five cents on the yard between the prices here and those asked elsewhere, in the more expensive grades particularly. Under the same head come mourning goods, comprising bombazines, alpaccas, cashmeres, merinos, Henrietta cloth, serges, and the best of English crapes, both for veils and trimming purposes. Cashmeres, as one of the most popular, may be quoted as ranging from 45 cents to $2.50 per yard, and camels' hair cloths from $1.25 to $4. Silks are a specialty of this house, and an unusually fine choice is constantly on hand, in colors as well as the leading makes of black. Evening shades in gros grains, of every color, can be had at $1.50 a yard, the same goods selling elsewhere for $2.50, being of full width and of extra quality. They range from this figure to $2.50. Bonnet's, Ponson's, Joubert's, all the various foreign makes are represented in blacks; also the make known as "The Pavilion," an extra quality, manufactured expressly for the firm, and bearing their trade mark. This can be recommended as one of the best wearing silks in the market, and varies in price from $1.50 to $5.00 a yard, the general line of these goods going from 75 cents to $6.50. Fine broads and broadened velvets should be spoken of in this connection; satins and plushes also. In cloakings there is a most varied assortment; and these, with an exceptionally excellent stock of shawls, in India camels' hair, broché, worsted knitted; and in lace, the Point de Venise and Duchesse constitute a marked feature of this establishment. Lighter grades at lower prices are not forgotten. We had our attention specially called to the hosiery department, in which the latest novelties are found at most moderate figures; ladies' silk hose, extra length, fast colors, being marked at $5, the usual price being from $7.50 to $10 elsewhere. For ladies, gentlemen, and children there is every conceivable fancy in plain white, unbleached, striped, bourette, embroidered, and hair line goods. At the underwear counter purchasers will find all grades of flannels ready made, the "scarlet medicated" in suits and of various sizes. Cartwright's and Warner's celebrated make of gauze goods, and Canton flannels in shirts and drawers to match. Gentlemen's white shirts are another specialty. Messrs. Kennedy & Durr very justly pride themselves on their house furnishing display, which is so extensive as to form a store in itself, and so entirely satisfactory in every way as to be beyond competition. Linen and cotton sheetings, toweling, quilts, spreads, comfortables, and blankets are among the leading points. These latter are both imported and of home manufacture; one elegant pair, which may be given as a sample, as having been made at the Mission Mills, costing $40. They are to be had, however, in all qualities, and from this price as low as $2 a pair. Lace curtains are also selling at greatly reduced rates—fine guipures and Nottingham laces ranging from 15 cents to $1.50 a yard, and real lace from $9 to $90 a pair. In table linens are all the best foreign makes, notably that of the Belfast house of Brown & Sons. Wine cloths in sets, worsted table covers in Persian and other fashionable designs, are among the further requisites of the dining-room. While giving so much and such critical attention to larger matters, Messrs. Kennedy & Durr have not neglected the various et ceteras of a first-class house. Ribbons, neckties, laces, trimmings of every description, buttons, and other fancy articles too numerous to mention at length, are always a part of their stock. In that important essential of the toilet, gloves, there are no less than five different makes in kids alone, besides silk, Lisle thread, mitts, in black and light evening shades, gauntlets, castor beaver gloves for riding and driving, worsted and cotton, and Swedish kid. The "Golden Eagle," "Golden Gate," the "Cécile," and a glove manufactured expressly for them in Paris, known as the "Pavilion," and the "Farriss Seamsless" of New York, are among the principal favorites in dress gloves. Something very popular in ladies' corsets is also named after the store itself, "The Pavilion." It is a combination of the best points known to the corsetiere, having the extra length over the hips, an extremely pliable steel, made broad, and curving inward somewhat at the lower end, to serve as a support, has side lacing, embroidered Tront bosoms, and is provided with an extra number of the lightest of whalebones for stiffening. This make comes in gray and white jeans, at $1.50 only. To sum up finally, there is nothing known to family wants that is not here amply provided for, and it is with more than ordinary pleasure that we pay this brief tribute to the business energy, tact, and taste of this enterprising firm, and take this occasion to introduce them to the many readers of THE ARGONAUT, feeling sure that we shall receive in return the sincere thanks of those who have as yet been unacquainted with them.

We knew it all along, and now we can prove it to you. Messrs. Burr & Fink, corner Montgomery and Market Streets, have the largest assortment of gentlemen's furnishing goods in the city.

"Ah, great heavens," sighed a rising young genius, throwing down his pen and leaning back wearily, "you don't know how much pleasanter and easier it is to read these little poems of mine than it is to write them." Sympathetic but awkward friend—"Gad, how you must suffer, then!"

Mrs. Parker, of the Ladies' Depository, has opened a new store at 126 Post Street. Dolls dressed in all styles. New Lace Patterns.

Messrs. Burr & Fink, Montgomery and Market Streets, are beating the stock market all hollow. They make things "boom" every day of the week.

"Fellow-citizens," said a North Carolina candidate, "there are three topics that now agitate the State—the United States Bank, the Tariff, and the Penitentiary. I shall pass over the first two very briefly, as my sentiments are well known, and come to the Penitentiary, where I shall dwell for some time."

California Street is, we believe, the only one connecting the waters of the Bay of San Francisco with the ocean beach. Either the Presidio Reservation, the Cemeteries, or the Park prevent an open communication to the sea. Hence when the California Street Railroad shall be extended, as it will soon be, to the Pacific Ocean, it will be crowded with pleasure seekers. The route over the hills gives delightful views of the town, the bay, the Golden Gate, and ocean. The street will be lined with palaces. The residences of Messrs. Stanford, Hopkins, Colton, Crocker, Flood, Mackey, Tobin, Rosenbaum, Norris, Carolan, Wiggins, are all located upon California Street. Our advice to all the newly bonanza rich is to secure a fifty-acre lot upon the line of this avenue, or to get as near to it as possible, for the time is coming when it will be fashionable exile not to have a residence either upon Van Ness Avenue, Nob Hill, or California Street heights.

We would call your attention to the fine display of colored and plain Photography just placed at the entrance of Dames & Hayes' gallery, 715 Market St.

Clara Louise Kellogg carries a trunk full of old corsets around with her, because she knows that if she shows them aside the size of her waist will be known to the anxious world two hours after.

Just received at Sullivan's, No. 120 Kearny Street, a large invoice of new goods, comprising the latest models for cloaks, dolmans, ulsters, and other outdoor wraps. Also, a heavy line of ladies' and children's suits, ladies' morning wrappers in every variety of trimming and material, and a particularly taking model known as the "Montague." All kinds of cloths, Siciliennes, and other suitings, constantly being renewed from abroad, as well as the very latest designs in buttons and other cloak fastenings, whalebone, and other fringes, tassels, chenille, and all kinds of trimmings and garnitures. Mourning suits made at the shortest notice.

There's no use in talking. Messrs. Burr & Fink, of No. 2 Montgomery Street, have the inside track on gentlemen's goods and general tailoring work.

In a country church-yard we find the following epitaph: "Here lies the body of James Robinson, and Ruth his wife, and underneath, the text, 'Their warfare is accomplished.'"

This paper is printed with ink furnished by Chas. Eneu Johnson & Co., 509 South Tenth Street, Philadelphia, and 59 Gold Street, New York.

"I know I am a perfect bear in manners," said a young farmer to his sweetheart. "No, indeed, you are not, John; you have never hugged me yet."

Have you seen the new style of "Montagues" at Sullivan's, No. 120 Kearny Street?

One of a party of friends, referring to an exquisite musical composition, said: "That song always carries me away when I hear it." "Can any body sing it?" asked a wit in the company.

BOSTON DRESS REFORM.

California "Worth" Princess Suits, Skirts, and attachable Flounces: Cashmere and Merino Union Suits for ladies and children; ladies' and misses' shoulder-brace Corsets; Abdominal Corsets. No. 430 Sutter Street. A. W. BAKER, the only Dress Reform Agent in the city.

An Indianapolis barber who abandoned his business and went into the ministry was suddenly called upon to baptize three candidates. He got along very well, but after baptizing the first he astonished his congregation by lustily shouting, "Next!"

Have you seen the new styles of "Montagues" at Sullivan's, No. 120 Kearny Street?

"What is this?" asked Kearney, in a Boston restaurant, the other day, where he had ordered pudding and milk. "Chinese mush," replied the waiter. "All right," said Kearney, too hungry to be particular, "the Chinese mush go."

Get your wedding suit at Messrs. Burr & Fink's, No. 2 Montgomery Street, over the Hibernia Bank, and be happy.

BUSH STREET THEATRE.

CHARLES E. LOCKE.....PROPRIETOR.

THE OATES

ENGLISH COMIC OPERA COMPANY,
Supporting the American Prima Donna Comedienne,
ALICE OATES.

Saturday Evening, October 19th, last renditions of

LA PERICHOLE.

Saturday Matinee and Sunday Evening, last renditions of GIROFLE-GIROFLA.

Monday Evening, October 21st, the latest opera, now meeting with the greatest success in Paris and London,

LE PETIT DUC,

By Charles Lecocq, author of Girofle-Girofla and La Fille de Mme. Angot.

BOOKS OF THE WEEK

The Ceramic Art, a History of Pottery and Porcelain. By Jennie S. Young. Cloth. $5 00
All around the House. By Mrs. H. W. Beecher. Clo. 1 50
Songs of Italy. By Joaquin Miller. Cloth. 1 50
His Heart's Desire. A Novel. Cloth. 1 50
A Friend. By H. Greville. Cloth, $1; paper. 50
The Management and Diseases of the Dog. By J. W. Hill. Cloth. 2 00
Hygiene of the Brain. By M. L. Holbrook. Cloth. 1 50
Growth of the Steam Engine. By R. H. Thurston. Cloth. 2 50
Cousin Polly's Gold Mine. By Mrs. A. E. Porter. Paper. 40
The Magic Flower-Pot. By Edward Garrett. Cloth. 1 50
The Chicken Market. By Prof. Henry Morley. Clo. 1 50
Nelly's Silver Mine. By H. H. Cloth. 1 50
Newbery's New Map of San Francisco. Pocket form. 75

NEW STATIONERY

RECEIVED DAILY.

BILLINGS, HARBOURNE & CO.,
BOOKSELLERS AND STATIONERS,
NO. 3 MONTGOMERY STREET.

BALDWIN'S THEATRE.

THOMAS MAGUIRE.....MANAGER.
F. LYSTER.....ACTING MANAGER.
G. R. CHIPMAN.....TREASURER.

Unparalleled success of the great emotional drama,

A WOMAN OF THE PEOPLE,

Attested by the united verdict of the people and the press, &c.:

It is a drama that appeals directly to the most humane and moving sentiment of the heart. Mr. James O'Neill as "Bertrand," the drunken, cruel, and subsequently repentant, husband, played with his usual ability. Mr. J. A. Herne as "Remy," a careless, drunken scoundrel, with a considerable ingredient of good humor, was excellent.—Alta.

Miss Rose Wood finds her opportunity. Well she avails herself of it. She sounds the whole gamut of a woman's nature—guileless love, intense suffering, heroic endurance. She is the artist in every phase of the character. The audience appeared bound to her by those strong ties of sympathy which only the true actress can weave, and each curtain was a relief for almost overwrought feeling. The lady was called out at the end of every act amidst emphatic and most genuine applause.—Call.

"Appiani" interests the audience most, though so far removed from their sympathy. In the hands of Mr. Morrison the character receives the most artistic treatment with results that could have been arrived at only by long and patient study.—Chronicle.

This Saturday afternoon, October 19th, and every evening including Sunday,

A WOMAN OF THE PEOPLE.

In Active Preparation—PROOF POSITIVE.

CALIFORNIA THEATRE.

BARTON & LAWLOR.....MANAGERS.
BARTON HILL.....ACTING MANAGER.

MONDAY, OCTOBER 21.

A notable event—First time in America of the Grand Spectacular Comic Opera,

FATINITZAI

Now the reigning sensation in Berlin, Vienna, Paris, and London. Libretto, by Richard Genée. Music, by Franz Suppe. Translated and adapted from the German by Messrs. Piercy Wilson and Barton Hill.

First appearance in English of the Brilliant Artists,

MISS MATHILDE COTTRELLY

—AND—

MR. MAX FREEMAN,

Supported by Miss Marie Prescott, Mr. Harry Gates, Mr. Felix Morris, Miss Carrie Godfrey, Miss Hattie Moore, an auxiliary cast of great musical and dramatic excellence.

Superb chorus of fresh and highly trained voices, with a full and complete orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Charles Schultz.

The scenes by Vogelin will be his masterpieces. The costumes, by Mrs. Walter Smith, new, varied, and beautiful. The properties and mechanical effects, by Stackhouse, Greenlock, and assistants, original and startling. The whole constituting a remarkable dramatic, musical, and realistic ensemble. The entire production under the direction of Mr. Max Freeman.

Fatinitza matinee Saturday. Reserved seats at the box office six days in advance.

THE VERTICAL FEED.

THE ONLY POSITIVE SUCCESS IN all departments of sewing. Lightest running shuttle machine in the market. The NEW DAVIS VERTICAL FEED SEWING MACHINE, 130 Post Street.

MARK SHELTON.

P. S.—Howe, Florence, Wheeler & Wilson, Grover & Baker, Domestic, Weed, Willcox & Gibbs, for sale at $70 each.

W. LITTLE.....J. B. CUMMING.

LITTLE & CUMMING,

CARPENTERS AND BUILDERS, No. 34 O'Farrell Street, San Francisco.

Estimates given on all classes and styles of work. General jobbing promptly attended to. Offices and Stores neatly fitted up.

PUBLIC ADMINISTRATOR,

WILLIAM DOOLAN,

Office No. 12 Nevada Block.

R. P. & H. N. CLEMENT,

ATTORNEYS-AT-LAW,

Nos. 2, 3, and 4 SHERMAN'S BUILDING,

Montgomery Street, N. E. corner of Clay, San Francisco (P. O. Box 707.)

DECKER BROS

COMPLICATED

WATCHES

CHRONOGRAPH,
REPEATING,
SPLIT SECONDS, ETC.

AND A LARGE STOCK OF GOLD and Silver Watches, Chains, Diamonds, Jewelry, Silver Ware, and Fancy Goods at

ANDERSON & RANDOLPH'S

CORNER OF

MONTGOMERY AND SUTTER STS.,

SAN FRANCISCO.

RECEIVER'S NOTICE.

The undersigned, having been appointed by the Judge of the Fifteenth District Court, Receiver, to take charge of the affairs of La Societe Francaise d'Epargnes et de Prevoyance Mutuelle (French Savings and Loan Society), with power to collect all moneys due the same, and to take possession of all books of accounts, papers, property, evidences of indebtedness, and assets thereof, hereby gives notice that he has entered upon the discharge of his duties as such Receiver, and has opened an office for the transaction of the business intrusted to him by said order of the Court, at No. 412 Montgomery Street.

All persons indebted to the Bank are hereby notified to make payment to the undersigned, and all depositors holding pass-books are requested to present them at the office of the Receiver, that they may be written up and balanced.

F. F. LOW, Receiver.

FALL AND WINTER OPENING

MRS. M. A. SOPER,

Corner Market and Third Streets,

WILL HAVE HER IMPORTATION of PARIS MILLINERY on Exhibition on TUESDAY, WEDNESDAY, THURSDAY

October 22d, 23d, and 24th.

NEW BOOKS AT ROMAN'S.

The Vision of Echard. A poem. By Whittier. 12mo. cloth. $1 25
The Heir of Charlton. By Mary Agnes. 12mo. cloth. 1 50
All around the House. By Mrs. Henry Ward Beecher. 12mo. cloth. 1 50
A Friend. By Henry Greville. Paper, 50c.; cloth. 1 00
The Home Doctor, a Guide to Health. By Dr. Bourne of San Francisco. Cloth. 3 00
Parks and Gardens of Paris. By Robinson. 8vo. cloth. 7 50
Theism. By Physicus. 8vo. cloth. 2 50
Nelly's Silver Mine. By H. H. 12mo. cloth. 1 25
Life and Adventure in Japan. By Clark. 12mo. clo. 1 25
Sketches Abroad. By Darley. Cloth. 2 00
Recollections of Writers. By Mary Cowlen Clarke. 12mo. cloth. 1 75
The Chicken Market, and other Fairy Tales. By Henry Morley. Cloth. 1 75
Cousin Polly's Gold Mine. Paper. 40
Mrs. Jack. By Miss Trollope. Paper. 25
John. A Day Dream. Paper. 30

Just, received, a large supply of new and elegant

PHOTOGRAPHIC ALBUMS.

A. ROMAN & CO.,

11 Montgomery Street,

Lick House Block, San Francisco.

PALACE HOTEL RESTAURANT,

FIRST CLASS IN ALL RESPECTS.

QUIET AND DESIRABLE PLACE

for La lies, Gentlemen, and Families. 237 Entrance south side of Court. A. D. SHARON.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—OFFICE OF

the Eureka Consolidated Mining Company, Nevada Block, Room 37, San Francisco, Oct. 15th, 1878.—At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above named company, held this day, a dividend (No. 39) of three dollars per share was declared, payable on Monday, Oct. 21st, 1878. Transfer books closed until October 2nd.

W. W. TRAYLOR, Secretary.

PIANOS ARE THE BEST

NEW IMPORTATION

Of the LATEST STYLES of

EMBROIDERIES

OF EVERY DESIGN.

ALSO, CANTAS OF NEW COLORS.

Ladies' Shopping Baskets of unique shapes. Bronzes, Clocks, Ivory Carvings, Toilet and Fancy Goods, Vienna Bronze Ornaments.

H. SIERING & CO.

(SUCCESSORS TO LOGAN & Co.)

19 MONTGOMERY STREET,

LICK HOUSE BLOCK.

MME. B. ZEITSKA'S

FRENCH, GERMAN, AND ENGLISH INSTITUTE

FOR YOUNG LADIES,

922 POST ST., BETWEEN HYDE

and Larkin. KINDERGARTEN connected with the Institute.

The next term will commence October 2d.

A limited number of Boarding Pupils received.

MME. A. ZEITSKA, Principal.

JOE POHEIM

The Tailor,

203 Montgomery St. and 103 Third St., has just received a large assortment of the latest style goods. Suits to order from $20.00. Pants to order from $5.00. Overcoats to order from $15.00.

The leading question is where the best goods can be found at the lowest prices. The answer is at

JOE POHEIM,

203 Montgomery St. and 103 Third St.

Samples and Rules for Self-Measurement sent free to any address. Fit guaranteed.

PALMER BROS.

726 TO 734 MARKET ST.,

Have a full assortment of

LADIES' AND GENTS' FURNISHing Goods, Toilet Articles, Corsets, Embroideries, French and Valenciennes Laces, a fine assortment of Veilings and Ruchings, and the largest stock of

MILLINERY GOODS,

And the best stock of

BOYS' CLOTHING AND HATS & CAPS

In the city.

KEANE BROS.

WOULD RESPECTFULLY ASK A visit of inspection to their new departments.

CLOAKS, SUITS, COSTUMES,

Etc., etc. Ladies will find only the latest novelties of this season's production from London, Paris, Berlin, and New York. Our cutters and fitters are thoroughly reliable, and combined with moderate charges we can confidently ask a share of public patronage.

All the newest materials and latest designs are to be found in our Silk and French Dress Goods Departments.

KEANE BROS.

107, 109, 111, AND 113

KEARNY STREET, SAN FRANCISCO.

REMOVAL.

S. B. WAKEFIELD & CO.

STOCK & EXCHANGE BROKERS,

Have removed from 314 Pine Street to a

322 Pine St., cor. Leidesdorff, San Francisco.

BEST KOHLER & CHASE

SAN FRANCISCO

& OAKLAND

NATURAL HISTORY FOR CHILDREN

The whale is generally spoken of by poets as "the monster of the deep." Do you see how lively he is? The whale is the most sportive fish under water. The shark can take a joke and crack one, but for broad, ruffling humor the whale knocks all the funny animals into slivers.

Some whales are eighty feet long, but if you ever see one, and rush into a printing office to have an item built on the fact, it would be better for your children if you said that the whale was forty feet long. The world can forgive a man exaggerating the facts of a tornado, freshest, or steamboat disaster, but the man that lies about fish is gone up from that moment. That's the reason why no true good man ever goes a fishing.

"Can a whale crack a hickory nut with his teeth?" "He can, but he doesn't fool around with such trifles. When he opens his mouth to bite he pretends to crack a whale-bone, or a bald-headed sea captain from Nantucket—one of those tough old fellows who come back from the Arctic seas and tell about four moons in the sky at once."

"Is a whale's mouth as large as the Capitol building at Washington?" "That's according to whose book on whaling you have confidence in. Some writers compare a whale's mouth wide enough to chuck in most any building, while others who want to go to heaven state that no whale could gulp down a street car without losing some of his teeth. The trouble is that no newspaper man ever finds time to go off on a cruise after whales, and therefore the public can secure no reliable figures and statistics."

"How old do whales live to be?" "You have got us now. We never saw the same whale over three or four times, and whether they died of grief over that fact, or swam away to make new acquaintances, we could never find out. When a man tells you that a whale lives to be seven, seventy, or seven hundred years old, ask him to submit the proofs."

"Where are whales mostly found?" "In the water. They never come to land until tired of life and ready for a change."

"How fast can they swim?" "That is another disputed point. A Nantucket captain says he saw one speeding at the rate of thirty miles an hour, while a New Bedford captain saw one going at the rate of a mile a minute. Horace Greeley could have settled the dispute in his Recollections of a Busy Life, but he seems to have avoided doing so. However, if you are ever chased by a whale, it will be prudent for you to make ten miles an hour, if you can."

"Do whales prefer shelled corn to corn on the cob?" "No. No well-regulated whale would be in the least put out after swallowing a wagon load of cobs."

"Do whales fight with each other?" "Not often. If a whale comes fooling around, blustering what he can do and putting on airs, he is generally rolled in the mud to take the crevices out of him; as a rule, the whale prefers to rest his nose on a coral reef and give himself up to planning the social elevation of the walrus and the squid."

"Is it cruel to harpoon a whale?" "It is. There should be law obliging the whalers to catch their victims with a noosed rope and then stupefy them with chloroform. Continue to be a good boy, and to be glad that you are not a whale."

—Free Press.

The Imperial Government of China is in the Shanghai market to float a loan. Civilization.

Dr. Bucknill of London pronounces the inebriate asylums of the United States a practical failure.

A mark was set upon Cain; but the umbrella was, for some inscrutable reason, left unprotected.

"Goats consume thyme," says an observant contemporary. Yes, they consume everything but eternity.

A Chinaman, employed to set up pins in a ball alley, said he would prefer to roll the balls if it was "alley sammy."

"I don't like that cat. It's got splinters in its feet," was the excuse of a four-year-old for throwing the kitten away.

One of the early Buddhist kings was doubtless given to kissing the wine cup. He was Asoka, and lived 220 B. C.

The director of the bank of France has issued an order declaring that the mountebanks of all his employees "must go."

Eastern exchanges complain that some of the Chinese embassy wear outside garments of white silk so closely resembling night shirts as to make the old maids dodge around the first corner.

The Springfield Republican thinks that Cronin's forgotten nose may come to the front as an issue in the 1890 campaign. New Haven Courier. It would be an easy matter to pool that issue. Arkansas Sentinel.

"Why does lightning so rarely strike twice in the same place?" Professor W. R. Martin asked the new boy in the class in natural philosophy. "Huh," said the boy. "It never needs to." And it is a little singular that nobody had thought of that question before.

A Michigan paper prints and circulates fit beer. One of its insertions is: "Ouf any body zaid as nodd goat peer, shoost spild it al, ober him. On the other side the bit of papez reads: 'This is one glass of beer, based on der grent of der min vat pays it.'"

"I'm a tough cuss from Bitter Creek," is the expression employed by the plans desperate to reform everybody that he is on the fight. Further east the corresponding number of society says: "I'm a wolf, and this is my time to howl." In Kentucky he says: "I'm a yard wide, and all wool."

"Hienlen," said Brother Van Meter, as reported by the Detroit Free Press, "death must come to all. We can't escape it. Some of us will be hung, some drowned, some burned up in barns, some shot by the police, but it will be death just the same. Let us have our cut in order, and let us see 'specimen' a visit from dat white-faced angel who moves so softly dat we must an who strikes so swiftly dat men hes."

"I'm a tough cuss from Bitter Creek," is the expression employed by the plans desperate to reform everybody that he is on the fight. Further east the corresponding number of society says: "I'm a wolf, and this is my time to howl." In Kentucky he says: "I'm a yard wide, and all wool."

"Hienlen," said Brother Van Meter, as reported by the Detroit Free Press, "death must come to all. We can't escape it. Some of us will be hung, some drowned, some burned up in barns, some shot by the police, but it will be death just the same. Let us have our cut in order, and let us see 'specimen' a visit from dat white-faced angel who moves so softly dat we must an who strikes so swiftly dat men hes."

"Hienlen," said Brother Van Meter, as reported by the Detroit Free Press, "death must come to all. We can't escape it. Some of us will be hung, some drowned, some burned up in barns, some shot by the police, but it will be death just the same. Let us have our cut in order, and let us see 'specimen' a visit from dat white-faced angel who moves so softly dat we must an who strikes so swiftly dat men hes."

"Hienlen," said Brother Van Meter, as reported by the Detroit Free Press, "death must come to all. We can't escape it. Some of us will be hung, some drowned, some burned up in barns, some shot by the police, but it will be death just the same. Let us have our cut in order, and let us see 'specimen' a visit from dat white-faced angel who moves so softly dat we must an who strikes so swiftly dat men hes."

"Hienlen," said Brother Van Meter, as reported by the Detroit Free Press, "death must come to all. We can't escape it. Some of us will be hung, some drowned, some burned up in barns, some shot by the police, but it will be death just the same. Let us have our cut in order, and let us see 'specimen' a visit from dat white-faced angel who moves so softly dat we must an who strikes so swiftly dat men hes."

"Hienlen," said Brother Van Meter, as reported by the Detroit Free Press, "death must come to all. We can't escape it. Some of us will be hung, some drowned, some burned up in barns, some shot by the police, but it will be death just the same. Let us have our cut in order, and let us see 'specimen' a visit from dat white-faced angel who moves so softly dat we must an who strikes so swiftly dat men hes."

"Hienlen," said Brother Van Meter, as reported by the Detroit Free Press, "death must come to all. We can't escape it. Some of us will be hung, some drowned, some burned up in barns, some shot by the police, but it will be death just the same. Let us have our cut in order, and let us see 'specimen' a visit from dat white-faced angel who moves so softly dat we must an who strikes so swiftly dat men hes."

"Hienlen," said Brother Van Meter, as reported by the Detroit Free Press, "death must come to all. We can't escape it. Some of us will be hung, some drowned, some burned up in barns, some shot by the police, but it will be death just the same. Let us have our cut in order, and let us see 'specimen' a visit from dat white-faced angel who moves so softly dat we must an who strikes so swiftly dat men hes."

ARLINGTON HOTEL,

SANTA BARBARA, CAL.

NO HOTEL ON THE PACIFIC
Coast can surpass the ARLINGTON in the airy cheerfulness and convenience of its arrangements. None can equal it in the natural and artistic beauty of its surroundings. The readers of the ARGONAUT will be pleased to know that the problem of combining solid comfort within doors, inexhaustible pleasure without, and calm contentment all the time, at a very economical rate of expenditure, has been solved at the ARLINGTON, and is respectfully submitted by
GEO. T. BROMLEY, Manager.

BERKELEY GYMNASIUM.

The Berkeley Gymnasium (a preparatory school to the University)—a first-class boarding-school establishment in the interests of higher education, and in opposition to the cramming system of the small colleges and military academies of the State. The next term will commence July 24th. Examination of candidates for admission July 22nd and 23rd. By request, instructions have been provided during the summer months for students preparing for the August examinations at the University. For catalogue or particulars, address

JOHN F. BURRIS, PRINCIPAL,
BERKELEY, CALIFORNIA.

NOTE.—We desire to call special attention to the organization of our Grammar Department, separate from the Academic, and solicit the patronage of parents and guardians of small boys.

GOLDEN GATE ACADEMY

AND CADET SCHOOL.

Next quarter will commence October 7, 1878.
For circulars, address
D. P. SACKETT, A. M., Principal,
Oakland, Cal.

REDINGTON'S FLAVORING EXTRACTS

ARE THE PERFECTLY PURE
and highly concentrated Extracts of

FRESH FRUITS

Prepared with great care. They are put up in superior style, in a bottle holding twice as much as ordinary brands of Extracts.

Comparing quality and contents, none other are nearly so cheap.

Wherever tested on their merits, they have been adopted in preference to all others, and now are the

STANDARD FLAVORING EXTRACTS

Of the Pacific coast. Dealers will find them to give better satisfaction to the consumers than any other kind and are respectfully requested to give them a trial.

REDINGTON & CO.
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

O. F. WILLEY & CO.,
IMPORTERS AND MANUFACTURERS OF

FINE CARRIAGES AND WAGONS
No. 427 MONTGOMERY ST., SAN FRANCISCO.

Agents for the sale of Wagons manufactured by
BREWSTER & CO., New York,
W. D. ROGERS, Philadelphia,
C. S. CAFFEY, Camden, N. J.,
WOOD BROTHERS, New York,
H. KILLAM & CO., New Haven,
COOLING BROS., Wilmington

ALSO, AGENTS FOR
HARNESS MANUFACTURED BY WOOD GIBSON,
TOMPKINS & MANDEVILLE, AND
A. H. DUNCOMBE.

Also, a fine assortment of Robes, Blankets, Nets, Whips, etc.

MILLER & RICHARD,
SOLE MAKERS OF

EXTRA-HARD METAL
SCOTCH TYPE.

SPECIAL AGENTS FOR
THE CAMPBELL, HOE, AND PEERLESS
PRESSES.

No. 523 COMMERCIAL STREET.

And 205 Leidesdorff Street, San Francisco.

GEO. W. FRESCOTT. IRVING M. SCOTT. H. T. SCOTT.

UNION IRON WORKS

(Founded 1844.) Post Office Box 2128.
COR. FIRST AND MISSION STREETS,
SAN FRANCISCO

MANUFACTURERS OF
Compressed Engines,
Air Compressors,
Rock Drills,
Portable Hoisting Engines,
Marine Stationary and Portable Boilers,
Baby Hoist, complete.

CONSTANTLY ON HAND AND FOR SALE.

Direct-acting Pumping and Hoisting Engines,
Upright and Horizontal Engines,
Quartz Crushing and Amalgamating Machinery,
Blake's Rock Breakers,
Smelting Furnaces,
Quicksilver Pumps,
Chloroziding Furnaces,
Cornish Pumps,
Steam Pumps.

All manufactured by us of the best materials, design, and workmanship, and furnished at lower rates than by Eastern manufacturers.

PRESCOTT, SCOTT & CO.

J. H. JONES & CO.,

Member S. F. Stock and Exchange Board.

STOCK AND EXCHANGE BROKERS
Office, 320 Pine Street, San Francisco.

CHAS. N. FOX. M. B. KELLOGG.

FOX & KELLOGG,
ATTORNEYS AND COUNSELORS

AT LAW, San Francisco, Cal.

Office, No. 530 California Street, Rooms 1, 2, and 3.

S. B. WAKEFIELD & CO.

Member S. F. Stock and Exchange Board.

STOCK & EXCHANGE BROKERS,

314 Pine Street, San Francisco.

FRANK KENNEDY,

ATTORNEY AT LAW, 604 MERRITT STREET, Room 15. Probate divorce, bankruptcy, and all other cases attended to.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District, of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

MARY E. HENRY, plaintiff, vs. JAMES J. HENRY, defendant.—An action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to JAMES J. HENRY, defendant:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District, of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons;—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days; otherwise within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony existing between plaintiff and defendant (as will appear more fully by reference to the complaint on file herein, to which your attention is hereby directed), and for general relief and costs of suit.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this Third day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight.

(SEAL OF COURT.) THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.

By W. STEVENSON, Deputy Clerk.

T. J. CROWLEY, Attorney for Plaintiff,

No. 525 Kearny Street.

OFFICE OF THE SIERRA NEVADA

Silver Mining Company, San Francisco, October 20, 1878.—In accordance with a resolution adopted at a meeting of the Trustees of the Sierra Nevada Silver Mining Company, held this day, a special meeting of the stockholders of said Company is hereby called, the same to be held at the office of the Company, Room 47, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California, on MONDAY, the fourth (4th) day of November, 1878, at two (2) o'clock P. M., to take into consideration and decide upon the proposition to increase the capital stock of said Company from ten million ($10,000,000) dollars, divided into one hundred thousand (100,000) shares of the par value of one hundred ($100) dollars each, the present capital stock, to fifty million ($50,000,000) dollars, divided into five hundred thousand (500,000) shares of the par value of one hundred ($100) dollars each.

JOHN SKEE, JOHN H. FISH, JOS. CLARK, A. E. HEAD, R. N. GRAVES, Trustees.

W. W. STETSON, Secretary.

W. W. STETSON, Secretary.

W. W. STETSON, Secretary.

W. W. STETSON, Secretary.

W. W. STETSON, Secretary.

W. W. STETSON, Secretary.

W. W. STETSON, Secretary.

W. W. STETSON, Secretary.

W. W. STETSON, Secretary.

W. W. STETSON, Secretary.

W. W. STETSON, Secretary.

W. W. STETSON, Secretary.

W. W. STETSON, Secretary.

W. W. STETSON, Secretary.

W. W. STETSON, Secretary.

W. W. STETSON, Secretary.

W. W. STETSON, Secretary.

W. W. STETSON, Secretary.

W. W. STETSON, Secretary.

W. W. STETSON, Secretary.

W. W. STETSON, Secretary.

W. W. STETSON, Secretary.

W. W. STETSON, Secretary.

W. W. STETSON, Secretary.

W. W. STETSON, Secretary.

W. W. STETSON, Secretary.

W. W. STETSON, Secretary.

W. W. STETSON, Secretary.

W. W. STETSON, Secretary.

W. W. STETSON, Secretary.

W. W. STETSON, Secretary.

W. W. STETSON, Secretary.

W. W. STETSON, Secretary.

W. W. STETSON, Secretary.

W. W. STETSON, Secretary.

W. W. STETSON, Secretary.

W. W. STETSON, Secretary.

CALIFORNIA FARMERS' MUTUAL

Fire Insurance Company

[ESTABLISHED IN 1874.]

Paid up Capital .....$200,000
Assets exceed..... 326,000

PRINCIPAL OFFICE, 209 SANSOME ST.
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

THOS. FLINT, President. J. W. FOARD, Manager.
FERD. K. RULE .....Secretary.
I. G. GARDNER.....General Agent.

COMMERCIAL

INSURANCE COMPANY OF CALA,

FIRE AND MARINE.
Principal office, 475 California Street, San Francisco.

JOHN H. WISE, President.

CHAS. A. LATON, Secretary.

THE STATE INVESTMENT

INSURANCE COMPANY, FIRE AND MARINE
CASH ASSETS.....$450,000

Principal Office, 218 and 220 Sansome Street, San Francisco

OFFICERS:
A. J. BRYANT, President,
RICHARD IVERS, Vice-President,
CHAS. H. CUSHING, Secretary,
H. H. WATSON, Marine Survevo

SILVER HILL MINING COMPANY.

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Gold Hill, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the thirtieth (30th) day of September, 1878, an assessment (No. 4) of fifty (50) cents per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the company, Room 8, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the first day of November, 1878, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction; and unless payment is made before will be sold on MONDAY, the twenty-fifth day of November, 1878, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

W. E. DEAN, Secretary.
Office—Room 8, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

CROWN POINT GOLD AND SILVER

Mining Company.—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Gold Hill, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the 13th day of September, 1878, an assessment (No. 3) of one dollar per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the company, Room 10, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the twenty-third (23d) day of October, 1878, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before will be sold on WEDNESDAY, the thirtieth day of November, 1878, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

JAMES NEWLANDS, Secretary.
Office, Room 10, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—THE STATE

INVESTMENT AND INSURANCE COMPANY.—Dividend No. 65.—The monthly dividend for September will be paid on October 10th, at their office, Nos. 218 and 220 Sansome Street.

CHS. H. CUSHING, Secretary.
San Francisco, October 5, 1878.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—OFFICE OF

the Standard Gold Mining Company, San Francisco, Cal., Oct. 7, 1878.—At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above named company, held this day, Dividend No. 1 of one dollar per share was declared, payable on Saturday, October 12, 1878. Transfer books closed on Wednesday, October 9, 1878, at 2 o'clock P. M.

WM. WILLIS, Secretary.
Office, Room 29, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, third floor, San Francisco, Cal.

OFFICE OF THE BODIE GOLD

Mining Company, Room 3, San Francisco Stock Exchange Building, No. 327 Pine Street, San Francisco, Cal., October 9, 1878.—At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above named company, held this day, a regular dividend (No. 3) of two dollars ($2) per share was declared, payable on Monday, October 14, 1878.

WM. H. LINT, Secretary.
Office, Room 29, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, third floor, San Francisco, Cal.

OFFICE OF THE EUREKA CON-

solidated Mining Company, Nevada Block, Room 37, San Francisco, October 5th, 1878.—The annual meeting of the stockholders of the above named company will be held at the office of the company, Room 37, Nevada Block, San Francisco, on MONDAY, the twenty-first day of October, 1878, at 2 o'clock P. M. of said day, for the election of Trustees to serve for the ensuing year, and for the transaction of such other business as may be presented. Transfer books closed Tuesday, October 15th, at 3 P. M.

W. W. TRAYLOR, Secretary.

BELCHER SILVER MINING CO.

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Gold Hill, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Trustees, held on the eighth day of October, 1878, an assessment (No. 15) of one ($1) dollar per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the company, Room 12, Cosmopolitan Hotel Building, 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall

PACIFIC MAIL STEAMSHIP CO.

First-class steamers with unequalled accommodations for passengers will leave San Francisco:

FOR YOKOHAMA AND HONGKONG.
On the 1st of every month.

FOR SYDNEY AND AUCKLAND, via HONOLULU,
September 2d, and every fourth week thereafter.

FOR NEW YORK, via PANAMA, CENTRAL AMERICAN, MEXICAN, and SOUTH AMERICAN PORTS, HAVANA, and all WEST INDIA PORTS, on the 5th and 19th of each month.

FOR HONOLULU,
April 27th, and every four weeks thereafter.

FOR VICTORIA, B. C., PUGET SOUND PORTS, and PORTLAND, Oregon, on the 10th, 20th, and 30th of each month.

WILLIAMS, BLANCHARD & CO., Agents,
Corner First and Brannan Streets.

MUSIC BOXES

OF ALL DESCRIPTIONS AND OF

Standard Reputation, playing from one to over one hundred airs. The largest and best assortment in this city. MUSICAL BOXES WITH CHANGEABLE CYLINDERS always on hand. New and interesting styles constantly received. Call and examine our stock.

REPAIRING OF MUSICAL BOXES thoroughly done in all their particularities.

M. J. PAILLARD & CO.,

MANUFACTURERS AND IMPORTERS,

120 Sutter Street, San Francisco.

Branch of House, 680 Broadway, New York.

ALASKA
COMMERCIAL CO.

No. 310 SANSOME STREET,

WHOLESALE DEALER IN FURS.

RE-OPENED.
HAYWARD WAREHOUSES

Are now receiving

GRAIN ON STORAGE.

THE PATRONAGE OF FARMERS

and others is respectfully solicited. Storage, one dollar per ton for the season. Advances and Insurance effected at the lowest rates.

Refer by permission to Chas. Webb Howard, President Spring Valley Company, Bray Bros., M. Waterman & Co., San Francisco; John Zeile, Hayward's; J. West Martin, President Union Savings Bank, Oakland.

R. H. BENNETT, Proprietor.

J. C. MERRILL & CO.
SHIPPING

—AND—

COMMISSION MERCHANTS,

Agents for the

SANDWICH ISLANDS AND OREGON PACKET LINES.

204 AND 206 CALIFORNIA ST., San Francisco.

MOODY'S
Drug and Prescription
STORE,

Northwest corner Polk and Pine Streets.

Prescriptions prepared with care from the purest of Drugs and Chemicals.

NEWTON BODDY, C. T. WHEELER, Sacramento,
J. T. GLOVER, W. W. DODGE, San Francisco

W. W. DODGE & CO.,

WHOLESALE GROCERS,

Northwest corner Clay and Front Streets, San Francisco.

T. J. PETTIT & CO.'S

LABEL, SHOW CARD,
ENGRAVING AND PRINTING
ESTABLISHMENT,

528 CALIFORNIA STREET, SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

SAFES AND SCALES.

FOR SALE BY

JOHN MOLLOY, 54 CLAY STREET.

COMMENCING SUNDAY, JULY 14, 1878. Passenger trains will leave San Francisco from the Depot on Townsend Street, between Third and Fourth, as follows:

8.30 A. M. DAILY for San Jose, Gilroy, Hollister, Tres Pinos, Pajaro, Salinas, Soledad, and all Way Stations. At Pajaro, the Santa Cruz R. R. connects with this train for Aptos and Santa Cruz. At Salinas the M. & S. V. R. R. connects with this train for Monterey. At Soledad connections made with this train. PARLOR CAR attached to this train.

10.40 A. M. DAILY for San Jose and Way Stations.

3.30 P. M. DAILY (Sundays excepted) for Gilroy, Pajaro, Hollister, Tres Pinos, and Way Stations. At Soledad connection made with this train at SANTA CLARA for Pacific Congress Springs.

4.40 P. M. DAILY for San Jose and Way Stations.

6.30 P. M. DAILY for Menlo Park and Way Stations.

SUNDAYS AN EXTRA TRAIN will leave for San Jose and Way Stations at 9.30 A. M. Returning, will leave San Jose at 6.00 P. M.

EXCURSION TICKETS to San Jose and other points and return sold on Saturdays and Sunday mornings. Good for return until following Monday, inclusive. Also, Excursion Tickets to Monterey—good from Saturday until following Monday, inclusive.

A. C. BASSETT, Superintendent. H. R. JUDAH, Asst. Pass. & Tkt. Agt.

SOUTHERN DIVISIONS.

Passengers for points on the Southern Divisions of the road will take the cars of the Central Pacific Railroad via OAKLAND, leaving SAN FRANCISCO via Ferry Landing, Market Street, at 4.00 P. M. daily, and making close connection at GOSHEN for Sumner, Mohave, LOS ANGELES, Wilmington, Anaheim, Colton, Colorado River, and YUMA.

SAN FRANCISCO AND NORTH PACIFIC R. R.

Commencing Monday, October 27th, 1878, and until further notice, Boats and Trains will leave San Francisco: (Ticket Office, Washington Street Wharf.)

3.30 P. M., DAILY, Sundays excepted, Steamer "James M. Donahue" (Washington Street Wharf), connecting with Mail and Express Train at Donahue for Petaluma, Santa Rosa, Healdsburg, Cloverdale, and way stations. Making stage connection at Lakeville for Sonoma; at Geyserville for Skaggs' Springs, at Cloverdale for Ukiah, Lakeport, Mendocino City, and the GEYSERS.

Connections made at Fulton on the following morning with Fulton and Guerneville R. R. for Korb's, Guerneville, and the Redwoods. (Arrive at San Francisco 10.35 A. M.)

8.00 A. M., Sundays only, Excursions, Steamer "James M. Donahue," connecting at Donahue with trains for Cloverdale and way stations. RETURNING—Trains will leave Donahue at 4.40 P. M., and arrive at San Francisco at 6.35 P. M.

Freight received from 7 A. M. to 2.30 P. M. daily (except Sunday).

TICKET OFFICE, WASHINGTON STREET WHARF. ARTHUR HUGHES, Gen. Manager. A. A. BEAN, Sup't. P. E. DOUGHERTY, Gen. Pass. and Tkt. Agent.

S. P. C. R. R.—(NARROW GAUGE).

NEW ROUTE TO ALAMEDA, SAN JOSE AND SANTA CRUZ.

SUMMER ARRANGEMENT, 1878.

Commencing Saturday, June 1, 1878, and until further notice, trains and boats will leave San Francisco, at the new Ferry Landing, Market St.:

5.00 A. M., via Alameda Ferry, daily, for Alameda, West San Leandro, West San Lorenzo, Mount Eden, Alvarado, Hall's, Newark, Mowry's, Alviso, Agnew's, Santa Clara, San Jose, Lovelady's, Los Gatos, and Alma.

9.20 A. M., via Alameda Ferry, daily, for Alameda, Newark, Alviso, Santa Clara, San Jose, Los Gatos, Alma, and all way stations, connecting at Los Gatos with Colgrove's stages for Oil Wells, Patchen, Mountain Charley's, Martin's Ranch, Scott's Valley, and SANTA CRUZ; or via Wright's Summit, Hotel de Redwood, Comstock's Mill, Mason's Grove, Sequel, to SANTA CRUZ. Also, connecting at Los Gatos with Blahon's stages for Saratoga and CONGRESS SPRINGS. (Dinner at Los Gatos.)

4.20 P. M., via Alameda Ferry, daily, for Alameda, Newark, Santa Clara, San Jose, Alma, and all way stations.

On Saturdays only stages will connect with the 4.20 P. M. train at Los Gatos for Santa Cruz and Saratoga. Returning, leave Santa Cruz at 4 A. M. Monday (breakfast at Los Gatos), arriving in San Francisco at 10.15 A. M.

FERRIES AND LOCAL TRAINS

Will run as follows:

LEAVE SAN FRANCISCO DAILY.

A. M.	A. M.	A. M.	A. M.	P. M.	P. M.
5.00	6.40	9.20	10.30	4.20	6.20

LEAVE HIGH STREET (ALAMEDA) DAILY.

A. M.	A. M.	A. M.	P. M.	P. M.	P. M.
5.40	7.30	9.26	3.00	4.26	7.00

* Sundays only.

THOS. CARTER, Superintendent. GEO. H. WAGGONER, Gen. Pass. Agent.

OCCIDENTAL AND ORIENTAL STEAMSHIP COMPANY

—FOR—

JAPAN AND CHINA,
Leave Wharf, Cor. First and Brannan Streets, at noon, for YOKOHAMA AND HONGKONG.

Connecting at Yokohama with steamers for Shanghai,

GAELIC, OCEANIC, BELGIC.

November.....16 December.....17 October.....24

February.....18 March.....15 January.....16

May.....16 April.....16

Cabin plans on exhibition and Passenger Tickets for sale at No. 2 Montgomery Street.

For freight apply at the Pacific Mail Steamship Company's Wharf.

T. H. GOODMAN, Gen'l Passenger Agent. DAVID D. COLTON, President.

C. P. R. R.

COMMENCING MONDAY, OCTOBER

7, 1878, and until further notice, TRAINS AND BOATS

WILL LEAVE SAN FRANCISCO:

OVERLAND TICKET OFFICE AT FERRY LANDING, MARKET STREET.

7.00 A. M., DAILY, VALLEJO Steamer from Market Street Landing, connecting with the trains for Napa (Stages for Sonoma), Calistoga (The Geysers), and Sacramento. Connecting at Davis (Sundays excepted) for Woodland and Knight's Landing, and at Woodland for Williams and Willows.

[Arrive San Francisco 8.10 P. M.]

7.00 A. M., DAILY, LOCAL PASSENGER Train (via Oakland Ferry), arriving at San Jose at 9.45 A. M. Connecting at Niles with train via Livermore, arriving at Tracy at 11.30 A. M., and connecting with Atlantic Express. [Arrive San Francisco 6.05 P. M.]

8.00 A. M., DAILY, ATLANTIC Express Train (via Oakland Ferry, Northern Ry., and S. P. & T. R. R.) for Sacramento, Marysville, Redding (Portland, Or.), Colfax, Reno (Virginia City), Fallsade (Eureka), Ogden, and Omaha. Connects at Galt with train arriving at Lone at 3.40 P. M.

[Arrive San Francisco 5.15 P. M.]

SUNDAY EXCURSION TICKETS TO SAN PABLO AND MARTINEZ AT REDUCED RATES.

10.00 A. M., DAILY, (VIA OAKLAND FERRY), Local Passenger Train to Haywards and Niles. [Arrive San Francisco 6.05 P. M.]

3.00 P. M., DAILY, SAN JOSE Passenger Train (via Oakland Ferry and Niles), stopping at all way stations. Arrive at San Jose at 5.20 P. M. [Arrive San Francisco at 9.35 A. M.]

3.00 P. M., DAILY, NORTHERN Railway Passenger Train (via Oakland Ferry) to San Pablo, Martinez, and Antioch. [Arrive San Francisco 9.35 A. M.]

4.00 P. M., DAILY, SOUTHERN Express Train (via Oakland Ferry, Northern Ry., and S. P. & T. R. R.), for Lathrop (and Stockton), Merced, Madera, Visalia, Sumner, Mojave, Newhall (San Buenaventura and Santa Barbara), Los Angeles, Santa Monica, Wilmington, Santa Ana (San Diego), Colton, and Yuma (Arizona Stages and Colorado River Steamers). Sleeping cars between Oakland, Los Angeles, and Yuma. [Arrive San Francisco at 10.35 P. M.]

4.00 P. M., SUNDAYS EXCEPTED, Vallejo Steamer (from Market Street Landing), connecting with trains for Calistoga (The Geysers), Woodland, Knight's Landing, and Sacramento, and at Sacramento with passenger train, leaving at 9.35 P. M., for Truckee, Reno, Carson, and Virginia. Sleeping cars between Vallejo and Carson. [Arrive San Francisco 11.10 A. M.]

4.00 P. M., SUNDAYS EXCEPTED, Sacramento Steamer (from Washington Street Wharf) for Benicia and Landings on the Sacramento River. [Arrive San Francisco 8.00 P. M.]

4.30 P. M., DAILY, THROUGH Third Class and Accommodation Train, via Oakland Ferry, Northern Ry., and S. P. & T. R. R.), connecting at Lathrop with train arriving at Los Angeles on second day at 11.55 A. M. [Arrive San Francisco 7.30 A. M.]

4.30 P. M., DAILY, LOCAL PASSENGER (via Oakland Ferry) to Haywards, Niles, and Livermore. [Arrive San Francisco 8.35 P. M.]

5.00 P. M., DAILY, OVERLAND Emigrant Train (via Oakland Ferry and Northern Railway) to Ogden, Omaha, and East.

Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Melrose."

THE NEVADA BANK OF SAN FRANCISCO

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA.

Paid up Capital.....$10,000,000 Gold

Reserve (U. S. Bonds).....3,500,000 "

DIRECTORS:

LOUIS McLANE, President. J. C. FLOOD, Vice-President.
JOHN W. MACKAY, J. L. FLOOD, JAMES G. FAIR.

Cashier.....H. W. GLENNY.

Agent at Virginia, Nev.....GEO. A. KING

Agents at New York, (C. T. CHRISTENSEN,
(62 Wall Street.) GEO. L. BRANDER.

Issues Commercial and Travelers' Credits, available in any part of the world. Makes Transfers by Telegraph and Cable, and draws Exchange at customary usances. This Bank has special facilities for dealing in bullion.

EXCHANGE

On the principal Cities throughout the United States, Europe, Japan, China, and the East Indies, the Australian Colonies, and New Zealand, and on Honolulu, Hawaii.

NEW YORK BANKERS.....The Bank of New York, N. B. A.
Amer. Exchange Nat. Bank.
LONDON BANKERS.....Messrs. Smith, Payne & Smiths.
The Union Bank of London.

THE ANGLO-CALIFORNIAN BANK
(Limited.)

No. 422 CALIFORNIA STREET, SAN FRANCISCO.

London Office.....3 Angel Court
New York Agents.....J. & W. Seligman & Co

Authorized Capital Stock.....$6,000,000
Surplus Earnings.....150,000

Will receive Deposits, open Accounts, make Collections, buy and sell Exchange and Bullion, loan Money, and issue Letters of Credit available throughout the world.

FRED' F. LOW, } Managers.
IGN. STEINHART, }

P. N. LILIENTHAL, Cashier.

THE BANK OF CALIFORNIA,

SAN FRANCISCO

Capital.....$5,000,000

D. O. MILLS.....President.

WILLIAM ALVORD.....Vice-President.

THOMAS BROWN.....Cashier.

AGENTS—New York: Agency of the Bank of California; Boston, Tremont National Bank; Chicago, Union National Bank; St. Louis, Boatmen's Savings Bank; New Zealand, the Bank of New Zealand; London, China, Japan India, and Australia, the Oriental Bank Corporation.

The Bank has Agencies at Virginia City and Gold Hill, and Correspondents in all the principal mining districts and interior towns of the Pacific Coast.

Letters of Credit issued available in all parts of the world. Draw direct on London, Dublin, Paris, Berlin, Bremen, Hamburg, Frankfurt-on-Main, Antwerp, Amsterdam, St. Petersburg, Copenhagen, Stockholm, Christiania, Locarno, Melbourne, Sydney, Auckland, Hongkong, Shanghai, Yokohama.

HIBERNIA SAVINGS AND LOAN SOCIETY.

President.....M. D. SWEENEY.

Vice-President.....C. D. O'SULLIVAN.

TRUSTEES.

M. D. Sweeney, M. J. O'Connor,
C. D. O'Sullivan, P. McArar,
John Sullivan, Gust. Touchard,
R. J. Tobin, Peter Donahue,
Joseph A. Donahue.

Treasurer.....EDWARD MARTIN

Attorney.....RICHARD TOBIN.

Office, Northeast corner of Market and Montgomery Streets

REMITTANCES FROM THE INTERIOR.

Remittances from the country may be sent through Wells, Fargo & Co.'s Express Office or any reliable banking house, but the Society will not be responsible for their safe delivery. The signature of the depositor should accompany his first deposit.

CHICKERING

PIANO WAREROOMS,

31 POST ST., Mechanics' Institute Building.

ELLEGANT PIANOS.

L. K. HAMMER,

Sole Agent for Pacific Coast.

25 Owners of Chickering Pianos are specially requested to leave orders for tuning at warehouses, 31 Post Street.

MUSIC

KNABE PIANOS,
IRVING PIANOS, ROGERS' UPRIGHT PIANOS,
Prince Organs, Waters' Organs, Sheet Music.

BANCROFT, KNIGHT & Co.,
733 MARKET STREET.

A WORLD'S TRIUMPH.

THE CURRENT OF

TRADE REVERSED.

TO EUROPE.

STEINWAY & SONS
ORDERS FROM EUROPE

have increased to an extent, necessitating the establishment of Warehouses in London, England, and connected with it is a Concert Hall, the whole combined making the most elegant Piano Warehouses in Europe, and stands there as a monument of American genius and industry.

It is impossible to mention in the limited space of an advertisement the innumerable triumphs of this energetic firm. They stand foremost as inventors in Piano building in America, and in that respect, no small compliment to their inventions is the undeniable endorsement of all their competitors, as shown in their imitative efforts. Certain principles of the Steinways are however so completely protected, that no imitation or substitute is attempted at all, and the shallow method of crying such inventions down are resorted to and relied upon.

The Steinways designed and perfected the Overstrung and Iron Frame systems. The application of the Agraffe Arrangements to Square and Upright Pianos. The Patent Duplex Scale creating the most beautiful treble tones, (the Duplex Scale is of recent invention and only to be found in Pianos sold recently). The Improved Double Damper. The Prior ideas extending the Agraffe to every string in the Piano. The highest finish to all parts of the instrument, including first qualities of ivory, ebony, felt, cloth, etc. The wood work and varnish of such first-class character, that the employment of large capital can never equal the results.

The name of Steinway has become a "household word" in American homes, and the satisfactory record of 18 years trial on the Pacific Coast, in itself assures the purchaser that the investment is no speculation, but one of perfect security.

The oft-repeated story of rival makers claiming to have been Steinways' forerunners, etc., should have no weight with purchasers. An immense manufacturing business like the Steinways is divided into departments for the various classes of work, and a foreman of one department superintends that alone, and cannot be perfect in other details.

The Steinways (a numerous family) are the inventors and designers of the principles of their Pianos, and are alone responsible for the thorough execution of their own ideas.

In the Machinery Department at the late Centennial Exhibition Steinways were awarded a special medal for an invention for testing their iron frames under a pressure of 5,000 lbs. to the square centimetre. (This award was distinct from their medal for the best Pianos exhibited). The iron frames in Steinway Pianos are the only ones so tested, and while other makers rely on castings from an ordinary foundry, the Steinways maintain their own foundry, and manufacture a frame of composite metal, which adds greatly to the resonant qualities of the instrument in general.

It frequently occurs that the attempt is made to raise the character of Pianos constructed on less costly principles to the rank that the Steinway maintains, by naming a price, the same or nearly so. This method is frequently exposed by the perfect willingness of the dealer to make astonishing discounts for cash or extremely long credits; system not entertained in any first-class business. In a Steinway Piano, a guarantee of worth is given protecting the purchaser for 5 years, and a catalogue issued by the Pacific Coast Agencies have an uniform rate of prices in gold, and where desired a liberal installment plan is offered to responsible buyers. It is an additional chance of simple interest in deferred payments. Catalogues mailed on application to

M. GRAY, General Agent,
105 Kearny Street, S. F.

WILL REMOVE ABOUT 1.15 TO

117 POST STREET.

PACIFIC BUSINESS COLLEGE.

THE CAL. FURNITURE M'FG CO.

HAVE FIVE TIMES AS MUCH

FURNITURE

As any other house on this Coast, which has been purchased so low that we CAN and WILL sell at such prices that the poor can gratify their WISHES and the rich their TASTE. At the old stand,

NOS. 224 AND 226 BUSH STREET, S. F.

REMOVAL.

I. W. TABER

The leading Photographer of this city, has just occupied his new and handsome parlors over the HIBERNIA BANK, CORNER MARKET AND MONTGOMERY STREETS. Entrance on Montgomery Street. Elevator connected with building.

Easy of access. The handsomest Photograph Rooms in the city. Give him a call.

HERRMANN'S

FALL STYLES

ARE NOW OUT AT

336 KEARNY STREET, BETWEEN BUSH AND PINE,
& 910 MARKET STREET, ABOVE STOCKTON.

SEND FOR ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE.

MISS K. McCARRICK, MILLINERY PARLORS

135 KEARNY STREET, NEAR SUTTER, UP STAIRS.

The finest assortment of French Millinery Goods in the city always on hand.

PIANOS

SCHOMACKER AND HENRY F. MILLER CELEBRATED PIANOS.

Pianos Tuned, Reputed, and for Sale on the Installment Plan.

WOODWORTH, SCHELL & Co.
12 Post Street San Francisco.

RUPTURE.

BUY NO TRUSS.

Call on Dr. F. W. New Illustrated Truss. Patent Truss. MAGNETIC ELASTIC TRUSS. 100, 505 Sacramento Street, San Francisco.

H. P. WAKELEE & CO.,
Wholesale and Retail

Druggists, Importers of Foreign and Domestic Drugs, Chemicals, and Perfumery,

No. 149 Montgomery Street, under the Occidental Hotel, San Francisco.

PARTICULAR ATTENTION PAID to compounding Physician's Prescriptions, the dispensing of which is entrusted only to the most competent hands, while every care is taken to ensure the purity of all preparations.

MULLER'S OPTOMETER!

The only reliable instrument for Testing Defective Vision.

135 MONTGOMERY ST.,
Near Bush, opposite the Occidental Hotel.

THE PACIFIC LAND AND TRUST CO.
RENT HOUSES,
COLLECT RENTS, MANAGE ESTATES

HOUSES AND LOTS FOR SALE in this city, Oakland, and Alameda. Lands and Ranches for sale in all parts of the country. Agents in the principal cities. Collections made throughout the coast.

No. 534 CALIFORNIA STREET.

THOMAS BOYSON, M. D.
(University of Copenhagen, Denmark).

PHYSICIAN AND SURGEON. Office and Residence, 112 Kearny Street. Office hours, 11 A. M. to 1 P. M., 5 to 8 P. M. Sunday 11 to 4 only. Telephone in the office.

MORRIS, SCHWAB & CO.
FINE-ART DEALERS.
FREE ART GALLERY.

A complete assortment of ARTISTS' MATERIAL, GOLD FRAMES, etc.

19 AND 21 POST STREET.

WAREHOUSES, N. W. CORNER KEARNY AND SUTTER STREETS.

SHERMAN, HYDE & CO.

SHEET MUSIC,
MUSIC BOOKS,
MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

SEWING MACHINE,

The only really light-running lock-stitch Sewing Machine in the market.

"DOMESTIC" PAPER FASHIONS

Elegant, stylish, and reliable.

J. W. EVANS, 20 Post Street, San Francisco.

STOVES

FOR PARLORS, OFFICES, HALLS BED-ROOMS, CHURCHES, STORES, ETC., ETC.

THE LARGEST STOCK AND greatest on the Pacific Coast.

500

DIFFERENT SIZES, STYLES, AND PATTERNS to select from.

W. W. MONTAGUE & CO.

NOS. 110, 112, 114, 116, & 120 BATTERY ST.

ROSS'

MILLINERY EMPORIUM,
UNDER THE BALDWIN.

PIANOS

NO. 12 TYLER STREET, S. F.

HOME IN THE COUNTRY.

NOOK FARM.

FAMILIES WISHING TO SPEND

the Summer in the country will find this a cheerful home, and beautiful scenery of such endless variety as tempt to healthful exercise and recreation. We furnish good accommodations and an excellent table. Good fishing and hunting on the premises. Four trains from San Francisco pass the station daily. Address

E. B. SMITH,
Rutherford, Napa County, Cal.

BUY YOUR SHIRTS AT BEAMISH'S

The Argonaut.

VOL. III. NO. 16.

SAN FRANCISCO, OCTOBER 26, 1878.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

MONTEREY, October 15, 1878.—So I promised to tell you more of this dream city by the sea, and you hold me to a strict fulfillment of the promise.

Well, you shall have the romantic history of the place, interwoven as it is with strange traditions of Church and State, of the doings of the old Padres, and the subsequent sequence of Alcaldes; of its discovery by tawny Mexico, instigated by sunny, sumptuous Spain. It was in the spring of the year 1602—mark you well the early date—that the Viceroy of Mexico, acting under instructions from Philip III. of Spain, dispatched Don Sebastian Viscaino, with three small vessels, to discover, explore, and bring into the kingdom, the then unknown and almost mythical California. Slowly, storm-driven, tempest-tossed, and fretted by head winds, this little fleet crept up the coast.

Lower California beld the voyagers' attention for months and months, and then on the 10th of November they sailed—oh! so thankfully—into the land-locked harbor of San Diego to prostrate themselves and pray. Here they lingered ten days, thanking God and proselyting Indians. Then they encamped on Santa Catalina Island, opposite where Santa Barbara now stands, and said their mass, and on the 10th day of December of the same year they rounded the Point of Pines, where the resinous needles actually prick the bosom of the salted waters, and cast their curious anchors in the blue, the beautiful, the breezy bay beyond.

Viscaino was the first man to place foot on the snowy sands of the crescent beach, where he, like the historic Columbus, took possession of the country in the name of God and the King of Spain, and then kneeling, the holy sacrament was partaken of under the wide spreading branches of an oak tree, at the mouth of a small ravine (see sketch above), and the spot was named Monterey, in honor of Gaspar de Luna, Count de Monterey, Viceroy of Mexico, by virtue of whose pocketbook the expedition had been fitted out. As Viscaino was unprepared to establish a mission he remained but eighteen days, and then continued on his voyage, taking a full description of the country, however, which he represented as being "clad in the deepest verdure, the soil most productive, the natives docile and easily brought to the bosom of the Church." He hoped to return for the founding of a mission, but his hope was never realized. After this first intrusion, over 166 years elapsed before civilization again looked on Monterey. On July 14, 1769, Gaspar de Portala, Governor of Lower California, at the head of an expedition of sixty-five persons, set out from San Diego to rediscover the place. He arrived at Monterey, but failing to identify it he erected the customary cross and kept on toward the north. The third attempt to settle Monterey was a success, and the following extract from a letter of the leader of the expedition tells, in language as simple and sweet as any I have at command, of the ceremonies attending the formal founding of the Mission of San Carlos de Monterey, by Padre Junipero Serra, on the 3d of June, 1770, years before we were in existence as a nation: "On the 31st of May, 1770, by favor of God, and after a painful voyage of a month and a half, the packet San Antonio, commanded by Don Juan Perez, arrived and anchored in this beautiful port of Monterey, which is unadulterated in any degree from what it was when visited by the expedition of Don Sebastian Viscaino, in 1602. It gave me great consolation to find that the land expedition had arrived eight days before us, and that Father Crespi and all others were in good health. On the 3d of June, being the holy day of Pentecost, the whole of the officers of sea and land, and all the people, assembled on a bank at the foot of an oak, where we caused an altar to be erected and the bells rung; we then chanted the Veni Creator, blessed the water, erected and blessed a grand cross, hoisted the royal standard, and chanted the first mass that was ever performed at this place; we afterward sung the Salve to Our Lady before an image of the illustrious Virgin, which occupied the altar; and at the same time preached a sermon, concluding the whole with a Te Deum. After this the officers took possession of the country in the name of the King (Charles III.), our Lord, whom God preserve. We then all dined together in a shady place on the beach; the whole ceremony being accompanied by many volleys and salutes by the troops and vessels." The San Antonio soon sailed for Mexico, leaving behind Father Junipero, five priests, Lieutenant Pedro Fages, and thirty soldiers. The Indians, as Viscaino had predicted, were ready converts, and "seated under those dark Monterey pines, told weird and ghostly stories of how brightly the crosses shone that each white man wore on his breast the first time they had passed through there, not knowing the place; and of the great cross that Portala planted before he knew he was at the spot he coveted; how it would grow at night till its point reached the stars, glistening the while with a splendor that outshone the sun; that when their superstitious dread wore off they had approached it, planted arrows and feathers in the earth around it, and hung strings of sardines as their choicest offering upon its outstretched arms." The Mission having finally been established, Monterey was at once selected as the capital of Alta California, and Portala appointed the first Governor. Owing to the small amount of arable land within the semi-circle of hills surrounding Monterey proper, the Mission was soon removed to the neighboring valley of Carmello, where the ruins stand even to this modern day. Last week I visited the quaint old place; and I went alone, death; I, because I was astride of his Mexican back, and full—of sentiment and surprise. Hang this picture in your mind's eye, and never turn it to memory's wall; look upon the original, if an opportunity ever presents itself: A canvas as broad as your vision; in the immediate foreground a sweeping semi-circle of hills, on the crest of which you stand; at your feet, the adobe town—quaint, curious, crooked, cracked; a lagoon, lobed like a lily leaf; the peninsula being the graveyard—a park of live oak hung with mourning streamers of lonesome-looking Spanish moss; between the trees the graves fenced about, and tombstones lazily leaning in the long, lifeless grass; beyond the lagoon and graveyard a monster embankment of sand, piled high and hot, by that California anomaly—a northern simoon; to the left, the cove of the town, the wharves, the fleet of Italian fishing boats with the Neapolitan style of sail, the expanse of bay with whaling boats far, far out, heeling over to the breeze with the black painted sky-sail—their distinguishing mark; in the middle foreground, a snowy sweep of beach, a parabola of spray, and creamy masses of palpitating foam, finally blotted out by mere distance in the direction of Santa Cruz; to the right of the beach, the broad, fruitful Salinas Valley, with Fremont Peak and the Gabilan range beyond for a background. And this but half the picture. Turning to the left, and jumping with the eye the pine-feathered crest, a vista view of the ocean and its waves caressing the shore in the vicinity of Portuguese Bay—Cypress Point, and the lighthouse, and picturesque Chinatown, nestled in the rocks behind the wooded gloom; still further to the left the Carmel Valley, like a magnificent and graceful fold in a heavy velvet dress, tapering out into the atmosphere of the bronzed and rough-ribbed hills, with a delicate green stripe running through the centre where the willows fringe the stream. Such a pretty pocket in the garment of nature. I rouse the mustang by an excited jab of the spur in his leather belly, and we are off on a lope for more of the view. Down a slope, up another, around a point; more of the sea; Point Lobos, with a halo of spray, to the right; more of Carmel Valley to the left; another turn and behold the old Mission—snuff-colored and streaked, as rusty-looking as an old nail. Te Deum de dum patter the feet of the mustang down the hill, and into the religious little valley. One more turn to the right, a swift dash through a few acres of willows, and we are in the lane leading to the old ruin. A thousand ground squirrels hold a convention in a potato field to the left; their for I knew that silence meeting solitude would sing its praises best. The canter to the top of the ridge back of Monterey was as drowsy as the ugly little mustang I rode could make it; but when the gap in the crest was reached, and I turned in the saddle for a last look at the ancient capital, I woke to a realization of the most perfect and dreamy scene that I ever gazed upon. No wonder that Viscaino, in 1602, in glory gushed; no wonder that Portala, so many years after, came to seek the lost spot; no wonder that Padre Junipero Serra and his following of priests and soldiers, in the name of the cross and crown, preëempted the place; no wonder that we (the mustang and I) stopped short and sharp at the turn—because he was dust-covered, dry, and seemingly tired to homes are on the hot hillside to the right; the road is between; they take alarm and start for their holes, shrieking and whistling with fear; under the horse's feet, in front, behind, on either side—the road is full of them and the scamper universal. Then a gate, an adobe wall, where the mustang is hitched, and, in another moment, I stand within what was once the second Mission of California; the spot, O Junipero Serra—venerable and respected Franciscan—where, over one hundred years ago you, wandering in the wilderness preaching the "glad tidings of great joy," hung your bronze bell on yonder tree, shouted "Hear, hear, oh, ye Gentiles, come to the Holy Church!" and gathered into this adobe

RUINS OF THE OLD FORT.

THE OLD CARMEL MISSION.—SERVICE ON SAN CARLOS DAY, NOVEMBER 4, BY THE MONTEREY PADRE.

Runsien, the Eslen, the Eclemaches, and the A

And what does the modern Gentile find of the Holy Church and its magnificence? A ruin. The roof broken in, loads upon loads of tiles carried off, tall weeds growing in the auditorium, sheep and hogs in the baptistry. My God! what desolation; what desecration. I sit down on the holy water font to think the thing all over. This floor, which never was covered by carpet or pavement, is a deep burying ground. Here lies the good old Padre Serra, who labored so zealously among his native converts, and died in 1784, beloved by them all—his great and good work done. Here are buried seventeen governors of California, and a long line of Alcaldes, and unnumbered people of gentle blood and noble quality. Here they all are, but where? Not a stone, nor a sign, nor a symbol, nothing but the weed-covered, undulating earth filled with bones. Like the tomb of Moses the resting place of Junipero Serra is unknown. This mound may or may not be his grave. This depression may or may not have been made by a retired Governor or a shrunken Alcalde. What a damnable shame this neglect is; what a standing reproach to the church and the State that permits it. And as I sit and mentally curse the thousands of self-advertised fools who have written, printed, scratched, and painted their names all over the walls a thousand pictures presented themselves. I see the laying of the immense foundation stones, packed—the builders alone know how—from the quarry on the hillside a mile away; the slow construction of the massive walls; the building of the immense tower, and the fixing of the vesper bells. I recognize the beauty of architecture, the harmony of fresco painting, the graceful sweep of the stone stairways, the magnitude of the outer buildings, the energy, and skill, and perseverance required to erect so mammoth an affair—and all the work of a few priests with ignorant Indians. I can see the earthen floor covered by these kneeling converts; the robed priests holding aloft the crucifix, and the banners that caught the eye. I can almost hear the spoken words from the pulpit opening just above me, the mournful symphony of the chanted mass, and through the doors I can almost see the procession of the great festival days, when about the mission the Indians camped from far and near. Those must have been halcyon days indeed. Think that in the year 1825 Carmel owned 87,600 head of cattle, 60,000 sheep, 2,300 calves, 365 yoke of working oxen; so many horses that they were driven into the bay in droves and drowned to keep the pasturage for cattle; and $40,000 in specie when money was a drug; think of this and then of the ruin of to-day—the ground squirrel range, the tar weed lawn and general desolation. It is enough to disgust one with modern civilization. I am informed that on the 4th of November of each year the Monterey Padre holds here a religious festival in honor of San Carlos, the patron saint of Carmelo. Then the old ruins are decorated with flowers and evergreens, and there is music and a procession, and a celebration generally. But what can it be but a miserable mockery of those splendid Indian pageants when the church was in its prime, when cattle were on a thousand hills, when water was brought in ditches to quench the thirst of the parched earth, when bands of beaded Indians, as brown as the cocoa's frown, were passive under the reign of the cross, and hopeful of a savage crown in the great hereafter, of which they were told so much. It must be borne in mind that when the Mission was first removed to Carmelo the settlement and presidio, or military establishment, still remained at Monterey, and consisted of an inclosure containing a chapel, storehouses, offices, residences, and barracks for the soldiers. The present church is located on the site of the old presidio. On the little hill overlooking the bay an adobe fort was built and equipped with a few cannons. This was the beginning of the town, which grew slowly as the years drifted away. Governor succeeded Governor, each being content to render tribute to the Viceroy of Mexico, while the dominion over which he ruled maintained him in luxurious idleness—no cares of state, no troubles of legislation. And so matters droned away till the year 1822, when Mexico, becoming tired of Spanish rule, established a separate empire. Receiving intelligence of this important event, Governor Pablo Vicente de Sola summoned a council of all the principal military officials and church dignitaries at Monterey, and formally announced the action of their mother country. The council decided unanimously that thereafter California was subject to Mexico alone. The oaths were changed and de Sola became the Mexican Governor, or "Political Chief of the Territory." The apathetic inhabitants offered no resistance, and the change was effected without a struggle. In 1823 the Mexican Congress adopted a plan of colonization, which authorized the Governors of dependent territories to grant unoccupied lands to all persons who properly petitioned for them, and agreed to cultivate and reside on them a certain portion of the time. These grants were subject to the approval of the Territorial Legislature. Many of the old settlers availed themselves of the privilege thus accorded them, and obtained a title to vast ranchos, then of little value, but destined in after years to render those who were fortunate enough to hold them immensely wealthy. The harbor of Monterey was visited about this time by numerous vessels, which realized an enormous profit by trading their assorted cargoes for hides. On the 25th of September, 1834, Hajar, Director of Colonization, arrived at Monterey on the brig Natalia for the purpose of secularizing the Missions. The Natalia, which was the same vessel in which Napoleon made his memorable escape from Elba, was thrown upon the beach by a storm and totally wrecked. But the colonization scheme was successfully accomplished, and the Missions of which there were many in the neighborhood were placed under the charge of Governor Figueroa; the beginning of their swift and destructive downfall. Figueroa, who was the best ruler that California had yet seen, died in September, 1835. Then ensued a series of insurrections, terminated only by the American conquest. A misunderstanding arose between Nicholas Gutierrez, Governor after Figueroa's death, and Juan Bautista Alvarado, Secretary of Territorial Deputation, regarding Custom House discipline. Alvarado, who was a native Californian of talent and education, insisted so strongly on his rights that Gutierrez ordered his arrest. But before the warrant could be served Alvarado escaped to Santa Cruz, across the bay. Here a plan was laid to seize Monterey and declare the independence of California: One José Castro organized a company of one hundred natives, which, together with fifty riflemen led by one Graham, entered Monterey in the night, imprisoned the Governor and his soldiers in the presidio, and after firing one shot from a four-pounder, took possession of the town. Alvarado was declared Governor, and Guadalupe Vallejo placed at the head of the military. Early in 1840 Alvarado, who had become exceedingly jealous of all foreigners, especially his former friend Graham, pretended to have received information of a deep-laid plot to overturn the Government. Castro was ordered to arrest all connected with the conspiracy, and by a strategic movement succeeded in surprising and arresting nearly one hundred persons, principally Americans. Afterward, about twenty of the supposed ringleaders were transported in chains to San Blas. In July of the same year the American man-of-war St. Louis and a French ship arrived at Monterey for the purpose of demanding satisfaction. Alvarado was so badly frightened at their arrival that he fled to the interior, on a pretext of business, and did not return to the Capital until the coast was again clear. For two years every thing remained quiet. In July, 1842, the foreigners so summarily banished unexpectedly returned on board a vessel furnished them by the Mexican Government, which had not approved of Alvarado's uncalled for action. They brought the startling news that General Micheltorena had been appointed to both the civil and military command of California. He arrived at San Diego in August, and was traveling northward in grand style, when intelligence reached him that caused him to halt at Los Angeles. This was that Commander Jones, in command of the frigate United States and sloop-of-war Cyane, had taken possession of the country,

CHINATOWN AND FISHERIES.

THE OLD CHURCH IN TOWN.

He ruled until February 1, 1845, when he was ousted by Vallejo, Alvarado, and Castro, and Don Pio Pico placed in his stead. The year 1846 was a notable one in the annals of Monterey. On July 7th, of that year, Commodore Sloat, who had arrived in the United States frigate Savannah a few days previously, dispatched Captain Mervine, at the head of 250 men, on shore, with instructions to hoist the American flag over Monterey. Amid the firing of cannon from the shipping in the harbor and the cheers of the assembled citizens, the stars and stripes were raised, and a proclamation read, declaring California henceforth a portion of the United States. The people accepted the change with characteristic resignation, and Walter Colton was appointed the first Alcalde under the new régime. Colton, who had previously been Chaplain of the frigate Congress, held the office of Alcalde for three years, during which time he figured prominently in the affairs of the town. In connection with Semple, a pioneer from Kentucky, he established the first newspaper ever published in California. It was called the Californian, and made its first appearance on Saturday, August 15th, 1846. It was printed on paper originally intended for the manufacture of cigarros, and was a little larger than a sheet of common foolscap. The office was resurrected from the remains of a small concern formerly used for printing Roman Catholic tracts in Spanish. There being no W in the Spanish alphabet, they were compelled to use two V's (thus, VV) whenever a W occurred. The Californian, it is needless to say, was eagerly welcomed, and was finally merged into the Alta California when the latter paper was established at San Francisco. The first jury summoned in California was empaneled by Colton, on September 4, 1846. It was composed of one-third Mexicans, one-third Californians, and the other third Americans. To Colton also belongs the honor of having erected the building intended for a town hall and school house, which bears his name, then the finest building in the State. On the 29th of May, 1848, news of the discovery of gold on the American Fork first reached Monterey. The report was scarcely credited, yet it produced so much excitement that the Alcalde was induced to dispatch a special messenger to investigate its truth. On the 12th of June he returned, bringing specimens of gold, and a story of its lavish abundance more marvelous than an Arabian Night's tale. Then commenced the grand rush to the mines, which almost depopulated the town, and from which it has never recovered. On the 3d of June, 1849 (the seventy-ninth anniversary of the settlement of Monterey), Governor Riley issued a "proclamation recommending the formation of a State Constitution, or plan of a Territorial government." In pursuance of this proclamation the Convention for forming a State Constitution met in Colton Hall (now used as a school house) on the first of the following September. The labors of the Convention were successful beyond its most sanguine expectations. A Constitution, remarkable for the wisdom and liberality of its provisions, was adopted, and shortly afterward ratified by the people. Upon adjournment, a salute of thirty-one guns was fired proclaiming the birth in law and formality of the new State. Although the Convention accomplished such great results, it effectually blighted the prospects of Monterey by removing the State Capital to San José. To counteract this blow the town determined to become a city. By an act of the Legislature an incorporation was secured on the 30th of April, 1851, and Philip A. Roach, the last Alcalde, was elected the first Mayor. Monterey, however, did not long remain a city. The gold fever and the ingratiatingness of the Legislature had sealed the fate of the place, and on the 11th of May, 1853, the charter was amended, and the municipal control vested in a board of trustees. In 1859 the place was so much in debt that it became necessary to sell the Pueblo lands. An attempt was made during the Legislative session of 1869-70 to reincorporate; the bill passed the Assembly, but was defeated in the Senate. Another attempt was then made, but in some manner the bill again miscarried. A third effort to obtain the desired result proved somewhat more successful. In 1873-74 the "Act to Reincorporate the City of Monterey" was carried through both Houses, and reached the Governor, who, it is alleged, failed to return the bill within the specified time. Be this as it may, nothing more was heard of the bill, and Monterey still remains under the nominal control of its trustees. Simultaneously with the growth of Salinas City, which was becoming the liveliest town in the county, arose the question of county seat removal. Monterey had held this honor ever and hoisted the stars and stripes at Monterey. Alvarado surrendered on the 20th of October, and California was apparently a portion of the American Union. The next day, however, Jones discovered that he had made a blunder—that Mexico was not yet at war with the United States—and therefore he gracefully hauled down the flag and apologized. Micheltorena now came to Monterey and assumed his duties.

COLTON HALL (WHERE FIRST CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION ASSEMBLED).

BATHING BEACH, AND RAVINE WHERE THE PADRES LANDED.

THE LIGHT HOUSE AT POINT PINOS.

since the organization of the county, and the attempt of her younger rival to wrest it from her was bitterly opposed. In spite of her efforts, however, a petition signed by the requisite number of voters was presented to the Board of Supervisors, who, as in duty bound, ordered an election; this was held on the 6th of November, 1872, the day of the Presidential election. The result was a victory for Salinas City, and on the following February the county seat was removed to its present location. This was the last straw, the last struggle, the resignation of absolute despair, the seeking of solace from sorrow in the natural somnolence of her sur-

Tenderly train the roses,
Gathering here and there
A bud—the richest and rarest—
For a place in their long, dark hair.

Feeble and garrulous old men
Tell in the Spanish tongue
Of the good, grand times at the Mission,
And the hymns that the Fathers sung.

Of the oil and the wine, and the plenty,
And the dance in the twilight gray—
"Ah, these," and the head shakes sadly,
"Were good times in Monterey!"

Behind in the march of cities—
The last in the eager stride
Of villages later born—
She dreams by the ocean side.

And it is just this spirit of resignation and Rip Van Winkleism that makes the sleepy hollow of a town so charming to the Bohemian, the artist, the littérateur, the tourist of to-day. Nearly thirty years have passed and never a change since the marrow went out of its bones. There is the curatel on California Street, with a balcony running around it, built in 1840, by order of Alvarado, when lumber sold for $50 per thousand feet, and nails $36 per keg; Colton Hall, built by the first American Alcalde, a retired minister, out of the proceeds of town lots, the labor of convicts, taxes on fandangoes, and gin mills, and gambling fines; the old adobe jail, which used to be filled to the brim with Mexicans and Americanos equally and internationally—yes, gloriously full; the old block house and the fort on the hillside overlooking the bay; cannon still sticking up as posts on the street corners; the old custom house, with its tiled roof, and ballroom in the basement, where the naval officers used to trip the light fantastic; the convent, on Main Street, with its ruined walls and broken windows; California's first theatre, an adobe building, on Pacific Avenue, where the disbanded soldiers of Stevenson's New York volunteers, essayed the first minstrel show on the coast, subsequently giving a regular drama, announcing by posters printed with a blacking pot and brush: Putnam, or the Lion Son of '76 as the first piece to be played, and following it with Damon and Pythias, Box and Cox, The Golden Farmer, Grandfather Whitehead, and Nan, the Good for Nothing; the old commissariat on California Street; the old church built in 1794—first used as a chapel to Carmel, but enlarged and dedicated as the para gulp or a glance. Everything has to be discovered—for, thank God, there are no guides; no one to tell a stereotyped story with a two-bit moral. There are discomforts and some things which disgust. The water is bad, the whisky and wine worse, and fleas will move you from one room to another, especially if your hide is tough and uninteresting. But living is comparatively cheap: there is plenty of room, and you can dress as you please, and dream as long as you please, and kill all the fleas, and nibble your own peculiar cheese. This satisfies the average Bohemian, and people who don't think they can accommodate themselves to these circumstances had better stay away. For those who have learned to love the quaint old place seek it for the retirement, and the dreaminess, and the characters that civilization, and cleanliness, and city comfort would annihilate. There are those in the town who are ambitious and hopeful of a resurrection. But once let Monterey shake off its grave clothes, and the charm of its present condition will have gone. Still there will remain the same natural features, the same broad and vigorous outline drawing, made by the master hand of the Almighty—now dusty, and brown, and dry, and dreary, but gorgeously colored by nature when the dark and dripping clouds chase away in the springtime; the same fragrance of the flower season, when no miserable human imitator of an artist can approach, with palette or brush, the tints of hillside, and plain, and garden, and pasture, or figure out the patterns and the combinations of color that carpet the roundings, and admitting of an obituary in verse by our Bohemian friend, Daniel O'Connell, who writes:

STORE IN MONTEREY—BUSINESS HOUR.

ALVARADO AVENUE, THE PRINCIPAL STREET OF MONTEREY.

In a mantle of old traditions,
In the time of a vanished day,
The shrouded and silent city
Sits by her crescent bay.

The ruined fort on the hill-top,
Where never a bunting streams,
Looks down, a cannonless fortress,
On the solemn city of dreams.

Gardens of wonderful roses,
Climbing on roof, tree, and wall,
Woodbine and crimson geranium,
Hollyhocks, purple and tall,

Mingle their odorous breathings
With the crisp, salt breeze, from the sands,
Where pebbles and sounding sea shells
Are gathered by children's hands.

Women with olive faces,
And the liquid southern eye,
Dark as the forest berries
That grace the woods in July,

STROLLING THROUGH THE SAND.

ish church when the Mission was secularized and abandoned—filled with old paintings and images, and natives kneeling on its earthen floor. And so I might go on and bewilder you with history and description. I could tell you of quaint and curious relics; of romantically walled-in gardens, hard for a lover to climb, like those in Spain; of sidewalks made of the vertebrae of whales, and the mammoth bones piled high in fantastic pyramids, and covered with flowers; of the strange sights at the whaling station, but never of the sickening smell; of Chinatown and its bales of dried fish, and the junks built by the heathen themselves, and equipped with great bat winged sails; of the lighthouse at Pinos Point; of the Methodist camp meeting ground where the brethren annually shouted good Lord!—of Cypress Point, where the gnarled and knotted trunks and delirious looking branches actually reach for you, and tangle up your thoughts, and shake long, disheveled locks of fog-soaked moss, and point at you reprovingly with their twisted and devilishly suggestive fingers, and stretch on high, with almost a human moan, their deformed and distressing arms; of the bathing beaches, and the dives from the end of the wharf down into water fifty feet deep, crisp as broken glass and as cold as the glance of a mother-in-law; of the wonderful natural aquariums among the rocks, visited at low tide, and fascinating enough to keep you chained to the place till the incoming waters cut off all chance of getting back to land; of the natural caves and bridges, where the requiem of the ocean is played by the waves, and sung by mournful, sighing, sepulchral winds; of the troling trips for barracouta on the bay, perch fishing in the surf, and snipe, quail, and squirrel slaughter on the land; of plumaged sea-birds, and flashing dolphins, and shelling beaches, and sand banks you might mistake for snow. All this I might amplify, and assert, and affirm, and then you might come down here, getting sea-sick on the way; finding nothing to eat or drink; no comfortable place to sleep; no one to black your boots; a shivering fog to greet you in the early morning, an atmosphere of dreary discontent, and come to the conclusion that I was a magnificent, capable, and commodious liar. And, per se, you would be justified. There is nothing handsome nor attractive in the place at way into the little ravines, where immense clumps of ferns toss their tropically-tufted tips, and the lovingly bending branches stretch out a floral hand to "shake" a welcome; the same languid, lifeless, lazy atmosphere that holds you in its arms, and breathes gently into the lung cells, while the booming waves croon the senses to soundest, sweetest sleep; the same rest that relieves from the city's nervous, never-ending strain; the same peacefulness that realizes to one—for but a brief and fitting moment perhaps—the supreme joy that shall irradiate to the human animal, when a fuller and truer knowledge of the science of life shall have chastened and refined his morbid cravings, emancipated him from care, redeemed labor from drudgery, and capped him with the blessed crown of contentment. Forgive this gurgling gush, oh, ye practical slaves, for it grows here. Despire its philosophy as much as you please, for nobody here cares a rap if you do. Cavil till the cows come home, and then milk your miserable morbid existence dry—with all the modern conveniences. And then? Then if you have an appreciation, and a taste, and a disposition to enjoy life, in a homely, humble way, drift down here by the sleepy sea, where you will find health and a hammock, and a dreamy little heaven all your own, not eternal in the skies; not alabaster, but adobe walls; not angels' songs, but those that the sea-shells sing; not golden harps, but greasy guitars; not the cherubim and the seraphim, but the dirty "Injun" and the dusky maid—but look here, this language smacks too much of the shop, and so, shutting it off, I slide to sleep again, leaving to drone and dream for and of you all—providing is sweet and undisturbed.

OMESIA (120 YEARS OLD).

FRED.

THE FAMOUS GILSON BEQUEST.

An Artless but Systematic Narration of All the Facts.

Mr. Gilson and eternity only the decent formality of a trial.

These are the short and simple annals of the prisoner. He had recently been a resident of New Jerusalem, on the north fork of the Little Buttermilk, but had come to the newly discovered placers of Mammon Hill immediately before the "rush" by which the former place was depopulated. The discovery of the new diggings had occurred opportunely for Mr. Gilson, for it had only just before been intimated to him by a New Jerusalem vigilance committee that it would better his prospects in, and for, life to go somewhere, and so he naturally established himself at Mammon Hill; but being eventually followed thither by all his judges he ordered his conduct with considerable circumspection, but as he had never been known to do an honest day's work at any industry sanctioned by the stern local code of morality except draw-poker (at which he invariably lost, he was still an object of suspicion. Indeed, it was conjectured that he was the author of the many daring depredations that had recently been made with pan and brush upon the sluice-boxes.

Prominent among those in whom this suspicion had ripened into a steadfast conviction was a Mr. Brentshaw. At all seasons and unseasonable times Mr. Brentshaw avowed his belief in Mr. Gilson's connection with these unholy midnight enterprises, and his own willingness to prepare a way for the solar beams through the body of any one who might think it expedient to utter a different opinion—which, in his presence, no one was more careful not to do than the peace-loving person most concerned. Whatever may have been the truth of the matter, it is certain that Mr. Gilson frequently lost more "clean dust" at Jo. Bentley's faro table than it was recorded in local history that he had ever honestly earned at draw-poker in all the days of the camp's existence. But at last Mr. Bentley—fearing, it may be, to lose the more profitable patronage of Mr. Brentshaw—peremptorily refused to let Mr. Gilson copper the queen, intimating at the same time, in his frank, forthright way, that the privilege of losing money at "this bank" was a blessing appertaining to, proceeding logically from, and coterminous with, a condition of notorious commercial righteousness and social good repute.

The Hill thought it high time to look after a person whom its most honored citizen had felt it his duty to rebuke at a ruinous personal sacrifice. The New Jerusalem contingent, particularly, began to abate something of the toleration begotten of amusement at their own blunder in banishing an objectionable neighbor from the place they had left to the place whither they had come. Mammon Hill was at last of one mind; not much was said, but that Mr. Gilson must hang was "in the air." It was at this critical juncture of affairs that on a misty, moonlight night Mr. Brentshaw rode quietly up alongside a person who was evidently leaving that part of the country, laid a hand upon the halter connecting Mr. Gilson's wrist with Mr. Harper's bay mare, tapped him familiarly on the cheek with the barrel of a navy revolver, and requested the pleasure of his company in a direction the exact opposite of that in which he was traveling.

It was indeed rough on Gilson. On the morning after his arrest he was tried, convicted, and sentenced. It only remains, so far as concerns his earthly career, to hang him, reserving for more particular mention his last will and testament, which, with great labor, he contrived in prison, and in which, probably from some confused and imperfect notion of the rights of captors, he bequeathed every thing he owned to his "lawful exceceter," Mr. Brentshaw. The bequest, however, was made conditional on the legatee taking the testator's body from The Tree and "planting it white."

So Mr. Gilson was—I was about to say "swung off," but I fear there has been already something too much of slang in this straightforward statement of facts; besides, the manner in which the law took its course is more accurately described in the terms employed by the judge in passing sentence—Mr. Gilson was "strung up."

In due season Mr. Brentshaw, somewhat touched, it may be, by the empty compliment of the bequest, repaired to The Tree to pluck the fruit thereof. When taken down the body was found to have in its waistcoat pocket a duly attested codicil to the will already executed. Briefly stated, the purport of the codicil was this:

Whereas, at divers times and in sundry places, certain persons had asserted that during his life the testator had robbed their sluice-boxes; therefore, if during the five years next succeeding the date of this instrument any one should make proof of such assertion before a court of law, such person was to receive as reparation the entire personal and real estate of which the testator died seized and possessed, minus the expenses of court and a stated compensation to the executor, Henry Clay Brentshaw; provided, that if more than one person made such proof the estate was to be equally divided between or amongst them. But in case none should succeed in so establishing the testator's guilt, then the whole property, minus court expenses, as aforesaid, should go to the said Henry Clay Brentshaw for his own use, as stated in the will.

The syntax of this remarkable document was perhaps open to critical objection, but that was clearly enough the meaning of it. The orthography conformed to no recognized system, but being mainly phonetic it was not ambiguous. In truth, as the Judge of the Probate Court remarked, it would take five acts to beat it. Mr. Brentshaw smiled good-humoredly, and after performing the last sad rites with amusing ostentation, had himself duly sworn as executor and conditional legatee under the provisions of a law hastily passed (at the instance of the member from Mammon Hill) by a facetious Legislature; which law was afterward discovered to have also created three or four lucrative offices, and authorized the expenditure of a considerable sum of public money for the construction of a certain railway bridge that with greater advantage might perhaps have been erected on the line of some actual or projected railway.

Of course Mr. Brentshaw expected neither profit from the will nor litigation in consequence of its unusual provisions; Mr. Gilson, although frequently "flush," had been a man whom assessors and tax-collectors were well satisfied to lose no money by. But a careless and merely formal search amongst his papers revealed the title deeds to valuable estates in the East, and certificates of deposit for incredible sums in banks less severely scrupulous than that of Mr. Jo. Bentley. Altogether, the property amounted to a sum requiring for expression in dollars no less than seven figures.

The astounding news got abroad directly, throwing the Hill into a fever of excitement. The Mammon Hill Patriot, whose editor had been a leading spirit in the proceedings which resulted in Mr. Gilson's departure from New Jerusalem, published a most complimentary obituary notice of the deceased, and was good enough to call attention to the fact that his degraded contemporary of the Squaw Gulch Clarion was bringing virtue into contempt by beslaving with flattery the memory of one who in life had spurned the vile sheet as a nuisance from his door. Undeterred by the press, however, claimants under the will were not slow in presenting themselves with their evidence; and, great as was the Gilson estate, it appeared conspicuously paltry considering the vast number of sluice-boxes from which it was averred to have been obtained. The country rose as one man!

Mr. Brentshaw was equal to the emergency. With a shrewd appreciation of humble auxiliary devices, he at once erected above the bones of his benefactor a costly monument, overtopping every rough head-board in the cemetery, and on this he judiciously caused to be inscribed an epitaph of his own composing, eulogizing the honesty, public spirit, and cognate virtues of him who slept beneath, "a victim to the unjust aspersions of Slander's viper brood." He employed the best legal talent to defend the memory of his departed friend, and for five long years the Courts of this State were occupied with causes growing out of the Gilson bequest.

Nor was the battle confined to the temples of the blind goddess. It invaded the press, the pulpit, the parlor. It raged in the mart, the exchange, the school; in the gulches, and on the street corners. And on the last day of the memorable lustrum to which suits for the Gilson property were limited the sun went down upon a community in which the moral instinct was dead, the social conscience callous.

On the night of that day it so happened that the cemetery in which lay the now honored ashes of the late Milton Gilson, Esq., was partially under water. Swollen by incessant rains, Cat Creek had spilled an angry flood over its banks, which, after scooping out unsightly hollows wherever the soil had been disturbed, had partially subsided, as if ashamed of the sacrilege, leaving exposed much that had been piously concealed. Even the famous Gilson monument, the pride and glory of Mammon Hill, was no longer a standing rebuke to the "viper brood," but, succumbing to the sapping current, had toppled prone to earth. The ghoully flood had exhumed the poor, decayed, pine coffin, which now lay half-lifted from the grave, in pitiful contrast with the pompous monolith that, like a giant note of admiration, emphasized the disclosure.

To this depressing spot, drawn by some subtle fascination which he had sought neither to analyze nor resist, came Mr. Brentshaw. He seated himself pensively on the prostrate monument, trying by the uncertain moonlight to spell out the noble epitaph which, five years before, he had composed with a chuckle that memory had not recorded, the tears of remorse sprang to his eyes as he remembered that he had been mainly instrumental in compassing by a false accusation this good man's death.

As he sat there torturing himself with unavailing regrets a faint shadow fell across his eyes. Looking toward the moon hanging low and red in the west, he saw what seemed a vague, watery cloud obscuring her disk; but as it moved so that her beams lit up one side of it he perceived the clear, sharp outline of a human figure. The chill of the marble upon which he sat rose that instant along his spine, spread over his shoulders, neck, scalp, penetrated his very bones and pervaded his blood. The apparition became momentarily more distinct, and grew, visibly, in approach. Dazed as were his senses, half-paralyzed with terror and confounded with dreadful imaginings, Mr. Brentshaw yet could not but perceive in this unearthly presence a strange likeness to the mortal part of the late Milton Gilson as that gentleman had appeared when taken from The Tree. The similitude was indeed complete, even to the bulging, stony eyes and a certain shadowy circle about the neck. In apparel it was without coat or hat, precisely as Mr. Gilson had been when laid in his rough, cheap casket by the not ungentle hands of Carpenter Pete—for whom some one had long since performed the same kindly office. The spectre, if spectre it was, appeared to have something in its hands.

It drew nearer, with apparent unconsciousness of Mr. Brentshaw, pausing at last beside the coffin of the late Mr. Gilson. The lid of which was awry, half disclosing the uncertain interior. Bending over this, the phantom seemed to shake into it from a basin some dark substance of dubious consistency, then glided stealthily back to the lowest part of the cemetery. Here the retiring flood had stranded a number of open coffins, about and amongst which it moved with low sobbings and stillly whispers. Stooping over one of the coffins, the apparition, with an automatic, mindless regularity of movement indescribably more suggestive of death than the most rigid repose, brushed the contents into a basin, then, returning to its own casket, emptied the vessel into that as before. This dismal performance was repeated at nearly every exposed coffin, the ghost sometimes dipping the basin into the running water and gently agitating it therein, as if to free it of the baser clay, always hoarding the remainder in its own box. In short, the impenitent spirit of the late Milton Gilson was panning out the dust of its neighbors, and with ghastly cupidity adding the same to its own.

SAN RAFAEL, October 20, 1878.

A. G. B.

PRELUDES--IN DIVERS KEYS.

Wilt thou have music? Hark! Apollo plays."

In view of the fact that Mr. Herold's orchestra was this week compelled to forego one of its usual rehearsals, and the added fact that it never seems to have had quite enough of them at the best (and that, consequently, the loss of one is really a very serious matter), it would be scarcely fair to deal with the performance at last Wednesday's matinee from any severely critical standpoint. In such cases the conductor—himself, at least, quite as sensitive to all shortcomings as the most exacting of his audience—is entitled to sympathy; and if, under such circumstances, we get anything like a reasonably smooth performance, one without mishaps or serious blemishes, I, for one, am ready to be easily satisfied, and carry off my share of the symphony with nothing but gratitude to the giver of the feast, and a hope that all may go better next time. I wish it were also possible to look forward to better programmes in the future; programmes in which the search for novelties might carry Mr. Herold's experience of the repertory backward to an occasional recollection of the fact that Mozart and Haydn also composed symphonies that will still bear listening to; in which there should be recognizable a somewhat more logical (I won't say æsthetic, although that's what I mean) arrangement of the various numbers, or in which one might occasionally get through an afternoon without four horns, four trumpets (cornets-a-piston), and three trombones, not to mention side drums and triangle.

Let me revert for a moment to last Wednesday's matinee, one of the noteworthy features of which was Mr. Schlott's performance of Mozart's horn concerto, which, if not entirely faultless in point of execution, was thoroughly enjoyable for its beautiful phrasing and chaste, musical interpretation. The slow (middle) movement was rendered as it might have been by a great singer of the old—now, alas, forgotten—Italian school, and, to those who had ears for it, was the one truly artistic moment of the afternoon. The other numbers were Gade's Fourth Symphony (in B flat), Wagner's Rienzi overture (horrid row!), and two trifles, Schumann's Reverie and Taubert's Liebeslied, for string orchestra, the last an unaccountably rough and slovenly performance.

I have been to see Fatinitza, and should have no fault to find if I had not been compelled to hear it at the same time. It is really very pretty—all but the music. This seems to have been composed for the express purpose of satisfying the world that Mr. von Suppé (Wasser-Suppé I should call him) can not write pretty music for more than four consecutive measures, and that when he does happen to stumble upon a reasonably interesting phrase, he has not the remotest idea of what to do with it. He seems to write his opera bouffe under protest, never permitting himself a bit of pretty melody lest he should appear trivial. The musical dreariness of the performance is heightened by the fact that only one of the company (Lafontaine) can sing his part even acceptably, and that it is in the main so over-scored that it is well nigh impossible to hear what little voice the Misses Cottrelly and Prescott have available. Mr. Freeman has none, and Mr. Gates might almost as well be in the same fix, as what he has is of no use to him—or anybody else. I understand that this operetta has had considerable success in Berlin and Vienna, and imagine this to be because the public of those cities gets its fill of pretty music, and is occasionally right glad to take a rest. I can fancy the tuneful Offenbach, most genial purveyor of musical cocktails, as he laughs in his sleeve (out of which he shakes so many pretty melodies) over this dreary mass of musically correct how-not-to-do-it, and makes his compliments to Mr. von Suppé. Fancy what he, or even Lecocq, would have done with such a sparkling, suggestive libretto to work upon. They would have poured you out charming melodies until every pretty girl should sing them, every gamin whistle, and every organ grind them. And Mr. von Suppé gives—probably the best he has; but a sad lot of rubbish it is, to be sure.

The first of the third series of the Schmidt Quintette Soirées took place at Mercantile Library Hall last evening. The subscription list is encouragingly full, and the programme of the season varied and interesting.

I want to suggest to some of the piano forte-playing young ladies who heard the lovely minuetto from Schubert's Quartette in A minor at the Quintette Concert last night (I am writing this before the concert takes place, but dare not wait until next week, lest they should have forgotten all about it including the minuetto) that Mr. Perabo has arranged, and Ditson (I believe) published, this little gem for a single player, and that it is well worth—yes, a thousand times worth—the trouble they will find in learning to play it. At the same time I may be permitted to mention a fact that seems to be unaccountably overlooked by the majority of both teachers and players, and musicians generally, viz.: that this same Mr. Schubert wrote a great deal of beautiful music for the piano—sonatas, impromptus, fantasies, etc., for two hands, besides a perfect bonanza of delightful duets (à quatre mains) in the form of marches, polonaises, and sonatas. Everybody knows Schubert's songs—i. e. some dozen or score of them out of over five hundred and odd that are printed—but nobody seems to know or care much about his pianoforte music, and yet much of it is as good as the best of the songs.

The death of Mr. Joseph Trenkle, which occurred quite suddenly on the 19th instant, affects me, in spite of the modest and retiring nature which kept him almost entirely aloof from the public, like the passing from among us of a prominent man, and indeed I doubt not that there are many who occupy a much larger share of the public attention whom we could better have spared. An admirable pianist, and cultured and refined gentleman, he worked earnestly and conscientiously as a teacher of his instrument, and exerted over his numerous pupils the most noble and healthful influence. His work was not for a day, nor will the result of it be speedily lost to us. Like all that is of the best, it will endure.

S. E.

CONFIDENTIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

Walker, Junior, Addresses that Uncle of Mine.

PHOENIX CLUB, SAN FRANCISCO, October 24.

MY DEAR UNCLE:—Miss Ellie Wilton put a very pertinent question to the gentleman who telegraphs interesting, but not altogether reliable, intelligence to a morning paper, when he interviewed her touching that little affair of Mr. Austin's. She asked him if her letters were to be treated as public property because she belonged to the theatrical profession. She has a great respect for her profession, but that was perhaps not a fair view to take of the matter. She is an attractive lady, and has mortally offended the scandal-loving public by always dressing on the stage with great taste. She has thereby drawn away from less fortunate ladies an admiration which it is the ambition of their lives to obtain, and it would doubtless be an intense gratification to those miserables if it were to be publicly stated that Mr. Austin paid for the dresses. I am inclined to think that Miss Ellie Wilton paid for them herself. She had a good salary at the California Theatre, "she was fortunate in stocks," (?) why therefore should she not pay for them? But it is not to take up the question of the scandal which public officials have foolishly made about an actress that I make this reference. It is entirely in connection with the profession that I comment upon it. It shows exactly what the position of actors and actresses is. The theatrical profession is one of the border tribes of society—half in, half out; half acknowledged and half despised. Of all its members there are few really free or fit to enter the higher circles, and by whose fault? There may be, there are, honest, honorable men, and pure and virtuous women on the stage. There are many of them. But the question is, what is the advantage of being honest, honorable, pure, or virtuous, while the vast mass in the profession keep the tone so low? I fancy that most of the trouble, so far as the public are concerned, is to be placed to the account of the female members. It must be admitted that the men who have most aided in forming the public opinion of the profession are not dramatic artists, and that the women whose general style of life has given rise to this impression of immorality are not much admired by their associates. But with that the public can have little to do, if dramatic artists permit themselves to be classed with nigger minstrels, can-can dancers, women whose talents are less admirable than their legs and busts, and whose appearance and behavior off the stage do not give any high impression of their moral character. The question is one upon which a good deal of discussion could be raised, discussion which I have no intention of entering into. I have met many actors who have bitterly complained that the profession is rudely abused and villainously maltreated by the public. They have told me that the opinion as to the immorality of the women on the stage is much exaggerated; that virtue is the rule, and vice the exception. Many of these pleaders have been married, but I have found, in not a few cases, that they would not permit their wives to act—a very sad and suggestive commentary. I once knew a very sprightly little soubrette. She was adored by the gallery and bald-heads, and crowded the pit when she appeared in tights. I was somewhat fascinated myself, and I made her acquaintance. Suppers and hacks to the Cliff House were more expensive in those days, my dear uncle, and my allowance was not always sufficient to enable me to carry on the liaison without severe pinching to hide it from your avuncular eyes. But I did. She was not very learned. She had a rude way of treating waiters and hackmen, and even used to address me in language which produced a momentary chill on my devotion. She sometimes said she loved me, but that was when the champagne had got into her head. Champagne produced the same effect in her head that her fascination produced in my heart. She had had a husband, "God knows when," and he was living in divorce, "God knows where." That was vague. There were times when she denied his existence. But she was good. She loved a glass of wine, and would put her arms around me quite affectionately, but she was a Sunday-school scholar. She would even rehearse little love scenes with me, and I could see her repeat almost to literalness the whole business on the stage the next night. I adored her to distraction. I was not foolish enough to tell anybody all about my adventure. I kept it quiet. Young Dodd was my intimate companion then. One night I introduced him to her. He was enchanted. I found she had frequent engagements after that. Young Dodd was always asking me to take him round to supper with us when I did meet her. It did not strike me as strange that he always knew of such engagements. He said she was such a nice, pleasant, frank, innocent little girl that he wished he knew her as well as I did. I introduced Young Bilkins to her. Young Bilkins was agreeably surprised. He always thought soubrettes were so coarse. She had more frequent engagements than ever. I introduced Young Spiffles to her; she was the most charming girl he had ever met. He envied me, too, but I never saw her after that; she was always engaged. One fatal night I took my stand outside of the theatre door as usual. A man came up and leaned against a lamp-post a little up the street. He was covered up in coat-collar. Another man, also all coat-collar, sauntered by and stopped opposite a fruit store. A third man came up and stood with his back against the window next the theatre door. A rustle of a dress. Suddenly the door opened; we all met, Bilkins, Dodd, Spiffles, and myself, and she came out with the stage manager, carrying a satchel. She said: "Gentlemen, I am happy to have had this opportunity of saying good-bye. I go to-morrow." We walked up the street, went into an oyster saloon, turned down our collars, and I said: "Boys, I'll pay the bill." I accidentally stumbled across her husband in New York last year. He had never been divorced that he knew, and wanted to punch my head for insinuating that his wife had ever been guilty of any impropriety. I immediately explained that I meant another lady. He invited me to call, which I did not do. I am not going to say that she was immoral, but perhaps good people, not so given to wickedness as myself, would hesitate before they committed themselves to an opinion of her character. This was only fun, no doubt. No doubt she was true to her husband; I can not say. Spiffles, Bilkins, Dodd, and myself had much the same opinion of her, and it did not agree with her husband's. Having been so deceived by a lady whose reputation was only for frankness and freedom as opposed to license, I determined that if ever I fell in love again it would be with one whose character should not disappoint me. I did fall in love with a "second lady." I believe that's what her position was called on the stage. She was not a lady of any great ability. She had any number of friends, who told me all sorts of stories about her. Every one of them knew little incidents in her career. She was frequently seen going out to the Cliff House by moonlight, had supper parties in her rooms, was free of speech, not particular as to manners; in fact, not in the least a woman by whom respect would be appreciated. This was what I was told. Didn't every informant "know it for a fact?" Hadn't one half of them been at her rooms at these suppers, and hadn't they seen her kick a man's hat off as he came into the room? How to get introduced to her was the question. I was told to go and call without ceremony; she didn't mind that. My instincts were opposed to rudeness, even to a woman like this. Still, one might take me for a fool if I did not treat her as other men treated her. I conceded so much to my self-respect that I framed some business with her, I don't know what. I called at the hotel; I sent up my card. The boy came down and said the lady would see me. I thought of that kicking peculiarity as I went up stairs, and I mechanically took off my hat. The boy pointed out a door to me and left. I stood a moment, nerving myself for the encounter with coarseness and vulgarity. What would she look like! She would be lying in a loose dressing-gown or reading a novel and smoking a cigarette. Well, I was ready for her. I knocked. A pleasant voice called out: "Come in." I opened the door. There she was, quietly and elegantly dressed in black silk, a perfect lady-like figure, rising with a charming smile to greet me. Surely, I had got into the wrong room! It was elegantly furnished, a profusion of pretty nicknacks tastefully arranged, a large easel standing there with a beautiful picture resting on it, a stand of flowers on the mantelpiece, a magnificent ornamental centre piece facing me, a canary in a cage by the window, and in her hand a copy of Tennyson's Idylls of the King. Her voice came like music; her hand, with only one or two plainly beautiful rings on the finger, grasped mine with the soft touch of perfect breeding, and then waved me to a chair neatly adorned with some delicate covering. She said she was pleased to meet me, and asked me in gentle tones what was the occasion of my call. My dear uncle, if I ever felt small, insignificant, infinitesimal in my life, it was before this "second lady" of the theatre. My first impulse was to apologize for calling at all and back out; but there was such a repose in her manner, such a fascination in her smile, that I stumbled through my mission—which, fortunately, was a plausible one—and made one of the pleasantest acquaintances of my life. What was her history?—A simple one. She had been well educated, tenderly brought up, accustomed to luxury and ease. The common misfortune called bad luck came to her, and she had to seek a livelihood. Gifted with taste and education, she tried the stage. She lived her life quietly and modestly, made few acquaintances, and many enemies. Men, whose lives were spent in haunting the green room, sought her affections and offered her bribes. These she refused, and jealousy and malice set to work on her reputation. Her salary was not large, but taste made up for her slender means; and so I found her. I have given you a contrast in theatrical life. It is not an uncommon contrast by any means, but it is a very unhappy one. It is the combination that is the mistake; and if anybody is to blame for the combination it is the business. Money is the cause of all the profession has to endure of ignominy. In haste to get rich, there is no time to spare to elevate the tone of the stage. A woman who will draw people to the theatre—a woman whose talent may be infinitesimal, but whose limbs or whose style is attractive, whatever may be her private character, is the requirement. Women whose modesty and virtue can scarcely stand the rude shock this naturally gives them, dare not think of going on the stage; naturally their places can be filled by less particular females, who have their own object in view before the public. The company is reduced in tone by unworthy "stars," and worthy "stars" have to accept whatever company they are offered. Again, theatrical women are more or less thrust into the public eye. They are talked about in the clubs, on the street, in the bar-room, as a matter of necessity. They encourage this by putting their names in big letters on big bills to be pasted on big boards; and part of their advertising is that everybody shall know their business. And what business is it of mine? None, my dear uncle, except that I know the acquaintance of theatrical women to be expensive and dangerous and undesirable, especially to old fellows with bank accounts, and I don't want you to make the fool of yourself that I hear, and fear, you contemplate doing. I have had the experience—please save the family the expense of buying it over again. This I beg of you.

Your very affectionate nephew, WALKER, JUNIOR.

The sand-lots are right in their position assumed in reference to the taxation of church property. There is no proposition more absolutely indefensible than that church property should be exempt from paying its just quota of taxes. The folly of Wellock will confound the wisdom of Shafter in any argument that can be made upon this proposition. The tax-payers will be with the labor party in issues of this kind.

BONBONS.—FRENCH AND OTHERWISE.

The man who fails in business but continues to live in luxury is a thief.

Elder sister (to little one who appears to take great interest in Mr. Skibbens)—"Come, little pet, it is time your eyes were shut in sleep."

Little pet—"Guess not. Mother told me to keep my eyes open when you and Mr. Skibbens were together."

Customer—"Look here, this meat is tainted. It's quite offensive."

Restaurant-keeper—"Yes, I think you're right, but I didn't tell you—I thought it might spoil your appetite."

A coxcomb, talking of the transmigration of souls, says: "In the time of Moses I have no doubt I was a golden calf." "Very likely," replies a lady; "time has robbed you of nothing but the gilding."

"I admit," said one dramatist of another, "that he has wit, but it is heavy wit."

"Heavy wit? What difference is there between heavy wit and any other kind of wit?"

"Precisely the difference that there is between a smell and a perfume."

Billiard-playing Husband (who claims that important lodge meetings keeps him out so late at night)—"Goodness gracious, Addie, what are you doing in this billiard saloon?"

Neglected Wife—"Oh, I thought I would like to enjoy some of your society; and as the children don't often see you, I brought them along with me. Keep right on with your 'lodge business,' I have got my sewing and I can wait until you are ready to go home."

She doesn't have to wait long.

"Don't I envy Louis James, though," observed a husband to his wife in an unguarded moment.

"And don't I envy Mary Anderson," she responded.

And there was a lull.

"I thought you had a dreadful row with X—, but you always seem to be together now; have you made it up with him?"

"My dear fellow, I detest him cordially. But I determined to make him uncomfortable, so I've become friends with him again so as to have the chance to say disagreeable things to him."

"What is meant by conscience?" asks an English school-master of his class.

"A hindward monitor," is the almost simultaneous reply.

"And what do you understand by a monitor?"

"A hiron-clad," exultingly yells an intelligent youth.

There is only one moment in the life of a San José girl that can compare in satisfaction with that when a lover declares his intentions. It is when her pretty fingers close on the mosquito that has been haunting the back of her neck, and rolls him up slowly and luxuriously into a pill.

A Detroit citizen breaks up a brisk fight between two boys, and, crowding the largest up against an ash barrel, says:

"It is a terrible thing for a boy like you to be fighting."

"I'd licked him if you hadn't come up!"

"Suppose you had. Do you want to be considered a dog? Why don't you try and be a good boy and get along peacefully with everybody? Suppose you had rolled off the wharf and been drowned?"

"Spos'n I hadn't, too! It's the good boys who get drowned!"

"What!"

"It's so, and I kin prove it! I'll bet a dollar agin a cent that more Sunday-school boys have been drowned this year than bad 'uns!"

The man reflects, and does not dispute the assertion.

"And more run over by the cars," continues the boy.

No answer again.

"And more of 'em got sick and died; and I'll bet I've got more money and have more fun than any good boy in town."

"But the good are rewarded," quietly observes the man.

"So are the bad," replies the boy. "I'll bet I make fifty cents before dark!"

"But the good are respected."

"So am I. I kin go up to the post-office and borrow $3 'bout any security, and I'll bet ten to five you can't! Come, now—put up or shut up!"

Mary had a little lamp;

Her lover all serene,

Extinguished it, for he did not

Want any carress seen.

Solution.—Let  $x$  equal "carress," and  $x$  plus  $y$  equal "carress seen;" then  $x$  plus  $y$  plus  $z$  will equal "kerosene," and we have the answer thus:

Extinguished it, for he did not Want any kerosene.

When Mary saw the lamp put out

She screamed: "Oh, dear, it's dark!"

"But bright enough," her lover said,

"With delight of a spark."

Solution.—Let  $q$  equal "delight," and  $b$  plus  $g$  equal a hyphen (-), when  $q$  plus  $b$  plus  $g$  will equal "de-light," which reduced to United States means "the light." Note— $a$ . The word "delight," refers to the joys of courtship,  $b$ , a some countries "spark" and "courtship" are synonymous terms. Therefore,

"But bright enough," her lover said,

"With the light of a spark."

What makes the youth love Mary so?

I'll tell you—she's a catch;

And he put out the lamp, you know,

So he might strike a match.

Solution.—This is very simple, and can be solved by mental process. The young man extinguished the lamp so that he could have the fun of striking a match and lighting it again.

The owner of Box 110, York, Neb., writes to the Postmaster of Chicago:

"I hear there is plenty of women that would like a home. I would like to correspond with one soon if you

THE DIARY OF A WOMAN.

Translated for the Argonaut from the French of Octave Feuillet.

[CONTINUED FROM LAST NUMBER.]

Cécile put the three louis into the hand of the fair little maiden, saying: "There, dear! Don't cry any more," and kissed her with a smack on both cheeks. We then continued our march. Cécile seemed a little thoughtful, and after taking a few steps said to Captain d'Eblis:

"Why didn't you want to drink after me?"

"Because, as I had the honor to tell you, Mademoiselle, I don't like milk."

"Don't tell a story; you meant it to be another lesson. When we get ten shall we make a cross? I don't find fault with you, seriously. I feel that I improve much in your society, Captain, and that, after a little more of this discipline, I shall become a miniature perfection."

There was more truth than she thought in her playful words. She had great respect for Monsieur d'Eblis, and is under restraint in his presence. She consults him with her eyes in spite of herself, to see if her acts or gestures displease him, and often stops short in the midst of her frolics if she discovers the slightest sign of disappointment in his expression. While she chews the bit, she recognizes her master and obeys him. In short, she feels in a high degree, as every one else does, the power of this firm yet gentle character, of this haughty and somewhat disdainful spirit. This association with Monsieur d'Eblis, if she could profit by it, would be salutary for her. Only he and I, in all the world, exercise this control over her. Ah! if ever, if ever the dream I have cradled comes to anything, this dear creature, shielded on every side by our love and influence, might indeed become perfect as she says, and the most lovable of perfections.

July 20th.—I am again quite overcome and disturbed by a conversation I have just had with Cécile. Affected by the reproaches which she addressed me the other day, I commenced again with much earnestness my consideration of the relative merits of the Messieurs de Valnesse, and after much thought had selected Monsieur René as being of a much more serious character and a more cultivated intellect than his cousin. Just now, after breakfast, I said in a confidential way to Cécile that I wished to speak to her.

"Very well," she answered, drily, "and what about?"

"Why, about what interests you so much?"

"Nothing interests me so much. But let's hear."

Somewhat surprised at this beginning, I led her away to the pine trees in the park.

"Well, dear," I said, "my choice is made."

"Ah, well, you took plenty of time for it."

"The choice will be all the better for that," replied I, laughing, and then began to recount my many hesitations, and to enumerate all the reasons which seemed to make the balance lean toward Monsieur René. She listened to me with a peculiar expression, and with closed lips and wandering eyes, striking now and then the trunks of the trees with the tip of her parasol. When I had finished, she said:

"There is one trouble about this, and that is, I prefer the other."

"What other?"

"Why, Monsieur Henri, of course."

"The trouble is not a very great one, dearest, for, as I have told you before, these gentlemen differ but slightly in character. There are in fact only shades of difference between them, and from this equality of good and suitable qualities and merits, it is clear that your own taste should guide you to a selection."

"So," replied Cécile, "you want to marry Monsieur René?"

"But I am not in question."

"Well, but would you marry him if you were at liberty to do so?"

"No."

"Why?"

"Because I do not love him."

"That is to say he is not worthy of you, but is good enough for me."

